A SURGEON, with a large practice, in the East of England, was in the habit of visiting members of his family residing in my parish in London. But, unhappily, like too many of his professional brethren, he was not in the habit of attending the house of God. Contrary, however, to his usual custom, on one of his visits he was prevailed upon to come to my church. He became so interested in the truths of the Gospel which he then heard that he determined henceforth always to attend when he had opportunity.

It was upon one of these occasional visits to his friends that I became personally acquainted with Mr. R. I found him to be a very gentlemanly man, of fine intellectual powers, and of a highly cultivated mind, and, what is rare in men of his profession, he was anxious to speak on matters relating to the soul. Nor was he narrow-minded, nor self-opinionated, and much less was he bigoted, or prejudiced against those doctrines of grace which were entirely new to him. He was a man of an inquiring mind, and always desired to go to the root of every subject, and to require an intelligent reason before yielding up his assent to any statement. He was not a man who argued for argument's sake, but he questioned and reasoned with the sole view of discovering and accepting truth. It was very pleasant to converse with him. He seemed to gain some additional light, and to make some advance in spiritual knowledge, and to grasp some new truth at every interview.

Some months passed away after my first acquaintance with my friend, when I was informed that he had been seized with an alarming illness, and had returned to London. I hastened to see him. I was pained to witness the sad change which a few months had wrought in him. He was evidently in a most critical state. The cold damps and foggy atmosphere of his country home, his exposure by night and day to the inclement weather in the rounds of his professional duties, had told fearfully upon his constitution. He knew full well the critical state he was in. Already he began to look upon himself as a dying man.

But there was no abatement in his mental vigor. His ample forehead and keen and penetrating eye indicated remarkable intelligence. Calm and earnest were our conversations on the one now absorbing question: "How can a guilty sinner appear justified before a holy God?" The Bible was constantly appealed to, as the only authority on this point. Day after day passed away, and the question was not solved to the satisfaction of the inquiring patient.

My friend rapidly grew worse. Nothing could stay the swift progress of his decline. He seemed to waste away before one's eyes. He was soon confined to his chamber, and then to his bed. But his mind remained as clear as ever, and his anxiety for the immediate salvation of his soul knew no abatement. He knew and felt that he had not yet discovered the true secret of safety and peace. He could not understand the great fundamental truth: "The just shall live by faith." He could not reconcile this doctrine with man's responsibility to "work out his own salvation." He had no doubt that the difficulty was his own. But until he could understand, and reconcile to his own satisfaction, these apparently conflicting truths, he could not receive them, nor find peace. His mind was greatly exercised and troubled. But I was certain the Holy Spirit was teaching him, and would lead him into the truth. He was earnest in prayer for enlightenment and guidance. And at last the whole truth burst upon his mind.

Upon entering his chamber on one Sunday afternoon, between the services at church, throwing out both his emaciated hands, and with a voice tremulous with joyful emotion, he exclaimed to me: "I see it all—I see it all—it is so clear and so simple."

And he did see it all. Truth is simple in proportion to its importance. And what did he see? What made him now so happy and triumphant? In a few terse, well chosen sentences, he explained that he now comprehended the way of salvation by Christ Jesus. He now saw clearly that God "justifies the ungodly," by imputing their sins to Christ, and imputing His righteousness to them. He understood now that, believing in Jesus, all his sins were atoned for on the cross, and that Christ had wrought out a perfect robe of righteousness on his behalf. Such passages as Rom. 4 and 5 and 2 Cor. 5 : 19-21 no longer puzzled him. He saw it all, and, what is more, he felt it all, and casting himself as a guilty, lost sinner at the feet of the Saviour, and looking to His blood and righteousness alone for acceptance before the mercy-seat, he found peace, and was made happy and joyous in believing.

I had longed for this moment with the yearning those only know whose life-work is the salvation of immortal souls. The joy I now felt at Mr. R.'s deliverance was proportionate to his own. I hoped that we might have many a happy hour's conversation on the Word of life. I knew he could no remain long with us, but I little thought his end was so near. After my evening's service in the church I again looked in upon him—but my friend was now passing away. He had but strength to beckon me to his side, and with difficulty to utter a few words of grateful love, and express his calm confidence in his Redeemer's merits.

The fear of death was removed. The near prospect of an eternity of bliss dawned upon him. And in the full assurance of faith in a crucified and risen Saviour he peacefully passed away into that Presence where there is fulness of joy, and where there are pleasures for evermore.

This was no common deathbed repentance. We have little confidence in such repentances. They often prove deceptive. But here was an instance of a calm, enlightened, deliberate, and prayerful inquiry after saving truth, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, which ended, as it always will end, in perfect peace and endless salvation.

A MEETING AT A KIOSK.

Encouragement for Preachers.

By the Rev. G. A. Rogers, M.A.

A Spanish Evangelist—His Wife's Conversion—A Welcome Letter from Australia—The Invalid's Conversion.

IN passing a Kiosk for the sale and gratuitous distribution of the Scriptures some years ago in the Maritime Exposition at Hav... where a dear friend had organized a great work for God, I was accosted by the inquiry, "Will you accept, sir, a copy of the Book of Revelation? It is a book little known and seldom read by Englishmen."

I turned to my interrogator and answered, "Do you dispose of many copies of the Scriptures in this place?" "Yes; they are eagerly sought after. Many a Frenchman having accepted a New Testament will begin reading it at once, and go on until he has finished it from Matthew to Revelation."

"Do you meet with much opposition from the priests?" "From some; but others, more enlightened, encourage their people to buy them. The other day a parish priest from the country brought up a bevy of his parishioners, and asked for a copy of the New Testament for each one of them."

"This is very encouraging," I replied. "Are you Mr. Hawke?"

"Yes," he answered; "and are you Mr. Rogers? Oh, how glad I am that you have come!"

Our conversation was here interrupted by the well-known missionary who labors as an evangelist in Spain, who, upon learning my name, came forward, and, grasping my hand, exclaimed, "How glad my wife will be to see you!" "Do I know her?" I asked. "No; but she knows you, and you are her spiritual father." "Tell me, when and where?" "It is now nearly eighteen years ago, when you were Vicar of L——, that this happy event took place. She lived in the neighborhood, some miles distant from the town, and from what she heard of your ministry she was led to go to your church. She became a regular attendant, and it was there the Lord brought the word home to her heart, and she became savingly converted. She never liked to make herself known to you then. But how glad she will be to see you now!"

"Is she with you in Havre?"

"Yes; we are spending the summer here during the Exposition to help Mr. Hawke, and to labor among the Spaniards attracted by it."

It was not long before I found my way to the temporary abode of Mrs. L——. I need not describe the mutual pleasure the unexpected interview afforded us. She was surrounded by a happy little family, whom she was striving to bring up in the fear of the Lord. How thankfully and gratefully did she recall the ministry of the word in the old Minster Church where the Lord met with her. With what humble gratitude did we, on that foreign shore, bow our knees together and bless God for His goodness!

This little incident has often encouraged me in the work of the ministry. We ministers need encouragement. Our hearts grow sad when we labor on day after day, week after week, month after month, and, in some places see so little fruit of our toil. We sow the good seed, but how seldom do we see it spring up! We cast the bread upon the waters, but how long it is before we find it again! Our labors seem to be in vain. Our prayers seem to be forgotten. We sow in hope, but hope speeds from us on wings. The ministers of evil flourish, and gather in their sad harvests. We witness the effects of the powers of darkness.

But we need not be discouraged. There is a seed time, and a harvest time is coming. The husbandman waiteth, and we must wait. We shall yet gather the ripe and full sheaves into our bosom if we be faithful and patient. The Lord is not slack concerning His promises. "Eighteen years" may seem long to wait for gathering in one soul, but this one was probably a type of many others. We know, thank God, that many besides the missionary's wife received the Word with joy and to their salvation in that old Minster Church. How many the recording angel has noted in the Book of Life we know not. But though we have to wait twice-told eighteen years, it matters not. "My word shall not return unto Me void."

A LETTER FROM AUSTRALIA

ately reached me. It came from an unknown correspondent, one who had attended my church in Regent Square. I had never spoken to her, nor had I ever seen her; but in a far distant land her heart was drawn out, under an impulse she could no longer resist, to tell me that it was under my ministry the Lord had met with her and brought her to Himself. On three several occasions she had endeavored to call on me in London to thank me. Thrice she actually came to my door for the purpose, but each time her heart had failed her. Twenty-five years had now passed away, and she felt constrained to pay this debt of gratitude, and to confess what God had done for her soul. She is now laboring for Christ in the hospitals and in other spheres of work in Australia.

"I have found the Lord Jesus Christ, and I should like Mr. Rogers to know it."

These were glad tidings, conveyed to me in a letter from England, just as I was compelled a few years ago to seek rest on the Continent. While on a visit in the neighborhood of London, I had met a gentleman who had been ordered home from China, having suffered from a sunstroke. I had many times spoken to him about the never-dying interests of his soul. He had listened with interest to the simple exposition of the way of salvation, but without giving me any grounds for hoping that he had found the Saviour. Upon subsequent inquiry, I learnt that he had been taken alarmingly ill—so ill, indeed, that he had to be placed under the care of strangers. But shortly before his death he enjoyed a lucid interval, and recalling perhaps my anxiety for his spiritual welfare, he said to one who took down the words, "I have found the Lord Jesus Christ, and I should like Mr. Rogers to know it."

It was his own sister, herself a child of God, who gleaned these facts, and kindly gladdened and cheered my heart with the welcome tidings.

Let all who know the Lord be encouraged to speak for Him at all times—in season and out of season. In some unexpected moment we may learn that angels in heaven have sung for joy over the words we have uttered in our Master's name.

TRIAL TRIP OF THE LIVINGSTONE.

Mr. Guiness's New Mission Steamer on the Congo River South Africa—Doubts as to the Engine's Power Dispelled—Arrival at the French Agent's House at Borna—The Quickest Passage on the Congo—Present State of the Mission.

IN our issue of July 28th appeared a brief notice of the arrival of the steam-launch sent from Mr. Guiness's Missionary Institute in London to Africa. We now publish a picture of the little ship, and further particulars. It is intended for navigating the Congo, and to aid Mr. McCall and his fellow-missionaries generally in their work in Congoland.

The launch arrived out at the Congo River, in Central Africa, last May, and Mr. McCall came from Manyanga, further inland, to see it, and make a trial trip with it. He writes:

"Everybody here, including myself, thought the engines of the Livingstone far too small to drive the launch up the river. On Thursday, May 5th, we loaded her up with a ton and a half of cargo, boxes of rice, bales, boxes, etc., together with about three quarters of a ton of coal. We loaded her carefully so as to balance her well fore and aft, and put the propeller well down in the water. Everything was prepared for a fair start next morning.

"Friday 6.—We steamed out of Banana at 6.15 A.M., with a pilot at the helm (lent by the French house), Angus, in the stern, Joe at his post managing the engines, etc., Joe (No. 2) the black stoker, also at his work, and the three hands 'for'ad.' We started out in good form under seventy pounds steam pressure. I had not yet seen the pretty little engines working under strong pressure, but now I soon discovered that with pressure they could drive us though the current splendidly. It was a lovely morning, the water calm as a lake, the rising sun gleaming brightly over the placid river. Our little Livingstone flew along, steady as a rock, graceful as a swan, comfortable as an arm-chair!

"Soon we rounded Roolambemba Point (the commencement of the Congo River proper) and entered upon our task of steaming up against the current; but to my joy and satisfaction we went ahead almost as if there were no current against us! We 'pounded' away (pardon the word) mile after mile, the strength of the current always increasing, the little engine humming again with the rapidity of its revolutions, and the propeller raising a perfect whirlpool astern, making the seething water hiss and curl up under our counter until it nearly reached the gunwales. We reached the landing-stage of the French house at Ponta da Lenha at eleven A.M., only four hours and three quarters from Banana, a distance of over thirty miles—about thirty-six, I believe.

"At 12.30 we were again under steam and away for Boma, where we arrived about 5 P.M., and made fast at the pier of the French house, everybody remarking what a capital run we had made. After dinner I called on Mr. Greshoff to request him to let me have a little coal. We arranged for our boys to come for it in the morning early.

"Saturday 7.—Steam up at 6 A.M. Some delay getting the coal; finally started for Massuca and Nokki at 7 A.M., and arrived at Massuca, after a capital run of exactly four hours, a distance of thirty miles and strong current. I met Mr. Grenfell here for the first time, and had a chat with him, breakfasting at Signor Santos' (who is always agreeable and hospitable), left again for Nokki soon after 1 P.M., running direct to Nokki in about one hour, thus making the entire 'run' from Banana to Nokki, a distance of 105 to 110 miles, in a day and a half, including stoppages, fourteen hours of actual steaming. No steamer on the river, Stanley's or otherwise, has ever done it in a shorter time.

"On Tuesday morning at 6.30 we steamed out of Nokki, Mr. and Mrs. Craven and Signor Martini as passengers; in twenty-eight minutes we were at Massuca. Mr. Grenfell came alongside with his boat, into which Mr. and Mrs. Craven stepped at once, and in two minutes we were off 'full steam ahead' for Boma. We regularly flew down with the current, and actually arrived at Boma in two hours from Massuca—i.e., fifteen miles an hour.

"Here I had a call or two to make, and to get some more coal, so that we did not start again until 10.10 A.M., when we ran for Banana direct without going to Ponta da Lenha. We had a fine run down; and although the last fifteen or twenty miles were against wind and tide and a head sea, we cut through splendidly, tossing the spray far and wide, and, with only half pressure, we arrived at Banana at 3 P.M.—i.e. ten minutes under five hours, a distance of seventy miles. With a full head of steam we could have done it easily in four hours and a half.

"So ended the trial trip of our pretty little Livingstone, to the complete satisfaction of all parties, and with hearty thanksgiving to our loving Father, the Giver of all good gifts, and the One in whom is our joy, and our hope now and for ever."

A HINDOO GOD IMPRISONED.

THE Vyshnavs are a large section of the most intelligent Hindoo merchants in Western India, who worship their own priests or Maharajah, believing them to be incarnations of God. Some of their modes of rendering devotion to the Maharajahs are too filthy to be related and would scarcely be believed. One of these Maharajahs has been convicted by a British court of justice of complicity in the theft of a parcel of pearls from a post-office, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine amounting to one thousand dollars. As the Vyshnavs believe that nothing a Maharajah does can be wrong, they attach no importance whatever to his conviction of the crime, but they are overwhelmed with horror at their god being classed with felons. An Indian paper thus describes how the Vyshnavs received the news:

"When the effects of the shock caused by the intelligence gave place to reflection, men, leaving aside their business, collected in large groups in the market and began to speculate on the extent of the accuracy of the information received. The knowing ones declared it to be absolutely correct; and then ejaculations of 'Ram, Ram,' (God! God!) escaped those upon whom the conviction laid its hold that he, whom they regarded as the incarnation of the deity, had been condemned to a felon's jail. When the news was confirmed, the Vyshnavs, with one consent, closed their establishments. As they constitute a large portion of the native trading community, this measure practically meant the stoppage of all business in the native town, the streets of which presented a curious appearance. In the Bhooleshwar district, the crowd of devotees was very great, long lines of carriages outside the temple indicating that the mourning was not confined to the lower and less opulent classes. At the temples prayers and offerings were made to the idols to secure the release of the incarcerated Maharajah, and a general fast was observed until yesterday evening by the entire community."

The Vyshnavs are among the most astute and prosperous traders of Bombay, a large share of the commerce of that emporium being in their hands, and it is said that they are prepared to raise ten millions of dollars in the attempt to deliver the Maharajah from the clutches of the law.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

The Magistrates' Meeting.

UPTOWN was not worthy of the name of town; it could hardly be called a large village. But it was the centre of a wide agricultural district, and a small market was held in it once a week, chiefly for the sale of butter and eggs, as the farmers carried their corn to a more important market farther away in the county-town. A magistrates' meeting was held at Uptown at stated intervals; and there was a police station just outside the village, provided with two cells but seldom occupied, in one of which Ishmael had been safely kept since noonday on Saturday.

Heavy-hearted still, though with a fund of secret courage bearing her up, Ruth entered Uptown on the Monday morning. There was more stir than usual about the single street, as there always was on the days when the magistrates came to hear the trivial cases which awaited their judgment. Round the inn where the justices' room was, there were several groups of somewhat discreditable folks hanging about in readiness. Nutkin was within the inn-yard, eagerly talking to one of the magistrates who had arrived before the others, and had just dismounted from his horse. Ruth saw him, but it was as if she did not see him, so absorbed was her whole soul in watching for Ishmael to come along the road between the town and the police-station.

She was half unconscious of the increasing crowd and stir as the magistrates rode in one after another; and the magistrates' clerk bustled down from his house with his blue bag full of papers. Mrs. Clift had arrived too with Elsie; and Squire Lansdowne was gone into the large room of the inn; but she only half knew it. At last Ishmael appeared, walking beside a policeman, who kept his hand tightly on his collar, as if to remind him it was of no use to try to escape. But could this sullen, scowling lad, with rough uncombed hair and tear-stained face, be Ishmael? He was close beside her, yet he never raised his eyes; and he would have passed her by, if she had not cried out in a very lamentable voice, "Oh, Ishmael, Ishmael!"

"It's my mother," he said, as the policeman tightened his grasp of his collar. "Don't you come inside, mother dear. It 'ud do no good, and it 'ud make me cry. You go home again now you've seen me, to say good-bye. You'll loose me to kiss my mother?" he added, looking at the policeman.

"Ay, if you're sharp about it," he answered.

For a minute the young boy, scarcely more than a child, and the bent, gray-haired woman stood with their arms fondly clinging about each other. Ruth felt as if she could not let him go; it seemed but a few days since he was but a baby in her bosom; and now he was a prisoner charged with an offence against the laws of his country. But Ishmael loosened his hands and let himself be led away inside the magistrates' room. Then she sat down on the lowest step of a horse-block below its open window, through which she could hear the hum of voices coming indistinctly to her ear. How long it was she did not know, but a gayly-dressed, flaunting young woman came to her at length, and spoke in a pitying tone.

"Don't you take on, Mrs. Medway," she said; "you're a good woman, I know, but luck's agen you. Nutkin was very hard on him; and they've give him three months in the county jail."

"Is it my Ishmael?" she asked, looking up with a wandering and vacant expression in her eyes.

"To be sure," answered the young woman. "'Ishmael Medway, thirteen years of age; three months for stealing pheasants' eggs.'"

Ruth heard no more, saw nothing more. But bending forward, as if to lift herself upon her feet, she fell heavily on the pavement, in a deep swoon. There was a crowd clustering about her when Ishmael was marched out of the inn by the policeman; he looked round in vain for a last glance at his mother's face.

"It were best for her to go away," he said to himself, with a sob; "but I should ha' liked to ha' seen her again."

He felt as if he was going to die in the prison to which they were sending him, and as if he should never see his mother's face again. His young soul was in a bewilderment of grief and amazement. He had heard himself described as an incorrigible thief and poacher. Everything had gone against him; the notorious character of his father and elder brothers; his own admission of having haunted the woods until he knew every spot in them; even his tearful confession that he knew he had no right to the eggs, and did not know why he should take them then for the first time. All had been against him.

He was going away to jail, a shame and disgrace to his poor mother. To-day too; the very day he was to have begun to earn his own living, and relieve her from the burden he had been upon her. He would be a worse trouble to her than any of the others had been, even than his father, who came home every night either drunk or angry. What could he ever do to make it up to her now? He could do nothing better than to die.

It was late before Ruth reached home in the evening, and she found her husband awaiting her return, sober and sullen; a hard, tyrannical old man, who looked upon her as a silent and spiritless drudge.

"So," he exclaimed, as she stepped feebly and wearily over the threshold, "this is what it's come to; thy fine lad's got hisself into jail! This comes o' book-learnin' and psalm-singin', eh? He brings shame on all on us. Ne'er a one on us was iver up afore the justices till now; and they say at the 'Labor in Vain' as he's got three months. And serve him right, I say. I takes sides with Nutkin, and th' squire, and the justices, as are ivery one on 'em gentlemen. If I'd a bit o' land, I'd hang every poacher as set foot on it. And a young little lad o' his age! What'll he be when he's a man? I'd ha' sent him to Botany Bay, I would. I'm on the side o' justice. And if ever Ishmael crosses o'er that door-sill agen, I'll thresh him to within an inch o' his life! I'll break ivery bone in his body! And thine, too," he shouted, with growing fury, "if thee don't open that cursed mouth o' thine, and say somethink!"

"I'm ill, Humphrey," she answered, meekly; "I swounded away dead when they told me on it."

"Swounded!" he repeated, sneeringly; "don't tell me. It's only born ladies as can do that, not a workin' woman like thee. But swound or no swound, just hearken to my words. Ishmael niver sets his foot over yon door-sill. I'll harbor no poachers or jail-birds under my roof."

Very quietly Ruth went on lighting the fire and boiling the kettle. It was a relief to her to be at home again, out of the stir and buzz of the little town, and out of sight of inquisitive eyes. Even her husband's threats and jeers could not altogether spoil the sense of having found rest at her own fireside. And when he was gone, the unbroken silence of the dark hut suited her. Her harassed soul could recollect itself now. Even in dense darkness our eyes by eager gazing begin to see a little, and so in the deepest trouble the soul by its earnest yearning towards God begins to discern light.

As Ruth sat alone in the dark hut, there came back to her memory the old story in the Bible, from which she had taken a name for her youngest boy. She thought of Hagar in the wilderness, a runaway slave, fleeing from her mistress, and how God heard her affliction; and how once more she was driven into the wilderness, wandering up and down homeless, until her son Ishmael was dying of thirst, and his mother cast him under a shrub to die, and went away out of sight—a good way off—lest she should see the death of her child; and how God heard the voice of the lad, and once again sent His angel to succor Hagar. Ruth shut her aching and swollen eyelids with a feeling of comfort and awe, as she whispered, "'Thou God seest me.'"

Yes, God saw; God knew. There was unspeakable consolation in that. She felt no bitterness of heart, even against Nutkin. She had nothing to say against the law that had sent Ishmael to prison. She did not try to justify her boy; he had done wrong, though in light-heartedness and thoughtlessness, not in malice. None of these things occupied her simple mind. God had seen all; and He knew all about it. It was in that thought she was to find consolation and strength. She must endure, as seeing Him who is invisible.

The hay-harvest and the corn-harvest, with their long hours of labor in the hot sunshine, passed by; and Ruth was one of the busiest of the women working on Chipchase's farm. No one saw much change in her, for she had always been a silent, inoffensive woman, minding her own business, and leaving other folks alone. But when harvest was ended, and the shooting season begun, the term of Ishmael's imprisonment was nearly over.

Nutkin and his assistant keepers were very busy about the woods, watching them all night, while all day long the crash of guns could be heard far and near. It was not a good time for Ishmael to be coming home; there was too much to put her husband in mind of his threats, and to keep his anger hot against his son. But surely he could not be so hard as to turn Ishmael out of doors when the law let him go free!

"Ishmael's time's up to-morrow," she said, in a tremulous voice one evening, with a deep anxiety she was striving to conceal.

"Ay," answered Humphrey, slowly, "that's what Nutkin says. So I up to the Hall this mornin' early, and I says to th' Squire, 'Squire, I've been a honest man all my life; and I've worked on your hedges many a year; and I'm not a-goin' to harbor no poacher in my home. There's that lad o' mine that's been a disgrace to me, a-comin' out o' the county jail to-morrow. He'll niver set his foot o'er my door-sill, I promise you.' The squire says, 'As you choose, Humphrey. Go into the kitchen, and get a draught o' ale.' And good ale it was; a sight better nor that at the 'Labor in Vain.' I'm not the man to drink the squire's good ale, and go agen him in any way."

"Thou'lt never turn the lad adrift on the world?" cried Ruth.

"Adrift! He's big enough to shift for himself," said Humphrey, doggedly. "The squire could get us turned out o' here neck-and-crop if he chosen; and what 'ud become of me, if we had to go to the workhouse? The squire won't have no poacher harbored close to his woods; and who's to save me from goin' into the house in my old age, eh? Me, as can't live without my drop o good ale, often and regular. I tasted the beer in the workhouse once. No; Ishmael niver sets his foot o'er that door-sill agen! And now thou knows it, and can make the best on it."

Ruth had a sleepless night again, as if the first bitterness of her sorrow had come back upon her with tenfold power. Early as the dawn came the next morning, she was up before it, making a bundle of all Ishmael's coarse clothing, the scanty outfit she had scraped together for him three months ago, when he was going out to earn his own living. Mrs. Chipchase was taking her butter to market in the county town, and had offered to carry Ruth with her in the gig, that she might meet Ishmael at the gate of the county jail. She saw little enough of the dusty high road along which they drove, or of the bustling streets thronged with a concourse of market people. It was only when she came within sight of the jail that she seemed to wake up from a brown study and get her wits about her again.

It stood outside the town, mid green fields; large, square, ugly building, surrounded by strong and black stone walls. Small round windows, closely barred and grated, looked out like hooded winked eyes over the lonely fields. Ruth felt herself shivering, though the September sun was shining in an unclouded sky, as she looked up, and wondered which one of those gloomy windows had lighted Ishmael's cell. But before she could reach the heavy gate she saw sauntering down the path from the jail, creeping with sluggish footsteps and a bowed-down head, her boy, Ishmael himself.

"Mother!" he cried, "mother!"

He threw himself into her arms, laughing and crying at the same moment. Ruth could not weep, but she held him fast in her arms, until he lifte ) his head to look into her dear face. There was) one near to see them ; they were as much alone : in their own quiet woods ; only that grim and gly building looked down upon their meeting ith its hollow eyes. She drew him away to a nely spot under its walls ; and they sat down gether on the grass, while, with her trembling nds, she untied the little packet of home-made read, baked in their own oven, which she had ought for them to eat together, before they had part again.

"I never meant any harm, mother," he said, hen their meal was over. "I never thought of ything save little Elsie wishing for 'em. But I ow it was poaching ; and oh, mother, it 'ill turn) against me all my life."

"I'm afeared so, lad," she answered, sighing. But hast thee asked God's forgiveness, Ishael?"

"Often and often," he replied, eagerly. Mother, I never forgot to sing, 'Glory to thee, y God, this night;' only I sang it low, in a hisper, like I used to do when father was at ome. I thought you'd be singing it as well, iother."

"Ay," she said, softly ; "thank God I could ng it after the first evenin', Ishmael."

IDOLATRY PUNISHED.

. S. Lesson for September 11. Exodus 32: 15–35. Golden Text, 1 John, 5 : 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IF we had not known by bitter experience the vil of our own hearts, and the truth of our Mas-r's words, "Without Me you can do nothing," would have appeared inconceivable that about orty days after the giving of the law, the whole ssembly of Israel should have lapsed into idolatry. revious to the giving of the law, the people had ledged themselves to the Lord. God had sent loses to them with this message : "Ye have seen hat I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare ou on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myelf. Now, therefore, if you will obey my voice, ideed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a eculiar treasure unto me, above all people ; for ll the earth is mine. And ye shall be unto me a ingdom of priests and an holy nation." The apeal of God, grounded as it was on what He had one for them, and on His great purposes regardng them, met with no opposition from the people. All the people answered together and said, All hat the Lord hath spoken we will do" (Exod. 9 : 3-8). Alas ! how little they knew themselves. And yet they could not be ignorant of the mighty ower of God, nor yet of His special regard for hem. The plagues in Egypt, and their wonderful xemption from so many of them, the way which He had made for them through the waters of the Red Sea, the miraculous food which was still sustaining them, the continued wear of shoes and lothing which the journey had in no way damaged (Deut. 8 : 4)—all this was proof of the power and he love of their God. But He had called Moses .way to commune with Him after the people had leclared a second time, "All that the Lord hath aid will we do, and be obedient" (Ex. 24 : 7). There was but one man who accompanied Moses nto the mountains, Joshua, Moses' minister, and ve are not told how far away he remained where Moses went up into the mount ; and the glory of he Lord "like devouring fire, covered it.

There, however, was the glory and every Israelte could see it with the naked eye, and each one could know that there, invisible to him, God was communing with Moses, and Moses with God. How deep, then, was the sin ; how unjustifiable he impatience of the people when they "saw hat Moses delayed to come down out of the nount," and they gathered themselves together nto Aaron and said unto him, "Up, make us gods, which shall go before us ; for as for this Moses, he man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him." Was hen God to be hastened, or was Moses to desist rom his interview with God, to satisfy the fleshly mpatience which possessed them? Which was most becoming, that they should learn to wait for God, or that the mighty God of the universe should minister to their childish petulance?

Moses had left Aaron as his representative ; when he and Joshua left the seventy elders of Israel behind, he said unto them, "Tarry ye here for us, until we come again unto you ; and behold Aaron and Hur are with you ; if any man have any matters to do, let him come unto them" (24 : 14). This idolatrous desire of the people is the first recorded matter which the people had. Now it is that we perceive the fruits of Moses' unbelief when he drove God to give him Aaron as his spokesman. Aaron had not been chosen by God or fitted for the position which he occupied as Moses was. The burden of his people's wrongs had not lain for a lifetime on his heart, as was the case with Moses, he had not his brother's knowledge of God, or his experience either of Egypt or the desert ; and now he found himself in a great difficulty. Instead of putting the matter boldly and at once into God's hands, as Moses probably would have done, Aaron seems to have had recourse to human policy ; Moses would soon return, and the great thing to do was by some means to occupy the people until he came. He would effect a compromise. The people should have what they craved for, some visible representation of God, and Aaron would make a feast unto the Lord ; it was the best which could be done, he probably thought, under the circumstances.

O how terrible are the consequences of one wrong step ! No sooner had Aaron made a golden calf, he, the high priest of the most high God, than the people shouted, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." God's priest had violated the second commandment, the people's promise to obey God was broken, the current was now turned into the channel of idolatry, and Aaron, instead of seeking to stem it, was carried away with it, and he built an altar before the golden calf. Things went from bad to worse ; once the rein given to their carnal passions, and this feast, said to be to the Lord, became one scene of shameful debauchery. Was it worse than the scenes of Christmas Day, Easter, and Whitsuntide, when drunkenness and licentiousness are often the characteristics of these feasts said to be unto the Lord?

God was not too much occupied with Moses to notice that which was going on in the camp of Israel. He said unto Moses, "Go, get thee down; for thy people, whom thou broughtest out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves." "Thy" people ! Had not God declared that the people should be a peculiar treasure unto Him, a nation of priests unto Him? Yes, truly, but it was on the condition that they obeyed His voice and kept His covenant. He told Moses that which had taken place, and added, "Now, therefore, let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them : and I will make of thee a great nation." Moses had learned to become a living sacrifice, no self-love would urge him to consider for a moment the personal glory it might be to him to become the head of a new race of God's people, and that God should call Himself the God of Moses instead of the God of Israel ; he looked at God's interests alone, and said, "Why doth Thy wrath wax hot against Thy people, which Thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt?" God imputed to Moses the bringing forth out of Egypt, and Moses imputed it to God. God said to Moses, "Thy people," and Moses held fast that they were God's. This was the strength of his intercession. It was a touching thing, God not able to destroy the people if Moses pleaded, and Moses, in utter self-abnegation, praying for the people, who were all the time persisting in their grievous sin against God. Moses urged how the Egyptians would believe, if He destroyed them, that He had brought them out of the land of Egypt for mischief, and then he pleaded : "Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, Thy servants, to whom Thou swarest," remember Thy promise. And Moses prevailed : "The Lord repented Him of the evil which He had thought to do unto His people."

But when Moses went down with Joshua from the holy presence of God in the mountain, and heard with his own ears the sounds of sinful revelry, and saw with his own eyes the revolting sights of sin, Moses' anger waxed hot, and he cast out of his hand the tablets of stone which were "the work of God and the writing of God," and broke them beneath the mount. He then proceeded to deal with their sin : "He took the calf which they had made, and burned it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strawed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel to drink of it." Nothing less than utter destruction can vindicate God's righteous anger against idols, everything which takes God's place in our hearts must be utterly done away. If a right hand or a right eye offend, better a thousand times to lose them both, than to harbor one vestige of sin, one refuge of idolatry.

Moses having utterly destroyed the sin, went on to deal with the sinners. None but God had told him of Aaron's part in the people's guilt, but as he had been left in charge, Moses held him responsible, and said to him, "What did this people unto thee, that thou hast brought so great a sin upon them?" Aaron told Moses the truth until it came to his part in the transaction, and then he said, speaking of the gold which was brought to him, "I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf," whereas, "he had fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf." O how cowardly is the heart of man ; there is no nobility in him until he is possessed by the Holy Ghost ! If such were the heart of Aaron, the leader and high priest of the people, what wonder that their hearts were set on mischief ! Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, "Who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me. And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him." He committed to them the work of destruction ; brother, companion, neighbor must fall; only death could wipe away the heinous sin which Israel had committed, and three thousand men fell that day and went to answer for their sin at the bar of God. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die" (Ezek. 18 : 4) is God's command, and He cannot reverse it. Had we who believe in Jesus not died in the person of our precious Redeemer, we too must have died for our sins.

But it was not sufficient that the sin should be judged and put away ; every discovery of sin, every real dealing with sin is a call to renewed consecration, "Consecrate yourselves to-day unto the Lord." It is a terrible thing to make light of sin, God never does. Whenever He has unveiled to us any sin in the light of His holy countenance, it is a call to us to dedicate ourselves in the new light of our own unworthiness and God's unspeakable grace, to a life in which our one undivided aim shall be to please Him, in which every member of our body and power of our mind shall be at the disposal of the Holy Ghost to do or to suffer what He wills ; to be humbled or lifted up as He wills ; for consecration implies a will laid down. Moses gave as the reason for consecration, "that He may bestow a blessing upon you this day." A blessing to follow such a sin? Yes, such is God's grace.

But the people did not know the extent of Moses' self-sacrifice, when he went and pleaded with God for the blessing. He only said unto the people, "Ye have sinned a great sin : and now I will go up unto the Lord ; peradventure I shall make atonement for your sin. And Moses returned unto the Lord, and said, Oh, this people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold. Yet now, if Thou wilt forgive their sin—; and if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of Thy book which Thou hast written." What is this? A man, and the man to whom God had offered that he should be made a great nation in the stead of Israel, yet willing rather to renounce his personal salvation than that the people should perish ! Paul alone had a like spirit when he said, "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren" (Rom. 9 : 3). Moses' prayer was not yet answered ; God said, "Whosoever hath sinned against Me, him will I blot out of My book . . . in the day when I visit I will visit their sin upon them. And the Lord plagued the people because they had made the calf, which Aaron had made."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Session of the British Parliament was closed on Saturday, August 27th, when Lord Selborne, the Lord High Chancellor, read the Queen's speech. This document is only called "The Queen's speech" by courtesy. It is really the production of the Cabinet, but is submitted to Her Majesty for approval before it is read. The events of the past session are reviewed in the speech as well as the affairs connected with British foreign policy. As to the latter, the Parliament is congratulated on the termination of hostilities in Basutoland, and the withdrawal from Candahar, two events on which the English public seem to be little disposed to congratulate themselves.

The paragraph referring to Irish affairs is as follows: "I warmly appreciate the zeal and assiduity with which you have devoted yourselves to the task of maturing a measure for improving the relations between the owners and occupiers of land in Ireland and for otherwise bettering the condition of its agricultural population. It is my earnest hope that the new law may be productive of benefits commensurate with the care you have bestowed upon its enactments. It has been my study to use the exceptional powers confided to me in Ireland with vigilance and firmness, but with discrimination, while I earnestly desire that the condition of the country may so improve as to enable me to dispense with or abate the use of temporary and exceptional provisions." This will be understood as implying that unless there is an increase of agitation in Ireland the powers of the Coercion Act will not be used.

The Successor of the late Dr. Stanley as Dean of Westminster Abbey has been appointed. He is not one of the men from whom it was generally expected a selection would be made. It is officially announced that the new dean will be Rev. George Granville Bradley, M.A., the master of University College, Oxford. He was an intimate friend of Dean Stanley, and came near being his schoolfellow. He entered Rugby school just as Stanley was leaving it. Mr. Bradley is best known as a schoolmaster. The great Marlborough School was placed under his charge some years ago, and he performed for it a service analogous to that Dr. Arnold performed for Rugby, raising it to the front rank of British schools.

The Elections in France have Resulted in a triumph for the Republicans. Both Royalists and Bonapartists have suffered in the struggle. The Royalists have lost 14 members, and the Bonapartists 26. Of the successful candidates 398 are Republicans, while the two other parties combined only number 85. This result must be very gratifying to M. Gambetta and his friends, although the triumph is diminished by a personal check. M. Gambetta, although re-elected, polled only 9400, while in 1877 he polled 13,300. This decrease of popularity is due to a fear lest his power is growing too great for the safety of the republic, and also to dissatisfaction with his conduct in reference to the recent difficulty with the Senate. It will be remembered that the Senate vetoed the plan M. Gambetta proposed, having for its object the increase of the size of the constituencies, merging a large number of small constituencies into a smaller number of large ones. This would have ruined the power of local "bosses," who it is supposed exerted their influence against him in the election.

The Expulsion of Prince Krapotkine, the Russian Nihilist, from Switzerland, on August 23d, has caused dismay in the revolutionary ranks. It was supposed that Switzerland was a safe asylum, but the horrors of the Czar's murder has caused a revulsion of feeling against Nihilists, principally because so many innocent lives have been sacrificed in their plots. The following are the details of the life of Krapotkine as given in a popular journal: Prince Krapotkine is now about thirty-eight years of age. He is a member of one of the oldest and noblest families of the Empire. Bred in ease and luxury, he very soon broke with all the traditions of his caste and devoted himself from his seventeenth year to the study of the natural sciences. He studied at various universities in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kharkoff and other cities, and soon became an authority in the specialty he had chosen—geology. He undertook, with the help of the Imperial Russian Geographical Society, of which he was secretary, various scientific expeditions throughout Russia. The life he led was so retired and seemed so utterly engrossed by scientific interests that nobody thought of suspecting him of any revolutionary propaganda. When, in 1877, he was suddenly arrested and thrown into a dungeon of the St. Petersburg fortress, public opinion was utterly amazed.

King Kalakaua in a Railroad Accident.—King Kalakaua, whose portrait appears with that of his wife on our frontispiece, and who has been travelling in Spain during the past week, had a narrow escape while travelling from Madrid to Lisbon. Between Veradas and Puerto Llano the special train which was conveying the king and his suite ran over a bullock and was thrown from the track. With the exception of a severe shaking no one was injured, but the accident caused great delay.

The Separation of Armenia from Turkey, and its formation into an independent State, is declared by the Russian General Count Melikoff, to be near at hand. Melikoff is likely to know, because Russia has for many years devoted her energies to stirring up discontent in Turkey, treacherously hoping to discredit that Power in Europe, and to profit by her fall. The Armenians, many of whom are very intelligent, constitute 70,000 of the 120,000 inhabitants of Tiflis, and they make it the headquarters of their agitation for Armenian freedom. M. Arzruni, a millionaire, devotes himself to promoting the movement by publications, and his party are now seeking to obtain practical self-government for Armenia under Russian protection. They affirm that Europe must before long resound with the noise of the Armenian question. We know from prophecy that the solution of the problem will be the separation of Syria, along with Armenia, from Turkey, and their establishment as an independent kingdom.

The Irish Drink Bill is a Matter worthy of consideration now that another appeal is likely to be made by Mr. Parnell to this country for money, and O'Donovan Rossa's agents are supplied with collecting cards to gather dimes for the Irish. Mr. William Hoyle, a well-known statistician, has published a pamphlet in which he shows that during the ten years ending 1879 the people of Ireland spent on an average each year over $65,000,000 in intoxicating liquors, which is $11,500,000 in excess of the rental of the land of Ireland. As Mr. Hoyle justly remarks: "It will need no superior intellect to see that if a reduction of the rent burden would prove so highly beneficial, even greater benefits would result from the abolition of the drink burden."

An Incident in Connection with the Hardships of Irish tenants is related by an Irish correspondent of the New York Herald, and suggests a doubt whether the tenant farmers are quite as poor as is represented. It appears that two weeks ago a deputation of the tenants of Mr. M. S. Synot, a landlord of County Armagh, called upon him and pleaded their inability to pay their rents. One of the deputation, John Cunningham, also visited Mr. Synot privately and begged for a large abatement of rent on the ground of the hard times and his absolute inability to pay. The request was refused and Mr. Synot got no rent. While returning, John Cunningham was robbed of his purse, which contained, besides a considerable sum of money; a bank deposit receipt on a Belfast bank, showing that he had sufficient money in the bank to pay his arrears ten times over. He was obliged to complain to the police to have the suspected thief arrested, and it is easy to imagine how ashamed he must have been as he told his story to the bench of magistrates, one of whom was his own landlord.

Serious Apprehension is Felt in England lest an era of radicalism, akin to socialism, should follow the régime of Mr. Gladstone. A London society journal, by no means unfriendly to the Premier or the present administration, makes the following significant remarks: "So far as a parliamentary majority can guarantee power, the present is a powerful administration. Nevertheless, the feeling grows, and as it grows it generates a profound uneasiness, that it perhaps represents only a provisional régime. The whisper of dissolution has long been in the air. Mr. Gladstone retains all the energy of consuming genius and devouring zeal, but his physical health is matter of anxiety. What is to come after Mr. Gladstone? If that question could be answered satisfactorily, much of the existing apprehension would disappear. But this is exactly what society cannot do. It feels that it is between two waves—the wave of Gladstonian liberalism or radicalism on the one hand, and a wave which may prove to be of a yet more portentous and destructive character on the other. Society has a shrewd apprehension that it might, perhaps, only be the lull before a new outburst of revolutionary tempest. The position is full of every kind of uncertainty and anxiety. It is a period of transition. Lord Beaconsfield is dead; Mr. Gladstone, at the age of seventy, cannot be an active political force much longer; a new era will begin; a new point of departure will be made."

Only Thirteen Years Ago the following Official bulletin was publicly posted up in the capital of Japan: "The evil sect called Christian is strictly prohibited. Suspicious persons should be reported to the proper officers, and rewards will be given." Now there are 18 Protestant Missionary Societies at work in Japan, besides 3 Bible Societies; 176 missionaries and missionaries' wives; 182 native preachers and helpers; 2912 communicants, and 31 Christian schools with 1525 scholars. In many of the public schools, the Bible is the prescribed text-book on morals, and the students often say to the teacher, "Sir, these are golden truths, and we thank you for them;" or, "Sir, please teach us to pray by ourselves." A young man saw in a native paper the advertisement of a mission school, and walked 150 miles to join the school. Some of the Japanese Christians have organized a foreign Missionary Society, and have set apart two men of their own number as missionaries to Corea.

An Expelled Nun.—A Paris Newspaper Correspondent has just supplied a vivid illustration of the rapacity and inhumanity which are bred of the Roman Catholic system. Esther Renaud endowed a convent with her fortune, she was not guilty of insubordination or careless in observing her vows. She was the victim of a disease which tortured her day and night, and disabled her from all work. The Superior of the convent decided that she was a useless mouth and expelled her. She was advised by counsel that it was useless to think of recovering the endowments that she had made, but that she might perhaps compel the convent to receive her back. She therefore applied to the Court of Appeals at Besancon. The tribunal declaring itself incompetent, she went to the Court of Cassation, which now decides that the Superior of the convent, in virtue of an article of the statutes for the internal regulation, has power to expel any nun she pleases. Esther Renaud is therefore now an invalid pauper. We trust she may be led also to see and feel her moral and spiritual destitution, and through faith in the all-sufficient efficiency of Christ's blood receive pardon and peace, and become possessed of unsearchable and eternal riches.

THE heavy affliction which has fallen on the nation in the blow that struck down its chief executive, naturally descended with a more crushing force on the members of the President's family. It is impossible for even the most indifferent and hardened citizen to read without sympathetic emotion the pathetic exclamation of the President's aged mother, when informed that a miscreant had shot the stalwart man whom she still persists in regarding as her "baby"; of the tearful, anxious faces of the group of beautiful and intelligent children of whom General Garfield is the father, but more especially of the devoted wife who, not yet completely recovered from illness severe and critical, has repressed the agony that filled her heart, so that she might encourage and comfort her wounded husband.

It was well known to the public, even before General Garfield was placed by the votes of the people in the Presidential chair, that his family relations were of the happiest kind, that his wife was not merely the mistress of his home, and the mother of his children, but an intelligent and congenial companion who had in his earlier struggles contributed in no slight measure to his success. It is natural, therefore, that in the trying circumstances in which Mrs. Garfield has spent the last two months, more interest has centred around her than is usually felt in the lady who presides for the time being in the White House, and a desire has been manifested to know all there is to be known of this afflicted lady.

In the year 1848 there was, attending at Chester, Ohio, a tall ungainly lad of eighteen. He was dressed in a coarse suit of clothes made of Kentucky jean. He had no overcoat, and it appeared that his suit of jean clothes comprised the whole of his wardrobe, for on one occasion his landlady, to whom he paid one dollar and six cents per week for board, washing, and lodging, found her lodger in deep distress. His trousers had worn thin at the knees, and on that day, as he was bending forward they had broken and exposed the bare knee. He had pinned them together as well as he could, but was mortified at the thought of how he would appear the next day, for the purchase of a new pair of pants was beyond his means. His landlady, however, with true womanly kindness, solved his difficulty by sending him to bed and repairing the dilapidated garments before school time next morning. This boy was James Abram Garfield, the son of a widow, his father having died when he was eighteen months old. He was trying to obtain an education, and had come to Chester with seventeen dollars to support him through the first term. During the second term he subsisted on twenty-five dollars, which he earned by chopping a hundred cords of wood for a neighbor.

At the same school was the daughter of a farmer, whom one who knew her then, describes as "a quiet thoughtful girl of singularly sweet and refined disposition, fond of study and reading, and possessing a warm heart and a mind capable of steady growth." This was Lucretia Rudolph, then in her seventeenth year. James Garfield was awkward and bashful, but he noticed and admired the girl, and some slight acquaintance sprang up between them. There was no romance in it, and there could have been no thought of marriage in the mind of the lad who during this very term in which he first became acquainted with his future wife had to lie in bed while his clothes were mended.

Garfield worked on during the following three years, teaching school in vacations and working in the carpenters' shops of the neighborhood in evenings, to save enough money to carry him through a college course. In 1851 he presented himself at the Eclectic Institute at Hiram in Portage County, and having obtained admittance to the room where the Board was sitting, he said: "Gentlemen, I want an education, and would like the privilege of making the fires and sweeping the floors of the building to pay part of my expenses." The Board took the young man at his word, and after two weeks' probation, during which Garfield lighted the fires and swept the floors to the satisfaction of the Board, he was duly installed as janitor of the Institute.

At the Eclectic Institute Garfield was again brought in contact with Lucretia Rudolph, who was also attending the institution.

sprang up between the two, and though the prospects of the young man at that time must have seemed to Miss Rudolph unpromising enough, she accepted his proffered love and promised that when he had graduated and was in a position to support a wife she would marry him. There was no doubt about young Garfield's earnestness and determination. He was a hardworking student, and he soon became an assistant teacher at Hiram. From there Garfield went to Williams. He was aided by a loan from a faithful friend, which was promptly repaid after he graduated in 1856. In that year Garfield commenced life on his own account. He was twenty-five years of age, he possessed a score of college text books, a college diploma, a good education and a magnificent physique. His indebtedness to his friend amounted to four hundred and fifty dollars. He was elected teacher of Latin and Greek in the Institute at Hiram, where he had been janitor, and he was now in a position to offer a home to the young lady of his choice. Miss Rudolph knew his poverty, but she also knew the character of her lover, and she was ready to fulfil her promise.

On November 11, 1858, they were married at the house of the bride's parents, and in the varying and changeful fortunes of the subsequent years she has been a faithful and devoted wife, the wise counsellor and the loyal friend of her husband. She was by no means unfitted for her station as a professor's wife. She was a good scholar in Latin, Greek, German, and French, was well read in philosophy, mathematics, and general literature, and could aid the young professor in the preparation of his lectures by collecting facts and references for his use. One who was acquainted with

Mr. Garfield brought to Hiram, describes her at this time in the following words: "She was of medium stature, with dark hazel eyes, wavy brown hair, a rounded form, and an expression about her mouth denoting a calm sweet temper, combined with a strong will. With all her learning she was still a quiet, trusting, affectionate country girl, who had but one hero in life, her lover and husband, but one ambition—to hold fast his love, and make for him a happy home. The marriage was a happy one. Indeed, it could hardly have been otherwise, for there was congeniality of taste, a high ideal of a pure home life, identity of religious belief, a great love of study and culture, and a long-standing affection to base it on."

The first four years of married life were spent by the Garfields in boarding among the families of their friends, but in 1862 the college debt of $450 having been repaid, and by dint of careful frugality a small fund of savings having accumulated, Mr. Garfield purchased for eight hundred dollars a small frame cottage facing the college, and Mrs. Garfield for the first time became mistress of a home. There, too, Mr. Garfield brought his venerated widowed mother, who has ever since been an inmate of his home. Here the Garfields resided for many years until the growing needs of the increasing family necessitated a more commodious dwelling.

By this time the number of the Garfield family had materially increased. God had given to the wedded pair seven children, of whom five are living. The first-born, Mary, died while the father was absent from home serving with his regiment in the war; the second, Harry, was born in 1866; then follow James, Molly, Irwin (named after General McDowell), and Abram. The youngest, Edward, died in Washington in 1876. Harry and James are preparing for college at St. Paul's School at Concord, New Hampshire.

Mr. Garfield had always had a strong desire to own a farm, and having paid off the mortgage on the little frame cottage, and being a little ahead in money matters, this desire increased upon him. A farm of 160 acres was, he heard, for sale

AT MENTOR,

Lake County, and he made arrangements for its purchase. On the farm was an ancient and somewhat dilapidated farm-house a story and a half high, and there the family removed in 1876. The ceilings were low and the house was somewhat inconvenient; but the outdoor life delighted the boys who ran wild in the orchards and hay fields, and Mrs. Garfield and her widowed mother-in-law rejoiced in the return to the scenes of farm life among which both had spent their younger years. Mr., now General Garfield, also, after the season at Washington, found healthful and congenial occupation in reviving the farmer-skill of his boyhood in holding the plough, loading the hay-wagon or driving the ox team.

Things prospered on the little farm, and in 187[illegible] it was found practicable to enlarge and modernize the house. Mrs. Garfield had considerable talent in architecture, which she had improved by study, and she now devoted her attention to devising the best way of improving the home. After long consideration she prepared the plans for the new house, the builders were set to work, and the present elegant but unpretentious dwelling was erected around and over the old one. It is described by Mr. E. V. Smalley, in his interesting work "The American Manual," as broad, high, and spacious. "Its two stories are capped by a steep red roof, which shelters a big garret lighted by dormer windows. A wide piazza extends the whole length of the front—a wide hall runs through to a back porch. Below is the parlor, dining room, kitchen, and two large bedrooms, the pleasantest being the room of "Grandma," now nearly eighty years of age. Above are the other sleeping rooms and the study of the master of the house. A few steps from the house, in the edge of the orchard, is a little building of a single room called the library, with its walls lined with book-cases and with windows on all sides through which the lake breeze pours."

This is the home to which in the crises of the President's suffering he has pathetically entreated to be removed. It is very significant, as showing how vain are the pomps and vanities of the world in times of real trouble to afford consolation, that although surrounded with the splendor and magnificence of the White House, and occupying a position which is the height of the American citizen's ambition, the President's thoughts have turned longingly to his little home at Mentor as the place where he would like to be.

With Mrs. Garfield's

during his illness the public is well acquainted. It is inappropriate to laud it, as has too often been done, as unparalleled. She has displayed the same tenderness, the same gentleness and affectionate solicitude that thousands of wives are at this moment displaying at the bedsides of their beloved husbands, and in according to her the praise to which she is fully and justly entitled there is no need to depreciate the wives of less distinguished citizens by comparisons which are unjust and unnecessary. She has shown herself—as other noble women have done in the past, as others are showing now—the loving, faithful wife, unfaltering in devotion, unshaken in courage, and unsparing in her exertions for her husband's welfare.

Not long after her husband's inauguration she, too, was stretched on a bed of sickness. The malarial atmosphere of the White House had increased and developed a dangerous malady which for some days threatened her life. It was manifest, then, how close and tender was the tie which united the heads of the Presidential household. Though oppressed with the cares of State and in the midst of the anxieties and perturbations of the was deaf to the eloquence of His apocalyptic announcement "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father."

The day of his child's burial, however, restored much of his scepticism. The grim facts of death seemed in utter contradiction to the belief of an all-powerful and loving existence in the universe.

THE DIFFERENT RESURRECTIONS.

By the Rev. W. L. Sanders, Pastor of the First Baptist Church, of Cambridge, Ill.

An Address First Delivered in Swedish.

The Authority for the Doctrine—Two Synchronous Events—Christ's Advent Premillennial—Martha's Mistake—The Resurrection of the Just—Paul's Aspiration—The Interval—The Resurrection of the Unjust—The First Event of All—The Translation of Believers—Enoch and Elijah—Hope from the Ascension of Christ—A Happy Meeting—Questions—The Duty of Watching.

OPEN your Bibles at 1 Thess. 4 : 15, 16. You will notice here, first of all, Paul calls special attention to the fact of his inspiration, "For this we say unto you by the Word of the Lord." Why? Because he is going to speak of a revealed doctrine: so he gives us his authority. But apart from this statement, we have sufficient proof that Paul was inspired, from the nature of the doctrine he is going to speak of. Resurrection is one of God's purposes and thoughts—God says, "My thoughts are not your thoughts" (Isa. 55 : 8). And so, when Paul writes about the resurrection of the dead, and the rapture of living believers, which he says is to take place when Jesus comes, we may be quite sure that the apostle is not giving us his own thoughts; for no man had ever thought of such a thing. The doctrine of the Resurrection was considered incredible from the standpoint of human reason. When the philosophers at Athens heard of the resurrection of the dead, "some mocked." This is truly a wonderful doctrine, and yet no more wonderful than the revelation of creation.

"By faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the Word of God," and by faith we understand that "the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth" (John 5 : 28). If in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth out of nothing, surely at the end He can resurrect man from something. If God has wrought this greater miracle in creation, cannot He perform the lesser in resurrection? But, my friends, there is no "if" about it.

"Why should it be thought a thing incredible that God should raise the dead?" (Acts 26 : 8.) And before one statement is made, the apostle reminds us of the Holy Spirit's authority and word, "For this we say unto you by the Word of the Lord." Now we shall all be agreed on this point, viz., "That the dead in Christ are to be raised when Jesus comes, them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him."

THE MAIN QUESTION.

The only question which need be asked here, is, "When is Jesus coming, before or after the Millennium?" If He is coming before the Millennium, then we can consistently, and ought to, watch and wait for the Son of God from Heaven, and daily be looking for that blessed hope; but if He is not coming till after, how are we to obey our Lord's command, "Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when He will return from the wedding; that when He cometh and knocketh, they may open unto Him immediately. And if He shall come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, blessed are those servants. Be ye therefore ready also; for the Son of Man cometh at an hour when ye think not?"

I speak of the time of our Lord's return at this point, because you will see at once how it affects the time of the resurrection of believers. Many earnest Christians, while I believe they love their Master, certainly are not looking for that blessed hope; because by placing at least a thousand years between them and their Lord, they believe that He will not come in their lifetime, and hence they do not look for the Son of God from heaven. (1 Thess. 1 : 10; Titus 2 : 13.) We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ; but it does not say "at the same time." And so of our Lord's own words, "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth"—this seems only to teach the universality of the Resurrection, that the bad as well as the good shall hear His voice, and shall come forth! When? Not at the same time, as I shall try and show from the Word. "The hour is coming." How long will that hour last? In the 25th verse of the 5th chapter of John, Jesus says, "Verily, verily I say unto you, The hour is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live."

Here again we have the word translated "hour," referring both to the salvation hour or period, also to the hour or "period" of resurrection. The hour is coming and now is—this Gospel hour, or dispensation of salvation is still here! How long has it lasted already? Eighteen hundred years. Yes, nineteen centuries nearly, of this precious gospel hour, or dispensation, has favored mankind with its bright light. When Jesus said to the woman of Samaria, "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth," He referred of course to this happy gospel hour, or dispensation, in which we live, and so when He speaks of the resurrection hour, or dispensation, the long period of time which will include the resurrection of every human soul, we are not to do violence to the text, and to the accepted rules of Biblical interpretation, by assigning one meaning to the word "hour," as it relates to the dispensation or hour of grace, and a totally different meaning when the Holy Spirit in the same verse uses it in reference to the dispensation or hour of universal resurrection.

THE ORDER OF EVENTS.

In the revealed account of the creation and subsequent arrangement of the universe, we find each event in its order—each day had its separate and fulfilled work, and it was not completed until the end of the week, and on the Sabbath God rested from His labor; and in like manner I take it God is fulfilling one by one the events which are a part and portion of "the present dispensation of grace—the great event of this age being (as I understand the Scriptures) the Holy Spirit's call to the Gentiles to take out of them a people for His name. Afterward God says, "I will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, and I will build again the ruins thereof, and It will set it up," (Acts 15 : 14).

Now, as we see different events in their order during the creative week, also in the antediluvian, patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations, as well as in the present age or dispensation of grace, may we not similarly expect that in the coming age of millennial glory, which will include the resurrection and judgment of every human soul, there will at least be order; and that all these momentous and appallingly grand events which are to come, will be fulfilled in the order of prophecy which forecasts plainly long intervals of time?

You remember how it was with Martha when Jesus said, "Thy brother shall rise again." She believed in the doctrine of the resurrection in a general way, because she answers, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." Martha was right in point of fact, but wrong in point of time; she didn't realize that her brother's resurrection was so near, and so she didn't get the comfort out of this blessed truth, which was her privilege. She answers Jesus in words which reveal sorrow as well as faith. "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day."

When Jesus said "Thy brother shall rise again," He referred not to a general, but a special, a particular resurrection, and when we read the words of Paul, "But every man in his own order (or band). Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's, at His coming" (1 Cor. 15 : 23), it seems plain that the Holy Spirit is speaking of a particular resurrection. And so, dear hearers, if any of you, like Martha, have had your eyes fixed on a general resurrection at the last day, I entreat you to look to Jesus, who Himself says, "I am the resurrection and the life:" look for Him a second time, and then the first resurrection, the "better" resurrection—the resurrection of the just—will appear more real, more glorious. It will appear nearer to you, because the resurrection of believers is plainly the first event which takes place when Jesus comes. "The dead in Christ shall rise first" (1 Thess. 4 : 16).

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

Before passing to the second event which is to take place at our Lord's return, let us briefly consider, more critically, the doctrine of the resurrection, not relative to the fact, which we all believe, but specially as it relates to the "time." That there is to be an interval of time intervening between the resurrections of the just and unjust—the resurrection of life and of damnation, seems evident for the following reasons:

1. It is distinctly stated that those only who are "in Christ" are to share in the first resurrection. "Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at His coming" (1 Cor. 15 : 23). "The dead in Christ shall rise first" (1 Thess. 4 : 16).

2. "The resurrection of the just" is spoken of by the Saviour as the rewarding time for believers: "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just" (Luke 14 : 14). It is evident, therefore, that no "unjust person" will share in this resurrection. Crowns of righteousness are to be given in that day to those that love His appearing. The Bridegroom is coming to receive the bride. But only believers are "the bride:" hence none but "the bride," the Lamb's wife, will have a part in this delightful union.

3. In the 6th chapter of John, in that memorable conversation with the Jews, our Lord speaks of the security of the believer, and four successive times re-affirms what He intends to do for all who shall believe in Him, by saying, "I will raise him up at the last day." Now, it cannot be that our Lord had reference to a general resurrection of the just and unjust, because then those words would have had no meaning. If this is simply an assurance that believers should be raised, it would be no more than the unjust will realize, for "all that are in their graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth." This solemn pledge our Lord four times repeats as a sure reward for His servants must relate to a special resurrection—the first resurrection, in which believers only shall share.

EK NEKRON.

4. In Luke, chapter 20th, our Lord speaks of some "which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead." Does not this language plainly intimate that some will not be worthy and hence will not share in the resurrection of the just? But the language in the original is even more significant. The Greek words, ek nekron, mean "out of," "from among," or, "from" the dead, as they are here translated. Now this preposition, ek, is never used in connection with the ungodly. The phrase ek nekron is used forty-one times; thirty four times to express Christ's resurrection; three times to express John's supposed resurrection, who, as Herod thought, had been raised out of, or from among the dead; three times in reference to Lazarus, who, we know, was raised "out of" the dead; and in the passage I have just quoted.

So if our Lord's coming is to be before the Millennium, which the apostle believed, and which is admitted on all hands to have been the firm and cherished belief of the early church, and which the Scriptures plainly teach; then we see at once the reason for this little word ek, prefixed before nekron, in reference to the resurrection of Christ and believers, but never otherwise.

Was not the resurrection of our Lord, literally, a resurrection "out of" or, "from among" the dead? And at the death of Jesus, when the graves opened and many bodies of them which slept arose, we have another instance of a resurrection from among the dead. So also with Lazarus.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Improvement in the President's Condition noticed on Monday, August 29th, was maintained with little variation through the week. It cannot be said that there was material progress toward recovery, but the fact that the sick man "still held his own" was accepted with thankfulness by the public as ground for encouragement. On Wednesday the pulse sank to 95, and though it rose fourteen beats in the evening, the lower figures were observed with renewed hope. Later in the week the pulse again became rapid, and on Saturday noon was 104. The physicians attributed the higher figure to the oppressive weather which prevailed in Washington.

The swelling of the parotid gland has decreased during the week. Several incisions were made in it, and healthy pus was released. It is now described as a large and painful sore, but serious danger is not apprehended from that source.

The condition of the bullet wound is not regarded as wholly satisfactory. The physicians say that it is "indolent" and that although some of the pus discharged, gives evidence that the process of healing is going on, some of it is of an unhealthy character. The ball still remains in the wound, and it is believed that it cannot become encysted (that is rendered harmless by a covering of flesh) on account of its shape having become jagged by contact with the rib, which it fractured. It seems probable that eventually it will have to be extracted, though at present the patient is too weak to undergo the operation.

The most serious danger now apprehended is that of malaria, to which the inmates of the White House are always exposed at this time of the year, owing to the proximity of the Potomac flats, covered with decaying vegetation. The President has long been anxious to be removed from the White House, and has expressed a preference for Long Branch. At a consultation of the physicians on Saturday, September 3d, it was unanimously decided to remove the President in the course of a few days, unless he became worse in the interval. It is of course a very serious undertaking, but Dr. Hamilton, having visited the flats, expressed his conviction, that the danger to be encountered in removing him would be less than that to be apprehended from malaria if he remained in the White House. It appears that the septicæmia—a mild form of blood poisoning—from which the President is suffering, has been rendered more virulent by the malarial odors from the flats, and it is certain that he is in no condition to bear any new complications. The best means of removing the President without fatiguing him were discussed, and the railroad companies expressed their willingness to make any arrangement for the safety of the journey by suspending traffic and in such other ways as the physicians might recommend.

A Striking Parallel has been Drawn by a prominent daily journal between the crisis in the President's illness and that of the Prince of Wales in 1871. In both cases the sufferers reached the crisis on the same day of the week—Saturday. Both were given over by the doctors, and on the next day, Sunday, when human aid seemed exhausted, the prayers of the people ascended to the great Healer, and an amendment was noticed, followed by a refreshing sleep. In each case the patient suffered from secondary irritations not necessarily connected with the disease or wound itself. The Prince suffered from ulcers on the intestines, which were hourly expected to break and produce perforation of the intestinal canal. Both were tenderly nursed by their wives. We can but hope that the analogy may be extended and that the perfect health now enjoyed by the Prince of Wales may be, under God's blessing, the lot in store for President Garfield.

The Project of Lynching Guiteau, to which an organized band of determined men are known to be pledged, has little, if any, chance of success. It should be well understood that such an attempt would involve the rioters in certain loss of life. The jail, where the wretch is confined, is so situated that the approach of an attacking force could be observed in time to prevent a surprise. It is strongly built; thirty-five well armed men are within the walls; Gatling guns cover all the approaches, and a thousand men are close at hand ready to obey a telegraphic call for assistance. These preparations to defeat an attack are generally approved. It would be a national disgrace to have law and order trampled under foot in our national capital; but the temptation to inflict summary and merciless punishment on the miscreant who has caused so much suffering is well nigh irresistible to men of ungoverned passion. To read of Guiteau's life in jail, of his good health, increasing weight, and his "happy hours with his books," while his victim lies in death agony, moves the calmest citizen to indignation, but it must not be forgotten that lawlessness is criminal, and in no circumstances justifiable.

An Application was made to the Secretary of State on September 3d by Governor Hoyt of Pennsylvania, in reference to the appointment of a day of prayer for the restoration of the President. Mr. Blaine replied as follows: "Proclamations are so essentially acts of the supreme executive power, that the cabinet has not felt authorized to assume its exercise even for the object which you propose, heartily as they sympathize with it and earnestly as they desire it. But it is entirely competent for Your Excellency to communicate with the executives of other States and promptly accomplish the desired end." Governor Hoyt accordingly fixed Tuesday, September 6th, as a suitable day, and invited the citizens to assemble in their respective places of worship between the hours of ten and twelve for prayer for the President's recovery. He also sent telegraphic messages to the governors of the other States with the view of securing concurrent action.

The Sad News of the Massacre of General Carr, six other officers, and 110 soldiers by the Apaches, arrived on Saturday. General Carr was in command at Fort Apache, a post on the White Mountain reservation, which lies in the southern half of Arizona. Rumors had been frequent of threatened disturbances among this tribe of Apaches, fomented by "medicine men" who had promised their followers to raise the dead warriors from their graves and sweep away the whites. The massacre appears to have resulted from an attempt to arrest one of these medicine men. In trying to prevent his capture the medicine man shot and killed his assailant, a lieutenant. The troops then killed the medicine man, and the Indians opened fire upon them. It is reported that every white man was slain, and that Fort Apache has been taken. The capture of the fort is not believed at military quarters, though considerable anxiety is felt on the subject, as Mrs. Carr and other ladies had quarters there.

The details of the fight received so far, are meagre, and as the telegraph lines are down it may be some days before accurate information is received. General McDowell is hastening troops to the scene of the massacre, and asks that others may be held in readiness to go to his assistance if the rising proves to be general. General Eugene Carr was a native of New York, and was fifty-one years of age. He had served in several Indian campaigns and had been many times wounded. He also served with distinction in the war, and received three wounds in the battle of Pea Ridge.

A Disastrous Cyclone of Unusual Violence visited the coasts of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, on Saturday, August 25th, doing extensive damage to property and causing a serious loss of life. A ferry house was blown down at Port Royal, and it is feared that more than twenty persons were killed. At Charleston the injury to buildings is estimated as at least $140,000. So violent was the storm, that the spray from the sea rose to a height of forty feet. At Savannah, Ga., houses were unroofed and sluiced, stores and warehouses flooded, and the streets littered with débris and prostrated trees. The shipping on the river was torn loose and thrown on the banks and there were many collisions. At Tybee, farther down the river, there was a serious destruction of property. One very sad incident occurred there. A young married lady with her child and her young brother were spending the season in a cottage, and becoming alarmed at the approaching storm, they went to the house of a friend for company. The house where they sought refuge was blown down, and before the inmates could be rescued from the debris, the fallen timbers caught fire and the lady and the children were burned to death. Their own cottage, where they were afraid to stay, escaped injury.

General Grant, Ex-Senator Conkling, and other Stalwarts are reported to have been in consultation on several occasions with Vice-President Arthur in reference to the changes to be made in the event of the President's death. General Grant has requested the announcement that there is no truth in any of the statements. He had been present at no consultation, and knew of none. He had only seen General Arthur once since the attempt on the President's life—at a brief morning call about three weeks ago—and no one was present except the Vice-President. He had met no one who showed a more profound and sincere sorrow for the President's condition than the Vice-President. General Grant did not believe, he said, that there had been any consultation of the character described between General Arthur and his political friends. This denial is very welcome. The publication of the statements General Grant contradicts, caused deep regret; they implied qualities in General Arthur which led the public to view his possible elevation to the Presidential chair with apprehension.

The Programme Sketched by Senator Edmunds in his letter to the Massachusetts Republicans covers a wide range of political ground. Among the objects he recommends the party to strive for, are, the improvement of the Civil Service; the readjustment of the revenue laws; the enactment of a law making coin the only legal tender; and an alteration of the mode of ascertaining the result of Presidential elections. All these are objects which the majority of citizens, without distinction of party, believe to be desirable, and there is no reason why at least some of them should not be speedily realized if Congress will consent to lay aside for a time mutual jealousy and make the welfare of the nation the primary motive. Especially does the question of civil service reform claim the attention of legislators. The wilful and persistent neglect of this very urgent necessity is mainly responsible for the crime which has plunged the whole nation in its present distress and anxiety.

The State Republican Convention of New ork is to be held in New York city on October n. This decision was arrived at by the State mmittee, which assembled on August 31st. Ex-nator Platt occupied the chair in the absence of ce-President Arthur. The division of the party the Conkling question has concentrated public ention on the coming convention in an unusual gree. It is expected to foreshadow the immedi- future of the party in the State, and to show extent of Mr. Conkling's influence and the use which he intends to put it. The Stalwarts car- their points in the committee; the Adminis- tion wing of the party wished the date of the nvention to be September 28th, and they would ve preferred it to meet in any place rather than w York. The fact that the committee omitted pass any vote of sympathy with the President and express condemnation of Guiteau's crime, al- ough all the Democratic committees have done is significant, and has been made the subject of ere comment. Collector Robertson is said to ve had a resolution on the subject prepared but l not present it.

A Remarkable Centenarian Died at Holder- s, N. H., on Sunday, August 28th. Her name s Hannah Cox, and she was born on July 4th, 6. The record of many centenarians has been n to doubt, but this case appears to be well henticated. Around the dying bed were grouped resentatives of four generations of her descend- s, children, grandchildren great grandchildren, l great great grandchildren. The farm on ich she lived for over a century adjoins the es- originally owned by Chief Justice Livermore, of the signers of the Declaration of Independ- e. Her father, Isaac Stanton, was a Captain Connecticut volunteers in the Revolutionary r. She had known personally nearly all the vernors of the State, her husband, Robert Cox, ng a man prominent in State politics. She re- ed the use of her faculties almost to the last r of her life, and her memory was very reten- . When she was seventy-five years old her t and hearing failed her, but both senses were ewed; and at the age of ninety she was again to hear and read without difficulty. The rem- cences of so long a life were very interesting, the old lady had many visitors anxious to con- se with so remarkable a character. How de- ted would many be if they could be assured of ong a life on earth, yet Jesus offers an endless unclouded with infirmities to those who will e to Him, and His offer is despised (John 6 : 40).

he Cost of a Bad Habit was the Subject of a rt private sermon preached by a minister to his sicians. The minister was an inveterate snuff- r, and his doctor expatiated to him on the evil ilts of the habit, and among other induce- ts to give it up he urged that it was expensive. minister admitted that he was aware of that, said he would give it up. In the conversation doctor had used an oath several times, and the ister addressed to him a faithful appeal to give his bad habit. "Well," said the doctor, "at rate it is not an expensive habit, like yours." h," said the minister, "I am afraid you will it so when the account is rendered."

Farmhouse for Children has been Opened Mr. Orlando B. Potter, on his estate near Sing g, and has proved a real benefit to the little . The enterprise originated with Mr. Potter's ghters, who are connected with the Grace pel Mission in New York. The children are n from the various missions of New York in in- nents of seventeen or eighteen by steamer, and kept at the farm for three weeks, and then rs replace them. If any are weak or sickly are allowed to remain a second three weeks. children are from three to twelve years of age. Misses Potter give their personal attention e little ones, conducting devotional services, Their object is to give the children fresh air, meat, milk, vegetables, and everything that do them good. As soon as the children arrive are put in a bath. They have opportunity to and play, eat and be happy. They are ht little household duties, too, such as making own beds. They thrive wonderfully under this treatment, and their appetites are enormous. Those who have seen the pallid faces of the children who live in the tenement houses of New York will understand how the fresh air and the wholesome diet are appreciated by the poor children.

Young ladies oppressed with ennui and other ills that beset the indolent, might learn a valuable lesson by visiting Mr. Potter's farm. The pleasure of doing good is an invaluable recipe for the cure of many ailments of the mind.

A Prospector's Death on the Mountain of the Holy Cross, is described in a Leadville paper, and shows that the life of a prospector, with all its attractions of wealth and freedom, may have a melancholy end. A party of miners from Gold Park started recently on a tour of investigation up Turkey Creek, south of Battle Mountain, and suddenly came on a lonely little hut in a picturesque spot on the undulating ground near the mountain of the Holy Cross. As they pushed open the rude door they were startled by the sight of a man partially undressed and apparently dead, stretched on a low bunk, with a prayer book clasped in his hands. Closer inspection showed that the man was still alive and the miners gave him such restoratives as they had. He revived sufficiently to tell them that his name was Charles Henderson, and his home was in Cincinnati, Ohio, whence he had been impelled by the gold fever to migrate to Colorado. He had prospered, but a week or two before the miners came, had caught a cold, which being neglected, became congestion of the lungs. He continued his work until at last he could stand no longer and crawled into his bunk, expecting to die in solitude. He had managed to reach a prayer book from his table, and said it had been his only comfort, and he hoped to die with a prayer on his lips. He died on the night the miners found him, having sacrificed his life in the pursuit of gold (Prov. 23 : 4).

How a Minister's Offer of Marriage was brought about, through a curious misunderstanding, is described in a Newtown journal. It appears that the minister, who was somewhat diffident, could not muster courage to propose to a young lady whom he sincerely loved. A new catalogue of the Sunday-school library was needed, and the young lady in question undertook to read the titles of the books while the clergyman wrote them down. As he wrote, he was meditating on the question he was so anxious to ask, but failed to overcome his timidity. "Why don't you do it?" said the young lady. The minister was surprised at the apposite question, but he merely said in a formal way, "Next book." "No time like the present," said the lady. Thus encouraged, the minister told his love, and did not discover, until after he had been accepted, that the lady's words were merely the titles of the two books next on the shelves of the library. The two appeals, though they were misunderstood, will have an important influence on the clergyman's future, but they might be addressed with still more propriety and, by God's blessing, with still more momentous results, to many young people in danger of postponing the duty of giving their hearts to the Saviour.

The Announcement that Dr. Tanner is in training for another fast, this time of ninety days, is not one very gratifying to the public. Dr. Tanner professed, when he fasted forty days, that his object was to demonstrate a great scientific truth and to prove in his own person a fact that it would be beneficial to the human race for physicians to know. It is difficult to see what more can be proved of any value by the contemplated experiment. If it is purely a business speculation it sinks to the level of an ordinary exhibition of physical endurance, which deserves the condemnation and not the encouragement of the public.

SHUT IN OR SHUT OUT.

"The Lord shut him in."—GEN. 7 : 16.

Noah a Member of a Pitiful Minority—I. Shut in—1. Noah Shut in—A Condition of Permanent Separation—Shut Out from Ambition—From Festivities—2. Shut in by God—Very Closely—Very Fast—Very Necessary—The Deed very Instructive—3. Shut in with God—4. With all His Family—5. To be Perfectly Preserved—II. Shut Out—Who were They?—A People that had Been Preached to—Prayed for—Associated in the Lord's Work—Had Seen Great Wonders—What They Did—What Came of it—Who is the Doomed Man?

NOAH was a very different man from the rest of those who lived in his time, for the grace of God had set a division between him and them. They forgot God, and he feared him; they lived for things seen and temporal, and he lived in sight of the invisible. When he was building his ark he was in a miserable minority, as men count heads; and, even after one hundred and twenty years' ministry, when his ark was builded and his family entered it, they were eight against many millions, an insignificant few, as men would say; a pitiful sect among mankind. Who could imagine that the eight would be right and all the millions wrong? Where God is, there is the majority. But very clearly there was a very marked distinction between Noah and his household, and all the rest of mankind. Yet, great as that distinction was, throughout one hundred and twenty years there was no impassable gulf between the two parties. Although Noah could not, would not go to them, yet they that would might pass to him; if they would hear, believe, and obey, they, too, might be among the company whom God had blessed, and whom he would surely preserve from destruction.

When the last seven days of grace had come to a close the Lord began His work of justice by separating Noah, and "the Lord shut him in." Then there was a more marked difference between Noah and the rest of mankind. He that openeth and no man shutteth, he that shutteth and no man openeth, even he had interposed a barrier impassable between Noah and those that believed not. Mercy's gate was shut, the time of longsuffering had come to a close.

Brethren, the Church of God stands at the present moment in the world very much in the same condition as Noah and his family. Still is the door of the ark wide open, and it is our business with all our might to persuade, constrain, compel men to come in. Not without success have our entreaties been; for many have entered the ark of salvation which is found in the person of our divine Lord Jesus. These make up with us the chosen family of God who shall be safe when the world is deluged with the last devouring fire. But the time cometh, it comes to each man in death, and it will come to the whole company of the ungodly in the day when the Lord Jesus shall descend from heaven with a shout, that the door shall be shut, and it shall be said, "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence." Character will become unchangeable; he that is unjust will be unjust still, and he that is filthy will be filthy still.

Our meditation will be arranged under two heads, which may readily be remembered: shut in and shut out. They stand in very distinct contrast, and admit of no third condition.

I. First, let us think of truths which range themselves under the head of SHUT IN.

This is a blessed text. Oh that the Spirit of God may help me to preach from it, and you to enjoy it.

1. Observe, then, that Noah was shut in—shut in the ark. Noah's condition as to an evil world was now one of permanent separation. He was severed from the world, and his separation was beyond recall. There is a time in the human character when it has some good thing in it toward the Lord God of Israel, and yet that good thing may be lost; but there is another and happier time when the truly converted have stepped over the boundary, and shall never go back again unto corruption. They are dead, and their life is hid with Christ in God; hidden beyond further damage or death. They are henceforth kept by the power of God unto salvation; crucified unto the world and the world unto them.

There was a time when, speaking after the manner of men, Noah might have given up his testimony and sided with the ungodly mass; but that possibility is all over; for the door is shut, the Lord hath shut him in. There was no wish in Noah's heart to come out, and he could not come out. The deed was done, and could not be undone; the bolt was turned and could not be withdrawn. Noah was shut in by a hand which is not given to undo its own work. I believe that this fixity of character and condition has happened to all believers who can truly say that they are dead unto the world. Dying unto the world is the way of our salvation.

Beloved, it is a great mercy when a man can feel in his own soul that God has fixed forever his condition toward the ungodly.

WE HAVE COME OUT,

my brethren, from among men just as Abraham did when he left his fatherland and went into the land of which he knew nothing but that God had said that He would give it to him and to his seed. They had as fully left Padanaram behind them as if they had been dead and buried to it, and their life showed each one of them to be a pilgrim and a sojourner with God. Even so with believers, the Lord has called us out and set us apart unto himself.

Brethren, I am always glad when I can feel concerning any of you that you have finally done with the world, and may be numbered with the irreconcilables: for, alas, I fear there are too many who have so questionably come out of Sodom that their hearts are there still, and they are apt to cast lingering looks toward the accursed city. Ah me! what if any of you should become pillars of salt! "Remember Lot's wife!" But when, like Noah, you are divided from the world's pursuits by God's own act, then is it well with you. Noah was shut in, and could not follow after the festivities and worldlinesses of men. They were eating and drinking, marrying and given in marriage, but to Noah the dance and the viol, the feast and the revel, called in vain. He could not now hoard up wealth, nor seek for fame among the sons of men. He was utterly exiled and excluded from all those things which charmed the minds of his contemporaries; he was out of the fashion, yea, out of the world.

He was shut out, too, from all their possessions; even from his own farm he was now expatriated. Blessed is that man who, whatsoever he hath, hath it as though he had it not; he sets no store by earthly things, and does not lock up his soul in his iron safe. He is shut out from the things which rust and corrupt, so that they are not his God, nor his treasure. Noah was divided from the evil generation among which he dwelt by the act of God: here was his safety.

O happy man who can truly say that henceforth he is "shut in," because he is born again, and thus entirely changed. In the olden time a newly converted man who became an eminent saint was met in the street by a woman who had at other times tempted him to sin. He took no notice of her, and at last she cried out, "Do you not know me? It is I." "Ah," said the new man, "but it is not I." No, he was not the man who could take pleasure in uncleanness; he could no longer sin, for he was born of God. Our inner life shuts us in to holiness, and the wounds of Jesus seal the door. The goodness of God interposes a barrier between us and evil, for we say with Joseph, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" "How can we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" Hence our prayer is that of Toplady:

"Oh nail me to the sacred wood,
There tie me with thy Spirit's chain;
There seal me with thy fastening blood,
Nor ever let me loose again:
There let me bow my suppliant knee,
And own no other Lord but thee!"

2. We must now remark, secondly, that Noah was not only shut in, but he was SHUT IN BY GOD.

There was the excellence of it, "The Lord shut him in." No man can shut in as the Lord can. I cannot shut professors in to the ways of godliness as I could wish; alas, with all my preaching, many wander, and try to be members of the church and citizens of the world too. We have among us avowed lovers of Christ, who act too much like "lovers of pleasure." I have preached no liberty to sin, as some do, but I have declared that "strait is the gate and narrow is the way;" but yet these men make excursions into the broad road. I would still hammer at the door of the ark, in hope of shutting it close and keeping it so; but it is little that I can do. Oh to be enclosed by Almighty grace! The Lord has shut his people in unto himself by his choice of them in Christ Jesus, by his redemption of them from among men, and by his sanctifying them to be a peculiar people unto himself. Yes, the Lord has done it—"The Lord shut him in."

Take notice that this was very close shutting, so as to keep out the water. I fancy that if you saw a huge vessel lying upon the dry land where the floods would come to float it, you would be very anxious about that great opening in its side. It was evidently a huge doorway, for a pair of elephants had passed through it; so that it was a gaping leak which would take in enough water in an hour to sink the ark to the bottom.

Hence "the Lord shut him in" because nobody else could safely be trusted to shut such a door, against which a forty days' tempest was to beat most furiously. What a mercy it is that when we get into Christ by faith, and are shut in from the world with Him, that we are perfectly safe, because the Lord Himself has shut us in. We are not only brought to Christ Jesus by divine power, but we are preserved in Christ Jesus unto eternal life by the same divine might.

That door was also

to prevent the entrance of enemies from the outside. For who can tell? I should fancy that when the waters began to rise, when they were up to the ankles, or knee deep, those who had hitherto ridiculed the patriarch's barge would assemble around that door and clamorously demand to be admitted, resolved, if refused, to force their way. In vain. God had shut the door, and no violence could force it open, by push of crowd, or leverage of strength. Even so it is with us, we are protected against every onslaught of the enemies of our soul. Come life, come death, things present or things to come, salvation hath God appointed for walls and bulwarks. Come temptations of every sort, come craft or assault of devils, none can force the doorway and come at us for our destruction. "At evening let them return; and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city. But I will sing of thy power; yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning: for thou hast been my defence and refuge in the day of my trouble. Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing."

This divine shutting in of Noah was very necessary: for I suppose that no one else could have moved the gigantic door upon its enormous hinges. It was probably too massive to have been stirred by Noah, or his united family. It must have been a moment of wonder and awe when that stupendous door began silently to move of its own accord, as though an invisible hand was carefully closing it, so that not a crevice should be made through which water could penetrate. The ark was soon as entire as if it had never exhibited an opening from stem to stern.

You and I need shutting into Christ by a divine hand, or it never will be done securely. When a soul is brought to Christ it is by divine grace, but the whole is not done then; the grand difficulty is to keep us in Christ; for without continued grace we shall still perish despite all the arrangements of redeeming love. How many have ventured to sea in the galleys of their own resolve and have perished there! How many have hoped to shut themselves in with Christ by the mere force of personal determination, and the leakage of their own depraved heart has drowned them. But, oh, when God has brought us into union with Jesus He shuts us in, and we are saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation.

Notice, once again, that this deed was very instructive to Noah; it must have been so. Noah had ceased to live according to the mere senses of the body, and had come to perceive his absolute dependence upon God; but he was made by the opened door to see that dependence most clearly. By divine orders he had built an ark on dry land, and when it was builded Noah might have said "Now I feel safe:" but he could not say so, for there was a gaping gash in the side of the ark, a vast aperture which he could not close up. It was an occasion of mercy to mankind, and Noah was probably glad to see it open that he might still preach righteousness and warn men to escape, saying "The door is open! Come, ye great sinners! Enter, ye sons of Anak. Come and be saved."

"Come to the ark, ere yet the flood
Your lingering steps oppose;
Come, for the door which open stood
Is now about to close."

Yet when he had done his sermon and went home perhaps he said to his wife, "Beloved, how can this ark save us? That door, if ever the floods come, will be a dreadful danger to us. We cannot shut it, what is to be done? We must leave it with God. We are still dependent upon a divine interposition, and Jehovah will stretch out His hand and shut the door effectually so that we shall float above the deluge." In this condition of daily dependence the Lord would have His people abide, conscious to the very last that in Him only do they live. "Without me ye can do nothing." We are entirely dependent upon our faithful, loving God for everything.

3. Thus, then, the text tells us that Noah was shut in, and that he was shut in by God; but now let us remember that he was for in the first verse of the chapter we read, "The Lord said unto Noah, Come thou and all thy house into the ark;" and this clearly shows that the Lord was in the ark already. O what a joy it is to know that when a soul is buried to the world it lives with Christ. "For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection." God is in Christ Jesus, and we are in Christ Jesus, and thus we have fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus. The tabernacle of God among men is the person of Christ, and when we are joined unto the Lord and become members of His body, we are alive unto God and have fellowship with Him.

Next, notice that Noah's happiness was all the greater because he was shut in the ark with all his family. This is a great joy, to have all your household brought unto the faith of Christ. Some among us have one or two of their family still without Christ, and strangers to His salvation. This is a great grief. I will not enlarge upon a subject so painful, but I know instances in which godly women have all their children with them in Christ but the husband is still a stranger to the covenant of promise.

There is a brother among us who joys to dwell in Christ, but his father and mother are still without God and without Christ. How often have we heard that dear brother's prayer for his relatives! Perhaps his parents are here, and if so I would tell them how much their son's prayers affect me; he cries as for his very life that God would save his father. Some among us never pray in the prayer-meeting without strong crying and tears for their kinsmen according to the flesh; they cannot get through a prayer without mentioning their children, or their brothers, or others of their household. I hope they never will; I hope God will lay the kindred on their heart as a heavy burden till they are all saved in answer to prayer.

You are very pleased, some of you, to see your sons and daughters respectably settled in life, thank God for his gracious providence; but, my you, if they were all poor, and you saw them saved, there would still be the highest cause gratitude. Better to see them regenerate than ich, better married to Christ than to a fortune. Give your God no rest till it is so ; and if there is one who seems quite outside of spiritual things, pray for him as Abraham prayed for Ishmael, 'Oh that Ishmael might live before thee!" It is better you should pray hard for them while they live, than that you should mourn bitterly over them when dead, as David did when he lamented loud, "O Absalom, my son ; would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" May the Lord, when He blesses us as He did Jacob, extend that blessing to all our tribes, and cause all that are born unto us to be born again into himself.

Noah and his household were shut in, dear friends, to be perfectly preserved, and then to come forth into a new world. The rains descended, the water-springs poured forth their fountains, the waters rose, and the huge vessel began to quit the ground, and to walk the waters like a thing of life. I cannot attempt to picture the scene : men must have come clustering in great multitudes round the ark when they saw that in very deed the flood was descending and uprising. As the fast-closed ark began to move the inmates must have heard a chorus of cries, and groans, and shrieks of men and women as they perished in the insatiable waters.

Down poured the incessant showers, beating on the roof with perpetual thunder. The hidden eight were in solitude, shut in from the all-enveloping sheet of rain. The waters continued to gather, and still up rose the ark ; though they could scarce tell where they were amid the watery solitude, they knew that they were safe. When they looked out and saw no living thing, not even the top of a mountain, and they were floating on a sea that knew no shore, how strange must have been their sensations ! But the Lord had shut Noah in, so he was perfectly safe. He knew that the Lord High Admiral of the seas was at the helm to steer the lonely bark aright. Then came a strong wind to assuage the waters ; and how the ark must have sped before the gale, none knew whither : it was tossed about, doubtless, for it is the nature of winds to raise waves, and where there was no more to give the slightest shelter the vessel must have felt all their force. Yet the favored family was safe.

"Without deep calleth unto deep,

The waters were assuaged, and by-and-by the ark yawned to a strange sensation, for its keel was touching the earth, the ark was coming to its rest. God remembered Noah, and brought the ark to rest on the mountains of Ararat. But will the ark be found safely ? Perhaps she will break her back on a rock, or slide down the side of a hill, or overset the brink of a precipice. No, no. He who was her Architect will be her Preserver. God has found an anchorage for the stars, and He can surely berth a ship. He found the ark a safe resting place, and brought out all her passengers safe and sound. He is berthing many a vessel now in the everlasting harbors, and He hath such skill in navigation that no vessel which belongs to Him shall ever come to an ill end. So far Noah fared well and felt solid ground beneath him once again.

So shall it be with us : shut in with Christ away from this world, to which we are not conformed, we shall ride in safety as exiled beings out of this old world into another. A day cometh when the new heaven and the new earth shall be seen, and men the meek shall inherit the earth and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace ; then shall all our sacrifice of praise be accepted of the Lord. Blessed are they who enter into the ark of Jesus Christ, and so die to the old life that they may live in newness of life, rejoicing in Him who sitteth upon the throne and saith, "Behold, I make all things new!" This be your lot and mine for ever and ever.

II. I have purposely reserved a very few minutes only for the second and much more painful point of my discourse, which comes out of the words

SHUT OUT.

To have the door shut is well enough for Noah and those who are with him, but as for all the rest, that big door when it closed on its hinges shut them all out ! Shut them all out to perish with a swift and sure destruction.

WHO WERE THEY ?

I wonder if any of the sort are here !

Well, they were a people that had been preached to. Noah was a "preacher of righteousness," and fulfilled his office perseveringly. The men of his generation were not left to perish without light; they had been warned, they had been instructed, they had been entreated. They were such as you are who have been habitual hearers of the word, but hearers only. Of course, you have none of you heard the gospel for one hundred and twenty years from one man ; but many of you have heard it quite long enough to have incurred great guilt in having rejected it so often.

They were a people who had been prayed for. You will ask me how I come to know that. I answer that Ezekiel speaks of three men notable as intercessors, Noah, Daniel, and Job ; and I feel sure he would not have mentioned Noah in that company if he had not been a man of great prayer. I believe that he prayed much for his generation, and yet they were not saved. Sure I am, dear hearers, that some of you are daily the objects of earnest supplication. On Monday nights I have had notes about some of you, and hundreds, and even thousands of us have joined together in praying for you. Beside that, you know the dear ones at home are earnestly interceding for you, and some who are now in heaven pleaded hard for you ere they departed ; yet you will be shut out as sure as you are alive unless you fly to Christ, and enter into His salvation very soon.

They were a people who had many of them been associated with Noah in his work. It is hardly likely that Noah built the ark with his own hands all alone ; he must have hired fellers of trees and carpenters, and calkers, and shipwrights of various kinds. None of these were saved. It is a sad thing that those who helped to build the ark were shut out of it ! Remember, however, that they shut themselves out ! They chose their own destruction. Do I speak to any who have subscribed to build the house in which they worship ? who contribute their share to the expenses of the church and to the help of the poor, and to the education of the young ; and yet to have no part in Christ ? I do not understand those of you who are zealous in promoting religion, and yet have no share in the great salvation ? Why will you resolve to be shut out ? As sure as ever you sit on that seat, you will be shut out of heaven, and shut out of Christ forever, unless you arise and go unto your Father confessing your sins and seeking His mercy. May God arouse you to flee from the wrath to come !

These people had seen great wonders. Half the world must have gathered to see the camels and elephants, eagles and peacocks, snails and worms, all come running, or flying, or creeping to the ark. Such a sight never could have been seen before. There they come in pairs ; four wild beasts two and two ; and clean beasts by sevens ! Voluntarily entering the ark ! What a sight it must have been ! Many saw it and confessed that God's hand was in it, and yet they did not enter the ark themselves. Oh, my hearers, some of you have been here in times of revival ; you have seen drunkards saved, you have seen the most unlikely ones converted, and yet you have not turned unto the Lord. Be ye sure of this—you will be shut out of hope forever ! May God grant it may never be so ; but except you repent it must be the case.

Next, notice

WHAT THEY DID.

What they did was this . they were a people who took all their delight in worldly things. We are told in the New Testament that they "ate and they drank, they married and were given in marriage, till the day that Noah entered into the ark." They were altogether taken up with this world—like some of you, who have no regard for the world to come, but live as if this life would be everything. Prayer and praise, and looking into eternal things are all a weariness to you ; you look after the shop and the farm and the house, and forget God. I do not blame you for diligence in business any more than I blame these people for eating and drinking and marrying ; but to make this the main thing in life is to despise God and heaven and eternity. O my hearer, remember your God ! your Saviour ! your soul ! death ! heaven ! hell !

And then they did not believe, there was the point. Whatever Noah might say they replied, "Poor old man, you have entered on a second childhood. Perhaps when we are five hundred years old we shall talk nonsense too." When the patriarch came to be six hundred years old they said, "That graybeard is always telling us these stories," and they jested at the old man's fable. Alas, some of you do not believe the Gospel, and therefore do not seek its salvation ; but it is true, and you will own it to be so when you get breast deep in the fire-flood, as you will be ere long. Oh that you would believe, and escape from the wrath to come ! They despised the longsuffering of God. They said, "Here has Noah been telling us these one hundred and twenty years that a flood is coming, and where is it ?"

Among ourselves it is a common proverb, "Christmas is coming," but in Noah's days there must have been more sting in the proverb, "The deluge is coming." They would not believe that such a thing could ever be. Some say, "I have gone on very well, I have had no religion and yet I have always prospered. I have seen godly people getting poor, but I have always added field to field and house to house. I do not want religion. I am comfortable enough without it." If we say we pity them, they reply, "We do not want your pity." Just so ! but the tables will be turned ere long, and then you will demand our pity, though it will avail you nothing, for the door will be shut. Once let God shut the door, and there will be an eternal separation between the ungodly and all hope and happiness.

WHAT CAME OF IT

then ? The door of hope was shut, and the multitude perished without hope. When I was thinking this over I fancied that I could preach about it ; but I cannot. When I realize the fact that any one of my dear hearers should be shut out of heaven I cannot bear myself. I want to find a secret place wherein to weep. If an angel should say to me this morning, "All your hearers shall be saved but one, and you must pick out the one who shall be shut out of heaven," I should run my eye anxiously up and down these lines of pews, and I should take up many an hour, and at last cry, "No, I cannot take the responsibility of marking out the doomed man." I should keep you here, I think, till I expired before I could make the horrible death-choice. I would say, "Lord, save every one." And as for the marked man, I would cry, "Spare him ! Do spare him !"

Oh, my hearers, will you do for yourselves what I could not dare to do for you ? Will any man choose for himself to be lost ? Will he count himself unworthy of eternal life, and put it from him ? Then I must shake off the dust of my feet against him. I will have none of the responsibility. If you will be damned you must do it yourselves. I will not be a partaker in the crime. Your blood be on your own heads. Go down to the pit if you will deliberately choose to do so ; but this know, that Christ was preached to you, and you would not have Him, you were invited to come to Him, but turned your backs upon Him , you chose for yourselves your own eternal destruction ! God grant you may repent of such a choice, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

Sir John Franklin's Monument in Westminster Abbey.

OBJECTS OF INTEREST IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

THE venerable building, of which a picture appeared in our issue of August 25th, contains many objects of interest which are esteemed on account of their historical and personal associations. Among these is the intrepid Arctic explorer, whose life was sacrificed in his attempt to wrest the secrets of the Arctic circle from their icy home. The monument was erected by Lady Franklin, the widow of the explorer, who in the many weary years that elapsed during which the fate of her husband was a mystery, spared neither money nor exertion in her efforts to discover the truth.

Sir John Franklin and his followers left England on his last voyage on May 19th, 1845, on board the two ships Erebus and Terror, and he never returned. No tidings were received of him, his ships, or his crews, although twenty-two expeditions were sent in search of them during the following twelve years. But in 1857, Sir Leopold McClintock sailed on a new search expedition in the yacht Fox, which Lady Franklin fitted out at her own expense, and he returned on September 22d, 1859, with the melancholy intelligence that Sir John Franklin had died on June 11th, 1847, that his ships had been destroyed, and the crews, numbering one hundred and five persons, had died of cold and starvation. Incontrovertible evidence, in the shape of relics and a written record signed by officers of the expedition, were brought back by Sir Leopold McClintock, which placed the truth of the sad intelligence beyond a doubt. Later (on June 19th, 1878), Lieutenant Schwatka, of the United States Navy, was able to add further details to those discovered by Sir L. McClintock.

During his famous sledge journey of 3251 miles, across King William's Land, he thoroughly searched the coast near the point where Sir John Franklin's party abandoned their ships, and found graves and relics of the expedition, and collected from the natives, narratives of events showing that the party must have suffered protracted agony before they died. An account of Lieutenant Schwatka's search, with the life and portrait of Sir John Franklin, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 11th, 1880.

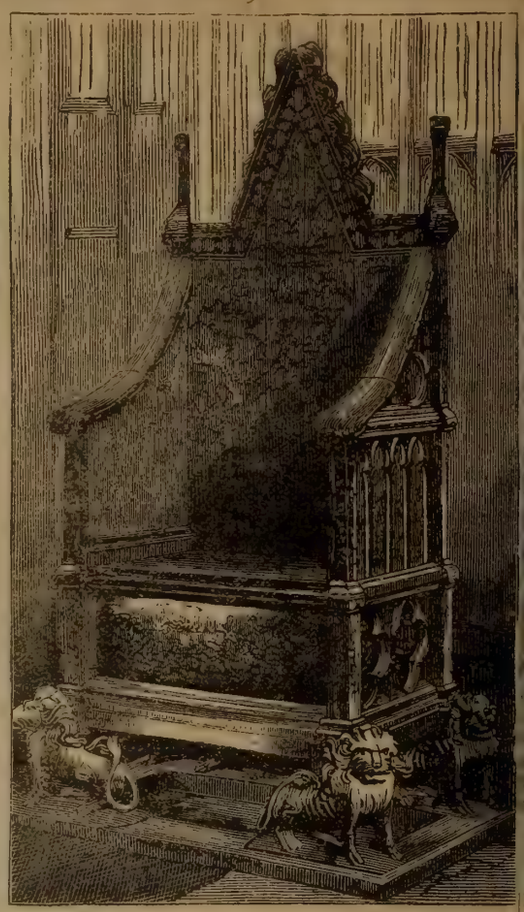
The Monument to the Wesleys.

Towards the Poets' Corner, in the south aisle of the choir and near to the monument of Isaac Watts, there was erected in 1876, a monument to the two Wesleys, inscribed with their characteristic sayings, taken from their respective tombs, and sculptured with the faces of the two brothers. Rich as is the far-famed Abbey in memorials of the illustrious dead, it may well be doubted whether, within its precincts, anything can be found more worthy to be perpetuated than the memory of the great and good men whose apostolic zeal and almost incredible labors did so much to transform the face of English society.

Dean Stanley himself explained the origin of this monument when he was in New York on his well-remembered visit. He related how some eight or ten years before, the president of the Wesleyan Conference waited upon him, and in courteous terms asked that a monument might be admitted into Westminster Abbey to the memory of Charles Wesley, "the sweet psalmist of our English Israel," and he (Dean Stanley), had then said "And why not John?" A monument to the memory of the two illustrious brothers, of which the above picture is a representation, was accordingly erected near Poets' Corner in the abbey.

An anecdote, connected in part with this memorial to the Wesleys, is thus related by a correspondent of the Spectator: "About three years ago, on Whit Monday—one of those occasions when the Dean delighted to mingle with the groups in the Abbey, drawing their attention to points of interest and beauty that might have been missed by working men, or explaining the history of particular monuments—a woman and her two children, boy and girl, were lingering round Henry VII.'s chapel. They were not exactly belonging to the artisan class, but poor, evidently, and with an air of struggling respectability.

"As they chanced to come near the Dean, who had been talking to others, the woman timidly asked him if it was 'true that some little princes were buried in the Abbey.' Immediately he took them to the chapel where are deposited the remains of the two princes murdered in the Tower, and spent some little time talking to the children, especially asking if they were learning English history at school, upon which the mother answered with pride, pointing to the boy, 'Oh yes, he learns his lessons, and he is going to be a preacher!' The quick sympathy of Dean Stanley was roused at once, and with that enthusiasm which kindles young minds, and is never lost upon children, he said, 'Then he ought to see John Wesley's monument. Come with me.' We followed him to the aisle where the monument is placed, one of many others added during Dean Stanley's time, and there he pointed out to the small, white-faced boy of twelve years old or so, the image of the man he was to emulate, and spoke of the goodness, earnestness, and zeal of Wesley. Surely the enthusiasm with which it was done, shown in voice and manner, can never be forgotten by the boy, and was characteristic of the man we mourn, as was the quickness of his unfailing sympathy."



The Coronation Chair.

In Edward the Confessor's Chapel in Westminster Abbey, is preserved the Coronation Chair used when the sovereigns of Great Britain are crowned. Under the seat of it is the famous "coronation stone," a relic of antiquity of which many fabulous stories are related. The origin of the stone is unknown, and it is difficult to separate the true from the false in the traditions concerning it.

The late Dean Stanley, who probably knew more about the history of everything connected with Westminster Abbey than any other scholar, endeavored to trace the history of the Coronation stone to its earliest point, but he could ascertain nothing definite about it prior to its being in use at Scone, in Scotland, in connection with the coronation of the kings of that country. It was encased in a chair of wood, and stood by a cross on the east of the monastic cemetery. From it Scone became the "sedes principalis" of Scotland, and the kingdom of Scotland, the kingdom of Scone; and hence for many generations Perth, and not Edinburgh, was regarded as the capital city of Scotland. Wherever else it may have strayed, there need be no question at least of its Scottish origin. Its geological formation is that of the sandstone of the western coasts of Scotland.

This precious relic Edward I. was determined to possess. He had already hung up before the confessor's shrine the golden coronet of the last Prince of Wales. It was a still further glory to deposit there the very seat of the kingdom of Scotland. On it he himself was crowned King of the Scots. From the Pope he procured a bull to raze to the ground the rebellious Abbey of Scone which had once possessed it, and his design was only prevented by his sudden death at Burgh-on-the-ands. He wished Westminster to e an English Scone. In 1306, the ıst year of Edward's reign, the enerable chair which still incloses it as made for it by the orders of its aptor. In spite of many treaties and egotiations, by which the Scotch ave sought to regain possession of ıe relic, it has from Edward's time :mained in Westminster Abbey. ı this chair, and on this very stone, very English sovereign, from Ed- ard I. to Queen Victoria, has been ıaugurated.

Once only has the stone been ıoved out of the Abbey, and that ɔr an occasion which proves more ıan any other single event since its rst capture, the importance attached ɔ it by the rulers and people of ngland. When in 1653, Cromwell as installed as Lord Protector in Vestminster Hall, he was placed in ıe "Chair of Scotland," brought ıt of the Abbey for that single and ɔecial occasion. In 1689, when ıe great Prince of Orange became ing of England, under the title of Villiam III., a second chair was ade of the same pattern. William erived his title to the throne from s wife Mary, who was the daughter of King ımes II., one of the worst of English kings. King Villiam and Queen Mary were crowned together ıd the second chair was made for the queen.

elated at the Recent Christian Convention at Keswick, England.

THE proceedings of the annual convention for e Promotion of Practical Holiness were this ar of more than ordinary interest and useful- ss. Among the various meetings held were the dies' meetings conducted daily by Mrs. M. Bax- r, which were largely attended and at which any encouraging testimonies were given.

At the general meetings one of the most promi- nt speakers was Rev. W. Haslam, whose por- ait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 27th, 1881. In the course of his address, on July 28th, Mr. Haslam told how by the power of the Word of God. She came into a meeting leaning on crutches; but the Gospel was so brought home to her heart, that she was healed there and then; threw up her crutches, clapped her hands, and cried, "Glory be to God! I'm healed! I'm healed!"

THE SERMON IN THE CRACK.

"I heard," said Mrs. Amanda Smith, "of a good man who had written an excellent sermon, and would, no doubt, have read it well, but there was a large crack in the old pulpit from which he preached, and the sermon slipped down the crack, and so he got on poorly. I am afraid there are many people like that. The good they have to make manifest to others slips down some awkward crack or another, and so nobody gets the benefit of it. Let us beware lest some such crack should prevent the message which God has given us from being duly delivered."

"A GLIMPSE AT THE LORD."

"A dear Christian man," said Mr. Haslam, "was dying the other day. A friend said to him, 'Brother, have you got a glimpse of the Lord?' 'A glimpse of the Lord?' was the reply. 'No, glory be to God, I've had a good full look at Him for forty years.'" Let us not be content with mere glimpses.

It was mentioned by another speaker that at the first Keswick Convention a cripple was brought on a couch into the tent, and that, when he began to question himself as to whether all was right, he was reminded of one bad habit—the habit of smoking. He asked himself whether he could smoke to the glory of God. Feeling convinced that he could not, he resolved, as a sanctified man, to give up the habit, and had derived great benefit from the self-denial thus practised.

HAPPY PETER.

Mr. Haslam told how "Happy Peter" was in the habit of saying he had been happy for thirty-seven years. One who visited him, and noticed the appearance of his sickly wife and humble home, said, "Have you no clouds?" "Yes," replied Peter, "but if there were no clouds there would be no sweet rain."

Dwelling on common mistakes about the gloom of a religious life, Mr. Haslam added: "I have a friend in Norfolk who was converted seventeen years ago. He is a magistrate and chairman of the Local Board. People said when he was converted, 'It's all over with him;' and a cousin of his said to me, about the same time, 'My cousin has become serious.' 'No,' I said, 'he hasn't.' 'Well, well, he has become religious.' 'No, he hasn't. A Hindoo, a Mohammedan, a Jew is religious, and your cousin might be that and be going to hell.' 'Then he must be going to die.' 'No, he isn't, for I've got hold of the same thing, and am stronger far than I was thirty years ago.' There are many people like that; and to one and all of them I give the same answer."

STRUGGLING FOR LIFE.

A gentleman was one day walking along one of the banks of the Thames, when he heard a great cry. Two young men had been playing by the river at high water, and indulging in some rough pranks, which ended in one of them being thrown into the river. The gentleman saw him in the water, and the young man who had pushed him in cried, "Oh, do please get him out if you can!" The gentleman looked on with much calmness for a moment or two, simply observing, "What a strong young man that is! how he struggles!" As the struggles continued a minute or two longer, the gentleman repeated the same remark. But, perceiving that the struggles were becoming weaker, the gentleman pulled off his coat, plunged into the river, and rescued the man, which he might not have been able to do if the drowning man had been as able to struggle as at first. It is even so with us. While we are struggling and struggling, and trying to save ourselves, God cannot save us. But when we give up our struggles, and simply resign ourselves into the hands of Him who alone can save us, then it is that we come to know how great and how glorious is His salvation.

SAVED AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR.

One day, at a place where I was preaching, I was told of an old great-grandmother of ninety-two, and went to see her. I said, "You won't live much longer." "No," she said, "but I'm going to heaven." I said, "What makes you think you are going to heaven? Are you converted and a child of God?" She said, "Oh, you mean like a Methody." I found she had been hoping to go to heaven for eighty years. I said, "Now, I'm sure if you are not converted your will not go to heaven; and if I were you, I should be afraid to look at that fire lest it should remind me of hell."

I left her, but at half-past ten that night her son, who looked a good deal older than his mother, came to the house where I was stopping, and said: "You have made my mother look right down miserable. I wish you would come and speak to her." I went, and said, as soon as I saw her, "I'm so glad to see you looking so miserable." She was thoroughly broken down, and I put the only way of salvation to her as plainly as I could. After awhile she saw it, and about half-past eleven that night she found peace.

LADY RADSTOCK'S TESTIMONY.

The late Lady Radstock came to a meeting which I was conducting in a barn some years ago. A farm laborer gave her a tract, and said, "Old lady, are you converted." She answered, "I hope so." To which the laborer replied, "What! haven't you got any further than that yet?" She walked away, but not feeling easy about her testimony, she returned and said to the young man, "You were dissatisfied with my answer, but I've been a Christian forty years." "Then why didn't you say so," said the man. "Pray, what do you say when asked if you are converted?" inquired her ladyship. "I say right out, 'Bless the Lord, I am.'" From that time Lady Radstock always took the greatest care to speak of her conversion, not as a matter of hope, but as an undoubted fact.

Secretary Windom Decreed the Award of the gold medal of the life-saving service to Captain Charles P. Smith, the gallant commander of the Seawanhaka, but the medal did not arrive from the mint until the day before Captain Smith died.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

Ishmael's Trials.

"When I get home," Ishmael said, "I'll go up to the Hall and ask the squire to forgive me; I'll beg and pray of him; and if he will, maybe I can go to work with Mr. Chipchase, like I was to go before I came here."

"He's got another wagoner's boy," answered his mother; "and thee'rt not to go home with me, but do thy best away from home. Father won't hear of it; and maybe the squire ud get us turned out altogether if thee comes home. But if God has forgiven thee—"

"Not go home with you, mother?" he cried.

"No," she said, half sobbing, "no! But God sees; God knows. Jesus Christ had not where to lay His head, and had to wander about without a home. Ishmael, I want thee to believe that God sees us always; and He loves us, in spite of it seeming as if He didn't take any notice of us. Oh, if I thought God didn't know and didn't care, my heart 'ud break. I'd go down to the river, yonder, and just drown myself. But some day He'll find us a home again, thee and me."

She had never spoken so passionately before, even to him; and he was startled, gazing into her agitated face with wondering eyes. Then he looked back at the dreary jail, his last dwelling-place. There seemed to be no place for him in the whole world now he had been in there.

"Where can we find a home again, mother?" he asked at last; "there's no place like home."

"Up there!" she said, lifting her dim eyes to the great sky above them; "if God gives us no other home here in this world, He's got one ready there for thee and me. 'Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you.' That's what Jesus said. He's preparing a place for us, Ishmael; and we must not trouble our hearts too much. Only we must go on believing in Him."

"I'll try, mother," he said, putting his hand in hers; and they sat there, not speaking much, but with hands closely clasped, till the chiming of the church clocks in the town behind them reminded Ruth there was still something to be done. A place must be found for Ishmael to sleep in that night, and if possible to stay at till he could get work to do.

It was hard work leaving him, so far away from her, to loiter about the streets and pick up any stray job that might fall in the way of a boy with a doubtful character. Her mother's heart told her but too plainly how precarious such a life must be. Only a few months ago he was still a child; even yet in happier homes he would be reckoned among the children, to be punished, indeed, for his faults, but not to be thrust into want and temptation. But Ishmael was to fight in the thickest of the battle, bereft of his good name, and removed from all good companionship. Yet Ruth had hope and faith. She worked harder than ever, never taking a day's rest, that she might save a few pence every week to send to his help. She knew he was almost always hungry; often pinched with cold; ragged and nearly barefoot at all times; scarcely able to pay for a shelter night after night. He roamed about the country from farmstead to farmstead, doing any odd work the farmers would trust him with, and sleeping in any outhouse or broken shed he could find open. But he failed in getting a settled place; there were too many boys of good character who wanted to set their foot on the first step of the ladder.

There was one thing he could not make up his mind to do. He could not put such a distance between himself and his mother as would prevent him seeing her every Sunday. He never failed to steal homeward at the close of the week, lurking about the lime-kiln or the woods, in hiding from his father, until he could make his presence known to his mother. It was the great solace and enjoyment of her life. She could still wash and mend his clothes for him, and get him a sufficient meal or two, and listen to all that had happened to him during the week.

He never crossed the threshold of his old home; but on summer evenings Ruth and he sat together within the tangle of green brush-wood behind it, and on winter nights they sheltered themselves under the walls of the old kiln, or, if they needed a roof over their heads, they met in the limestone cave, which most often of all was Ishmael's sleeping-place.

So five years went on, and still Ishmael was not a man. There was little hope now of his ever making a strong, hardy, capable man. The privations he was compelled to undergo had told upon his under-sized, thin, and feeble frame. But still more had the anxieties and the mortifications he had to endure borne down his spirit. No one but his mother cared for him. Suspicion dogged him, and he doubtful companions necessity forced upon him strengthened suspicion. He was losing heart, and growing hopeless. His mother had called him Ishmael, because the Lord had heard her affliction; but she might have called him Ishmael because every man's hand was against him. Would the day come, dreaded by his mother, when his hand would be against every man?

The last few years had weighed more heavily upon Ruth than ten might have done if Ishmael had been at home. She could no longer help her old husband up the ladder when he came home drunk; and many a night he had lain on the damp floor, groaning with rheumatic pains, for want of a strong young arm such as Ishmael's would have been. Still every Sunday brought her a gleam of gladness. As yet Ishmael had not gone astray amid his manifold temptations; and she was comforted for her own sorrow and his. But what would become of him when she was no longer there?

It was a hard trial to her, when she heard Ishmael's call, plaintive and low, sounding round and round the hut through the stillness of a winter's night, and she could not answer it. It would come nearer and nearer, until it seemed as if it was under the very eaves; but if her husband was crouching over the fire she dared not even open the door to look out. In the black darkness outside the little casement she could see for a moment the dim outline of her boy's white face gazing through the lattice-panes; and then the long, low, plaintive cry grew fainter, and died away in the woods behind.

"I must tell Nutkin of that owl," said old Humphrey, peevishly.

At last Ruth could go out no more to her hard work, but lay still and almost helpless in her close loft, scarcely able to creep down the ladder to the hearth below. Old Humphrey could not understand that she was no longer the willing drudge she had been so long. That she could get free from him by death never once crossed his dull brain, soddened by drink. Many a moan he made over his wife's idleness in the sanded kitchen of the "Labor in Vain," where he sat now on a corner of a bench furthest from the fire, having only a few pence to spend; he who in better days had been welcome to the best seat, and been most lavish with his money.

But whenever Sunday came new life seemed to visit Ruth. Whence the strength arose she could not tell; but it never failed her when she got up from her bed, and crept downstairs, and out into the spring sunshine to meet Ishmael. Everybody knew now, except Humphrey, that Ishmael haunted the old home where his mother was dying; but they took no notice except by carrying food, as they said, for old Ruth, though they knew well she could not eat it.

Some of the women offered to do any washing they could for her, and made no remark when Ishmael's clothing was among it. For when we are going down visibly into the dark valley of the shadow of death, those around us look upon us with other eyes, and press upon us some of the kindliness and tenderness which would have made all the pilgrimage of life only a happy journey. Ruth, so long a solitary and sorrowful woman, wondered at the friendliness which gathered about her in her last days.

"It makes home seem sweeter," she said to Ishmael, "to have plenty o' friends, and plenty o' everything else. But if it had always been so I might never ha' thought as dyin' was like goin' home. I always think as if heaven were home now, Ishmael," she added, a faint smile lighting up her wrinkled face.

She was sitting beside him on the old door-sill for the last time, though that they did not know. For when death is drawing near to any one of us we do not always know that the last time is come for the old familiar duties and habits of every-day life. It had been a long sunny day in May, but now the twilight was coming on, and every minute made her beloved face more thin and shadowy.

"It feels a'most," she went on falteringly, "like when I was a little girl, and 'ud hear father callin' me in from my play. I'm partly afeared to say it, Ishmael; but it's sometimes as if I could hear the blessed Lord callin' 'Ruth, come to Me, and ye shall find rest.' And last night I answered Him out loud, 'Lord, I can't rest because of my lad Ishmael.' And it seemed to me as if there came a low quiet voice whispering to me, 'Leave Ishmael to Me. He is My son.' And I said to myself, 'The Lord has heard my affliction again.'"

Ishmael sat silent, with his eyes fastened on the pale yellow light in the sky behind the tops of the trees, across which a bat was flitting to and fro; but he did not see the sunset light or the flight of the bat.

"Ay!" she said, almost joyously, "and to-day I knew He'd heard; for Mrs. Clift and Miss Elsie came to see me; and Ishmael, my lad, they brought grand news for thee. They're going away across the seas, to that country where folks go for a better chance than they've got here; and they've promised to take thee with them; for Mrs. Clift said, 'It was all along of Elsie that Ishmael got into trouble and disgrace; and folks won't think badly of him there; and I'll be like a mother to him,' said Mrs. Clift. And I knew then that God had heard my affliction again."

"Oh, mother!" cried Ishmael, "I couldn't leave thee, never; not if the Queen of England sent for me to go!"

[illegible] free. She could no longer come down the ladder which led to the loft, where she lay in darkness; but whenever Humphrey was away, Ishmael was beside her in the darkness, within reach of her hand, as in the old time when he was a child. There was no stint of food for him now, for Mrs. Clift came every day with Elsie, and Mrs. Chipchase sent from the farm, or called in to see Ruth herself, and neither of them came empty-handed. It was only when the time came each day for him to escape out of the way of his father that he felt himself still an exile from his home.

"I'll not leave thee to-night," he said, one evening when she seemed worse than he had ever seen her before ; "I can't leave thee to-night. Maybe thou'rt dyin'."

"Nay," she answered with a long, low, sad sigh, "nay, Ishmael, there mustn't be a fight twixt thy father and thee over my dyin' bed."

"He'll come home drunk," he said almost fiercely ; "and I can't leave thee alone with him."

"I'm not afeared to be left alone with thy father," she replied. "He was a good husband to me once, and he'll not be hard with me when I'm dyin'. I wasn't always as good a wife as I might ha' been ; and I've a many things to say to him. Hark ! they're running to tell thee he's comin' up the lane. Go, Ishmael ; kiss me, and go quickly."

"I cannot go !" he cried, clinging to her ; "p'r'aps I shall never see thy face again, never ! Oh, mother, I cannot go!"

But as he still held her in his arms, and she pushed him feebly away, Elsie's clear young voice was heard in the kitchen below, calling hurriedly.

"Ishmael, she cried, "little Willie Nutkin is lost in the old quarry behind the cave, and we want you. Nutkin, and the squire and everybody ; we all want you."

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for September 18. Golden Text. Ps. 105 : 43. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN our lessons for the past quarter we have seen the misery and helplessness of God's ancient people in Egypt, and the mighty power and love of our God in their deliverance. What could be more pitiable than their slavery, the bitter, cruel bondage which they endured, who were yet heirs through promise to the richest and most fertile of lands ! Only the antitype can equal it, the state of God's people now, and this is even more grievous. What does it mean that men and women who are called to be divine, to exercise the very power of God in their own lives and upon the lives of others, are yet held captive to lust and passion and self, just as though there were no Saviour to deliver, and no salvation to set them free? What does it mean, that instead of going forth in the power of "the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. 1 : 12), the Lord working with them and confirming the word with signs following (Mark 16 : 20), instead of leaving behind them everywhere on their track, sinful and sick ones delivered and healed, and bound ones set free, the proofs of believers' ministry are so small compared to apostolic times? It is time we set ourselves to discover the reason, and cry unto God for as complete a deliverance as Israel experienced in coming out of Egypt.

It was a matter of primary importance with God's ancient people that they should recognize their bondage, and that they should carry the matter to God. Thus it must be with us. So long as a powerless unfaithful child of God is satisfied with his condition, he will continue to abide in it, but when he discovers in God's Word promises of a life of power and of liberty to which he is a stranger, and he discovers moreover that he has a title to this inheritance of power, it is folly and sin in him to go on living as he has done, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and of love and of a sound mind" (2 Tim. 1 : 7). If you and I are not exercising the spirit of power, we are wronging God who has given it to us in the gift of His Holy Spirit, as surely as He had already given the land of Canaan to the Israelites in Egypt, and we are wronging our own selves to whom God has given His gifts, and others for whose sake God has trusted His gifts to us.

How stands it then? Are we willing to set ourselves to the task of obtaining this deliverance as a realized possession, and are we willing to do so at any cost which may be involved? Are we willing to stake everything upon it ; life, reputation, money, influence, comfort, to cast all into the scale so that only God may have His rights and possess us as instruments which will carry out His will in the same power and devotedness as the early Christians did, and with the same glorious results? Then let us make one united cry to God that He will undertake for us until the power and blessing of the first days of the Christian church have visited us again, and God will surely hear our cry. And if, in our close dealing with Him, He calls upon us to give up this or that unnecessary expenditure, let it be done without a moment's hesitation ; if He call upon us to renounce the friendship of some one we have valued, let nothing weigh in the scale against the interests of Jesus; if our hearts are wholly His, and He has told us so, it will cost very little to place our treasure where our hearts are gone before. The great want in the Christianity of our day is whole heartedness.

We have seen how Moses, before he could be instrumental in delivering the children of Israel from Egypt, must first become nothing in himself, must find his own plans of helping them to be a hindrance and not a help, and must be so conscious of his own utter weakness that his temptation instead of being as at first, that of too great zeal to undertake the deliverance of the people, should actually become that of fear to undertake it, even when God sent him. He had to find that his great learning was of no avail, that his influence in the court of Egypt could not help God, that his burning zeal was useless, that he could not even speak, in fact that he was of no account ; and then, and then only could he do by faith that which God will allow no man to do by human resources. We have seen his mistake when he carried his self-distrust to a point in which it became distrust of God, and he almost forced God to send Aaron with him. It was probably God's first intention to unite the offices of ruler and priest in the person of Moses as a type of Christ, and we have seen in the fearful sin of Aaron in the matter of the golden calf, how much better it might have been had Moses simply trusted the promise of God, "I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt say" (Ex. 4 : 12).

We have also seen in our lesson on Moses and the Magicians how great is the contrast between a man empty of himself but thoroughly at God's disposal, and a man who, after having blasphemously denied any knowledge of God, so yielded to a demoniacal strife against God and His people that at last God hardened the heart which had been wilfully steeled against Him. Moses by the lifting up of his hand under the command of God, exercised an irresistible power over Pharaoh and all his people, Pharaoh, king of the then mightiest nation upon earth, full of threatenings and anger and malice, but possessed of no power to hurt the people of God, nor yet to defend his own people from the wrath of the Almighty, obliged to withdraw his reiterated declaration that he would not let the people go, and at last even to beseech them to depart; and then, when with fiendish hatred he pursued them into the Red Sea, the death which he had desired for them, overtook him, and he went to his account to meet, whether he would or no, the God whom he had sought to ignore and had blasphemed in word and deed.

We next thought of the Passover, the blood of the Lamb under cover of which the children of Israel abode, when the destroying angel passed over to destroy the flower of Egypt, the first-born of all the land. O it is true of us that "If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we (i.e. God and we), have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin ;" and again, "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1 : 7, 9). Walking in the light, i.e. in the consciousness of always pleasing God, there is fellowship, a real understanding between God and us. Are we then not sinful? Yes, but cleansed and therefore clean, and we have no right to be anything else. Any believer whose heart condemns him, who has a constant sense of uncleanness, is either not walking in the light, allowing sin of some kind to continue unconfessed, or he does not really believe that the blood of Jesus cleanses him now from all sin. Faith and obedience are the great requisites to purity of life. A Christian young lady who longed for holiness of heart, had a constant sense of condemnation, and again and again her thoughts were turned to a valuable ring which she wore. At last she sold it and gave the money to the work of God ; and all sense of condemnation disappeared. God was jealous of that ring. Let us make conscience of all things.

Our next lesson was on the Red Sea, the great trial of faith and the glorious deliverance. Paul says the people were "baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea (1 Cor. 10 : 2), i.e. they went through a death and resurrection. For such as were naturally slaves of fear what must have been the terror of being led into the bed of the ocean with walls of water hundreds of feet high on either side. Faith alone could grasp the fact that not one drop of those walls of water could move from its place without the will of its Creator, who manifested Himself there in the pillar of cloud or of fire ; and faith alone could rest still with the certain knowledge that in that narrow water walled way their deadly enemies marched behind them. It was a death, but there was a resurrection to follow. And it is so with every definite deliverance which we receive from the hands of God, it is always one history, the life of Christ out of the death of self. In our lesson on the Manna, we see how they who had been marvellously delivered were afterward miraculously sustained. He who is our provider can never fail to send succor in time of need for spiritual and for temporal necessities.

Our next two lessons were on the Commandments. It is those who live with no cloud between them and God, who walk in the light of His countenance and rejoice in His name all the day (Ps. 89 : 15, 16), it is such as these who are the most anxious to discover the will of God that they may do it. Paul prays for the Colossians that they might be filled with the knowledge of God's will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding that they might walk worthy of the Lord to all pleasing (Col. 1 : 9, 10). These were no badly converted Christians, Paul gave thanks to God for their faith in Christ Jesus, their love to all saints, and the hope which was laid up for them in heaven, the Word of the truth of the Gospel brought forth fruit in them, but they needed to become acquainted with all the will of God. This is our life's study, to discover by His Word and by His Spirit that which is His will, and to let Him write it on our hearts. Sometimes the writing is painful, but it is worth the while if thereby we may walk worthy of our God. In the early part of our review we have referred to Israel's idolatry. The Lord our God so deliver us and so teach us His will that when our Lord shall come we may be found ready.

A Sunday Morning Dream.—A Writer to the London Record says : "One Sunday morning, some months ago, quite early, it seemed to me I was neither waking or sleeping, when the following dream passed through my mind. I fancied I was in a place of business familiar to me, when I met a gentleman I had not seen for some years, and who, though possessing much of this world's wealth, was devoid of the true riches—peace and joy through faith in a loving and living Saviour. Somewhat abruptly calling me by name, he thus accosted me, 'Will you give up your business immediately and accept my cheque for—?' naming a large amount. At once I answered, 'Yes.' Somewhat in surprise, but with evident gratification, he replied, Then you do believe and trust me?' 'Most implicitly,' was my answer. Then all at once it seemed to me as though my whole soul was drawn out toward him in earnest longings for his salvation, and I said to him, 'It pleases you that I trust you? Oh, believe me, this is the way in which God would have you accept His offer of eternal life. Freely, lovingly, surely, He offers it to you, and asks you to take His word for it. Yes, now, at this very moment, as you listen to my voice, in the person of His Son, our dear Lord Jesus Christ, who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. He has paid the debt. 'Jesus did it—did it all, long, long ago.' All that remains for you to do is to believe God, to take Him at His word, and receive now, once and forever, to the rejoicing of your soul, this grand truth, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' I awoke, and my whole being was filled with a holy peace, as I thought of what an immediate salvation there is in Christ for every poor sinner."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Loss of the Teuton, a British Steamer, is reported from Capetown, South Africa. The vessel struck on a rock near Quoin Point on August 30th. She backed off and steamed for the shore, but before reaching it her speed was seen to slacken, and she suddenly foundered in deep water. Three boats were lowered and were filled with as many of the passengers and crew as could be crowded into them. Two of the boats have come safely to land, but the third, on board of which were thirty women and children, it is feared, is lost. The passengers and crew numbered 227 persons, of whom nearly two hundred must have been drowned. The sudden sinking of the vessel was caused by the collapse of the water-tight bulk heads dividing the compartments. The Teuton was one of the Union Mail Steamship Company's vessels, and left England on her voyage to Africa on Friday, August 5th.

Two Electoral Defeats have Befallen Mr. Gladstone's supporters in England during the week. In North Lincolnshire an election was held on September 2d, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of a Liberal member of Parliament, and a Conservative was elected by a considerable majority. In North Durham, on September 3d, Sir George Elliott, a Conservative, was elected also in the place of a Liberal member. Thus the administration loses two supporters, which means a difference of four in a party vote. The change is in part due to the Irish vote, which at this election was cast for the Conservative who promised to vote for the release of the men imprisoned under the Coercion act in Ireland. It was also due in some measure to the wave of reaction sweeping over the country in favor of reciprocity or "fair trade." The principle of the "fair trade" party is to admit free of duty the productions of those countries only which admit British manufactures free. This discrimination, should it be carried into effect, will operate prejudicially against the United States unless a revision of our own tariff takes place.

The Operation of the Land Bill is Dreaded by the leaders of the Land League in Ireland. At a banquet given in Dublin, on August 29th, to Mr. John Dillon, who has recently been liberated from jail, Mr. Dillon referred at length to his action in regard to the Land bill, and said he was very strongly of the opinion that the passage of the bill would immediately increase the difficulty, if it did not render impossible, the carrying on of the Land League movement on the old lines. When it is remembered that "the old lines" included Boycotting, maiming cattle, and shooting landlords, the assurance will be hailed with pleasure. Mr. Dillon feared the yoke of landlord ascendancy would be so much altered as to make the people once more bow their heads beneath it, whereas if the fight had been continued another six months unconditionally they would have been in a position to dictate their own terms and abolish landlordism altogether. That opinion is open to doubt, though it was well understood from the first, that the abolition of landlords was an article of the League's creed.

A Special Service of Prayer for the Recovery of President Garfield was held at several Nonconformist places of worship in London, on Sunday, August 28th. Liverpool newspapers state that prayer for Mr. Garfield was almost universal in the churches there on Sunday. The Bishop of Tennessee, preaching at Seaford, England referred to the spirit which is abroad in the world to put down all authority.

A Bitter Attack has been Made on Mr. Forster, the British Secretary for Ireland, and on Mr. Gladstone for selecting him for the position. Many American journals have echoed this denunciation, with no apparent reason except that Mr. Forster is not an Irishman, and is therefore presumed to be unable to understand Irishmen and Irish affairs. It is, however, notorious that the appointment of an Irishman to the post would have been fatal to the prospects of the Land Bill. Mr. Forster was chosen because he had given evidence during a former session of Parliament, when he had charge of the Education Bill, that he possessed in pre-eminent degree the qualities of tact, patience and good humor—qualities essential to the successful management of Irish affairs. It has been proved by experience that an Irishman as Secretary for Ireland has inspired the jealousy of the Irish members, and has been more hated than any Englishman could have been.

The Enquiry into the Cause of the Explosion on board the British ship Doterel has terminated. The court has acquitted the captain and officers of all blame. In the opinion of the court the first explosion was caused by gas evolved in the coal bunkers, into which a light had probably been introduced for purposes of examination. The court further expressed the belief that the second explosion was the result of the first, the violence of which burst the bulkhead and allowed the flame to enter the magazine. There was no evidence to support the suspicion that the vessel was blown up by dynamite concealed among the coals.

A Pamphlet on the Condition of Russia has been published by Count Baschkoff and General Jadcreff, the friends and advisers of the Czar, in which some frank admissions are made. It is claimed that it represents the view the Czar held when he was only heir to the throne. It is asserted that it was submitted to the Czar shortly before his father's death, and received his approval. It acknowledges that all Russia is dissatisfied with the present state of affairs. It advocates some kind of popular administration, and has apparently been published in order to acquaint the world with what the Czar might do if the Nihilists would refrain from agitation, and discontinue their plots for his assassination.

The Agitation Against the Jews in Germany continues, in spite of the influence exerted against it by the Emperor and the Crown Prince. Various causes are alleged for the spirit of hatred that prevails against the Jewish race there, and in other European countries. The principal reason, however, appears to be that the Jews are very seldom landed proprietors or producers; that they are mainly traders and money-lenders, and by their superior commercial skill they have become rich. Jewish capitalists hold mortgages on the estates of the aristocracy, and Jewish pawnbrokers have the goods of the poor in pawn. It is evident that God is punishing the nations in this way for the sins of the past, when the Jews were not permitted to possess land. Jews found trade the only way in which they could maintain themselves, and they became adepts in it and have surpassed their rivals in all its departments. Thus the Germans, Austrians, Russians, and Armenians are now only reaping the fruits of their own misdeeds.

Nearly Buried Alive.—A Curious Incident occurred in the British camp at Newcastle, in South Africa, during the Transvaal war, illustrating a too common danger. A private of the 97th who had poisoned himself with native grog—a sort of villainous brandy—was brought in as dead, and an inquest was held upon him. He was found to have died by overdrinking bad alcoholic liquor, and was in the course of the morning taken away for burial. While being borne to the grave the shaking up of the coffin awoke him, and he shouted lustily to be let out, causing a general scare among the men carrying him. The man was released, and is still alive, and his narrow escape will doubtless make him more cautious as to the quality of his liquor in future.

A Spanish Martin Luther.—The Rev. J. P. Wigstone, of Villagarcia, says: "We have a hearer in this town who has his country house and land about twenty miles distant. This is the season for work in the fields, and this man circulates Gospels and tracts in that part. The priest has excommunicated any one who will serve him in the fields or the house. One Sunday in July he nailed a paper on the church door before mass, begging that the priest would convince him publicly of his errors. Coming out of mass everybody was talking about the heretic, the priest among the number. At this moment our friend presented himself. Everybody gathered round, and the priest was accompanied by three who are studying for the priesthood. 'Mr. Rector,' said our friend, 'you say I am a heretic, and that the doctrines I now profess are wicked. Now, I have brought two books for you to examine publicly—a Roman Catholic Catechism and Bible. I am determined to be right. Now tell me, are these books bad? They are recognized by the pope and the bishops, and they contain all the doctrines I have spoken about in the parish.' The priest was enraged, and so were his friends. Our friend continued: 'I want you to give your judgment first on the Catechism. Is it good? But, mark you, it says we ought to believe the Holy Scriptures.' 'I won't give any opinion whatever.' 'Then, about the Bible, what do you say, is it false?' 'I won't give any opinion.' It was an exciting time, and in that inland fanatical place it as a bold step to do this. The other day in that village a man burned a Bible because in Matthew 1 it said the Virgin brought forth her 'first born.' But our hearer took the priest's Bible to show him that was just the same. In this way the Word of God gets spread."

Champagne in a Welsh Sewer.—For some time past in the town of Cardiff, Wales, there has been considerable excitement in the matter of a lottery for the benefit of the infirmary there. Tens of thousands of tickets were sold; indeed, every one in the district was supposed to "try his luck." The process of drawing for the prizes came off, and it so happened that a case of champagne fell to the lot of Mr. Johns, a good Christian teetotaler of forty years' standing. Here was a case of conscience to be settled. Of course he could not drink it; he would not give it to the infirmary for the patients, nor sell it. After a short consultation with members of his family the washing-tub was sent for, the contents of the bottles emptied into it, and then the whole ignominiously thrown into the common sewer! Some of his neighbors found grievous fault with him, while others applauded him for his heroic settlement of the difficulty.

Saved at Seventy.—At Redruth, in Cornwall, England, a town missionary and his band of workers hold open-air services all the year round, sometimes in storms of rain. On one of these occasions, when the rain fell heavily, a poor woman living in a cottage close by heard the singing. For sixteen years she had not been to church or chapel, and only two or three times to a mission hall. So, hearing the singing, she said to those in the house, "Well, to think they are out in this storm of rain! There must be something in that religion, and I should like to have it." So, being feeble, she afterward listened at the window, where the Holy Spirit convinced her of sin. When the missionary called to see her, she exclaimed, "Bless God! I have found Jesus. I know I am saved: I feel it. To think an old sinner of seventy, living all my life in sin, should now be saved. Praise God." As thus she gave glory to God, her face was radiant with joy.

A Young Convict has Recently been Led to Christ through the instrumentality of Mr. G. Hatton, whose self-denying work among criminals in St. Giles's, London, is so well known. Having made application for admission into the home, he was asked what he had been doing for a living. His reply was, "I have done nothing that is good, but, on the contrary, everything that is bad. I am really sick of my life. I do hope that you will take me in and help me to become an honest man." "Have you been convicted many times?" he was asked; "and when was your first conviction; and have you a father?" His answer was, "I have no father. My mother turned me out of doors at the age of thirteen," and he proceeded to give a long list of convictions recorded against him. "What made you come to us?" "I heard of your kindness at a mission in Spitalfields, and I thought I would try and get an honest living." He was admitted into the Home, and watched very carefully. He gave signs of repentance, and was often found in tears when spoken to. A situation was obtained for him, where he has proved himself worthy of the trial given. He has given his heart to Christ, and rejoices in sin forgiven.

AMERICANS have just been reminded of the name of "Bonar" by the visit of the septuagenarian whose portrait appears in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to attend Mr. Moody's Bible Conference at Northfield, Mass. The name is not unfamiliar to the religious people of this country; for as long as "I heard the voice of Jesus say,"

"I was a wandering sheep,"

and other hymns which may be found in almost any hymn book, continue to be sung in the homes and the churches, people will think of Horatius Bonar of Scotland; and as long as the Life of the Rev. Robert Murray McCheyne stands a cherished memorial of one of the saints of the earth, people will remember its author, Andrew Bonar. Least of all do the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have read so many of their discourses on prophecy in its columns, require to be told who Drs. Horace and Andrew Bonar are. Like the Wesleys, they are two brothers, one gifted as a preacher and writer, the other as a preacher and singer.

But old Scotland has been the scene of the labors so well appreciated in America, and the battle-ground of the conflicts that enlisted sympathy here. In that, their native country, the two Bonars remain white-haired veterans of the long struggle that ended in the disruption of the Church of Scotland; and in many years they have watched the heroes of that day—Welsh, and Gordon, and Candlish, and Guthrie, and Cunningham, and Buchanan, and the great Chalmers—lay down their weapons and go to their reward. They are monuments of the that made their race at once the awe of the pious and the butt of the godless; that Puritanism which is fast melting away, as the old bulwarks fall off, and as the railway and the telegraph obliterate the distinctive features of the nation.

A few more years and the story will be true, in a sense, once more: "The people served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, who had seen all the great works of the Lord that He did for Israel. . . . And also all that generation were gathered unto their fathers: and there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the works which He had done for Israel" (Judges 2:7,10).

For although the Scotch churches are rich in faith and strong in zeal, with more love to man than they had in by-gone years; yet the old men who have seen both periods notice that the fear of God and the love of his commandments which produced John Knox, are merging into other sentiments—sentiments that are much to be admired, but which are almost too dear at the price of their purchase.

Dr. Bonar and his contemporaries have seen the day when no temporal consideration was deemed sufficient to justify Sunday travelling or Sunday trading; and when reverence for the house of God and the Book of God were impressed with indelible impression upon the young. When, too, it was considered no merit to submit the authority of the Bible to the somewhat variable tests of scholarship, and its doctrines to the treacherous crucible of the human understanding. Much that was faulty and short-sighted in Christian faith and practice at that time has given way to accurate and full views of what the Gospel teaches; but the change has been carried to unwarrantable limits, and men still living who love "the old paths and the good way" (Jer. 6:16), regretfully notice that the words of God do not excite the awe with which they used to be regarded.

So the Bonars are venerated in their own land as representatives of a generation that has nearly passed away; and one of the two brothers having just been among us, with his cheerful face and eager voice, we give our readers a few notes of his rather uneventful life. Dr. Andrew A. Bonar was born in the year 1810, and if his birth did not actually take place in Edinburgh, that was at least the home of the family. The period of his school and college life is veiled by the privacy in which the Scotch love to pursue their affairs. But he was a young minister in 1836, when he began to attract notice by his fervent piety and his firm belief in the speedy premillennial advent of Christ.

At that time the doctrine of Christ's personal reign upon the earth, as the hope of the Church, was far less extensively known than it is now; and so strong was the prejudice against it, that no common courage and clear-sighted perception of truth were necessary to lead a man to profess it openly. But these very characteristics were at that time developing themselves in Dr. Bonar, and in company with his brother he patiently studied the prophetic Scriptures. That was the wise and candid way to settle his convictions; for it is strange disregard of that portion of God's Word, rather than any particular interpretation of it, that characterizes nearly all those who look for the gradual improvement of the world up to a state of universal Christianity, and who deny the personal return of Christ to reign upon the earth and remove the curse from it.

It has always been the aim of the writers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to lead people to read the prophetic Scriptures for themselves. Differences of opinion regarding points of detail in the events that are to come upon the earth are of small moment, compared with an intelligent acquaintance with the large section of the Bible which treats of the future of the Jewish and Gentile Church. Many of God's people, who would shudder at the thought of slurring over the historical, devotional, or doctrinal parts of the Bible have no scruple in vaguely setting aside as "figurative" the books and chapters in which the near future of the Church is minutely sketched, with its disasters and deliverances, its trials and triumphs, all to come. This is done with as little discrimination as an ostrich exercises when it swallows for food bread and meat, paper and rags, stones and iron, with almost anything else that comes in its way. It is a mistake into which Dr. Bonar never fell. He earnestly sought to know the whole counsel of God, and he remembered how carefully, by word and letter, Paul warned the Thessalonians of these things (2 Thess. 2:5).

In 1839 Dr. Bonar, who was then Mr. Bonar, and minister of Collace, with Dr. Black, of Aberdeen, Dr. Keith, and the Rev. Mr. McCheyne, were sent by the Church of Scotland on a

into the spiritual condition of the Jews. In those days such a journey was an undertaking scarcely less serious and novel that an expedition to the Arctic Sea is now; and it excited extraordinary interest in Scotland. The journey, moreover, was attended with no small danger; for the ports and cities of the East had not then been provided by the enterprise of competition with means for the accommodation and convenience of travellers, and the natives had not become familiar with the incident of meeting European tourists, and were less cautious than they have since grown about treating them roughly. Indeed when the party got among the fierce and bigoted people of Austrian Poland, they had a narrow escape from some shepherds with whom they came into contact.

Only the two younger members of the mission, Dr. Bonar and Mr. R. M. McCheyne, followed the whole course laid down for them, and returned home by way of Moldavia, Wallachia, Austria, and Prussia. A painful accident was the means used by Providence to turn the steps of Dr. Keith and Dr. Black in a different direction and for a larger purpose. Dr. Black dropped asleep when riding in the Egyptian desert, and fell off his camel, hurting himself so seriously that he had to be carried like a patient for many days afterward.

"None of all our company," writes Dr. Bonar, "could conjecture what bearing on the object of our mission this sad occurrence could have. Is it a frown on our undertaking? Or can it really be a movement of His kind guiding hand? We often spoke of it; in our visit to Galilee we thought that we saw some purposes evolving; but there was still something unexplained. Now, however, the reason appears; even that event was of the Lord, in wise and kind design. But for that fall, our fathers in the deputation would not have sailed up the Danube on their way to Vienna, and Pesth would not have been visited. This accident, which mainly disabled Dr. Black from undertaking the after fatigue of exploring Galilee, was the occasion of directing the steps of our two fathers to that station, where a severe stroke of sickness was made the means of detaining Dr. Keith till they had learned that there was an open door among the Jews.

"And there, accordingly, it has been that the Lord has poured down His Spirit on the Jews that have come to our missionaries so remarkably that no Jewish mission seems ever to have been blessed with deeper conversions. There is nothing but truth in the remark made by one of our number—'Dr. Black's fall from the camel was the first step toward Pesth.'"

The incident of the loss of Dr. Bonar's Bible in the well of Sychar is well known. He and Mr. McCheyne separated to look for that object of sacred associations, as all tourists in Palestine had to do for themselves forty years ago. Dr. Bonar found it, and in leaning over it let his Bible fall into the water. Four years afterward Dr. Wilson, the famous Indian missionary, who was exploring the same region in preparation to write his work "The Lands of the Bible," sent a native Samaritan down to examine the well, and the man found and brought up the soaked and decomposed remnants of the book.

During the absence of these ministers in the East, there occurred that great revival which shook many towns in Scotland to their centre. For never before had the propriety of a Presbyterian service been disturbed by crowds of men and women falling on the ground and crying out in the anguish of conviction of sin. So many people were affronted and incredulous at what they regarded as an overflow of excitement, that in the following year, 1840, the Presbytery of Aberdeen appointed a committee to collect evidence and inquire into the facts of the case!

Dr. Bonar returned to his charge at Collace in November, 1839; but that town was outside of the locality in which the rousing work of conviction and conversion was still in progress, and he was a good deal discouraged. But no Presbyterian minister at that time could be long in dull spirits, for the Church of Scotland was hastening into the

and in 1843 the memorable event took place, when four hundred and fifty of the ablest and most devoted ministers any Church ever had left their churches and manses, and, supported by an overwhelming multitude of the people, entered upon the struggles and hardships of organizing the Free Church of Scotland.

Dr. Bonar was one of the four hundred and fifty, and in fortitude under difficulty, patience under trial, faithfulness in labor, love of God, and knowledge of the Word, there was not a greater than he in the entire body of seceders. A friend met Dr. Bonar early one Sunday morning walking out of the road that led to his church. On remarking to him about the early time and the locality, "Ah," the doctor replied, "there is a poor woman who has been trying in vain to get her husband to church, and I thought if I went myself this morning, I might persuade him." And he had to preach that day twice at least, and probably three times. But for the sake of trying to win a soul he would go out early at almost any inconvenience to himself.

But it is the peculiarity of men like Dr. Bonar

, while gloriously enthusiastic, they remember old landmarks and contend for a careful study of Scriptures. Let us illustrate this by a charactic instance. Dr. Bonar was keenly alive to dangers which might arise from the adoption n erroneous theory about human perfection. at one time some of his people wanted to go ier than he thought was Scriptural or wise. at then did his elders and himself do? They a whole evening with their Bibles in their ds, "searching the Scriptures" to find out t really they taught concerning the perfecta- y in this life of believers; and the result was ually satisfactory.

or the last twenty-five years Dr. Bonar has n minister of Finnieston Free Church, in the

has lent his aid freely and heartily at evangel- services and prophetic conferences in England Scotland. He was an active co-operator with srs. Moody and Sankey when they went to land a few years ago. He has also written litracts and contrived in other ways to promote Master's cause.

rom an early date in his ministry Dr. Bonar has ngly maintained that all Christians ought to : the assurance of their salvation, and not rest sfied without it. He is also very emphatic and ded in preaching against any conformity of istians to the world. He recognizes the evil the dangers of the world's ways, and wants istians to keep on a different track altogether. ddition to these two points he holds, as we e said, the doctrine of Christ's premillenial ad- , despairing of the world's conversion under the pel, and daily watching, according to the com- ndment, for the Lord's appearing.

hose who have heard him in the pulpit are re of the facility he has in making himself in- sting; and that explains in a great measure popularity of his books. His "Narrative of Mission of Inquiry to the Jews," which he pre- d jointly with Mr. McCheyne, was first pub- ed in 1842; and it remains to this day one of most absorbing of the many books that have n written on travels in Egypt and Palestine. Life of McCheyne is in the front rank of gious biographies for every quality that makes emoir valuable and impressive. Both these ks have been reprinted and largely sold in this ntry; the latter having found its way into nearly y religious household in some parts of the ted States and Canada. Dr. Bonar has also lished a scholarly Commentary on Leviticus.

was from discernment of his character as a man of God that Mr. Moody invited the doc- to be present and help at the Believers' Bible ference, which closed its sittings the week be- last. Dr. Bonar came, accompanied by his ghter, who is enthusiastic about evangelistic ices, and sings and plays sweetly when her is wanted in that way. They did not prolong r stay after the Conference, but the doctor hav- responded to invitations to preach in Boston, onto, Philadelphia, and New York, they sailed in for Scotland on Saturday morning, the 10th ant. Dr. Bonar has been a widower for six- n years.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY IN EGYPT.

THE interest of archæologists and Bible students been excited by the discovery of a large num- of mummies and a vast store of relics of an- ity in a cave in the mountains near the Temple Deir-el-Bahari, about four miles from the Nile he east of Thebes. The number of mummies wenty-nine, and they are all of royal and priestly sonages who lived between the time of Abra- n and the time of Solomon.

The identity of twenty-six of the bodies has been ertained beyond dispute by the inscriptions n the mummy-cases, and there is not a doubt t the very Pharaoh who reduced the Israelites ondage, and whose daughter drew Moses out he river, is now lying in the Boulak Museum r Cairo, where the curiosities have been re- ved. As that king is not designated in the book Exodus otherwise than by the general name of Pharaoh, students of ancient Egyptian history have been obliged to rely upon collateral evidence to establish his full name and dynasty. He is considered to have been Ramses II., the third king of the nineteenth dynasty, and it is the mummy of this king that has now been found. The following is the description of it:

"The mummy is in a perfect state of preservation, but of the three mummy-cases in which it once probably reposed, only one remains. This mummy-case is of plain sycamore wood, unpainted and unvarnished. It is carved to represent Ramses in the position of Osiris. The crossed arms rest upon the breast. In the right hand is the royal whip, and in the left is the royal hook. The features are most beautifully and delicately carved, and are surmounted by the crown of Upper and Lower Egypt, with the uræus serpent. The mummy-case is a most graceful and animated specimen of sculpture, displaying, in all its purity, the firm and flowing lines of the period of the Egyptian Renaissance.

"The nomen and prænomen cartouches of Ramses are written in plain black characters upon the mummy-case, which bears no other text or representations whatever, and in its beautiful simplicity contrasts strangely with the pompous and exaggerated dedications of almost all other inscriptions which mention the name of Ramses the Great. The mummy itself is wrapped in rose-colored and yellow linen of a texture finer than the finest Indian muslin, upon which lotos flowers are strewn. One of the bands which pass across the shrouds to keep them in place bears a hieratic inscription stating that this, the mummy of Ramses II., was concealed in a pit at a time when a foreign army invaded Egypt."

The cases of the other mummies present considerable variety in their carving and coloring, all being distinguished by the most costly and tasteful style of ornamentation. Several of the mummies are queens and princesses of ancient dynasties that reigned in Egypt.

Besides these human remains there were discovered in the cave the following curiosities:

A magnificent tent made of pieces of leather of different colors and bearing the cartouche, or inscribed tablet, of King Pinotem I., with the royal vulture and stars in red, yellow, and green. Fifteen enormous wigs which were worn upon occasions of ceremony. These wigs are about two feet high, and are made of curled hair or wool falling in braids behind the back. Three thousand seven hundred small porcelain funeral statuettes, each bearing cartouches and inscriptions. Nearly two thousand other objects, such as drinking cups, baskets, vases, lamps, urns, chairs, dried fruits, boxes, etc.

There are also four papyri, or rolls of ancient Egyptian paper, covered with hieroglyphic writing, which may prove to be the most valuable part of the discovery. It is possible that they will throw light upon the history of Genesis and Exodus by confirming the sacred narrative of Israel's captivity in Egypt; or they may furnish new evidence that the highest civilization of the world was in times which it is customary to call primitive, and that the savage state was not the original state of man, but that it represents a deterioration from the remarkable race of men whose achievements are chronicled in the tenth chapter of Genesis.

But whether the papyri turn out to be important or not, this discovery of the mortal remains of the grandest monarchs of Egypt in the time of its glory, of whom it was thought that all trace except the stone-inscriptions had gone from the earth, is not the least of the striking occurrences of 1881.

The discovery was brought about in a simple way. One of the Turkish provincial governors of Egypt noticed in the early part of the summer that the sale of relics to foreign tourists was brisker than usual; so he arrested several of the Bedaweens, and by means which are familiar to Oriental justice extorted from them the information that they had recently lighted upon a cave which contained the treasure. The governor had the intelligence to telegraph the news to the Khedive, and he at once directed Herr Emil Brugsch, of the Boulak Museum, to go to the place and take charge of what the cave contained.

The manner in which the relics came to be in the cave is explained by inscriptions in the mummy-cases which record the fact that the priests removed the most precious of the mummies in their charge to the cave for security when Cambyses invaded and conquered Egypt in the year 520 B.C. The mummies were at least a thousand years old at that time, and they have remained concealed in the cave 2400 years.

MR. CHARLES COOK, the celebrated open-air preacher, who is now visiting this country for the benefit of his health, and whose portrait we give on page 589, is one of the most successful evangelists in London. His well known work at the West End, in Hyde Park, Hyde Park Hall, and the Metropolitan Music Hall, alike speak of his ability to attract, and his power to retain the attention of the masses; while the numbers who have been converted through his ministry show plainly the honor God has conferred upon his work. The last named place, accommodating over 2000 persons, is more than crowded every Sunday evening with a congregation, the majority of whom have been gathered out of the non-church-going masses.

He was born in 1846, and after his conversion in 1867 he immediately commenced work in the cause of Christ. His first efforts were made in the poor lodging houses of the east of London, where he spent every hour of his time when not engaged in business in Christian conversation with the inmates, and in praying with such of them as were sick.

In the year 1872 some of the parks were thrown open for public meetings, and Mr. Charles Cook at once began preaching the Gospel in Hyde Park; and no better illustration of the success of open air preaching or greater arguments could be used by that hard-working society, the Open-Air Mission, in proof of the work they are doing and helping, than that one of their honorary members, who began his work by standing up in Hyde Park with but one brother to help him, has in a few years succeeded in getting an indoor congregation of 2000, and that the largest regular open-air meeting in London is his meeting, not where infidelity is advocated and upheld, but where the simple Gospel is preached and blessed.

At the close of the second summer's work a music hall holding 1000, but nearly a mile from the park, was taken for indoor meetings; but after a month's services the proprietor refused the further use of the place, and Mr. Cook then hired for six months a large dancing academy (where years before he had loved to dance), and which was filled every Sunday evening. In 1877 the large music hall in the Edgware Road was taken, and for four years the Sunday evening services have gone on, it being a common thing to see the large bills outside the hall, "NO ROOM."

Mr. Charles Cook's forte is open-air preaching, and many have been the marked and striking cases of conversion in Hyde Park. It is the park of the West End, and on Sunday evening is crowded with a class of people who attend no place of worship, and it is to this particular class that he has been wondrously blessed. Possessed with a singularly powerful voice, which experience has taught him how to use and modulate, he is distinctly heard even by those on the outskirts of the vast crowd who surround the rostrum from which he speaks; and, ably and lovingly assisted by a good and godly band of singers, who are almost as well known by their correct singing as he by his plain preaching, he never fails to get an attentive as well as immense congregation.

As an evangelist he has travelled through England, Ireland, Wales, and Scotland, beside preaching in many cities of the continent of Europe, but of later years has kept more to his local work. On account of his health failing through overwork and study, after preaching almost nightly for ten years, and having the entire responsibility of the whole of the work upon him, he has been recommended to come to America for change of air, hoping the voyage will do him good, and allow him to labor here for a few months.

BREAD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, September 11, 1881.*

"Then Elisha said, Hear ye the word of the Lord: Thus saith the Lord, to-morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel," etc.—II. KINGS 7 : 1, 2 and 20.

THANK God for the showers of last night. Would that they might spread all over the land. Ten thousand families homeless. Vast estates destroyed. Drought at the North, the South, the East, and the West. Was there ever such a time in which to preach a sermon about bread?

Around Samaria had been drawn the fiery girth of Assyrian vindictiveness. Siege was laid to the city, and ghastly and horrible famine prevailed. The bombardment of a modern city has in it something of grandeur as well as of terror. The toss and the bursting of the bombshells kindle the eye of the artist while people perish. But the besiegement of an olden time city was starvation by inches.

Nothing short of the Judgment Day will give any idea of what was suffered when Hamilcar besieged Utica and Titus besieged Jerusalem. In one of those old time besiegements history tells us that a mouse was sold for two hundred pence. History tells us that in one of those old time besiegements the soldiers gnawed the flesh from their left arms, while they fought with the right. Alas! for Samaria. The hollow-eyed wretches lay in the streets. The Bible says that the head of an ass was sold for twenty-five dollars. Mothers cooked their own children and fought over the disgusting fragments.

The hunger continued to pinch and drink out the life of the city, and left its wolfish howl in the market places, and shoved its victims into the grave. Tighter and tighter was the girth of Assyrian vindictiveness drawn around poor Samaria. At that darkest time Elisha comes forth, and he says: "To-morrow will end this famine, and in these streets, where these people are dying, you can buy a peck of fine flour for five shillings." There was a nobleman, a confidential friend of the king, on whose arm the king was leaning while he looked out upon the desolation; this nobleman said: "Well, that's absurd. If the Lord would open a window-shutter in Heaven and throw out a lot of corn, that might be. You are a silly prophet; you can't fool me with any such prophecy as that." Then retorted Elisha: "Thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof."

Four lepers stood at the gate of this besieged city. "Ah! what shall we do? what shall we do?" they cried. "If we stay here, we'll die of the leprosy; if we go into the city, we'll die of the famine; if we throw ourselves on this Assyrian host, they will cut us to pieces with their swords. What shall we do?" After much consultation and thought they decided they would throw themselves on the Assyrian host that was besieging the city. It was eventide, and the long shadows, which were funeral shadows, stretched across that dying city, and in the shadow of the evening the four lepers started for the encampment of the Assyrian host. Coming there, lo! the Assyrians were gone. The horses were tied by the encampment. A great banquet was spread. Plenty of silver and gold lying all around. Royal apparel in abundance. The richest of wines. Go there—go in, ye four lepers, and slake your thirst with the costliest of the wines, and clothe yourselves in the costliest of the apparel, and eat the richest fruits of all the earth. Banquet of four lepers!

Word, of course, reached the city of Samaria that the Assyrian host is gone, and the siege is lifted. Thousands on thousands of people pour out of the streets of Samaria. The dying wretches on the street lift up their eyes, and there is a ghastly smile on their faces at the announcement of bread, very cheap, a peck of fine flour for five shillings. But there is one word caught up and flung over the city and over the country—one word that goes forth from pauper's cabin and from rich man's gate, and from city tower—one word that goes up in shout, and laughter, and huzza, and congratulation—a plain word, but it thrills every heart, and it flushes every cheek, and it bounds from the white lips. That one word is "bread!" All the people of the city got the advantage of the fall in prices save one man—

History says that he was caught in the rush of the people as they were pouring out of the city. They ran over the nobleman not knowing who he was, or caring who he was; they ran over him and trampled him into the dust, and the record says, so it fell out that he was trampled in the gate and he died. Before we come to the more cheerful part of this subject, we want to stop a moment at the funeral of that man. I knew him. You know him. You see him in this city, or any city of America any day you want to. He died then, but he seems to have been resurrected. He was an out and out Rationalist. "Why," he says, "there's no sign that the Assyrian host is going to lift the siege, and we have looked in every hole and corner of this city for food, and we have actually become cannibals and eaten women and children. Now, you say to-morrow there is going to be plenty of flour, and it is going to be so cheap you can get a peck of it for five shillings. It is an absurd thing. I don't believe it."

Why, that is nothing new, that is nothing strange. There have always been men of that kind. They believe no more of God, or of Christ, or of Providence, or of eternity than they can understand with their little brain, not recognizing the fact that there are a thousand things we believe that we cannot understand. "O!" say these men, these Rationalists, "I don't believe that Christ is God, because I can't understand how the Divine and the human natures are interjoined. The Bible isn't true because there are many things in it I can't explain. Regeneration is a farce. There is good enough in us if we only get it out." "Development" is the word. "Development," or "culture," as though you spelled it "culchar."

The story of the Garden of Eden is a fairy story, no more to be believed than the "Arabian Nights," or "Robinson Crusoe," or "Gulliver's Travels." We are all descended from baboons, and we are blood relations to the monkey on the top of the hand organ. Lazarus was not dead; he only played dead. Christ did not turn the water into wine; He only found some wine convenient at that particular crisis of the entertainment, and He brought it in. Christ did not walk on Genessaret; He only walked on the shore so near it looked as if He was walking on the water.

What is the remarkable thing, the alarming thing in this day, is that Christian people cannot unblanched say they believe in a whole Bible, every statement, from the first word of the first verse of the Book of Genesis, to the last word of the last verse of the last chapter of the Book of Revelation. Go out among commercial circles in New York, and how many Christians are there who can stand bombardment. Out of five, how many will dare to say: "I believe everything in the Bible?" Well, if you find one out of five, you do well. Now, my friends, we have got to come to a time when we believe not only that every word in the Bible is true, but are courageous enough to state it. But what is the fact?

THIS WEAK-KNEED CHRISTIAN

meets a sceptic who says: "It's absurd to say that the Red Sea was divided." The weak-kneed Christian begins and he tries to soften down the statement and explain it away. "Why," he says, "that isn't so very wonderful. The fact was there was a hurricane, and it blew from one direction a great while, and the waters piled up, and then at that season of the year the water was very low anyhow. It isn't very wonderful that they should have crossed the Red Sea." Instead of coming out frankly and boldly, and saying: "I suppose God came down to the brink of the sea and with His right arm He rolled back the water on one side, and with His left arm He rolled back the waters on the other side, until they piled up hundreds of feet high, and through the glassy walls the sea monsters looked with affrighted eye upon the passing Israelites."

"Why," you say, "if I should take that position among business men in this city, I would be laughed at." What of it? Was not Elisha laughed at? You are no better than Elisha. You are no better than the Lord Jesus Christ, who was caricatured and assailed and spit on all the active days of His ministry.

But the sceptic comes up and says: "Really you, a professor of religion, don't believe that story about the whale swallowing Jonah; you know it's only a great fish story, and you can't possibly believe such a thing as that." There have not been so many Nantucket fishermen out after one whale as there have been men harpooning this Mediterranean sea monster, and they have got enough oil out of it to light ten thousand souls to perdition. "Why," says the sceptic, "it's absurd—that whole incident is absurd. Why, the prophet would have lost his life before he had passed through the jaws of the sea monster. Besides that, he could not have lived three days in such close quarters and in such bad ventilation." "Well," says the weak-kneed Christian, "I'll explain it for you. This whale is an air-breathing fish, and it often comes to the surface, and I suppose it took enough breath for itself and enough breath for the prophet."

Why, do you not say God can do anything, and if it was the smallest whale that ever floated the Mediterranean Sea, God could put a man down its throat. Who made the whale? God. Who made Jonah? God. Then He can do what He will with either of them. My friends, just as soon as we dismiss the supernatural and the miraculous out of our religion, we surrender the Bible, and I prefer "Æsop's Fables." They are what they profess to be—fables; but if you tell me after all I have read of this Bible that Christ did not turn the water into wine, and you actually prove that God did not divide the Red Sea, and that all those stories of miracles are mere fables, then I declare that the Bible is the worst fraud that was ever perpetrated in all God's universe.

Why, my friends, I am not this morning trying to prove the truth of the Scriptures; I want simply to make you who do believe in the entire Bible willing to be laughed at. Surrender nothing, compromise nothing, trim off nothing to please others. You can afford to wait.

a great while and said: "Matter is eternal; the world was not made; it was always made; God didn't create it." "I believe in the eternity of matter," says the Rationalist. But the geologist goes on in our day, and he discovers, what every body must admit, that the earth was gradually made. If gradually made, then there must have been a time at which the process began. If the process really started at a certain time, then who started it? And then we are ready, after all that process of thought, to open the Bible and read the first four words, and they roll up in magnificence indescribable: "In—the—beginning—God."

Rationalism laughed a great while at that story in the Bible, told over and over again, about the locusts, and you notice that wherever it is mentioned, it almost always speaks of the locusts as an army. Rationalism says: "That's absurd; it's a poor comparison anyhow. Why, an army walks; locusts fly; an army moves with precision, locusts go without any order." But in 1868, in the southwest part of this country, scientific men went out to watch the locusts, and they all talked invariably about "the army of locusts"—all the newspapers reported "the army of locusts," and said it was just like an army, moved like an army, halted like an army, had commanders, and that if the locusts halted when there was a wind, they would wait il the wind had passed, and then they would rt again, and go straight as an arrow—proving t the Bible was right when it spoke of the rmy of locusts."

Rationalism laughed a great deal at the story in about the light turned as the clay to the seal. Why," Rationalists said, "it's absurd; the light n't turn, it don't come in curves, the light is aight." Scientific men go on in their explora- ns and they come and tell us that the light does ve around the world just like the seal—like clay the seal.

Ah! my friends, we can afford to wait. The e will come—if not in your day or mine, the e will come—when all the world will see that re is perfect harmony between science and reve- ion.

But you say, "Suppose the Rationalist shall me out from Harvard, or suppose he shall come t from some German university, are you going put him off in this rough way?" I reply, God s no special rule for a graduate of Harvard or graduate of Berlin. He has got the same law d the same provision for great brain and for all brain, for high-forehead Greek professor, d flat-skulled Esquimaux. "He that believeth d is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth t shall be damned." By that divine announce- nt I must stand or fall, and so must you. I e my stand here this day, and I declare these be the theories of my religion: an infallible ble, a supernatural religion, a divine Christ, in om all the world must believe or be lost.

But my subject impresses me also with the way

hen the gates of the city were opened, if a few ves of bread had come in, that would have been great mercy; but no—what is in that pail? our. What is in that sack? Flour. What is at piled up in all the market places? Flour. hat is in every house? Flour, plenty of it, a ck for five shillings. That is the way God pro- les for the hunger of the nations. You know y are famine-struck with sin, you know they are ing for bread. What supply does God give? st a little grace for here a man, or a little grace there a man? No. Abundance of help, par- n for all, peace for all, comfort for all, life for all, aven for all.

The idea was well expressed by a lad who sent rd to his Sabbath-school superintendent that he nted to see him. The word came from a garret the lowest part of the city of New York. The perintendent went to see what was the matter. saw the little child about dying in the straw, d said, "Why did you send for me?" "Well," child replied, "I attend your Sabbath-school." Why do you look so very happy?" asked the perintendent. "You said last Sunday when I s there that whomsoever a fellow cometh to God will in nowise cast him away, and I have come Him, and I have prayed to Him, and He has ken away my sin, and I'm going to heaven, and thought I would like to see you before I go." ne boy's grammar was bad, but his faith was agnificent. Whosoever—that is the whole story Whosoever.

But mind you,

at was provided. It was not any coarse meal at the Lord gave that famine-struck city. It was ne flour. And when God provides salvation for e world He gives us grand salvation—it is beau- ul salvation. It is not the ground-up corn cobs worldly morality mixed with a little grace, but it a fine Gospel. It is an unadulterated Gospel. is a pure Gospel. Why one crumb of the bread llen from the Master's table is worth more than l the banquets of worldly frivolity.

Mind you, that just what that flour was, or much that flour was to those poor people of the city Samaria, that Christ Jesus is to all who have im. He does not offer a coarse supply when He ys to you and to me to-day: "I am the bread of e." Fine flour for a shekel. O! what Christ is you, and what He is to me, I cannot tell. With- t Him heaven would be a dungeon, with Him ne great Sahara would be a paradise. You may ave all the harps of heaven, and all the trumpets of heaven, and all the thrones of heaven. Give me Jesus. He washed away my sin. He com- forted my sorrows. He conquered my tempta- tions.

> "When on these new fledged wings I rise
> To tread the shore beyond the skies,
> I'll run through every golden street,
> And ask each blissful saint I meet,
> Where is the God whose praise I sing?
> Lead me, O, stranger, to your king.

Which Gospel do you like the best? Do you want the Gospel of Theodore Parker, or the Gospel of Darwin, or the Gospel of Stuart Mill? or would you not rather have the Gospel of the two old people who found more comfort in their religion in one hour than all the ungodly scientists of the earth ever found in a lifetime? You know what two people I mean. Those two old people that sat at opposite ends of the table in your child- hood. I mean those old people beside whom you would like to lie down and sleep when your work is done. Would you not rather have their religion, their than all the dreaming of the universities? O! come out from under the cold fog of Rationalism into the sunlight of Christ's Gospel. Stand on the eternal rock. No elaborate thinking necessary. If it were elaborate thinking, you might have to take this subject home, and think perhaps days and weeks and years about it. There is no elabo- rate thinking about it. There are just two ideas. You can put them together now. One idea is the saddest in the universe, and the other is the glad- dest: You are a sinner, but Christ died to save you." Can you not to-day put those two ideas together?

I proclaim this morning that the siege is lifted. Bread! Bread! Why perish with hunger? A peck of fine flour for five shillings? No; better than that. "Without money and without price." O! my dear brother, do not refuse this Gospel be- cause you cannot understand everything about it. Remember the fate of the sceptical nobleman— that Rationalist of olden time who, when told about the flour, rejected the prophecy because he could not see how the flour was to come. "The people trode upon him in the gate, and he died."

Let everything else go. There is one thing you can understand. I know you can take up this Bi- ble this morning, and find five hundred things you cannot understand. I can find a thousand; but there are two or three things I can understand. I know if I will come to God this morning and throw myself at His feet, crying for mercy, He will re- ceive me and pardon me and bless me, and He will do that for you. I swing the door wide open. I do not think a man can preach too wide a Gospel.

There was

on one of the Western lakes, and a father and hus- band found that he would have to get his family to the shore or they would perish. They were far away from the land; but he was a stout swimmer, and he had full faith in his strong arms. He said to his wife and child who were on the deck: "I'll leap into the waves, and then you leap after me, and I'll take you ashore. If I don't take you, no one can take you." It was an awful hour. The hus- band leaped into the wave; the wife and child leaped after him. The one clung to one shoulder, and the other to the other shoulder, and he put out with mighty strokes for the beach. It was not only his own life that was in peril, but the life of his wife and child.

With an almost superhuman effort he struggled toward the beach, but his strength began to fail. He found he could not reach the shore with his own life and the life of his wife and the life of his child. Someone must perish, or they must all go down. O! what a crisis it was in the life of the man. His strength failing, he said to himself: "My first duty is to my wife, and I'll have to let my darling child die." So tenderly he pushed her aside, the little child, and then began to put out for the shore. Coming to the shore, coming into the breakers and within reach of those on shore, he fainted dead away, and they carried him and the wife into a cabin. The child was gone. O! it was a grand thing for him to save one.

I bless God that Jesus is an Almighty swim- mer. He can take us all on his shoulder—father, mother, husband, wife, son, daughter—all the world. He is a mighty swimmer. Lay hold of His strength to-day. Lay hold of it, O ye dying yet immortal auditors. He is mighty to save. "O! come thou, and all thy house into the ark." Come this morning. Come now. In the prayer we offer just put up that one petition that will bring emancipation to your immortal spirit, and if you cannot pray in words, just look and live. And who knows but that by one almighty impulse this entire auditory may be launched into the kingdom of God? Come, Holy Ghost! Come, Holy Ghost!

The Rev. Cornelius DeHerr, a Missionary on the Gaboon River, west coast of Africa, one of our subscribers, writes "I have just visited two pow- erful tribes in the interior, one of which had never before seen a foreign missionary, and the other but once. Surprised by the intelligent, hearty wel- come accorded me, I learned that this was due to the Gospel teaching which had been carried to them by one of their own people, who in his journey- ings having come in contact with the truth, had embraced it, and at once set to work to bring others to the Messiah. Before I could tear myself away from them I had to promise, in response to their earnest pleadings, that I would send some one to teach them more of the way of life.

"Another party from farther interior, hearing of my arrival, travelled all day over a difficult road, that they too might hear the blessed message. During this tour I organized a church at a point where we had been employing a native assistant. On the first Sabbath eighteen were admitted on profession of their faith. At another place ten were admitted to the sealing ordinances, having previously been under instruction. Christian par- ents from among the heathen brought their little ones to receive the seal of the covenant. A num- ber reclaimed from their heathen practices came to me to be united in Christian marriage.

"These people bade me choose a site upon which they would erect a house, if perchance a missionary could be found who would remain with them and break to them the bread of life. And out of their extreme poverty they freely contributed of such as they had to the treasury of the Lord. Wherever I travel on this coast I find an open door. We need not leave the coast with its mil- lions of perishing souls to find work for the Master."

A Saturday Midnight Dance was Going On in Edinburgh in the house of a prominent member of St. George's Church congregation. Its minis- ter, Dr. Andrew Thompson, had been out late that night to visit a sick member of his flock. Re- turning home, his eyes chanced to light on this house, whose windows were brilliant with the glare of festivity. He paused as he saw the shad- ows of the dancers on the window-blinds of the drawing-room, and heard the sounds of the music, to which the votaries of Terpsichore were tripping it on the light fantastic toe. Taking his resolution, he stepped up to the doorway and rang the bell. Without speaking a word to the servant who opened the door, he went upstairs, entered the room, and stood up in the midst of the dancers. Had a spirit from the other world appeared, the party could not have been thrown into a state of greater embarrassment and confusion. The music ceased; the dancers stood still; a silence as awful as death followed, while the bold intruder sur- veyed the company with a stern glance. Not a word did he utter; not one tongue was moved to ask, "What doest thou?" As the penetrating glance of reproof fell in turn on each one of the revellers, every countenance fell, and the bravest quailed. The piercing eye and solemn presence having accomplished the work of admonition, the minister retired, amid the same unbroken silence. It was a bold stroke, but God blessed it, and it was the beginning of a work of the revival of gen- uine Christianity and reformation in many a fam- ily in the Scottish metropolis.

SYLPH SOMERS.

Oliver and David Owen's Wagons—The Brothers' Greeting on the Road—Owen finds on the Highway a Fainting Lady with her Child—His Efforts to Restore Consciousness are Successful.

AT the period before us Wrexham was the largest town in North Wales, and its fine church, with magnificent tower, panelled in stages and adorned with statues, is still the boast of the Principality. The road from this town to Chester was daily traversed a century since by Owen Oliver's huge wagon conveying corn and other useful commodities to the cathedral city.

The great wagon, covered with a canvas awning stretched on hoops, and lumbering along on very broad and massive wheels—necessary before macadamized roads were dreamt of—is nowadays almost a superseded article. Smooth and level highways, and, above all, the railway van and iron horse, have all but banished it from use as a mode of conveyance. But a century ago the wagon was an institution.

Owen Oliver's great wagon, drawn by four and sometimes six horses, had been for several years the chief means of communication between Wrexham and Chester—or, rather, there were two such methods of communication, Owen's wagon and another, the exact likeness of it, conducted by his brother David.

These wagons, however, travelled each day in different directions, for at the hour one started from Chester the other started from Wrexham, and moving at the same rate they passed each other about half-way on the road each day nearly at the same place and at the same moment. It was only at this instant of transition that the brothers saw each other and spoke to each other the whole year through, from New Year's Day to Christmas.

Owen and David were taciturn men—uncommonly so for Welshmen—for, as every tourist in Wales knows, whether he meets the "sons of the leek" in railway carriage or on the common road, the Cymri are an irrepressible race, and evidently take a huge delight in talking and in all justice; it must be added that they give as great a degree of delight as they take.

Owen and David Oliver, however, were certainly an exception to this rule, for as they met each day, what follows was the unvarying length and tenor of their conversation: Owen to David, as the horses' heads approached each other, "Morra;" David to Owen, in solemn reply, "Morra." David to Owen, as the wagons came side by side, "Aught? (i.e. "Is there any news?") Owen to David, in prompt response, "Naught (i.e. "Not any"). David to Owen, as the unhalted wagons rolled beyond each other, "Morra," and Owen's final salute was just its echo, "Morra," and with this closing greeting, without the turning of a head, the brothers parted, not to see each other again for another twenty-four hours.

It was a conversation, it will be seen, of just six words—three a-side—and with the exception of the simple negative letter n, they were relatively alike. An absurdly curt and monotonous interchange of thought and speech, one would say, between two rational beings.

Yet it served to refresh and keep alive in these men brotherly affection and interest, and of such a depth and strength that when, at last, one of the brothers died, the other only for a short time survived him. Deprived of the long accustomed momentary salutation and loving glance of one that was now gone forever, he fell into a strange sort of craze and melancholy, wasted away, pined and fretted to death. Life had lost its zest, and he hastened, as it were, to join his brother in the grave. How delicate and subtle is the bond that sometimes holds even rugged men to this world's life! And well has it been said that there are more mysteries in the heart of the simplest boor than a philosopher could fathom in a century.

Upon a day, at the period of our narrative, Owen, conducting as usual his heavily rolling wagon, had reached about a third of the distance to Chester, when, from the following incident, he was led to bring his horses to a stand. While cracking his great whip every now and then with the reverberation of a pistol shot, and calling to his horses to urge their pull and speed, with the laboring wagon, up an ascent, his eye, at a bend of the road, suddenly came in sight of a woman lying on one side of the highway, and his ear caught the sounds of a child weeping near her.

Owen, though of a gross build and rough exterior, had a warm Welsh heart, and the wailing voice and tears of the child greatly touched him, and as it would seem from the sequel, thawed his reserve and loosened his tongue, for a season, most unwontedly.

Halting his team on the incline soon as possible, he came over to the objects that had so arrested him, to learn what was the matter. When he had closely approached the woman and the child he perceived at once they were no common wayfarers. The child's features and dress bespoke her of a superior class, and the woman, who was lying on the ground as in a faint, had both the apparel and general appearance of a lady.

Owen did not often come into contact with "quality folk," as he called them, so checking his ruder forms of speech, as taken a little aback, he addressed the child in his most respectful accents.

"Pardon, little miss, a rough chap such as me," he said, "for speaking to the likes o' ye, but what's wrong, my pretty dear, with you and the lady?" Getting no reply because of the sobs of the child, Owen went over close to the prostrate form, and, speaking half to himself, said, "I think I mun' raise her agen the bank, poor lady, fur her pale face tells me her has fainted." This the kind-hearted fellow proceeded to do in the gentlest and most respectful manner, and when done, he took his stand near the lady's feet to watch the effect of his merciful ministry.

The object of his solicitude, however, continued in the same state of complete unconsciousness; the eyes remained closed, the head lay back, the white form was relaxed, while a more deathlike hue seemed to overspread the features. This latter appearance was, no doubt, due to Owen's mistaken act of raising the body at a somewhat high incline against the bank, a posture which, unknown to him, served not to recover from the faint, but to increase and perpetuate it.

In great alarm Owen turned to the weeping child to ask who the unconscious lady was, and how she was taken ill, but as the person interrogated was not much over four or five years of age, as he reckoned, he could extract but little information. "It's my mamma, sir, my own dear mamma," was all the intelligence which, amid violent and choking sobs, Owen could gather.

"Where do you come from, my precious little dear," inquired the wagoner, but the reply was a child's attempt at some long and guttural Welsh word, the name of the child's abode, which, Owen listening with all his ears, and making the child repeat it over and over again, was more (Welshman though he was) than he could make anything out of.

"What's your own name, darling?" asked Owen, striving in this way to get some clue to the mystery. What sounded like "Silf" was murmured by the child. "Silf what, ' asked Owen. "Nothing but Silf," responded the interrogated. "Mamma and papa call me Silf, and so does nurse, and that's just my name, and nothing else, sir."

"What in the name o' goodness am I to do" Owen asked of himself. "This lady, poor thing, shure as day, is goin' to die, and no wan will ever know who she is, and where this child has come from. It's wan o' the awkwardest fixes that ever happened me ever since I war born."

Owen looked up and down the road to see if any one were in sight that he could enlist to give aid, or who might suggest some more feasible method for the recovery of the swooned one, than his inexperience could think of; but no, the road was vacant, no living object could he espy, nor was there a house on either hand in view to which he might repair to entreat assistance.

Owen then, left completely to his own resources, resolved to see what effect would follow his ther best-devised expedients for the recovery his unsought-for patient thrown so absolutely u his personal endeavor. He fanned her face w his hat, he bathed her temples with water, chafed her hands, but all in vain, and to greatly augmented vexation and distress, he served on the fingers of the unconscious lady as took her hands in his to chafe them, rings of gr value; he had no doubt of their worth, for, as fingers moved under his efforts, the rings flash wonderfully in the sunlight.

"Was ever mortial man in such a plight as m this blessed minnit?" exclaimed Owen. "I p test, I'd give a good ten 'pun' note to have good missus here, that I wud, she'd know at wu what to do; aye, or if hur here now were onl horse I could manage she," he reflected, "b shure, it's a wummun's job and nothin' else I on han', and bless me, I'm naught but a dolt it."

After studying the case of his patient a li longer and more deeply, he said at last, stroikes me, now, that howsumever it has cum pass, it's summit to nourish her this poor la wants. Shure, it's plain to be seen when I lo more carefully at her." And then, Good Te plarism being a thing undreamed of in those da he fervently cried, "Wud to 'even I had a w drop o' wine wi' me."

The expression of this wish brought, as was na ral, to Owen's recollection a certain case of th commodity which he had in his wagon convey to Chester. It was, in truth, being returned t wine merchant there as deemed by the consign not quite equal to sample.

Having no scruples about the use of wine—th were few who had at this period—Owen cri "I'm blest, but I'll force open that case in t wagon, I will, and take wan o' them bottles fr it, yes, I will, and put it to a far better use th the owner, Mr. Vines—honest man—ever dream of. 'Tis true the 'licker' isn't mine and I'm o in charge of it, but still and all, necessity has law as I've heard them say, and any how, it'll n be robbery in God's sight, it won't, but Christi charity, an' my character is well known on t road, it is, and shure, more nor that, I mean pay fur it. What then can the law or evil talki and thinkin' do on me? and in any case," he ad ed, "I mean to save, iv I can, the life o' this lady

After these thoughts and intentions had rapid passed through Owen's head, it was not long un he acted upon his resolve. He climbed at once in the wagon; after some trouble came upon t wine case, and with hard and brawny han forced it open. Soon he reappeared and hasten to the unconscious one, with a bottle in his han and having dexterously shivered off the neck, a plied the broken vessel, at the most convenie part, to the lips of the lady; but, to his sore d appointment, he could not get her to drink, a indeed, all power of swallowing seemed to be gor

But Owen, rude in culture as he was, prov equal to the emergency. Calling the child ne him, whose sobs and tears had stopped upon w nessing the attention of Owen to her parent, directed the little girl to dip her finger into t rosy fluid, and apply the wine, in drops, to the li of her mother.

Owen's surmise as to the cause of the lady's c lapsed condition proved to be correct. For seve hours she had not tasted food, and nature w sinking from depletion. The generous stimular therefore, administered in the method related, r called the vital powers. A slight tinge of col came back to the ashy lips and pallid cheeks; t bosom gently rose, she sighed, and the ey opened. First the reanimated lady looked at h child and then at her deliverer, and awakening from a horrid dream, and taking in the circu stances, she said, fervently, though weakl "Thank God, I am restored to life, for my child sake, thank Heaven! And you, sir," she sa with an effort, addressing Owen, "accept the be acknowledgments I can give. I see that I owe to you, as Heaven's instrument, that I am call back to this world. God in mercy sent you her and put it in your heart to save a dying mother her child, and from the very depths of my soul I thank Him," she repeated, looking upward.

"I thank God as well as you, missus," said Owen, "for a sparin' o' ye, and for a givin' to us this happy success; from the bottom o' me heart I thank 'im, fur if it war that you died, forgive me for sayin' it, what in the wurld wud I do, and what 'id becum o' the dear babbie, that like a very hangel is attendin' o' ye."

OBSERVE, in this connection, another passage: Paul's intense desire, expressed in Phil. 3 : 10, 11, "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection. . . . . If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." This earnest longing of the apostle is proof that he had his eye, not on a general, but a particular, or special resurrection: and so, in the original we find this same preposition attached, and the article "the" is repeated after the word resurrection. Hence the literal reading of this passage is, "If by any means I might attain unto the out resurrection—in other words, the resurrection from among the dead."

Yes; Paul's desire evidently was that he might share in the better resurrection—the resurrection of the just—the first resurrection, which only those who sleep in Jesus will share. This the Holy Spirit reveals through John (Rev. 20 : 4), "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded" etc.

Here we not only have the two resurrections, but also an interval of time between them—an age of millennial righteousness. Now, dear friends, what have we before us? The end of this gospel dispensation or age, closing with the judgment of the quick or living nations, when He shall come with His saints, who have been previously resurrected from among the dead, and translated or caught up, from among the living.

In Matt. 25th chapter, we have the account of the judgment which takes place at the close of this present gospel day, or dispensation; but please observe that not a word is said about the ungodly dead being judged then. The ungodly dead are not once referred to in this account of the judgment of living nations. Not a word regarding their resurrection before the millennium either. Keep these thoughts clear in your minds, and you will not be confused as to the time of the resurrection and judgment of the ungodly dead.

What follows the judgment of the quick or living nations? The Holy Spirit forecasts it in prophecy, the millennial age, a Sabbatic rest, the saints' jubilee, when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," and when the prayer so often offered shall be fulfilled, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." John the Revelator sees all this, and the Holy Spirit forecasts it in Revelations. With a prophet's vision, he looks on to the approaching millennial age, and his eye rests at the end of it. He takes in a thousand years at a glance, and sees the end. And what is it? Resurrection and judgment again. Of whom? Of all the remaining dead, all who went down to their graves in sin without faith in the Son of God.

THE SECOND RESURRECTION.

"The rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." (Rev. 20 : 5.) "And I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away, and there was found no place for them; and I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God, and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life, and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it, and death and the grave delivered up the dead which were in them, and they were judged, every man according to his works" (vers. 11—13).

Daniel speaks of it as a "resurrection of shame and everlasting contempt." Jesus calls it "the resurrection of damnation." Those who die in their sins are to be raised, they are to receive their bodies back again, to receive punishment in the same body in which they sinned. Awful thought! Christ Himself says, "These shall go away." From whom? From God, from heaven, from hope, from peace. To what? "To everlasting punishment." Oh, friends! what solemn truths are these! Will you not ask your heart this moment, Which resurrection shall I share in?

How shall I leave my tomb?
With triumph or regret?
A fearful or a joyful doom,
A curse or blessing meet?

Now I hope it is clear to your minds from what I have shown you from the Word of God: 1st. that all are to be raised; 2d. that the first resurrection takes place when Jesus comes; 3d. that only those who died in Christ are to be raised when He comes; 4th. that the resurrection of all the remaining dead does not take place till the close of the millennial age.

THE TRANSLATION.

Now, for a brief time, I will speak of another important event which the Holy Spirit tells us will occur in connection with the first resurrection of Old and New Testament saints, viz., the rapture or translation of living believers. In 1 Thess. 4 : 15, Paul writes: "For this we say unto you by the Word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent (or precede) them which are asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Not only have we this precious truth revealed, but God has furnished us with more than one literal illustration of that wonderful change which "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," will pass over each living believer when Jesus comes." By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found because God had translated him, for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God" (Heb. 11 : 5). Enoch was taken out of the world before the judgment of the Flood came, a type of what Jesus promises to do for those who, like Enoch, have faith and walk with God. Elijah, also, was carried up bodily into heaven.

And then, consider our Lord Jesus Christ Himself. In His resurrection we have a pledge of the resurrection of all who sleep in Him when He comes, and in our Lord's ascension we have a pledge of the rapture of those who are alive and believe in Him. So that our Lord Jesus Christ is not only in His resurrection the first-fruits of those who sleep, but in His glorious ascension bodily he is also the first-fruits of those who shall be alive and remain. Dear hearers, what a comfort is this for those who go down to death, as well as for us who remain. Christ's resurrection is a comfort for the dead, because they will not be forgotten.

Asleep in Jesus! Time nor place
Affects this precious hiding-place;
On India's plains, or Lapland snows,
Believers find the same repose.

And Christ's ascension is equally comforting to us, because in it we have a pledge of our translation, and that we shall not be forgotten.

Then when Jesus comes He will bring our friends with Him. Many of you have lost friends. They died in the faith of Christ. Yes—they that sleep in Jesus God will bring with Him. Be of good courage, ye who are called to mourn: here is solid comfort for you. Jesus says, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." They shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.

Then will come that long-looked-for and happy hour when all the Old and New Testament saints shall be resurrected, and we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; then we shall meet the saint and his Saviour, and we shall indeed see Him whom we loved on earth.

Oh, what a sight will that be! The Bridegroom meet the Bride, and receive the kiss of friendship. John forecasts this happy scene, (Rev. 19 : 6), "And I heard, as it were, the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia! for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!"

This was Paul's intense desire, to see each and every believer walking holy and blameless before God. To the Corinthian brethren he says: "For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy; for I have espoused you to one Husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ" (2 Cor. 11 : 2). My hearers, are you robed in this fine garment of Christ's righteousness? Can you say,

Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress:
Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE CHURCH.

Many interesting questions might be asked here relative to the rapture of living believers. But the Holy Spirit has not seen fit to answer all our questions. Some will ask, But where will the resurrected and translated saints be? "They will be forever with the Lord,"—that's enough. But where will they go? With the Bridegroom, of course. "These are they that follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth." Of course a large portion of the church will experience death and resurrection, but some will be alive when Jesus comes, and the world will be moving on the same then as now, with this difference, that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse" (2 Tim. 3 : 13). And because latter-day iniquity abounds on every hand, as we see it to-day, "the love of many will wax cold" (Matt. 24 : 12), and many within the church will have the form of godliness, but deny the power (2 Tim. 3 : 5).

Evil servants, who profess to love their absent Master, will say in their hearts, not "My Lord will not come at all," but "My Lord delayeth His coming;" and they will cease to watch and be sober. And what then? "The Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for Him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him off (marg.) and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 24 : 51). And it will not be very long, for "He that shall come will come and will not tarry." Jesus says, "Behold I come quickly. Amen." The glorious day draws nearer and nearer, and when that solemn hour arrives the dead in Christ shall rise first, and we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

Paul closes by saying, "Comfort one another with these words" (1 Thess. 4 : 18). Poor comfort this to an infidel, to a rejecter of God's dear Son. Poor comfort to all whose sins are not washed away by faith in the precious blood of Christ; but it is sweet comfort to you, who for refuge to Jesus have fled, and have laid hold of the hope set before you in the Gospel. My dear Christian friends, what can be a greater incentive to a holy, active life than this thought, "My Master may come to-day?"

And be sure and remember, while you work for Jesus, what the Holy Spirit has said, "And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness" (1 John 5 : 19). The world lies guilty before God, never so guilty as to-day, because it never had so much Gospel light; but God has made ample provision for all in Jesus, and all who will may come.

Oh for a trumpet voice,
On all the world to call;
To bid their hearts rejoice
In Him who died for all.
For all my Lord was crucified:
For all, for all my Saviour died.

"And now, little children, abide in Him; that when He shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming" (1 John 2 : 28).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Condition of the President is Still the chief topic of public concern. A more hopeful feeling was produced last week by the encouraging bulletins issued from the sick room after the patient's removal to Elberon; but it is impossible to notice the fluctuations of the pulse, the account of the condition of the wound, and the daily recurrence of fever without grave apprehension. Prayer ought to be offered without ceasing to God for him, that, if it be in accordance with the Divine will, he may recover.

On Tuesday, September 6th, the removal of the President from Washington to Elberon was safely accomplished. Notwithstanding the oppressive heat, he bore the journey very well, but complained after his arrival of pain in his back, saying it felt "as if it had been pounded" The results of the journey were also manifest in the rise of his pulse on Tuesday evening to 124. On Wednesday the President made no perceptible progress. The weather was very hot, and the cooling apparatus by which the atmosphere of the sick room in the White House was kept at a uniform temperature not being available at Long Branch, the patient suffered from the heat. There was, however, no recurrence of the dreaded nausea, and food was administered naturally. Thursday was a day of marked improvement. The pulse went down to 94; some solid food was taken with apparent relish, and Dr. Bliss expressed the opinion that the President was convalescent. Friday also was an encouraging day. The President said to Mrs. Garfield in the evening: "This is the first day on which I have myself felt that I am making real progress." Mr. Blaine was able to cable to Mr. Lowell that "the medical reports are all favorable to-day—morning, noon, and night. The President has not for many weeks done so well for so many consecutive hours. He has had very little fever; his respiration has been normal, and his pulse has not exceeded 100. He slept without opiate, and gained strength without stimulant." On Saturday many disquieting rumors were circulated; but the bulletins afforded no confirmation of them. Dr. Agnew said in the evening that the President had had a very fair day, and was doing well. Secretary Windom had an interview with the President in the afternoon, when the latter inquired how the operations for refunding were proceeding, and evinced his gratification at the satisfactory news the Secretary was able to give him in reply. On Sunday the President was troubled by a cough, and he expectorated a quantity of mucus which contained pus of a most unhealthy character. The doctors admitted that a pus cavity had formed in the lower portion of the right lung, which is of course a most serious complication. During Sunday night the President slept well and on Monday the cough was less, and the expectoration materially diminished. The pulse again stood at 100, and the temperature normal.

It was decided on Wednesday, at the suggestion of the President, to dispense with the services of Drs. Barnes, Reyburn, and Woodward. Mrs. Dr. Edson, who has acted in the capacity of nurse, also retired. The President, when informed that the doctors intended to accompany him to Long Branch, said that he thought it unnecessary, and preferred that the case be left to Dr. Bliss, with the alternative assistance of Drs. Hamilton and Agnew. In his enfeebled condition, the presence of so many persons at the dressing of his wound tended to excite him; and the desire having been communicated to the doctors they withdrew, after having, at the request of Dr. Bliss, accompanied the President on the journey to Long Branch.

Prayers for the President were Offered on Tuesday, September 6th, in many States, and Public Offices closed, in accordance with the proclamation of the governors. In other States, as in New York, Thursday was observed as a day of humiliation and prayer. All the public offices and a majority of the stores were closed, and the services of prayer were attended by earnest crowds. Had the day fixed been announced earlier, so that business men could have made their arrangements for suspending business, there would have been greater unanimity; but, as it was, the deserted offices in Wall Street, the silent Exchange, and the closed gates of the courts, with the open churches, presented a solemn and suggestive spectacle. In spite of all that sceptics and infidels have done and said, the nation in its hour of suspense had turned for help, not to philosophy, but to God.

The Journey of the President from the White House to Elberon will probably long be regarded as an historic journey. It was a hazardous experiment, and was only justified by the greater danger of malaria which menaced the patient if he remained at the White House. Every precaution which could be devised to insure the success of the removal was made. A track was laid from the railroad to Pennsylvania Avenue, to avoid the jolting the President would suffer in being driven over the rough paving of Sixth Street, and also to spare him the emotions he might endure in being carried through the room in the depot where he was shot. Another track was laid at Long Branch from the railroad to the cottage Mr. Francklyn has placed at his disposal at Elberon. The President eagerly anticipated his removal, and talked continually about it. He was very cheerful, and humorously suggested that the experiment of carrying the bed down stairs should be tried with some one else in it, before he made the descent.

Soon after dawn on Tuesday morning, the legs were unscrewed from the bed on which the President lay, and it was laid on a stretcher specially made for the purpose. The President was sleeping under the influence of morphine, and did not awake while the doctors and his friends carried him down and placed him in the express wagon which waited at the door of the White House. As the wagon drove along Pennsylvania Avenue the President opened his eyes, and seeing the bystanders gazing in silent sympathy on his wasted features, he waved his hand in adieu. He was placed in the car prepared for him. Boards had been fixed crosswise in the car, and on these a box large enough to hold the bed laid on three mattresses.

Engineer Page, who had charge of the train, is known as the most skilful engineer in the company's service, and the train under his care was run with the utmost delicacy and without a single jolt. During the journey the President talked but little. He lay quietly, sometimes sleeping, and at others watching with interest the changing scene from the window of the car. All along the line of the road, people were gathered, and great crowds were collected at towns passed on the route. Everywhere there was perfect quiet. It was a common thing to see the people taking their hats off and standing reverently bareheaded until the train had passed by. At Bay View the engineer heard that the President was enjoying the trip, and decided to try the experiment of a faster rate of speed. He ran a mile in fifty-three seconds, and at the next stopping-place sent to inquire if any ill effects had been experienced. He was informed that the increase of speed had not been noticed, and the President said: "Tell him to go ahead. I want to get there. I feel as though I were on the road to recovery." After that, the engineer ran at the highest rate of speed he considered safe, according to his knowledge of the road, and during the rest of the journey some portions were done at the rate of seventy miles an hour.

Elberon was reached at 1.20 P.M., the entire distance of 227 miles having been run over six different railroads in less than seven hours. The engine was detached at the Elberon station, and the car was pushed along the track to the cottage by willing hands, so as to avoid the jar of the breaks. The President was lifted from the car and carried to his cool room, from which he could see the waves as they broke on the beach.

The Report of the Massacre of Gen. Carr and his troops received a welcome denial last week. One officer—Captain Hentig—and ten men were killed in the fight, but General Carr and the remainder of his command succeeded in making a rapid retreat to Fort Apache, which they reached August 31st. Troops are being sent forward for the defence of the fort, as it is feared the rising of the Apaches is general, and that a serious onslaught will be made. The origin of the disturbance is not yet made clear. It appears there has been some ill feeling caused by the discovery of a mine, either of silver or of coal, which Agent Tiffany desired to purchase, and there have been other causes of discontent; but the arrest of the medicine man, whom the Apaches regard as the high priest of their religion, brought the ill feeling to the point of explosion.

A Hurricane of Fire is the Expressive Name by which eye-witnesses describe the appalling calamity which has devastated extensive districts of the State of Michigan. Huron, Sanilac and Tuscola Counties have been the chief scenes of the terrible visitation. It is impossible to estimate the loss of either life or property, but it is stated by reliable witnesses that more than a thousand square miles of forest have been burned; at least ten thousand families have been rendered homeless; and five hundred persons have perished in the flames. Such a catastrophe is without parallel in the history of forest fires.

In an appeal for assistance for the homeless by a New York journal, the extent of the fires is thus explained: "Northern Michigan is a heavily timbered country only recently settled. Much of the land is still covered with primeval forests of pine, oak, maple, and beech. Many of the farms are small, isolated clearings. Sometimes three or four farms lie together, but the horizon is always bounded by a wall of trees, and there is rarely a stretch of road over a mile long which does not at some point run through a 'piece of woods.' Escape from one farm or group of farms to another not menaced by the advancing flames could therefore only be had by traversing the forests which fed the fire, and often the fire ran faster than could the poor creatures fleeing for their lives, and struck them down in the roads with its hot breath. The first warning sign of the approach of the dreaded scourge is a vast black cloud of stifling smoke. Then strange noises are heard like the crackling of musketry. Soon, there is a lurid light in the sky; the sound of falling tree trunks, bursting limbs and crackling underbrush become more distinct, and the dull, roaring undertone grows loud and menacing; showers of sparks and big blazing brands are carried forward by the wind. Then, the near woods are all aflame, and the whole earth seems to burn with fervent heat. There is no assurance of safety in flight for the beleaguered farmer and his family. They are fortunate if they can find their way to a swamp or a wet meadow or a field of green corn or buckwheat. In some such refuge, lying with their faces close to the ground, they may keep alive until the storm of fire passes by, but if the clearing is small, the air may become so heated as to cause death even where the flames do not touch them."

An appeal for aid in the shape of money, food, or clothing for the thousands of homeless people has been issued, and the Erie Railroad has undertaken to carry all contributions gratis to the scene of the calamity. All contributions should be addressed to the Hon. E. C. Carleton, Mayor of Port Huron.

It is believed that the dent was caused by a neglect of precautions on the part of the deceased officers. The connection should have been broken in two places, but they appear to have thought it would be safe to make only one break. This break was closed either by the action of the salt water, or by some other unknown cause. The sad event has caused general grief at the station, where both officers were very popular. Much surprise is also expressed at the manner of their death, as they perfectly understood torpedo practice, and were aware of the risk they incurred. In this and other catastrophes of a like nature, such as explosions in mines, it is observed that the constant presence of danger often produces in men who are cognizant of it, a carelessness almost incredible. A like disposition is often manifest as to spiritual danger by men who have been warned of the judgment of God from childhood (Eccles. 8 : 11).

A Little Heroine, only Eight Years of Age, lost her life at Providence, R. I, on September 10th. She saw a younger child straying in the way of an ice cart, which was being driven along the street in the reckless way icemen too frequently drive. Instantly she darted into the road and, clutching the child, drew her away from the threatened danger. As she did so, she slipped and fell ; the wheels of the ice cart crushed her head, and she was carried to her home a lifeless corpse. A more pathetic incident is rarely witnessed. The child whose life was thus saved will learn, as she grows older, that as she lives through the sacrifice of another's life, so she may inherit eternal life through the sacrifice of the Son of God (John 3 : 16).

A Maine Hunter's Fight with a Panther is described by the Augusta, Me., Journal. It seems that on September 5th two young men, while hunting for partridges in the vicinity of Medomac Pond, near Washington, came suddenly face to face with one of the most savage and ferocious animals of the northern woods, namely, a puma, or North American panther. The panther, after giving vent to a terrible growl, slowly retreated, when one of the sportsmen, Prof. A. E. Jones, a resident of Washington, raised his gun and discharged it at the animal, the shot taking effect in its side. Turning quickly he came with mighty bounds straight toward the sportsmen. They had only time to fire one shot when the animal was upon them. With a leap he crushed Prof. Jones to the ground, when his companion, E. B. Sweeney, an amateur sportsman, with wonderful quickness inserted a shell into his gun, and, placing the muzzle against the animal's head, discharged it with deadly effect, killing it instantly. Mr. Jones escaped with a few scratches and a large gash in his breast. The panther measures six feet four inches from tip to tip, having claws nearly two inches long. The sudden and ferocious attack of the panther on the startled sportsmen typifies the assaults which the great enemy of souls often makes on men whom he hates (1 Peter 5 : 8).

An Active Search for Pearls is being Prose- cuted along the Stones River in Rutherford Co., Tenn. A Southern journal says a gentleman from Jefferson saw persons wading in the river and assiduously hunting mussels, which yielded fine pearls which were readily sold. Not less than 500 people were engaged daily in raking the bottom of the stream, delving down in the mud for mussels, which are piled along the banks, opened, and critically examined for the treasures contained in many of them. One pearl was secured that brought $80 in New York. The general range of value, however, was from 50 cents to $25. This search must be a somewhat weary one, and, considering the time spent in it, not particularly remunerative ; but the chance of finding an eighty-dollar pearl will be sure to attract many seekers. Yet there are comparatively few seekers for that treasure beside which we are assured pearls are not worthy of mention (Job 28 : 18).

DRESSING IN THE MORNING.

" And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: . . . . But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.—ROMANS 13 : 11-14.

THIS passage is a piece of holy teaching set forth under the parable of rising in the morning and preparing for the work of the day. May the Holy Spirit help me to place it before you in a clear light.

It is a great mistake in a man's life when he does not know the times in which he lives, and how to act in them ; and when he does not know the time as to the day of his own life, so as to apply his heart unto wisdom. The apostle speaks of his Roman brethren as "knowing the time." What, then, is the time of day with the Christian ? It is no longer the dead of the night with us ; but "the night is far spent, the day is at hand." A little while ago the dense darkness of ignorance was about us ; but the gospel has made us light in the Lord. We lay asleep in the gloom of sin ; like a thick cloud it enveloped all our powers ; but God has brought us out of darkness into His marvellous light. Some of us were plunged in despair, a night without a moon, without a star; we were without hope, and feared that our future would be the " blackness of darkness for ever." That hopeless gloom is over, and we have light and joy in Christ Jesus.

Of what value is the knowledge of the time of day ? It lies here. Certain duties arise out of the hour. " Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening." From morning to evening, and from evening to morning again, there is a round of duty to be fulfilled, and each work is comeliest if attended to in its own season. When the shadows of evening fall the time has come for going home, where domestic joys await us at the hearth. It would not be right for the laboring man to go home in the morning, nor seemly for him to be going out at night. Each duty has its own time of day, and therefore the apostle would have us know the hour and be assured that it is high time to awake out of sleep. He urges us to the duties which attend the hour of rising, the hour to which we have now come.

As my Master helps me I shall endeavor, first of all, to give the morning call ; and then, secondly, to preach the morning gospel.

I. First, Listen to

THE MORNING CALL.

I have shown you that the hour of the day is that in which men should rise and begin their daily service ; and its first seasonable duty is to awake— " It is high time to awake out of sleep." When day begins sleep should end. The bugle sounds in the camp, " Awake ! awake !" But are not all Christians awake ? Yes, from the sleep of death, but not from other kinds of sleep. Many need rough shaking and loud calling before they will be thoroughly awakened. Beloved brethren, I speak to you upon whom the light has arisen, and who are now delivered from the power of darkness, for you will not deny that it is high time for you to shake off the bands of slumber.

You should rise from the sleep of inaction. Do not let your religion consist in receiving all and doing nothing. Work while it is called to-day, and as you wish to be faithful servants of your gracious Lord be up at once. It is time for you to stir yourselves, and see what can be done with the golden hours for the glory of your Redeemer's name. Go forth and see what herbs are to be planted, what weeds are to be rooted up, what part of the garden needs watering, and which of the vines need pruning. Your Master's vineyard needs constant labor; for He Himself keeps it with unceasing care. Up, then, gird up your loins and yield your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God.

Leave also all lethargy behind you. At night a man may yawn and stretch himself as he likes; but when the morning comes, good sir, have done with yawning, and display energy. Look about you and be brisk, for the day will be none too long. Does not the song of the birds and the glitter of the dew bid you shake off your slumber and have done with listlessness? Oh, I hate to see some professing Christian people go about the Lord's work in such a languid way, as if it did not matter how their Lord was served. Ah me! If God was obeyed with half the activity with which the devil is served we should soon see a change in church life.

Moreover, it is time to have done with dreaming. That is proper for the night, but not for the morning. An ungodly man's pursuits are mere dreams; he hunteth after shadows, he feedeth upon ashes; his weightiest business is a mere vision, a thing of nought. Have done with day dreams as well as night dreams, and come to stern matters of eternal fact. Trifle no longer; the time past may suffice you for that. Be earnest! Be all awake, put forth all your powers, arouse all your faculties. It is high time to awake out of sleep.

THE GARMENTS OF THE NIGHT.

When awake, what is the next duty? Is it not to cast off your night clothes? Our text saith, "Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness.' The man who is just awakened, and finds that it is morning light, must first of all put off the garments which covered him during the night. He quits his bed, and in so doing shakes off his bed clothes and leaves them. The coverlet of night is not our covering by day. There must be a putting off in the morning before there can be a putting on; there is a measure of undressing before we commence to dress.

Simple and homely as the figure is, it conveys a lesson which I pray you to remember. Sins and follies are to be cast off when we put on the garments of light. I have known a man profess to be converted, but he has merely put religion over his old character. He has been a passionate man with bad companions, and all he has done is to carry his bad temper into a church-meeting. He has been accustomed to drink more wine than is good for him, and all the change is that he drinks it in respectable company or in secret. He has taken up the saint without casting off the sinner. The rags of his lust are rotting under the raiment of his profession. This will never do; Christ has not come to save you in your sins but from your sins. Anger and drunkenness, and such like, must be got rid of; Christ never came that you might christen your anger by the name of warmth, and your drunkenness with the name of liberty.

I have heard of persons living unclean lives who have heard that faith in Jesus Christ would save them, who have misunderstood this doctrine so grievously that they have thought of believing in Christ, and continuing in their evil ways. That attempt will be their ruin. Rahab the harlot was saved by faith; but she was saved from being a harlot any longer. The rags of sin must come off if we put on the robe of Christ. There must be a taking away of the love of sin, there must be a renouncing of the practices and habits of sin, or else a man cannot be a Christian. It will be an idle attempt to try and wear religion as a sort of celestial overall over the top of old sins. You must be cleansed in the blood of Jesus before you can be clothed in the white linen which is the righteousness of the saints. See to it that, being awakened out of your sleep, ye put off all the garments of the night.

So far we have described our getting up: first, we awake, and then we cast off the garments of darkness. Now we must put on

OUR MORNING DRESS.

The believer should at once look to his toilet and array himself for the day: "Let us put on the armor of light." "What," says one, "armor? Why, I thought my danger was over. The darkness has departed, and I am no longer afraid of thieves and robbers, for the daylight has come. Why, then, should I put on armor?" Is it not instructive that no sooner do we awake than we have to put on "the whole armor of God"? Does it not warn us that a day of battle is coming? Brethren, you may as well expect a conflict, for it is sure to come, and it will be wise to put on your harness for the fight. Dress according to what you will meet with during the day. You are not at home yet; the land of peace is yet beyond you.

Young converts think that they have got to heaven, or very near it; but it is not so: you will get there one day; but the time is not yet. You are in an enemy's country: put on the armor of light. Perhaps before you get down to breakfast an arrow will be shot at you by the great enemy; or you may come down-stairs after your morning prayer feeling as safe as if you were among the angels, and yet you will not get through the first meal in the day without an assault from the arch-enemy, or an outburst of your own corruptions, or an attack from the world. Your foes may be found in your own household, and they may wound you at your own table. Before you leave your bedchamber you had better put on girdle, helmet, breastplate, shield—you had better take the complete panoply. A Christian is never safe unless he is protected from head to foot by grace, for in such a world as this you know not behind what bush the assassin may be lurking, or from what corner the fatal bolt may fly.

The Greek word, however, may be understood to signify not only armor, but such garments as are fitted and suitable for the day's work. These should be put on at once, and our soul should be dressed for service.

PRAY GOD TO CLOTHE YOU

in such style that you may be ready for whatever comes. You are not a gentleman on the parade, but a workman in his workday clothes. Some people are too fine to do real service for the Lord. When the Duke of Wellington asked one of our soldiers how he would like to be dressed if he had to fight the battle of Waterloo again, he answered that he should like to be in his shirt-sleeves. How I wish that Christians would get into their shirt-sleeves, as if they meant work for Jesus.

Now you are dressed, what next? It remains that we walk forth and behave as in the light. The directions are explicit—"Let us walk honestly, as in the day," which means, let our demeanor be such as becomes daylight.

The word translated "honestly" may mean decently—with decorum and dignity. In the middle of the night, if you have to go about the house, you are not particular as to how you are dressed; there is no person to see you, and so you will slip from one room to another in dishabille; but when you rise in the morning, and come down to your day's work, you choose to be somewhat neat. You do not go out to your business slip-shod and half-dressed, but you array yourself according to your station in an appropriate manner. Let it be so with you spiritually: holiness is the highest decency, the most becoming apparel. You live in the daylight, brother; therefore walk as one who is "compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses." Yet more, walk as one who has the eye of God upon him, which is infinitely more.

"Walk honestly," says our translation, because that is the right thing for daylight. The thief breaks through and steals beneath the cover of the darkness; but a child of light must be upright and just. I earnestly beg all professing Christians to be honest in heart, and then they will be honest in word and deed. You ask me, "Do you mean that we should pay our debts?" Of course, I mean all that, but I mean far more: be honest when you speak to others and of others. Do not say of any man behind his back that which you would not utter to his face. Do not carry a mask about with you, it is a horrible instrument of torture to an honest man. Say what you mean, and mean what you say. Many act upon quite another principle, practising if not duplicity. They bring themselves into a great deal of trouble by being cunning, and "pl ing their cards well," as they say. What has Christian to do with such deceitful gaming?

Walk honestly; let all your actions be such will bear the light. A man that stands under powerful electric light bearing right down on hi would feel uncomfortable with everybody look at him; at any rate, he would be careful what did. Behold, the light of eternity is shining upon your soul, God Himself sees you, you stand the blaze of the eternal day. O Christian man, with transparent honesty; have nothing to c ceal; come to the light, that your deeds may made manifest that they are wrought in God. clothed with light, and walk in the light as God in the light.

THREE PAIRS OF EVILS.

Our position in the light of the morning deman of us one more point of behavior: we must nounce the deeds of darkness. If we have be truly awakened, and have put on the garments light, it behoves us to have done with the thi that belong to the night. I will not dwell up them at any great length; but I may not p them over, since the apostle thought it necess to mention three pairs of evils with which we m have done. He mentions them because even Christian assemblies it is necessary to denoun these things. People exclaim against the preach if he speak plainly home about the vices of times. "Really, it is shocking," says one, "I not like to hear such indelicate things referred t No, no, ladies and gentlemen who do such thi cannot bear to hear of them by way of rebuke. have noticed that none are more fantastically n than the morally nasty; none are so ready to f fault when a spade is called a spade as th whose morals most want digging. They will co mit the vice themselves, but they cannot bear hear it mentioned—it shocks their marvellously d icate minds.

The apostle Paul felt none of the noxious dain ness which touches sin with a delicate hand; speaks out plainly, and he says that all Christ people, first, must have done with sensuality, wh he describes as "rioting and drunkenness." drinking bout is held it is usually at night. B quets generally begin in the evening; if they come scenes of gluttony and drunkenness they a vance far into the night; but the sun rebukes s orgies, and men usually give heed to the warnin "they that be drunken are drunken in the nigh Christian men have done with night, and ought have done with all excess in meat and dri Alas, there are some who spend more over a sin dinner for a few than would keep families of p people a month. Gluttony is seldom mentioned a possible fault, and yet I fear it is far from be an obsolete vice among professed followers Jesus.

"Drunkenness," well I need not say how shan ful it is in any man; but he that professes to b Christian man, how temperate, how abstin should he be; for intoxication is a soul-destroy sin, and no drunkard can enter the kingdom God. These are night vices; let the children night have them if they will: as for us, we de to be filled with the Spirit, and fed upon the br of heaven, for we are the children of the day.

Then Paul denounces impurity by saying, " in chambering and wantonness." It is an aw thing when a man calls himself by the name Christian, and yet can be foul in language, chaste in conversation, lascivious in spirit, wic in life. If any man indulges in fornication adultery, and yet calls himself a Christian, he surely come under the curse of God. We spea such persons weeping, for they are the enemie the cross of Christ.

Oh, that you who are young might be kept f anything like looseness or effeminacy. A glances, words, and thoughts which tend way. Do not go near the borders of that sin men and women sin not grossly all at once, slide by degrees, as the vessel slides from the st into the sea at the time of its launching. It m very little at the first; but by and by it gai impetus, and glides rapidly into the deep. keep you from sins of the flesh, for they are a ditch, and the abhorred of the Lord do fall into them. They are base deeds of the night; does not nature itself teach us so? Vice walks abroad beneath the moon; it is by night that our streets are defiled. O you who have reached the morning light, abhor these things, and hate even the garment spotted by the flesh.

The next night deed is passion; passion taking the two shapes of "strife and envying." Brawls are for the night. Fierce assaults disturb us in our sleep, but they are not usual in the day. So Christian men, being of the day, are not to strive. It is a great pity when strife comes into a family, when brother is divided from brother and father from son, and when relatives cannot speak well of one another. These bitter things are for the night; you have reached the daylight, and must have done with them! Away, then, from all deeds of darkness, and seek only that which may be set in the face of the sun and cause no man to blush.

II. Now, I have preached so long upon things required of you that you are beginning to say, "Ah me, how much there is for us to do! How shall we ever accomplish it? We have to wake, to put off our night garments, to dress in suitable attire, to behave ourselves as children of light, and to avoid the deeds of darkness. Alas, what shall we do?" Now listen, ye anxious ones; here is something sweet and blessed for you; you shall be inclined and helped to obey in all things; therefore hearken diligently and hear, that your souls may live. I preach to you

THE MORNING GOSPEL.

Here it is—"Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."

This verse has been rendered very famous in church history, since that chief among the fathers, the mighty teacher Augustine, found the light through reading this verse. He had been leading an ungodly and more or less dissipated life when he began in a measure to think upon his condition, and he thought he heard a voice saying to him, "Tolle, lege. Tolle, lege!" "Take up and read." So, taking up the New Testament which lay near, he began to read it, and, as God would have it, he opened upon this very place, and he read: "Let us walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."

Here are his words, which I will read to you: "I would read no further for I needed not; for when I had read to the end of this sentence all the darkness of doubtfulness vanished away, as if some clear light of security were poured into my heart. It was as if it had been said, 'O man, acknowledge thy misery, thou art naked; cover thy filthiness; put upon thee Jesus Christ.' And forthwith I felt a fire within me. My heart was lightened, the scales fell from mine eyes—I was able to see!" How earnestly do I desire that these words may strike some of you in the same powerful manner.

Does any one here desire to put off his old garments of sin and to dress in robes of holiness? And does he mourn over an empty wardrobe? See, here is a robe for him—"Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." Did I hear one cry, "You told us to put on armor, but we have neither shield nor breastplate; how can we put on the armor of light?" Here is the panoply—"Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." Does the man cry, "I am afraid to go into the world undressed, and I dare not put on the old garments of darkness; but what can I do?" Here it is; here is the death of sin and the life of holiness—"Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."

For, first, in the Lord Jesus Christ, there is a covering. The garment covers the man; he is hidden, and his garments are seen. Come, then, poor sinner, and take by faith the Lord Jesus Christ to be a covering for your soul. You are naked, but He will be your robe of righteousness. There is in the Lord Jesus a complete and suitable apparel for thy soul, by which every blemish and defilement shall be put out of sight, according to the word, "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, and whose sin is covered." In Christ Jesus there is merit to cover our demerit, purity to cover our impurity, obedience to cover our disobedience, beauty to cover our deformity, perfection to cover our imperfection, acceptance to cover our provocation.

"Ay," saith one, "I need more than just to be covered, I must have a garment provided for my necessity; suitable for my everyday work." My text points you to a full supply: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ" as the most suitable dress for a saint at work, as well as for a sinner desiring justification before God.

As we have already said, a first necessity is to awake, and truly none can lie and dream after they have once beheld his glorious robe; they are eager to obtain it. Our next necessity is to cast off the old garments of the night, and nothing helps us more than to put on Christ. Only look at this robe of righteousness as yours, and you will loathe the filthy rags of sin at once. When a man perceives the perfection of the righteousness of Christ, which is freely given to him of God, he abhors his sin, he loves his God, and pines to be like Him in holiness. There is no breeder of repentance like simple faith in Jesus Christ. Unbelieving philosophers tell us that if we preach salvation by faith in Christ alone people will take license to sin; but in this they err from want of observation.

Now speak your own experience, Christian man; did you ever feel yourself moved to sin by the assurance of being justified by Christ's righteousness? Never was there such a case in this world. A man may hear about it and turn it into an excuse for sin, but he cannot in his heart believe it and do so. The grandest motive power for the death of sin is the death of Christ; and nothing makes us so eager to die unto sin as Christ's death for sin. Off goes the filthy raiment at the sight of the glorious, spotless righteousness which is freely presented to every needy sinner in Christ Jesus.

I would call attention to this garment very specially in a few words. The text says, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." What made him use there? Because he meant to point out the three senses in which we clothe ourselves from head to foot with Christ. "Put ye on the Lord," become His servant, wear His livery, let Him be your Rabbi, your Master, your King, your Lord. Put ye on "Jesus" the Saviour, acknowledge yourself as a saved one, saved by Him whose name is called Jesus "for He shall save His people from their sins." Put ye on "Christ"—that is the Anointed; take an anointing from God the Holy Spirit through Jesus Christ to whom He is given without measure. As Christ is anointed to be prophet, priest, and king, put Him on in all these three offices, and rejoice to do so. "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."

Do not put on Jesus only as your Saviour, put him on as your Commander. Do not only put Him on as your Master and Saviour, but as your Christ, anointed for you. Take a whole Christ to yourself that you may be wholly in Him, and so may be spiritual, gracious, holy. Henceforth may those around you see nothing of you, but much of your Lord. May your outward character be so Christ-like that men may see Christ displayed upon you, as a new garment is displayed by the act of wearing it. May the Spirit of glory and of Christ rest upon you. May you be clothed with power. Our Lord said to His disciples, "Tarry at Jerusalem until ye are endued with power from on high"—the word signifies "clothed." If we are clothed with Christ, we shall be clothed with power from on high; even as He has said "The works that I do shall ye do also." Therefore put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ.

"Yes," but I hear another say, "I want not only raiment to cover my nakedness and supply my necessity, but I want apparel for my dignity. You told us that we were to walk abroad in a worthy and honorable manner." Ah, and so you will if you put on Christ. Oh what a bright creature in the sight of God is the man who has put on Christ. God himself asks no purer or more acceptable array. The perfection of God is upon the soul that has put on Christ. Ay, and while God thus sees us in Christ, and is well pleased with us, our fellows are obliged to admire us too. If you put on Christ, so that you become like to Christ, your walk and conversation will be bright and lustrous before the eyes of those about you. They, perhaps, will not like it, they may even hate you for it, but they will not be able to do otherwise than own your excellence. He who lives in Christ lives a charming life, which, by its loveliness, commands the homage of onlookers.

"Ay," says another, "but you have forgotten part of your sermon. You said that now we were awake we were to put on armor." I have not forgotten, for Christ is armor for our defence, therefore put on the Lord Jesus Christ. Here is a coat of mail for you. The man that does as Christ would do, and thinks as Christ would think, and lives as Christ would live, and makes Christ to be all in all to him, and thus armors himself with Christ, is thereby made impervious to the shafts of the enemy, and amid the darts of temptation or the arrows of slander he may abide unharmed. The Lord is our defence, and the Holy One of Israel is our King.

"Ay," saith one, "but you told us that the day when it was once up, would never again darken into night, but brighten into a perfect day." It is even so, and here is raiment provided for our expectancy. We may expect to meet with years of mingled conflict, service, and suffering. "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ," and you will be prepared for all weathers, fair or foul, and for all conditions and requirements. This garment will never wax old; it will last you all the desert through, and, what is more, it is suitable for Canaan, and you shall keep it on for ever and ever. We need a dress that we can wear in all the events which will happen in the awful future, the endless future. It is on this account that I press home the words of my text—"Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."

Our Lord is a fit robe for life and death, for time and for eternity. I expect to battle till I die; here is my armor, the integrity and uprightness which I learn of Christ will preserve me. I expect in death to rise out of this lower life into a higher one; and when I reach that higher life, that glory life, I shall require a dress, and I shall find it in my Lord. I cannot have a better garment than the Lord Himself, and there is a wedding coming on! Every believer expects to be married to his Lord. Then, dear friend, you must certainly have a wedding dress. How can you go in unto the marriage feast, not having on a wedding garment? but here you have it: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."

Now I have done; but how I wish that some souls would be moved as Augustine was, and at once put on Christ before they leave the place. I wish that some of you that came in here this morning with nothing on but your would at once pull it off and throw it under your feet. Here is Jesus Christ Himself waiting to become your righteousness. Will you not have Him? His is a perfect righteousness, for He magnified the law, and made it honorable. He made a perfect robe, and then He dyed it in His blood, that you might wear it as the imperial purple of the kingdom which He gives you.

Put it on, poor soul, that is all. "But I have nothing that I could bring." Do not bring anything, but put on Christ. There He is! Do not refuse Him! I beseech you, do not refuse Him; for he who will not put on Christ when Christ is freely set before him must not wonder if at the last he stands shivering amid the glare of the last lightnings, in front of the awful judgment-seat, with the eyes of men and angels, and the eyes of the great Judge, fixed upon him. Ah, then he tries to hide himself and cannot, and he shrieks to rocks and mountains, "Hide me, hide me from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne." He will have no one but himself to blame when it comes to that, if he will not put on Christ. May the Lord Jesus now be made unto you wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Romans 12.]

The Evening Prayer.

George Radcliffe's Cruel Accusation.

THE EVENING PRAYER.

"NURSIE," said a childish voice, "who hears our prayers beside you?" Two little figures attired in airy costume were bending their knees and about to repeat their usual prayers. The inquiry was addressed to the nurse who from their birth had taken charge of the children. She was an earnest Christian girl, who, happily for the little ones, filled the place which their mother left vacant, she having too many engagements in the world of fashion to think of the spiritual welfare of her children.

Nurse explained to the children the wonderful nature of prayer. Both listened in silent awe. The time might come when they would be puzzled by scientific objections, and would hear that "the laws of the universe are not suspended in answer to prayer." They might some day learn that in this late day of the world's history it was proposed to institute "a prayer test," but as they bowed at nurse's knee in childlike faith and confidence their hearts were nearer the standard of excellence Jesus set up than those of the philosophers.

The evening prayer was then said, the children repeating solemnly the words uttered by the infant lips of many generations:

> "Now I lay me down to sleep,
> I pray thee' Lord, my soul to keep;
> If I should die before I wake,
> I pray thee, Lord, my to soul to take,
> And this I ask for Jesus' sake."

Then after they had retired to their little beds, the nurse too sought her own chamber, and bending at the Throne of Grace prayed that God would bless such teachings as she was able to give to the children, and that when they grew up and were exposed to the temptations of life they might be "kept unspotted from the world."

None can tell the impression produced on a child's mind by a simple prayer regularly uttered every night. It is an interesting incident that is told of an old saint of eighty-six years, whose mind had so failed that he could not recognize his own daughter. Very touching was the scene one night, after retiring, as he called his daughter under the impression that the form he saw, with eyes dimmed with the dews of death, was his mother, saying, like a little child, "Mother, come here by my bed and hear me say my prayers before I go to sleep." She came near. He clasped his white withered hands, and repeated the verse; then quietly fell asleep, and woke in heaven.

GEORGE RADCLIFFE'S CRUEL ACCUSATION.

GEORGE RADCLIFFE was a farmer, whose wife being dead, employed his niece to manage his house. Morose, penurious, and suspicious, he was at the best a far from agreeable master, and, in his darker moods, could say cutting things in words so provoking as to be almost unendurable. But Martha, his niece, had accepted the old man's invitation to go to the farm without hesitation, for she was very poor; her father and mother were only recently dead, and she knew that in some way she must earn a living for herself. She was a pious girl and when her uncle offered her a home it seemed to her a fulfilment of her dying father's words as he said, "Do not fear, my child, I have committed your lot to the Lord, and He will provide a home for the orphan." The farm had not proved a home in the true sense of the word. There she had found food and shelter; but the feeling of home, such as she had enjoyed in the dear old place where her childhood had been spent, had not been renewed at the farm. She had worked hard and had kept the place clean and tidy, but she found it impossible to win her uncle's confidence. His whole soul was bound up in his money, and he suspected every one, and, as it seemed to her, herself most of all, of a design on his hoard.

One evening, her domestic duties concluded, she sat down by the light of a candle to repair some article of wearing apparel belonging to her uncle. She sat stitching alone for some time, the farmer not having returned from market; but soon she heard his heavy footstep at the door. He entered and walked straight to a corner cupboard in which he usually kept his loose money. In a moment he turned hastily to his niece, and said, in an angry tone: "Martha, how's this? I left ten pounds here when I want away this morning, and now there's only five?" As he uttered these words his look and manner were such as clearly to convey the impression that he laid the whole blame of the loss on her.

Poor Martha's whole nature shrank with horror, not only from dishonesty but from the suspicion of it. As her uncle's words fell upon her ear, she turned deathly pale, and was hardly able to utter a word beyond the assurance that she knew nothing whatever about the missing money. Her state of tremor and fright was taken by her suspicious uncle as proof that she had either stolen the money or had some guilty knowledge as to its disappearance. Where's that money gone to?" he said. 'You've got your Bible open there I see, but don't think I'm going to be deceived by that. There's more roguery among them as professes to be religious, I tell you, than anywhere else."

Martha's first impulse was to leave the house at once, although it had been dark more than an hour, and seek a friendly shelter among the neighbors. Going up, however, to her bedroom, she laid the matter, with many tears and earnest supplications, before God. She particularly pleaded the promise in Ps. 37: 5, 6, "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass; and He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light and thy judgment as the noonday." Soothed and cheered by these words, and by the testimony of a good conscience, Martha retired to rest, with a calm persuasion that in some way or another she would be cleared from the dreadful aspersion which had been cast upon her.

The next morning her uncle was even more bitter and unmeasured in his abuse than before. He avowed his intention of sending for a policeman and having Martha taken before the magistrate of the neighboring town; but before doing anything else, he called to consult a neighbor who was supposed to be uncommonly long-headed and well-informed in matters of law. "I'll tell you what, Radcliffe," said the latter, after hearing the story of the robbery, "if you are not careful you will make a great fool of yourself. There's no proof that the girl is guilty, and if you bring a charge as won't stand, against your own niece, you may look out for a snubbing from the squire."

Hard-hearted and obtuse as he was, Radcliffe had a strong wish not to look foolish in the presence of his landlord, and so gave up the idea of prosecuting Martha, although still clinging to the firm persuasion that she was guilty.

Four long weeks, which seemed like years to Martha, passed, and the disappearance of the money remained wrapped in mystery, when an occurrence at the inn of the next hamlet solved it. A drunken laborer, who had at the time of the robbery been in Radcliffe's employ, was heard to boast that he had "served old Radcliffe out for paying for his bit o' work so badly," and said he was not the sort of man to be "swindled by a miserly farmer." The man, too, was found to have more money than such men usually have, and suspicion was excited.

Perhaps no one would have troubled to right the old farmer; but there were many who would rejoice in seeing his niece cleared of suspicion. Inquiries were made, which resulted in the discovery that the man had asked for change of the identical five pound note Radcliffe had lost.

The laborer was tried and convicted for his theft, and Martha rose in her uncle's esteem by the patience with which she had borne an unjust and cruel charge. She became to the old man almost as dear as his gold, and when after his death she was informed by the farmer's lawyer that she was sole heiress of his property, she acknowledged with devout humility that God had more than fulfilled the promise which had cheered her on the night when her uncle had brought against her his unjust charge.

THE REV. GEORGE OSBORN, D.D.,

The New President of the British Wesleyan Conference.

THE Rev. George Osborn, D.D., who has just been re-elected to the chair of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, was born March 29th, 1808, and is therefore now in the 73d year of his age. He is a native of Rochester, England, where his father was in business as a dry goods merchant, and highly esteemed as an earnest Methodist and acceptable local preacher for fifty years. Brought under the influence of religion while yet young, he was early led to Christ, and while under the parental roof was taught zealously to promote the interests of Wesleyan Methodism.

He was educated at Brompton, under Dr. Hulett, a well-known educationalist of that day. Having joined the Wesleyan Methodist Society, and engaged in various evangelistic work, at the age of twenty-one he was recommended as a candidate for the Wesleyan ministry. At the Conference of 1829 he was appointed junior minister in the Brighton Circuit, where he spent two years, under the fatherly guidance of the Rev. John Geden. In 1831, he removed to Liverpool, and at the Manchester Conference of 1833 was ordained, and soon made his mark as a preacher. He at once occupied a prominent position in the foremost Circuits in England.

In 1851, he was appointed one of the general Secretaries of the Wesleyan Mission House, which post he held for seventeen years. Elected a member of the Legal Hundred in 1849, he was by a large vote placed in the chair of the Conference in 1863. During this year he received the honorary degree of D.D. from America.

During his year of office he rendered invaluable service to Methodism, especially in connection with the Jubilee of Wesleyan Foreign Missions, in which movement he took a most active part. In 1864, owing to the sudden decease of the president, the Rev. William L. Thornton, he had again to discharge the duties of the presidency. In 1868 he was appointed Theological Professor at the Wesleyan Mission College, Richmond, Surrey, which post he still holds. At the institution of the Fernley Lectureship, he delivered the first lecture, taking for his subject "The Work of the Holy Spirit." He is thoroughly versed in Wesleyan theology, and has a full grasp of the polity of Methodism. As a Conference debater he is unequalled. In politics he is a strong Conservative.

The Rev. Dr. Osborn belongs to a generation of Methodist ministers, the remaining representatives of which are comparatively few. All the qualifications necessary to make a powerful minister of the Gospel are combined in him. Together with extraordinary natural gifts, he has always possessed the habits of a laborious student. He has very extensively studied Methodist biography; but his sympathies have, perhaps, been more fully commanded by the marvellous poetical forms in which the spiritual element of Methodism has found its permanent expression. The Methodist Hymn Book in Dr. Osborn's hands has often appeared as an incomparable manual of devotion and directory of the Christian life. By his complete edition of the poetical works of John and Charles Wesley he has conferred a lasting benefit on the Church.

A man of such labors, of such Connectional position, and of such power, is worthy of the re-election with which he has now been honored. There has been only one other instance of re-election to the high office in twenty-eight years, and that was the case of the venerable John Farrar in 1870. Twelve months ago it was feared that the term of his service might not be much extended; and he was so unwell, and so full of apprehensions, that he desired at once to resign the chair of Theology at Richmond; but there has taken place a great improvement in his health, and he seems at present equal to the duties of his arduous position.

The President has before him a year which will be made memorable in the annals of Methodism. The great representative gathering which quickly followed the recent Conference will turn the thoughts of Methodists in all lands to London and to that British Methodism of which the President will be the leading representative. No one can tell the Œcumenical Conference more about Wesley than Dr. Osborn can. No one can more readily settle any historical difficulty that may arise in that assembly. No one can more correctly represent the conditions and tendencies which distinguished the Wesleyan Connection before the last great agitation by which it was convulsed, and throughout a past generation.

REV. CHARLES KENDALL,

The New President of the British Primitive Methodist Conference.

THE Rev. Charles Kendall, of Driffield, the newly elected president of the Primitive Methodist Conference in England, is the oldest minister in the Hull District, and has on one or two former occasions been put in nomination for the presidency.

He is a man about sixty-two years of age, and has been engaged in the work of the ministry for forty-two years. He is fresh and vigorous for his years, and looks younger than he really is. He is of medium size, and rather slight build, but appears to have a good constitution and considerable working power. He has, we understand, some four or five brothers who are all ministers, some of whom have been remarkable for their precocious mental development and his only son has been from his boyhood a popular minister, and has distinguished himself for his scholastic attainments. He has rather a long face, with strongly marked lines, a perpendicular forehead, and level eyebrows knit over the eyes. He shaves the upper lip, but wears a beard which is getting mixed with gray.

His voice is clear and bell-like, and he is a distinct and effective speaker. Mr. Kendall has for many years been an efficient and influential minister in the Hull district, and is now employed as a circuit preacher in the largest station in the connection. He is possessed of considerable literary power, and is an author of some repute, having produced two volumes of considerable merit on "Strange Footsteps; or, the Mysteries of Providence," and "A Biography of the late Rev. W. Sanderson," etc. It is also rumored that he has for some time been engaged in preparing a history of Primitive Methodism in Hull. It may be hoped that his year of office will be rich in blessing to the church which has appointed him to its presidential chair.

Her Last Command.

ISHMAEL loosed his hold of his mother, but he did not rise from the place where he was kneeling beside her. A faint gleam coming up from the room below lit up Ruth's face as she looked earnestly and searchingly into his.

"I can't quit my mother," he answered, speaking in a loud but forced tone; "she's dyin', and if I go maybe I shall never see her again."

"Ishmael," said Ruth, "thee has never forgiven Nutkin yet."

"No," he muttered, "no; it's been too much to forgive. He drove me away from home: and I'd have been a man by now, instead of a wastrel, if he hadn't been hard on me. Thee'd not ha' worked thyself to death, mother, if it hadn't been for him. No; I've not forgiven him. Let him find his little lad for himself!"

"You must come, Ishmael," called Elsie. "Willie's been missing five hours or more; and we can hear him crying in the old quarry; and nobody knows it like you do; and the opening's too small for a man to crawl through, and it's no use sending in a boy, if any of them would go alone. Oh come quickly! Suppose he strayed into one of those pools you told me of, and was drowned. Come down this minute!"

But Ishmael did not move, holding his mother's hand between his own, and gazing mournfully into her beseeching face.

"If I bid thee go," she murmured, "thee would not disobey me now I'm dyin'?"

"Don't send me," he cried; "don't bid me go!"

"Nay," she said tenderly. "I'm bound to bid thee, and thee art bound to go. It 'ud be no comfort to see thee nigh me, if I couldn't die happy for thinkin' o' the little lad in the pit. And it's partly because thee hasn't forgiven Nutkin. And if we forgive not men their sins, neither will our heavenly Father forgive ours. That's what the blessed Lord says. And oh, if thee forgives him, the Lord will forgive thee. Go, Ishmael; I shall see thee again—not here, maybe—but in some better place."

"I'll go," he said looking into her face very sorrowfully; "but, oh, if I never see thee again in this world, it'll seem hard to wait till we get to heaven."

Still Elsie's impatient and entreating voice reached their ears, urging him to make haste, and his mother's sunken eyes were fastened upon him with a look in them as if she was beseeching him to go. It might be the last time he would ever see her face. With a deep and heavy sob Ishmael stooped to kiss her, and, as if afraid to trust himself to linger another moment, he sprang down the ladder, and, pushing on through bramble and brushwood, quickly reached the entrance of the cave.

It was no longer dark and solitary. Many of the villagers were there, and the glimmer of several lanterns produced a lurid and fitful light. Nutkin knelt at the far end of the cave before the low and narrow inlet, through which, when there was a moment's silence, he fancied he could hear in the black darkness the voice of his child crying.

"The men will be here with pick-axes soon, Nutkin," said the squire, who stood beside him, "and we'll get the little fellow out in a very short time, my man."

"I'm more afeard of the picks bringing the old roof in than aught else, sir," answered Nutkin, in a voice of despair; "there's been a deal o' heavy rain o' late, and there's been two or three hollows given in above ground; and if the roof gave way betwixt us and the little lad he'd die o' fright before we could dig him out. If the hole was but big enough for a man to creep through! But nobody could creep through a hole no bigger than a rabbit-bury; only a teeny creature like little Willie."

A profound silence followed Nutkin's speech, for no man or woman there could risk the life of any of their boys by sending them into the workings of the old quarry. And amid the silence there was heard plainly enough a low stifled voice speaking.

"I can crawl through," it said; "I know every step o' the old pit."

"Ishmael Medway!" shouted half-a-dozen voices, joyously, "he's the lad, if there is one."

He felt himself pushed forward to the far end of the cave, where the light was strongest. The thin, stunted, undersized lad, in his tattered clothing, and with his mournful face, stood in front of the squire, and of his old enemy, who gazed at him half in shame and half in hope.

"Mother's sent me," he said, touching his old ragged cap to the squire. "She's dyin', and I don't s'pose as I shall ever see her again; but she couldn't die happy with the little lad lost in the pit. And mother says if I forgive him here God'll forgive me, and take me, some day, somewhere, to the place where she's goin'! I slept here last night, and I heard the ground give way. Don't set any picks at work."

Ishmael did not wait for an answer, but lying down on the ground, crept through the narrow, winding tunnel he had often crawled through as a boy. He called back to them when he had reached the shaft, where he could stand upright, and they saw that he had struck a light; but presently all sound and sign of him was lost, and Nutkin and the squire rose from their knees where they had been watching and listening, and the fitful light of the lanterns shone upon the tears in their eyes.

"I'll make a man of that lad," said the squire in a broken voice.

"God Almighty bring him and Willie safe back," cried Nutkin, sinking down on his knees again, "and I'll treat him as my own son, I will; as long as ever I live! So help me, God!"

So silent for some time was the crowd of villagers now thronging the cave, that they could hear the heavy splashes of water falling from the rain-sodden earth into the little pools collected below in the subterranean alleys of the old pit; and once a low rumbling like distant thunder, telling of the earth giving way in one of the many galleries, made them hold their breath in speechless dread, and look anxiously into one another's faces. But, as if Ishmael too had heard it, and wished to reassure them, there came the sound of his voice, calling back to them from the hidden pathways.

"God bless him!" exclaimed the squire, a smile for a moment crossing his anxious and clouded face.

"Ay!" cried Chipchase, "he was as good a lad as ever breathed before he went to gaol for stealing them pheasants' eggs; and old Ruth, his mother, you might trust her in a room full of golden guineas. She's as good an old soul as ever lived. Ishmael said she was a-dying, didn't he, sir?"

"Yes," answered the squire.

"And she'd send him away from her to save Nutkin's little lad!" said Chipchase; "that's what I call being a Christian. Any minute might bring the roof over his head, and bury him alive: and old Ruth knows it. But if any soul in Broadmore believes in God, it's Ruth; and, please God, I'll be a better man myself from this day forth."

The farmer's voice trembled as he finished speaking, and he turned his face away from the light, ashamed to let his neighbors see how much he felt.

"Old Ruth's had a hard, bitter life," said Mrs. Chipchase, sobbing; "she was near broken-hearted when Ishmael went to gaol; and she's never been the same woman since. He was like the apple of her eye, Ishmael was; and he'd worse luck than any of her children, thanks to Nutkin, I always said, and always shall say to my dying day. What was a boy's taking a few paltry eggs, I'd like to know?"

"I'll treat him like my own son," muttered Nutkin, not looking up.

"We must make it up to him," added the squire. "If I'd known he was a good lad, he should never have gone to gaol."

"Hush!" cried Elsie, who was standing beside Mrs. Chipchase.

Instantly there was a breathless stillness in the cave, and every eye was turned toward the low outer entrance, through which they could hear the dragging of weary footsteps. Bent almost double, and tottering as if every step must be the last, came old Ruth herself.

"Where's Ishmael?" she asked, looking round at her neighbors' faces with eyes dim and glazed.

When Ishmael had obeyed her, and gone away from her death-bed, Ruth had for a little while lain still in utter solitude. After the echo of Ishmael's and Elsie's footsteps had died away, not a sound had reached her ears. She was accustomed to be alone; but this loneliness seemed terrible in her last hours. An unutterable yearning came upon her to see her boy once more, to know what he was doing, and what was befalling him. He had gone into danger at her bidding; and until she knew what became of him, she felt as if she could not turn her thoughts even to the God in whom she trusted. If only Humphrey would come home, she would prevail upon him to follow Ishmael to the cave, and bring back word, or send some one to tell her what was going on. How could she die in peace while her boy was in instant danger? She lifted herself up, and strained her ear to catch some distant sound of voices or footsteps, but there was nothing save utter silence and solitude.

Then a feverish strength, the strength of the dying, came to her. To be somewhere near where Ishmael was, to have faces about her, and hear the voices of her neighbors, seemed absolutely needful to her. With feeble, yet hurried hands, she dressed herself in the poor old clothing she had laid aside for the last time, and with faltering feet she descended the steep ladder. The fresh air of the evening blowing softly in her face revived her, and made her feel as if it had only been because she had been lying in bed in the hot, dark loft that she had thought herself dying. But as she crept on through the tangle of brushwood, with barely strength enough to part the hazel twigs which beset her path, the numbing hand of death weighed more and more heavily upon her.

She heard the voices of her neighbors passing to and fro in the woods, but she could not call loudly enough to make them hear. The thrushes sang in the topmost branches of the trees, where they could yet see the lingering sunset light, but below her path was all in darkness, and the power of seeing was fading out of her eyes. Half-blind, stumbling over the roots of the trees, fainting with weariness, yet urged on by her passionate love for her son, Ruth reached the cave at last. She was come to die somewhere near where Ishmael was.

"Didn't he say his mother lay a-dying?" exclaimed some of the crowd, as they fell back to make way for her. But as soon as they caught sight of her face by the light of the lanterns they knew that she was dying. She tottered forward with stumbling feet to the end of the cave, and sank down on the ground, breathing fitfully, while her sunken eyes gleamed with a bright light. Nutkin shrank away in awe of her; but she smiled faintly, and beckoned with her hand that he should watch and listen still at the post he had held since Ishmael had entered the old quarry. But he stood, pale and panic-stricken, looking down upon her as if she had been one come back from the dead.

"Ruth," cried Mrs. Clift, the schoolmistress, coming forward from among the villagers, "how did you get here?"

She sat down on the ground beside her, and drew the gray old head upon her lap; and Ruth looked up thankfully, and summoned all her failing strength to answer.

"I was afeard," she whispered, "never to see Ishmael again. And God helped me. The poor lad 'ud fret so if he never saw me again; and it 'll be easier to die here than all alone at home yonder."

"Some of us ought to have thought of you," said the schoolmistress.

"It's best here," she whispered again, "near Ishmael. God's been very good to me all my life; and He's very good to me now I'm dying. I'd rather wait here for him to come back than be anywhere else in the world. Only I shall miss seein' Humphrey, and he was a good husband to me once."

"Ruth Medway," said the squire, speaking ly and distinctly, that she might hear him, 'on't you be troubled about your son. I will see r him, and make a man of him ; I promise you mnly."

uth looked up inquiringly into the squire's face nfamiliar face, looking blurred and misty to failing eyes.

Who is it?" she asked.

The squire," said the schoolmistress, gently.

I thank you humbly, sir," she said, making a at effort, "but it's too late now, I'm afeard. s goin' away to a country where there's a bet- chance for him, as soon as I'm gone. He won't e me, sir, not as long as I live, if he starve for But he'll go as soon as I'm dead."

I ll make it worth his while to stay at home," l the squire.

There won't be no home when I'm gone," rmured Ruth ; "he's never had a home these years ; like Him that had no place to lay His d."

(To be concluded.)

S. Lesson for September 25. 1 Cor. 9 : 22-27. olden Text 1 Cor. 9 : 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR lesson for to-day is temperance, and temperance is one of the fruits of the Spirit, which "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, odness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Gal. 22) ; thus, in order to possess true temperance, need the Holy Ghost. All self-restraint which oceeds from a selfish motive includes self- ulgence or self-exaltation. For instance, in the cient Grecian athletic games, to which our Gold- Text refers, the candidates for the prize were nperate in food, drink, etc. ; they went into train- , as young men do now for boat-racing. But s was quite consistent with an immoderate am- ion, and the flesh, which was kept under on the e hand, exalted itself all the more on the other. at can be true of Christians which was never ie to the letter in the ancient runners and wres- rs.—"Every man that striveth for the mastery temperate in all things."

It would have been impossible for those ancient ndidates for "a corruptible crown" of laurel, rsley, or olive, to put themselves to so much in- nvenience if the fading crown had not brought th it unfading honors, if the combatants had not fore them something they esteemed worth striv- g for. What, then, is the goal for which we are iving—what is "the mark for the prize of the gh calling of God in Christ Jesus," which Paul essed toward twenty-eight years after his con- rsion, during his first imprisonment in Rome hil. 3 : 14)? What was that "crown of right- usness" which he knew was already laid up for m in heaven, and for all those who love Christ's ppearing. "If by any means I might attain nto" (Phil. 3 : 11), "lest that by any means, when have preached to others, I myself should be a astaway." Such words as these from such a man nply an object which he might have missed many ears after his conversion, and even after he could y, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." e was saved from hell, from sin, and from him- lf, but there was a grasp of the eternal life which e already possessed, which he yet sought for ; there as a knowing Christ and a winning Christ in an in- nser inward union than was as yet his experience, o for this Paul counted all else "but loss" and but dung" (Phil. 3 : 7, 8). He measured all things n their bearing upon this one goal, never let hanker- ng glances follow that which was allowable. "All nings are lawful unto me," said he, "but all nings are not expedient ; all things are lawful for ne, but I will not be brought under the power of ny." This is Christian temperance.

How, then, can a man be temperate in business? Paul says, The time is short, let they that buy be s though they possessed not (1 Cor. 7 : 29). Such n exhortation followed, and men of business would not die of heart disease, induced by over- nxiety, by excessive travelling, etc. ; we should not hear of sad cases of brain wear in the service of what?—a fortune which must and will be left at a moment's notice. O the intemperance of laying up treasures upon earth! O the folly of living only for time! Daniel was a man of business, but no pressing engagement hindered him from openly praying to his God, in the midst of a people who no doubt esteemed him a fanatic ; it was Daniel's temperance submitting the interests of time to those of eternity. Let a man deny himself when a good speculation offers, and go quietly on getting the ten per cent or so which is his equitable profit ; let him carry on his business as a steward for the Lord, and not think so much about the amount which may come to him, as about the honor of the Master with whose goods he is trading.

To be temperate in food, the aim will be not to seek that which is most pleasant and palatable, but that which can best fit us for our work, that which does not take too much time in cooking, and is not too expensive, so that time and money may be reserved for other work. To be temperate in drink in these days in which our God has so blessedly set His seal to the labors of His servants in the cause of total abstinence. There can be but one opinion about intoxicating drinks among those in our country who desire to serve God in the Spirit. "It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Rom. 14 : 21). It has been so ably demonstrated, both in theory and by experience in hospitals, that intoxicating drinks are deleterious to health, that the old excuse that they are necessary for health can no longer stand its ground, the only place they can take is that of an expensive, useless, dangerous, and often, by the example to others, cruel luxury, and as such it becomes the followers of Christ in our land to have done with them.

But how to be temperate in dress? Both the apostles Peter and Paul have given us the mind of God on this subject for women ; and in our day there is nothing to find fault with in men's attire, unless it may be in useless extravagance. Paul calls on women to adorn themselves in "modest apparel," and he certainly did not mean such as show every line of their figure when they move, or that they should make themselves appear something like the nude statues which disgrace the houses where they are, by opening the door wide to the lust of the eye. It used to be only lost women who allowed their form to be seen by every passer-by, but now, just when bonnets are becoming modest once again one is almost forced to turn one's head the other way when a young lady walks down the street. "But it's the fashion," you say. Blessed be God, His children are not bound to follow the fashion. Jesus has redeemed us from our vain conversation (or manner of life) received by tradition from our fathers (1 Pet. 1 : 18). Better to be unfashionable than immodest or lacking in sobriety. The apostle further says, "Not with broidered hair, or gold or pearls, or costly array," i.e., nothing which takes much time, much thought, or much money ; time, thought, and money are given for worthier objects. Peter says almost the same (1 Pet. 3 : 3).

How can we be temperate in our households? We are called to be "given to hospitality." A dear old German woman, the rich widow of a farmer, lives as simply as any of the farm-laborers who work on her farm ; she has in her dining-room only a deal floor without covering, deal tables without cloth, except at meal times, and deal benches. The same simplicity all over the house ; and yet she is willing at an hour's notice to afford hospitality to twelve or twenty of the Lord's servants. She has built a large hall for gospel preaching, where she undertakes all the financial responsbility. She dresses in common blue cotton, and works with the servants all day, that she "may have to give to him that needeth ;" she is perhaps one of the largest givers to missionary work in her part of Germany. This is an instance of temperance in a household. She economizes light, having breakfast at five o'clock A.M., dinner at eleven, and supper at seven, thus there is not much need to burn candle, and more money can therefore go to the Lord's work. O how much more could we all do if we were more simple in our households! Jesus had "not where to lay His head."

But how can we be temperate in our conversation? This is most important, but oh how much neglected by God's children! Useless words, light and aimless words, come as much under the heading of the "idle words" for which we shall have to give account, as bitter, untrue, and malicious words do. "Every idle word which men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. 12 : 36, 37). This is a day of much speaking and little reflection; we have to learn Solomon's exhortation, "He that hath knowledge spareth his words" (Prov. 17 : 27). But "a greater than Solomon is here," "The words which I speak unto you I speak not of myself" (John 14 : 10), said our blessed Lord. Oh let us learn to speak when God bids us speak, and never say that which is unnecessary, that so our speech be always with grace seasoned with salt, that we may know how to answer every man.

Again we must learn to be temperate in sleep. How many precious hours are lost through the evil habit of late rising. Most people can do well with seven hours' sleep, when they take as much regularly, from ten to five or from eleven to six, and this leaves a good margin for prayer before the day begins. Paul in everything kept under his body and brought it into subjection ; he would not let it master him by its requirements ; an unnecessary appeal from his body for more sleep when the hour for prayer was come would have been left unresponded to by Paul ; more food, when he had already taken enough to strengthen him, no, this would be denied ; conversation, when there was no necessity for it, no, the man lived for another. To him "to live was Christ."

A Distracted Mother Sought an Interview with Rev. Wolcott Calkins after he had preached, some years ago, at the American Chapel in Paris. He had referred in the course of his sermon, to Uzzah having been struck dead for touching the ark of God. When he read to her the story again she exclaimed, with sobs : "The ark, nothing but the ark ; and I have put forth my hand against my own son. I have killed him—I have murdered my boy."

From further explanations it appeared that she had been left a widow with two young children in a mansion in New York, and in the enjoyment of an immense fortune. She gave herself up to fashionable society and utterly neglected her children. When they were old enough to be companions to herself one of them joined the same gay society and seemed to desire nothing better. But the other son had become a studious, thoughtful, and Christian young man. His example was such a reproach to her that she could not bear to have him near her. Sensitive to this feeling of his mother he sought her out and told her he had received a business offer from South America, and had decided to go. She told him she was glad of it, and parted with him without one kind word, and without giving him the slightest help. By and by news came that a hazardous expedition by a company of American engineers in Brazil had been attacked by desperate highwaymen, and only one or two escaped. Among the killed was her son. Hence, the grief and remorse she now felt.

Mr. Calkins prayed with her with the fifty-first Psalm spread open before them. "Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God," was her incessant cry. Gradually and timidly she began to hope for the thorough washing from iniquity for which David prayed. She was very ignorant of spiritual truth, and had to be led step by step, but ere long she gave proof of being truly converted to God. It turned out, strangely enough, that her son, after all, had not been murdered. His name was enrolled for the expedition, but he went only part way ; was detained by sickness, and ultimately returned to headquarters in safety. He heard of his mother's conversion, and when Mr. Calkins last heard of him he was on his way to join her in London. She declared to Mr. Calkins that her one desire was to receive assurance of forgiveness from her long-neglected and persecuted child.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Principal Topic of Interest in Europe during the week was the meeting at Dantzig, in Germany, of the Emperors of Russia and Germany on Thursday. The interview is represented as having no political significance; but the fact that the Emperor William was accompanied by Prince Bismarck, and the Czar by M. de Ghiers, implies that the personal relations of the two potentates were not the only cause that brought them together. It appears that the feeling between the two courts has been, since the Czar's accession, becoming gradually colder, and the Czar's known antipathy to German ideas, and the frigid nature of the hospitality tendered in Russia to German princes has increased the estrangement. When it became known that the Emperor William proposed to visit Dantzig, the Czar availed himself of the opportunity to remove the unpleasantness by paying him a visit. The meeting took place on board the Hohenzollern, the yacht of the Emperor of Germany, and the Czar afterward dined with the Emperor at Dantzig. The meeting is regarded in Europe as a rebuff to France, which had cherished hopes that, in the struggle with Germany which she anticipates, she might have had the assistance of Russia.

A Revolution has Broken out in Egypt. The insurgents under the lead of Araby Bey, with two regiments of infantry, consisting of 4000 soldiers, and two batteries of artillery, with thirty guns, surrounded the Abdin, the Khedive's palace, on Friday, September 9th, and demanded the immediate dismissal of the ministry and the creation of an Egyptian Parliament. The Soudan troops are marching on Cairo from Touras. The Bedouins of Upper Egypt are also under Araby's orders. The movement is connected with the general Moslem rising. It is feared that this difficulty may involve a dispute between England and France. The Khedive is at the mercy of his army, and is practically its slave. It is therefore necessary in the interest of the creditors of Egypt, that the state of anarchy resulting from the supremacy of the army should be terminated by some foreign power. France has too much to do in Tunis to take an active part herself, but would resent the interference of either England, Italy or Turkey. The situation is very ominous.

The Elections of Members of the British Parliament during the past week have caused some surprise. In Tyrone County, Ireland, there were three candidates for the vacant seat, and a supporter of Mr. Gladstone was elected. Mr. Parnell's nominee polled only 907 votes, while the successful candidate polled 3168. The London Times says: "Mr. Parnell's discomfiture is rendered more complete by the tremendous efforts of himself and colleagues during the canvass. Their speeches were more than ordinary electoral harangues. They appealed to the cupidity of one class of electors and to the patriotism of others, for the purpose of catching votes on every side. It is estimated that the Land League did not poll more than half of the Catholic vote."

An election in Cambridgeshire has resulted in a Conservative triumph. The Marquis of Blandford, the Liberal candidate, retired before the election. He came forward as a Land Law reformer; but if he had polled the constituency it would not have been a fair political test. Lord Blandford's personal character is so corrupt that the idea of his advocating reform in anything is ridiculous. Many supporters of Mr. Gladstone who would have liked to vote for a Liberal would probably have voted against Lord Blandford to save themselves from the disgrace of being represented in Parliament by so base a man.

The Methodist Œcumenical Council commenced its sittings in London on September 7th. The council was opened by a sermon by Bishop Simpson from the text John 6 : 63. The bishop argued that the success of Methodism could only be accounted for by the fact that it is instinct with the divine spirit of life. The successive assemblages of great Protestant bodies during late years, the bishop said, foreshadowed that there would, at no distant day, be an æcumenical conference of evangelical Christians of every denomination. Dr. Osborn, the president of the British conference, whose portrait we give on another page, delivered an address of welcome, to which Bishop McTyeire and Dr. Douglass, of Canada, responded. A resolution of the Business Committee desiring the prayers of the delegates for President Garfield was received with great enthusiasm, and a devotional meeting was held to pray for his restoration to health. The Lord Mayor of London, who is a Methodist, received about nine hundred delegates and others on Wednesday evening at the Mansion House. The Lord Mayor, in addressing the delegates, said he trusted the proceedings of the Conference would be a blessing to every member of the Christian body. At the session of Saturday the topic discussed was Methodism and the young, and Dr. Bennett deplored the tendency of the young people of America to leave the Methodist for other communions, which he considered one of the most disastrous facts connected with Methodism.

Mr. Parnell has Committed a Blunder which has involved those who followed his advice in a serious loss. He advised the tenants to sell their holdings rather than pay rent. Many of them did so, and are now without farms or interest. Had they retained possession they would now, under the new land law, be in a very advantageous position. Mr. Parnell is being severely blamed, and those who have been practically ruined by accepting his advice are loud in their complaints.

A Corner in Cotton has been Effected by a ring of speculators in Liverpool. This is not the first occasion on which they have attempted to force a rise in prices, but they have been more successful this time than formerly. A cablegram from Liverpool says: "The spinners are suffering heavy losses. The quarterly report of the council of the associations of spinners of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and adjoining counties, states that the spinning department is in a worse position than for some time. The trade is paying 10 to 20 per cent more for cotton than its proper value, while a small clique is pocketing the proceeds. These corners cannot be maintained for more than a few weeks at a time, but their constant recurrence points to the advisability of concerted action. A meeting of spinners was held at Manchester on Friday, at which it was decided to stop the mills for a week if the consent of two-thirds of the spinners could be secured. The meeting adjourned until the districts could be canvassed. Should the determination of the spinners be realized, the syndicate holding the cotton for a rise, with the banks that are aiding them, must lose heavily.

A Severe Engagement is Reported to have taken place on Wednesday, September 7th, between the French forces and the Arabs at Hammamet, in Tunis. The French Government have refused to allow war correspondents to accompany the army, so that the details of the battle have not been made public. The report, however, that the French were victorious is generally credited. They are usually successful in important engagements, but lose ground in the guerilla warfare and the minor struggles which their watchful antagonists force upon them. The ranks are being rapidly thinned by disease, and reinforcements are being sent. France has entered upon one of the little wars which entail serious loss of life and money, but bring little recompense. The government would rejoice if they could withdraw from the struggle without endangering their popularity at home; but they are not strong enough to follow the example the British set them in surrendering the Transvaal.

A Vegetable Bludgeon.—A London Lawyer relates a curious incident arising out of the apprehension timid people feel in travelling on the railroad since the recent murder: "Going home by rail, I carried a strong umbrella as the best means of protection. On one occasion I got into a carriage the only other occupant of which had what seemed to be a roll of paper in his hand. I thought he held it in an attitude of readiness for attack, and I accordingly sat equipped with my umbrella, prepared for any emergency. I was sure he had a bludgeon concealed in the harmless-looking roll of paper, and he certainly looked excited enough for a deed of violence. Need I say that I breathed more freely when I reached my destination. I sent a letter, which was published, to a morning paper, detailing my 'narrow escape.' Next day I read in the same journal a letter from my fellow-traveller, describing a scare he had had in riding with a fellow-passenger who carried his umbrella in a way that suggested offensive intentions. Thus my watchful, suspicious air, and the position of my weapon of defence—[illegible] umbrella—made him uneasy, and his roll of paper was simply a cucumber which he was bearing home to his family." The incident reminds us of the many groundless alarms which, from time to time, disturb the quietude even of the children of God. As the Psalmist said: "There were they in great fear where no fear was." (Psa. 53 : 5.)

Refusing to Pay for Heathen Rites.—The Rev. Dr. Verbeck, a missionary in Japan, narrates the following hopeful incident: A rule was adopted for the Japanese army, that every soldier should give a small amount to provide for the funeral expenses and for the widows and children of those who might die in the service. A young Christian soldier refused to pay his quota, saying that he was willing to give toward the support of the families of deceased comrades, and for ordinary funeral expenses, but not for heathen rites of a Japanese burial. He was put under arrest, and, what was more trying, was urged by some native Christians to yield. He, however, remained firm. The matter was referred to the Government. Much anxiety was felt in relation to the decision. The Government has released the prisoner, restored him to his position, and announced that he need not pay for Buddhist rites if he were not disposed to do so. This recognition of the rights of conscience, and grant of religious liberty, are worthy of honor, and will be heard of with satisfaction by all Christians.

"The Man of Glass" was the Name used by the attendants to designate a Frenchman at Bicêtre Asylum, who was taken there in 1797, wounded by a pane of glass which fell on his head, and before the cut could be healed the brain became affected by a permanent disease. After the first transports of delirium had passed off the man became more quiet; but he could never get rid of the idea that he was made of glass, and that the least shock or blow would cause him to break in pieces. He remained, therefore, perfectly quiet and silent, being afraid even to speak, for fear of precipitating the catastrophe which he fancied was ever impending. For eighty-three long years he had led this singular existence, only once opening his lips in speech, when he asked for a little tobacco. At only one period his faculties appeared to be aroused, and that was when during the siege of Paris he could hear the shells bursting in the air at no great distance from his place of retreat. At the time of his death he had attained the age of 103. His illusion appears very ridiculous to some people, but many men who are supposed to have the use of their reason cherish ideas which, in the light of eternity, they will see were equally idiotic and more disastrous to their own well being. IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 18th, we informed our readers of the departure from this country for Europe of Francis Murphy, whose successes during the past eleven years in the United States and Canada have been amazing, not fewer than eleven million signatures having been obtained in that period to the ever-lengthening roll of the Blue Ribbon Temperance Army, through the agency of Mr. Murphy and the co-operation of his numerous band of lieutenants. This week we give a portrait of Mr. Murphy, and pictures of four incidents in his life.

Francis Murphy was born at the village of Targoat, in Wexford, Ireland, on April 24th, 1836, and is therefore now forty-five years of age. His parents occupied a very lowly station in life, but they were pre-eminently honest and moral people, greatly respected by all who knew them.

The humble cottage in which the family lived overlooked the sea. Francis often stood at the door of it, watching passing vessels, with their white sails set, bearing toward the New World. He had often heard of the American continent, with its "silvery lakes and golden rivers," and had excitedly longed for the time when he would see it. But poverty necessitated his going into the fields to work, and in that way beginning to earn a living.

After years of deserving toil, his mother came into the possession of comparative wealth. At that time public dinners were fashionable in Ireland, and though her means could ill bear the strain, Mrs. Murphy bowed to public opinion, and gave costly dinners to her friends. At those dinners a large amount of strong liquors was consumed, and though it was not the custom for the children to sit with the guests at dinner, yet the influence of the elders was potent, and, according to his own admission, Francis Murphy "fell under the influence of drink at the early age of thirteen, and at sixteen had become habituated to its use."

EMIGRATES TO THE NEW WORLD.

In 1852, at the age of sixteen, having resolved to leave home, he obtained his mother's reluctant consent and blessing, and took ship at New Ross for America. After a voyage of seven weeks and a half, he reached Quebec, where he was kindly greeted, and taken to an hotel. There he was invited to drink, and although standing at a public bar to drink was a new experience to him, he thought the right and proper thing for him to do under the circumstances was to invite friends to drink with him. Such dissipation lasted for a week, at the end of which his money was all gone, and the landlord's friendship with it.

For eighteen months Francis Murphy remained in Quebec, working at various trades for a livelihood, but all his attempts ended in failure. His craving for drink and his sociality caused him a constant struggle. Referring to that sad period of his history, he says: "My position at that time reminds me of a story of two of my own countrymen. Arriving in America, they went to find out the locality in which a friend lived, and discovered that it was a distance of twenty miles from the landing. 'How shall we reach him?' said one. 'By walking ten miles each,' said the other.

"Off they started. It was mosquito harvest then, and as the two friends came upon a swampy place, the mosquitoes came out in swarms to welcome them. As it was getting dark, the Irishmen proposed to get out of the way of their tormentors by covering themselves up in their blankets. They lay down to sleep; but one of them happening to awake during the night, got uncovered, and saw a fire-fly. He therefore aroused and warned his companion that one of the mosquitoes was after him with a lantern. I was in the position of my countrymen, for I could not by any possibility get out of the way of my social tormentors, or so-called boon companions."

BECOMES A FARM-LABORER.

By the intervention of a kindly disposed Scotchman, who took an interest in him, Mr. Murphy obtained employment on a farm as a laborer, ploughing, and sowing, and reaping. He says: "The farmer was a tall, lanky fellow, set up after the fashion of Abraham Lincoln—on rails." This man had a dairy on his farm, and Francis was sent to "milk the critters," but got repeatedly kicked by the cows. His employer then sent him with a yoke of oxen to "stone that piece of land up thar." He had never seen a yoke of oxen before, "and the oxen knew it." Whenever he approached them they ran off, and while he was running after them the tall farmer stood behind a barn laughing at him. He noticed, however, that when his master approached the oxen he always had some corn in his pocket. Francis, therefore, adopted the same plan, and by kindness found that the animals would become tractable and gentle.

In 1856, when Francis Murphy was about twenty years of age, he was living a sober hard-working life, and had managed to save a little money. He then married, and until the breaking out of the civil war, lived a quiet and contented life. At that eventful period he enlisted in the New York Volunteers, as a private soldier, and served until 1864 all through the campaign. Peace having been concluded, he was induced to go to Portland, Me., where he had a brother, and was strongly recommended to open a hotel and drinking saloon in that city.

Before undertaking the business he thought he would consult his wife, yet, with the full determination that if she did not indorse his project, he would take it up. Upon being informed of the proposal, Mrs. Murphy said, "I would sooner beg in the city for a living, than have you keep a hotel." In a short time the establishment was started, and a strenuous effort was made to conduct it with respectability; but, as Mr. Murphy himself admits, "there is no respectability about the traffic. No man can see his best friends stand drinking at his bar till they reel and stagger without becoming degraded."

LED TO CHRIST IN PRISON.

It was then that his own first experience in hard drinking began, and, sad to relate, he soon became a common drunkard. Disaster and ruin overtook him. He became so reckless, that his friends thought it best to have him confined in prison; so in 1870, the sheriff of Portland presented him with an authority, signed by four of his friends, for his incarceration. He turned from the door of his desolate home, broken-hearted and full of remorse, and went with the sheriff to the jail.

There he remained for some time, and before he regained his liberty the Holy Spirit of God had made him "free indeed." In the city of Portland there was a kind-hearted, Christian man, named Captain Cyrus Sturtevant, who believed it possible to save men, in Christ's name, however degraded, and he used to pay frequent visits to the jail for the purpose of talking to the prisoners and leading them to the Saviour who died for them. Let Francis Murphy himself tell this part of his life-story:

"Captain Sturtevant came to me one Sunday evening, and said, 'I should like you to attend the religious meeting in the prison,' and I agreed to go. He was weeping as though he were broken-hearted, and the first words he said as he walked along were, 'God's mercy endureth for ever.' He repeated it again and again, and it was very sweet to me. He never said an unkind word to me, but talked only of God's love and mercy; and as he spoke of wife and children, I thought I should like to see mine. I did not believe that anybody particularly cared for me, and I was anxious for the service to close as speedily as possible.

"As I was again returning to my cell, Captain Sturtevant accompanied me, and as we walked along he said to me in a very tender manner, 'I am so sorry to see you here; would you not like to be with your wife and children?' I replied, 'No hope remains for me!' 'Yes, Mr. Murphy, there is hope for you,' he answered, 'and if only you pray to God to help you He will.'"

And there, upon the floor of the jail cell, as shown on the left-hand side of the portrait in our frontispiece, the servant of Christ and the hopeless Francis knelt, while the voice of prayer and Heaven-moving entreaty went up to Him who "healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds" (Psa. 147: 3). The result was that the genial-hearted inebriate went forth from that prison in the enjoyment of a double enfranchisement, for not only had he resolved in God's strength never more to sell or taste intoxicating drink, but he had also received forgiveness through the precious blood of Christ, for all his past sin-stained and guilty, godless life.

There is one incident, however, which we must narrate before we pass from that interesting epoch in Francis Murphy's career. The week after Captain Sturtevant's first interview with him, Mrs. Murphy went to see her husband, and the children came along and stooped down to peep into the cell "where father was." Mary, his eldest daughter, had a beautiful bouquet of flowers in her hand, and as she put her arms about his neck, she sobbed, "Oh, father, we have been so lonesome without you!" and with a choking voice he answered, "God helping me, I shall make an effort to become a sober man." They then prayed together, and not only did the hearts of the weeping wife and children dance for joy, but there was also "joy in the presence of the angels of God" over the sinner's repentance, and his realization of acceptance with his Divine Father.

BEGINS TO SPEAK ON TEMPERANCE.

On his being set free, the Temperance Crusaders of Portland took him by the hand, and frequently referred to him as an example of what could be done by prayerful efforts on behalf of lost and dissipated men. Through their agency he was induced to speak at a temperance meeting one evening. It was his maiden speech, and was characterized by so much earnestness, humor, and pathos, that he was cordially congratulated upon the effort. The earnest solicitations of his temperance friends resulted in his relinquishing a situation he had obtained as bookkeeper, in order to devote himself to the work of lecturing upon the evils and dangers of strong drink.

His faithful and devoted wife sickened and died in 1870, and during her illness he was very poor. He had no money wherewith to buy either medicines or food, yet, as he thankfully acknowledges, God provided both by the instrumentality of Christian people. When Mrs. Murphy was told that nothing more could be done for her, turning to her husband, she said in a pathetic manner, "Never mind about me; I'm quite satisfied; for God has saved you!" Her dying message was, "Keep the children together and meet me in heaven."

Mr. Murphy's first temperance lecture was delivered in Portland on April 3d, 1870, to a full house. From that time to the present he has been almost constantly engaged in lecturing all over the United States and in Canada, with altogether unprecedented success. It is impossible for us to give either the names of the cities, towns, and villages that have been visited, or more than an approximate number of the persons who in every place have signed the Murphy Temperance Pledge. The largest buildings are filled to overflowing wherever he goes, and overflow meetings have invariably to be arranged. Perhaps a concise summary of the work done in Pittsburg, Pa., in 1876–77 will give a fair idea of the general features of Mr. Murphy's work.

REVIVAL AT PITTSBURG.

Under the auspices of the Young Men's Temperance Union of Pittsburg, the first lecture was given in the Opera House on November 26th, 1876. "God has given us Pittsburg, my brother!" said Mr. Murphy to one of the committee after its close. Then visits were paid to all the

On the occasion before us the intended victim s large and powerful, a noble English bull, with ssive head and curved horns. As he gazed, jestically, upon the vulgar throng around, he ked by far the finest living existence on the spot, d cast into the shade his two-legged persecutors. e would think that his aspect, so calm and con- ing, so gentle, and yet so indicative of strength, uld have appealed to the better feelings of those o had assembled to make holiday of his suffer- rs and have conquered their sympathy—but no, : natures of those who surrounded him, though ny of them were women, were too coarse and ital for any such sentiment, and their higher f too oblivious of all true admiration and pity. After a loud and impatient demand from the ex- ed crowd, at a signal several dogs of great size d strength were slipped from their collars and ciferously hounded on upon the alarmed, yet oudly defiant, more gigantic animal. Two or three of them were killed in a moment, red and tossed high into the air by the infuriated nt they had dared to summon to battle, and ivering in death, they fell at the feet of their en- ged but unpitying owners.

We shall not pursue in its details the sanguinary ectacle, but every change in the fight, every inci- nt of agony and blood, was greeted with mad outs of anger or delight, by the crowding and ose-pressed multitude.

HOUGHTS ON MATTHEW XXIV. AND XXV.

By P. W. E.

IN Matt. 24 : 3 the disciples ask three questions. st. When shall these things be? 2d. What shall the sign of Thy coming? 3d. And of the end the world or age? Thus they classed together e destruction of the temple, the coming of hrist, and the end of the age.

The Lord's answer may be divided into four rts. First. The general condition of the disciples id of the world during the time of the testimony, om verse 4 to the end of verse 14. Second. The eriod marked by "the abomination of desolation" stand in the holy place, or in the temple, verses 5. 16. Third. The Lord's coming and the gather- g together of the elect, or the remnant in Israel, erses 29–31. Fourth. The gathering before Him ll nations and separating them one from another, nder the symbol of sheep and goats. Chapter 5 : 31 to the end.

We will explain these points in the order given. First. Remember that on account of Christ's ejection the kingdom was set aside with the Jews; hus the Gospel of the kingdom was postponed and ill not be resumed till after the Church has been athered out and taken up to be with Christ. It s now the time for the preaching of "the Gospel f God" (Rom. 1 : 1), and Paul's Gospel, which is he unity of the Church with Christ, composed of hose gathered out of the world and united to Christ by the Holy Spirit.

After the Church has been caught up to be with he Lord, then "the Gospel of the kingdom" will e resumed by the remnant Jews; and it shall be reached "in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come" (Matt. 4 : 14). We also learn that at this same period "the everlasting Gospel is to be preached unto hem that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, nd kindred, and tongue, and people" (Rev. 4 : 6). And in Jerusalem, "the two witnesses shall prophecy a thousand two hundred and three score days" (Rev. 11 : 3).

This time will be characterized by wars, fam- nes, pestilences, and earthquakes; also by false Christs and false prophets. The remnant are not o be troubled; for the end would not be yet. These things will only be the beginning of sor- rows, for they are to be delivered up, put to death, hated of all nations. He who endures to the end shall be saved, for he shall come out of "the great tribulation." They are then to preach "this Gos- pel of the kingdom;" not the proclamation of the union of the Church with Christ, nor redemption in its fulness, as preached and taught by the apostles after the ascension, but the kingdom which is to be established on the earth, as John the Baptist, and as the Lord Himself, had proclaimed; but which was set aside on account of the rejection and crucifixion of the Lord.

The rejection and crucifixion of our Lord and the refusal of the Jews to receive the Gospel, caused God to raise up a special gospel, or testimony, by the hands of Paul, without annulling the truth of the coming kingdom. Thus "the Gospel of the kingdom," when it shall be resumed, will reach all nations before the coming of that judgment which will put an end to the age.

"This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled" (verse 34). The Jewish nation has been set aside; but this 34th verse has a much wider sense, and one that more properly explains it. The Greek word translated generation, means family, race, descendant. Thus this generation, or race of unbelieving Jews, are to exist as such until all shall be accomplished.

The Scripture, in Deuteronomy 32 : 5, 20, where this judgment of Israel is especially in view, gives us light on the subject, which see—God hides His face from them until He shall see what their end will be, for they are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith. They are still a distinct generation of people and exist in the same condition of unbelief—a monument of the abiding certainty of God's dealings and of the Lord's words.

Second. This is designated by "the abomination of desolation" or idol, which is to be set up in the temple. In speaking of the abomination that maketh desolate, the Lord quotes from Daniel, that we may fully understand to what time He refers. In Daniel 12, where this is spoken of, we are brought definitely to the last days, to the time when Michael shall stand up for Daniel's people, the Jews, who shall then be, as they are now, under the dominion of the Gentiles—the days in which there shall be a time of trouble, such as never had been nor ever again shall be, and out of which the remnant shall be delivered.

This is the time when the remnant, under the symbol of a woman, in Revelation, flees from the serpent into the wilderness, and is nourished there three and a half years. At the end He shall come in judgment, and the kingdom shall be given to the saints, and Christ shall become King of kings and Lord of lords.

Third. The Lord, as Son of man, shall come and gather His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. This 30th verse answers the second question of the disciples.

"And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." The Lord will come suddenly, as a flash of lightning, a sign sufficient for the guidance of the saints; but the world will see no sign. The brightness of His glory whom they had despised, will show them who it is that comes. What a terrible moment—when instead of a Messiah, who would answer to their pride, the very Christ, whom they had despised, shall appear in the heavens, in power and great glory.

Here comes the end, of which the disciples inquired—of the age during which the Jews shall be subject to Gentile rule—a period which shall cease, giving place to the Messiah, and the establishment of His kingdom on the earth.

Fourth. He gathers before Him all (living) nations and separates them, etc. Notice, the prophetic history is resumed in Matt. 25 : 31, from Matt. 24 : 31. In Matt. 24 : 31 the Son of man appears suddenly in glory and power, and afterwards gathers together the remnant of Israel from the four corners of the earth. For the way this is done, see Isaiah 66 : 18–20, and other places. For the way His enemies are to die or to be slain, see Zech. 14 : 12 15 and other passages.

But here, in Matt. 25, we see, besides the Son of man, three classes of persons; (a) the brethren, who are the believing Jews, whom the Lord shall employ as messengers to preach the Gospel of the kingdom during His absence; (b) the sheep, those who shall receive this Gospel; and (c) the goats, who shall despise the teaching or the testimony of these messengers, and will thus despise the King who shall send them.

During this terrible week of seven years, in which the Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached, and the everlasting Gospel that shall be proclaimed in all the earth, and the two witnesses shall testify in Jerusalem, some—perhaps many—of the Gentiles are going to believe and accept the truth. They also are going to befriend the remnant Jews, who preach this Gospel of the kingdom, and in some instances visit them in prison, feed them, care for and clothe them, all of which will be contrary to the wishes of the Beast and false Prophet, as they are not to allow any one to buy or sell, excepting those having the mark of the beast upon them (Rev. 13 : 17): and Christ recognizes all these kind acts as having been done to Him. Thus He says, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me" (Matt. 25 : 40).

"My brethren" are the believing Jews. Those who shall believe this Gospel and shall be kind to these Jewish messengers shall be the "sheep," and those who shall be unbelievers and shall neglect the Jews in their persecution and trials, shall be the "goats."

Thus the whole effect of Christ's coming, with regard to the kingdom and His messengers during His absence, is unfolded in these two chapters. With respect to the Jews, as far as verse 31 of chapter 24; with respect to His servants during His absence, to the end of verse 30 of chapter 25, including the kingdom of heaven in its present condition, and the heavenly rewards that shall be given; and then, from verse 31 to the end of chapter 25, with respect to the nations who shall be blessed on the earth at His return.

Comparing these chapters with Luke 21, I will simply say that the disciples ask nothing about the end of the age in Luke, consequently the Lord says nothing about the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, as in Matthew, nor of the end of the age. When we reach the 25th verse of chapter 21 of Luke, we find the Lord refers to the terrible time when He shall come in judgment to redeem His elect. But we have nothing respecting the gathering of the elect Israel, who have been dispersed, of which Matthew speaks, nor of the separation of those who believe the testimony of His messengers from those who despise, as spoken of in Matt. 25.

The text itself informs us of what disposition is made of the goats or unbelievers. The sentence then given is as final as that will be after the millennium, when the dead are brought before the judgment of the great white throne. In the one case the living wicked are brought before Him, and in the other the wicked dead are brought before the great white throne.

The Widow's Investment.—A Lady in Scotland, whose husband had left her a competence, had two profligate sons who wasted her substance with riotous living. When she saw that her property was being squandered, she determined to make an offering to the Lord. She took twenty pounds ($100) and gave to the Foreign Missionary Society. Her sons were very angry at this, and told her that she might just as well cast her money into the sea. "I will cast it into the sea," she replied, "and it shall be my bread upon the waters." The sons, having spent all they could get, enlisted in a regiment and were sent to India. Their positions were far apart, but God so ordered in His providence, that both were stationed near the missionaries. The elder one was led to repent of sin and embrace Christ. He shortly afterward died. Meanwhile the widowed mother was praying for her boys. One evening as she was taking down her family Bible to read, the door was softly opened, and the younger son appeared to greet the aged mother. He told her he had turned to God, and Christ had blotted out all his sins. Then he narrated his past history in connection with the influence the missionaries of the cross had on his own mind, while his mother, with tears of overflowing gratitude, exclaimed, "Oh, my twenty pounds! my twenty pounds! I have cast my bread upon the waters, and now I have found it after many days."

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Garfield is Dead! The Intelligence flashed through the country on Monday night carried a sense of bereavement into every home. It is with sorrowful hearts that we say, "God's will be done!" We hoped that the magnificent constitution, the undaunted spirit that for eighty days had waged this heroic fight with death, might have triumphed after all. But it was not to be. God must have seen that it was necessary for the nation that the sacrifice should be made, and we, though we had prayed that the cup might pass from us, must add, like our Divine Exemplar, "not our will, but thine be done."

The end was very sudden. There was no attempt on Monday night to disguise the fact that the President was in imminent danger, but at nine o'clock there was some encouragement for hope. The President had rallied from the chill, and was sleeping quietly. At 10.10 o'clock, however, he awoke, complaining of pain at the heart, and then sank into unconsciousness. The doctors were summoned, and there, standing around the dying bed, watched the patient sufferer, who lay breathing heavily, his hand clasped in that of his devoted wife. At 10.35 the long struggle was over, the assassin's fatal work was complete, the sacrifice was made. It is a sorrowful time; only the consciousness that God, who directs all events, is all-wise as well as all-loving, can sustain us. May He who is the God of all comfort succor and comfort the widow and the fatherless.

The Bulletins Issued by the President's Physicians last week did not allay the anxiety about the condition of the distinguished patient. On Tuesday some encouragement was given by the announcement that the President had been allowed to lie for half an hour in a reclining chair, and had not suffered by the experiment. On Wednesday the pulse, temperature, and respiration were abnormally high, and at night it was admitted that there had been no perceptible gain during the day. Thursday also passed without improvement.

On Friday an aggravation of the symptoms was observed. The pulse showed increased fluctuation, the pus discharged from the wound decreased in quantity, and was of a more unhealthy character, and the cough was more troublesome, with expectoration of a decided purulent kind. The patient had a high fever and was unable to bear removal to the invalid chair. On Saturday the gravest apprehension was again excited by the intelligence that the President had had a pyæmic chill or rigor. It lasted half an hour, during which his pulse bounded up to 137, and he was delirious. When the rigor passed, he fell asleep and the pulse fell to 102 and the temperature below normal. Sunday passed uneventfully until evening when the President had another rigor. On Monday morning at half past eight his limbs were observed to stiffen rapidly, he shivered in spasms and the end seemed very near. A rigor was upon him and though every effort to relieve him was made by Drs. Agnew and Bliss who were present, it continued twenty minutes. The pulse mounted to 143 and there was aberration of the mind. Then, as the rigor yielded, the President sank into a stupor, which the doctors regarded as a sign of approaching collapse.

Mount Garfield is the Name Officially Conferred on the mountain in the Franconia Range heretofore known as Haystack Mountain. The Selectmen of Franconia, N. H., have executed and placed in the County Clerk's office the necessary official document legalizing the change of name. The significance of this testimony of respect is deepened by the fact that the Selectmen are Democrats, who voted against Garfield last fall.

Gov. Cornell has Declined to Indorse Mayor Grace's removal of the Police Commissioners of New York. The Governor does not disagree with the Mayor as to the culpability of the commissioners; he is careful not to express any opinion on the matter. But the law under which they were removed having been repealed, all offences committed against that law, the Governor considers, are cancelled. The effect of the Governor's veto will not be serious, as the commissioners cannot, under the new law, any longer prevent the cleaning of the streets.

General Ambrose E. Burnside Died Suddenly on September 13th, at Bristol, R. I. He had been slightly ill for two or three days, but serious consequences were not apprehended until an hour before his death, when he was seized with spasms of the heart. He was born at Liberty, Ind., in 1824, and graduated at West Point in 1847. He took a conspicuous part in the war, and was made a Major General in 1862. In November, 1862, he succeeded General McClellan in the command of the Army of the Potomac, but he only held that position until January 26th, 1863, when he was succeeded by General Hooker. Since the war he has been three times elected Governor of Rhode Island, and in 1875 he took his seat as Senator from that State. He was re-elected on the expiration of his term for that ending in 1887. The Republican ranks in the Senate will, by the death of General Burnside, be still further reduced. The Democrats now have a majority of three in that chamber.

The Subscriptions in Aid of the Sufferers by the Michigan forest fires are proceeding in all the large cities. The amount raised in New York up to Saturday, September 17th, was $44,230.71. A letter from Detroit, acknowledging the receipt of the New York contributions, shows how sorely help is still needed. The writer says:

"No language can adequately describe the terrible suffering these people have passed through, and the fearful condition they are still in and likely to remain in for some time to come, do the best we can. It is estimated that at least a half of million of dollars will be required to bridge over the winter, as a majority of the sufferers lost everything, many even the clothing on their bodies; and others whose lives were spared will be maimed for life; as, for instance, a young girl of sixteen years who ran a mile and a half through the fire and on reaching shelter was so severely burned that her flesh fell from her bones and amputation of both lower limbs became necessary. Many still more distressing cases could be cited if time permitted.

"The dead list increases daily, and information continues to arrive of hitherto unreported burnt territory. In order to realize the magnitude of the calamity, bear in mind that upward of fifty townships, covering an area of about 2000 square miles, have been wholly or partially burnt over, scarcely a green sprig being left in the track of the fire. Immense trees were twisted off by the force of the tornado which prevailed, and the darkness was so great that not anything could be distinguished at six inches distance. This accounts for the great loss of life, as the people were bewildered and knew not which way to turn to escape."

The Hon. W. M. Evarts, who Returned from Europe on September 4th, is not sanguine as to the results of the International Monetary Conference, to which he was a delegate. As to the opinions of the conference, Mr. Evarts remarked to a reporter: "The general opinion, we think, of the conference was that an international bi-metallic convention would accomplish the purpose of making both silver and gold an international money, thus enlarging the basis of the credit system of the world, and relieving it from disasters, and give steadiness to the exchanges that would prevent the drain of gold, which is now the only international money, from disastrously affecting the industries and money systems at home of the nations subjected to its laws." The conference has not terminated, but has adjourned to next spring, and Mr. Evarts is doubtful "whether our own or any other nation will occupy the interval to carry on negotiations in the matter or whether it will be left to the ordinary channels and the press to be discussed, or whether all these influences combined will operate during the interval."

The Disappearance of Mr. G. A. W. Stuart, ex-Secretary of the Brooklyn Board of Education, has caused considerable excitement. He was charged with having embezzled $100,000 belonging to the Board. It was part of the funds realized by the sales of books to the children in the public schools, which had been intrusted to him. He had been liberated from arrest under bonds fixed at $10,000, but he heard that further investigation had decided the Board of Education to commence a civil suit against him for $200,000, and it is supposed he absconded rather than undergo punishment. Alderman Jones, who is a brother of Mrs. Stuart, and was one of Stuart's bondsmen, was arrested on Monday for aiding and abetting the ex-Secretary in his embezzlement. Mr. Stuart held the office of Secretary more than twenty years.

The Pool-Selling Establishments in New York have been made the subject of complaint by the Mayor, who in strong terms calls the attention of the Police Commissioners to the neglect of duty shown by their subordinates. The Mayor said: "The existence of these places causes a widespread mischief, in that they are most powerful corrupters of the morals of our community. Among their frequenters are many young men, and even boys; and these places are nevertheless permitted in open daylight and under the very eye of the law which denounces them, to entice these youths to their ruin. The law is explicit in its condemnation of gambling houses. Such crying, notorious, and constant breaches of the law can surely be punished and prevented if the desire exists on the part of the officers of the law, and these places must be abated."

On Wednesday, September 14th, the police visited the haunts of the pool-sellers, and arrested some of the clerks. The places were afterward closed and remained closed during the week, pending the proceedings before the justices.

The Death of Rev. Cyrus Dickson, D.D., is announced. He was until recently Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, and devoted his best energies to the work of the office. He made extensive journeys throughout the country in order to become personally acquainted with the needs of the several districts. In 1870 he was appointed Permanent Clerk of the General Assembly, a position he held until his death. Dr. Dickson died at Baltimore on Sunday, September 11th, aged 65.

A Remarkably Ingenious Invention is Described in a recent issue of a scientific journal. An engineer driving his locomotive in a fog or a snowstorm is frequently unable to see the signal which is set to inform him whether the track is clear ahead. Fog-signals and other devices have been tried to overcome this difficulty, but not with satisfactory results. The new scheme is that of attaching to the locomotive an insulated brush, so placed as to be at the edges within a few inches of the roadway. A copper-faced bar is placed betwen the rails near the signal, and attached to an electric battery. When the signal stands at danger the bar is slightly raised and the insulated brush on the locomotive sweeps it; this completes the current, which opens the whistle, and thus sounds the alarm. When the signal is "line clear" the bar is depressed, and the locomotive brush does not touch it. The difficulty and the proposed remedy have a partial resemblance in life. The danger signals intended to warn men that their habits are leading them to destruction are often unseen because the moral atmosphere in which they live is loaded with corruption. Contact with God in prayer, however, quickens the conscience and warning is given of the evil ahead (Matt. 26 : 41).

A Child's Pathetic Wish was Granted in a remarkable manner recently. A correspondent of a contemporary says: "Mr. William L. Bonner, of Syracuse, has recently lost three daughters by diphtheria—Hattie A., in her fourteenth year, Lillie May, in her eighth year, and Matie, in her fifth year. A little time before Lillie died, she said to her mother, 'Ma, I don't want to come back, but I don't want to go alone. Let Matie go with me.' A few hours afterward, when Matie was struggling with the fell destroyer, she reached up her hands toward the ceiling exclaiming, 'Lillie, take hold of my hands.'" It is easy to understand the little sufferer's desire for company in the momentous journey. The mature Christian has the same wish, and for his encouragement he is told he shall not tread the dark valley alone (Psa. 23 : 4).

A Cinder in the Eye Has Been the Means of effecting a surgical operation so delicate and difficult that no surgeon would attempt it. The incident, related by a Cleveland, O., journal, is as follows: Last fall, as the results of a cold, an ulcer appeared on the right eye of a young gentleman of this city. The ulcer was removed, but a scar was left on the cornea directly over the pupil, completely obscuring the sight. While riding in the cars last week the young man experienced the customary fortune of travellers, and for several days suffered from the evil effects of a large cinder in the eye. When the bandage was removed, much to the surprise of the patient, he found that he could see almost as well as before the growth of the ulcer. The rough edges of the cinder had removed the scar, a feat supposed to be beyond the power of science. How many times has it happened that some event which the world calls a misfortune, such as financial ruin, or a serious illness, opened the eyes of the sufferer which Satan had blinded by worldly prosperity and worldly pleasure (Psa. 78 : 34).

A Morphine User Writes to the New York Tribune that he has been cured of his habit. Some six months ago a piteous appeal for help appeared in that journal from one who had fallen under the power of the habit through the treatment he had undergone on recovery from a painful illness. The physicians had ordered the injection of morphine under the skin by a syringe, and he had experienced so much relief from it that after his recovery he continued the practice. Eventually he used two and a half grains a day, and was unable to dispense with it. It produced ecstasy, cheerfulness, and braced up the nerves, and when discontinued the effect was languor, headache, restlessness and aching limbs. The publication of the letter led to numerous confessions showing how largely slavery to this fascinating habit prevailed in society. Among these was one who took the drug instead of injecting it, and it is this victim who now writes announcing his cure. He states that having mixed his drug as usual he replaced the quantity he took with the same quantity of clear water and continued doing so until the mixture was so diluted that there was not a trace of morphine in it, and that by that time he was cured, and in three months he has not had occasion to touch it again. Thousands of people in this and other cities are the abject slaves of this miserable habit, and are sighing for release. The cure of this victim may possibly lead to the emancipation of others.

A Magnificent Fortune, as the Reward of kindness, is reported to be awaiting the claim of a mechanic at Kingston, N. Y. Three years ago he met an immigrant from Ireland who was in abject poverty. The Irishman seemed to be intelligent and honest, but he had been sick from the time he arrived, and had been unable to obtain employment. His condition awakened the mechanic's sympathy, and he took him home and cared for him until he was strong enough to work, and then found him employment. The Irishman was very grateful and showed his sense of his obligation by writing letters for the mechanic, and rendering him other little services. The two men were separated by business engagements, but kept up a correspondence. At length the Irishman wrote that he was about to return to Ireland to look after some property he heard had fallen to him, by the death of a distant relative. He went, and succeeded in establishing his claim. But ill health returned, and he died after having enjoyed his prosperity only a few months. A few weeks ago, it is stated, a lawyer notified the mechanic who had befriended the Irishman when he was in distress at Kingston, that his friend had made him sole heir to the property, which is said to be worth nearly seven million dollars. It is rare, indeed, for so splendid a reward to result from an act of kindness; but we may be assured that such acts never fail of ultimate reward (Luke 14 : 14).

A Death Resulted from the Prick of a Pin on Monday, September 5th, in the Adirondacks. A young married lady of Albany, on a summer excursion in the mountains, was going out driving on Saturday, and when dressing she noticed a cold-sore on her upper lip, which she pricked with a brass pin, and rubbed it with camphor. Before she reached her hotel her lip commenced to swell, and before night her whole face was swollen to an abnormal size. Her husband was telegraphed for, and arrived before the unfortunate lady died, but she could not speak to him, such was the condition of her face. Erysipelas had set in of the most virulent type, and death resulted within forty-eight hours. Such a melancholy result of so slight a cause is very infrequent, but we know that many men whose spiritual nature may be correctly described as dead, full of "wounds and bruises, and putrefying sores," commenced the career of sin which led to their desperate condition with a sin which the world would call trivial, as unworthy of serious thought as the prick of a pin (1 Cor. 15 : 56).

A Strange Landmark was Discovered in Maine a few days ago. It was a Bible laid on a rock and covered by an enormous stone. Inquiries about it elicited the fact that fifty years ago an aged farmer in Turner, by name John Swett, had a disagreement with a neighbor as to the boundary line between their farms. The old man declared a certain big rock marked the line, and laying his family Bible on that rock, took oath to that effect. He then covered the Bible with a flat stone, and instructed his descendants to allow it to remain there forever. When the Bible was found, after its half a century's intombment, the print was still legible. It was an inexplicable freak of the old farmer to put his Bible to such a use, and may possibly have been done with the idea that it gave the monument a sacred character. It often happens that people who rarely study the Bible have a superstitious veneration for it, as the Israelites had for the brazen serpent in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18 : 4).

The Subscription List of the "Christian HERALD" is now nearly all set up in type, and the addresses on the wrappers are printed instead of being written every week. SAVED IN HOPE.

"For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen in not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it."—ROM. 8 : 24, 25.

Distinction Between Faith and Hope—The Salvation by Faith—Something more to be Had—A New Appetite—For Freedom from Sin—Without and Within—From the Memory of Sin—From Tendency to Sin—Freedom from the Body.—I. The Object of Hope—1. Absolute Perfection—2. Redemption of the Body—3. Enter upon our Inheritance—4. Glory Revealed in us—5. Liberty—6. Manifestation.—II. The Nature of the Hope—Its Component Parts—Belief—Desire—Expectancy—Grounded on the Word—Wrought by the Spirit—Operates Holily.—III. Its Effect—Patience—Rowland Hill's Message to Heaven—An offer of Endless Life on Earth—The Hope of the Unbeliever.

ACCORDING to our version "we are saved by hope," but that is scarcely in accordance with other parts of Holy Scripture. Everywhere in the Word of God we are told that we are saved by faith. See the first verse of the fifth chapter: "Therefore being justified by faith." Faith is the saving grace, and not hope—save only as hope is under some aspects tantamount to faith. Faith is the saving grace, and the original should be rendered—and one wonders that it is not so in the Revised Version—"We were saved in hope." It would prevent misapprehension if the passage were so rendered; for, as that eminent critic, Bengel, well says, "the words do not describe the means, but the manner of salvation; we are so saved that there may even yet remain something for which we may hope, both of salvation and glory." Believers receive the salvation of their souls as the end of their faith, and it is of faith that it might be of grace. They are saved by faith and in hope.

At this present moment believers are saved, and in a certain sense completely saved. They are entirely saved from the guilt of sin. The Lord Jesus took their sin and bore it in His own body on the tree, and offered an acceptable atonement, by which the iniquity of all His people is once and for ever put away. By faith we are at once saved from the defilement of evil, and have free access to God our Father. By faith we are saved from the reigning power of sin in our members. Sin strives to get the mastery, but it cannot win the day, for he that is born of God doth not commit sin with delight, or as his daily habit, but he keepeth himself so that that evil one toucheth him not. As to the penalty of sin, that has been borne by our great Substitute, and by faith we have accepted His sacrifice, and "he that believeth in Him is not condemned." We rejoice, therefore, at this moment in salvation already obtained and enjoyed by faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Yet we are conscious that there is something more than this to be had. There is which as yet we see not; for at the present moment we find ourselves in this tabernacle, groaning because we are burdened. All around us the creation is evidently in travail; there are signs of birth-pangs in a certain unrest, upheaval, and anguish of the creation. Things are not as God originally made them. Thorns are in earth's furrows, a blight has fallen on her flowers, a mildew on her grain. The heavens weep and saturate our harvests, earth's bowels move and shake our cities. Frequent calamities and disasters are portents of a great future which shall be born of this travailing present. Nowhere on earth can a perfect paradise be found. Our best things are expectant of something better. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain with us.

Even we that have received the firstfruits of the Spirit, and so are blessed and saved, nevertheless groan within ourselves, waiting for a further something, a glory not seen as yet. We have not yet attained, but are pressing on. Our first soul-thirst as sinners has been quenched; but there are within us still greater desires, by which we hunger and thirst after righteousness with longings insatiable. Before we ate of the bread of heaven we hungered for mere husks; but now our newborn nature has brought us a new appetite, which the whole world could not satisfy.

What is the cause of this hungering? We are under no difficulty whatever in answering the question. Our griefs and longings, and unsatisfied desires are principally gathered up in two things. First, we long to be totally free from sin in every form. The evil which is in the world is our burden; we are vexed with the evil conversation of the ungodly, and are grieved by their temptations and persecutions. The fact that the world lieth in the wicked one, and that men reject Christ and perish in unbelief, is a source of much affliction to our hearts. This is not our rest, for it is polluted, and so far we look for a great deliverance when we shall be taken out of this world to dwell in perfect company.

Yet even the presence of the ungodly were a small matter if we could be completely delivered from sin within ourselves. That is among the things not seen as yet. If a man were free from all tendency to sin he would no longer be liable to temptation, or under necessity to watch against it. That which cannot possibly be burned or blackened has no need to dread the fire. We feel that we must shun temptation, because we are conscious that there is material within us which may soon take fire.

Oh that we could get rid of the memory of sin! What a torment it is to us to remember snatches of loose songs, and words of ill savor. Oh, that we were rid of the imagination of sin! Do we mourn enough over sins of thought and fancy? A man may sin, and sin horribly, in thought, and yet may not have sinned in act. Many a man hath committed fornication, adultery, theft, and even murder in his imagination, by finding pleasure in the thought thereof, and yet he may never have fallen into any one of the overt acts. Oh that our imagination, and all our inward parts, were purged of the corrupt matter which is in them, and which fermenteth toward foulness! There is in us that which makes us cry out from day to day, "O wretched man that I am; who shall deliver me!" If any man here says, "I feel no such emotions," I pray God that he may soon do so. Those know very little of who are content with themselves. A perfect child grows, and so does a perfect child of God.

The nearer we come to perfect cleanness of heart the more shall we mourn over the tiniest spot of sin, and the more shall we see that to be sin which once we excused. He who is most like Christ is most conscious of imperfection, and most weary that the least iniquity should hang about him. When a man saith, "I have reached the goal," I fear he has not begun to run. As for me, I endure many growing pains, and feel far less pleased with myself than I used to be. I have a firm hope of something better, but were it not for hope I should account myself truly unhappy to be so conscious of need and so racked with desires. This is one great source of our groaning. We are saved, but we are not completely delivered from tendencies to sin, neither have we reached the fulness of holiness. "There is yet very much land to be possessed."

Another cause of this winter of our discontent is our body. Paul calls it a "vile body," and so indeed it is when compared with what it shall be when fashioned in the image of Christ Jesus. It is not vile in itself, viewed as the creature of God, for it is fearfully and wonderfully made; and there is something very noble about the body of a man, made to walk erect, and to look upward and gaze toward heaven. A body so marvellously prepared to be the tenement of the mind, and to obey the soul's behests, is not to be despised. A body which can be the temple of the Holy Ghost is no mean structure, therefore let us not despise it. It is a thing for which to be eternally grateful, that we have been made men if we have been also made new men in Christ Jesus.

How often doth a penury of health repress the noble flame of high resolve and holy aspiration! How often do pain and weakness freeze the genial current of the soul! When shall we be emancipated from the shackles of this natural body and put on the wedding dress of the spiritual body? What with the sin dwelling in our breast, and this vesture of mortal clay, we are glad that now is our salvation nearer than when we believed, and we long to enter into the full enjoyment of it.

Here my text gives us good cheer. From the sources of our present groaning there is a full deliverance, a salvation so wide that it covers the whole area of our wants, yea, of our desires. A salvation awaits us whose sweep is eternity and immensity. All our capacious powers can wish are compassed within it, and of this the text says, "We were saved in hope." That grandest, widest salvation, we have seized by hope. Glory be to God for this.

This, then, is the subject of our present meditation; the hope which embraces the grander salvation for which we long.

I. Let us begin by recapitulating under the first head

THE OBJECT OF THIS HOPE.

1. Our hope, first of all, embraces our own absolute perfection. We have set our faces toward holiness, and by God's grace we will never rest till we attain it. Every sin that is in us is doomed, not only to be conquered, but to be slain. The grace of God does not help us to conceal our infirmities, but to destroy them. We deal with sin as Joshua did with the five kings when they went into the cave at Makkedah. While he was busy in the battle, he said, "Roll great stones upon the mouth of the cave." Our sins for awhile are shut up by restraining grace, as in a cave, and great stones are rolled at the cave's mouth; for they would escape if they could, and once more snatch at the reins; but in the power of the Holy Spirit we mean to deal with them more effectually by-and-bye. "Bring out those five kings unto me," said Joshua, and "he smote them, and slew them, and hanged them."

By God's grace we will never be satisfied till all our natural inclinations to sin shall be utterly destroyed, execrated, and abhorred. We expect a day when there will not remain in us a taint of sin past, or an inclination for sin future. We shall still be possessed of will and freedom of choice, but we shall choose only good. Ignorance shall be gone, for we shall all be taught of the Lord, and we shall know, even as we are known. Perfect in service and clean delivered from all self-will and carnal desire, we shall be near our God and like Him. As Watts has it—

> "Sin, my worst enemy before,
> Shall vex my eyes and ears no more;
> My inward foes shall all be slain,
> Nor Satan break my peace again."

2. The other object of our desire is the redemption of the body. Let us read the verses in which Paul teaches us that truth: "And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you." When we die we shall leave our body behind us for awhile; we shall not, therefore, as to our entire manhood, be perfect in heaven till the resurrection; we shall be morally perfect, but as a complete man is made up of body as well as soul, we shall not be physically perfect, while one part of our person shall remain in the tomb. When the resurrection trumpet shall sound, this body will rise, but it will rise redeemed; and as our soul regenerated is very different from our soul under the bondage of sin, so the body when it is risen will be widely different from the body as it now is.

The infirmities caused by sickness and age will be unknown among the glorified, for they are as the angels of God. None shall enter into glory halt, or maimed, or decrepit, or malformed. You will have no blind eye there, my sister; no deaf ear there, my brother; there shall be no quivering of paralysis or wasting of consumption. There we shall possess everlasting youth; the body which is sown in weakness shall be raised in power, and shall at once fly upon the errands of its Lord. Paul says, "It is sown a natural (or soulish) body," fit for the soul; "it is raised a spiritual body," fit for the spirit, the highest nature of man. This is the second object of our hope, a glorified body to consort with our purified spirit.

3. Viewed in another light, the object of our hope is this—that we shall enter upon our inheritance. Paul saith, "If children, then heirs; heirs of God; joint heirs with Christ." Whether we have little or much in this life our estate is nothing when compared with that which we have in reversion, secured to us against the day when we shall come of age. The fulness of God is the heritage of the saints; all that can make a man blessed, and noble, and complete is laid up in store for us. Measure, if you can, the inheritance of the Christ, who is heir of all things! What must be the portion of the well-beloved Son of the Highest? Whatever that may be, it is ours; for we are joint heirs with Christ.

4. Paul speaks of "the glory which shall be revealed in us," and tells us in another place that it is "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." What a word is that—Glory! Glory is to be ours. Even ours, poor sinners as we are. Grace is sweet, but what must glory be. And it is to be revealed in us, and about us, and over us, and through us to all eternity.

5. Paul also speaks of

of the children of God." O charming word, liberty! We love it even as we hear it rung from the silver bugles of those who fight with tyrants; but what will it be when the trumpets of heaven shall proclaim eternal jubilee to every spiritual bondslave! Liberty? the liberty of the children of God! Liberty to enter into the holiest, to dwell in God's presence, and behold His face for ever and ever.

6. The apostle speaks also of "the manifestation of the sons of God." Here we are hidden away in Christ as gems in a casket; by-and-bye we are to be revealed as jewels in a crown. As Christ had His time of manifestation to the Gentiles after He had for awhile been hidden, so we who are now unknown are to have a manifestation before men and angels. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." What our manifestation shall be, O my brothers and sisters, I cannot tell you; eye hath not seen it, nor ear heard it, neither hath it entered into the heart of man; and though God hath revealed it unto us by His Spirit, yet how small a part of that revelation have our spirits been able to receive.

II. Let us now muse upon

THE NATURE OF THIS HOPE.

We are saved in hope. What kind of hope is it in which we are saved?

First, our hope consists of three things—belief, desire, expectancy.

Our hope of being clean delivered from sin as to our soul, and rescued from all infirmity as to our body, arises out of a solemn assurance that it shall be so. The revelation of Him who hath brought life and immortality to light bears witness to us that we also shall obtain glory and immortality. We shall be raised in the image of Christ, and shall partake in His glory. This is our belief because Christ is risen and glorified, and we are one with Him. This also we desire, O how ardently! We so desire it that we at times wish to die that we may enter into it.

This hope is grounded upon the word of God. God has promised us this; therefore do we believe it, desire it, and expect it. He has said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," and the widest sense that we can give to that word "saved" must be God's sense of it, since His thoughts are always above our thoughts. We expect God to do as He has said to the fullest extent of His promise, for He will never run back from His word, nor fail in His engagement. We have committed our souls to the keeping of the Saviour, who has declared that He will save His people from their sins. We are trusting in our Redeemer, and our belief is that our Redeemer liveth, and that when He shall stand in the latter day upon his hope is wrought in us by the Spirit of God. should never have known this hope if the Holy st had not kindled it in our bosoms. Ungodly have no such hope, and never will have. It nly when men are renewed that this hope en- into them, the Holy Ghost dwelling in them. herein do I exult with joy unspeakable, for if hope of perfection and immortality has been ught in me by God, then it must be fulfilled, the Lord never could inspire a hope which ld put His people to shame. The true God r gave men a false hope. That cannot be. God of hope who has taught thee, my brother, xpect salvation from sin and all its effects, will nto thee according to the expectation which He Himself excited ; therefore be thou very confi- t, and patiently wait the joyful day of the Lord's earing.

h, though after our skin worms destroy this

his hope operates in us in a holy manner, as y holy thing that comes from God must do. It fies us, as saith John, " He that hath this hope im purifieth himself, even as God is pure." We so certain of this inheritance that we prepare it by putting off all things contrary to it, and ing on all things which suit it. We endeavor ve as in the prospect of glory. How often has ccurred to me, and I doubt not to you, my thers, to say of such and such a thing, " How this look in the day of judgment?" And we e done this act of generosity or that act of con- ation, not because we care a whit what men ld think of it, but because we looked at it in light of the coming glory. To us the grandest ulus is that there is laid up for us a crown of that fadeth not away.

II. Having described the object and the nature his blessed hope, I come more closely still to text to observe his hope, for the apostle says in our text, " We e saved in hope ;" that is to say, we did get greater salvation, about which we are now aking, when we were taught to know this e. We obtained the first part of salvation, the giveness of sin, and justification of our persons, faith, and we have fellowship with God, and ess into countless blessings by faith; some of are as conscious of this as that we eat and k. But, beside all this, we have in hope the er range of salvation, total deliverance of the l from sin, and complete redemption of the ly from pain and death. We have this salva- in hope; and we rejoice in hope of the glory God. How is this?

Vhy, first, hope saw it all secured by the prom- of grace. As soon as ever we believed in ist our faith secured forgiveness, and we cried, am not yet free from tendencies to sin, but in- uch as I have believed in Christ unto salvation hall surely be perfected, for Christ could not e come to give me a partial and imperfect sal- ion ; He will perfect that which concerneth me." us hope saw within the promise of salvation ch that as yet was not actually experienced. owing that the whole of the promise is of equal tainty, hope expected the future mercy as sure- s faith enjoyed the present blessing.

Moreover, hope saw the full harvest in the first- fits. When sin was subdued by grace, hope ected to see it utterly exterminated. When Holy Spirit came to dwell in the body, hope cluded that the body would be delivered as ely as the soul. The moment that faith intro- ed hope into the heart she sang, " I have the nplete salvation—not in actual enjoyment, but sure reversion in Christ Jesus." Hope waved first sheaf, and so took possession of the har- t.

Moreover, hope is so sure about this coming favor t she reckons it as obtained. You get an advice m a merchant with whom you have traded be- d sea ; he says, " I have procured the goods have ordered, and will send them by the next sel ; which will probably arrive at such a time." nother trader calls in and asks you whether you sh to buy such goods ; and you reply, " No, I ve them." Have you spoken the truth? Cer- tainly ; for though you have them not in your warehouse, they are invoiced to you ; you know they are on the way, and you are so accustomed to trust your foreign correspondent, that you regard the goods as yours. The deed is done that makes them yours. So it is with heaven, with perfection, with immortality ; the deed is done which makes these the heritage of saints. I have advices from One whom I cannot doubt, even my Lord, that He has gone to heaven to prepare a place for me, and that He will come again and receive me to Himself. So sure is hope of this fact that she reckons it, and makes comparisons and draws practical conclu- sions.

Nay, he is not only so sure as to reckon upon it, but to groan after it. We that are in this body do groan for the full adoption. Our groanings do not arise from doubt, but from eagerness ; we are urged by our confident expectancy to vehemence of desire. It is idle to cry for that which you will never have. The child is foolish who cries for the moon. But to groan for what I am sure to have is proper and fit, and shows the strength of my faith.

The apostle is so sure of it that he even tri- umphs in it. He says that we are more than con- querors through Him that loved us—that is to say, although we are not perfect yet, and although our body is not delivered from pain, yet we are so sure of perfection and complete deliverance that we joyfully endure all things, triumphing over every difficulty. Friend, you will not be poor many weeks longer ; you shall dwell where the streets are paved with gold. Your head will not ache many months longer, for it shall be surrounded with a coronet of glory and of bliss. Never mind shame, they will not be able to laugh at you long ; you shall be at the right hand of God, even the Father, and the glory of Christ shall clothe you, world without end. Oh, it is an infinite blessing to have such a hope, and to be so sure of it as to an- ticipate its joys before they actually come to us.

IV. Let us for a moment observe

THE PROPER SPHERE OF HOPE.

The sphere of hope is " things not seen." Hope that is seen is not hope, for what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for? Therefore, brethren, a Christian's real possession is not what he sees. Suppose God prospers him in this world and he has riches ; let him be grateful, but let him con- fess that these are not his treasure. One hour with the Lord Jesus Christ will bring more satis- faction to the believer than the largest measure of wealth. Although he may have been prospered in this world, the saint will ridicule the idea of mak- ing the world his portion. A thousand worlds with all the joy which they could yield are as nothing compared with our appointed inheritance. Our hope does not deal with trifles , it leaves the mice of the barn to the owls, and soars on eagle's wings where nobler joys await her.

" Beyond, beyond this lower sky,
Up where eternal ages roll ;
Where solid pleasures never die,
And fruits immortal feast the soul."

But it is clear that we do not at present enjoy these glorious things for wnich we hope. The worldling cries, " Where is your hope?" and we confess that we do not see the objects of our hope. For instance, we could, not claim to be already perfect, neither do we expect to do so while we are in this body, but we believe that we shall be per- fected in the image of Christ at the time appointed of the Father. By no means is our body free from infirmity at this moment, aches and pains and weariness remind us that the body is under death because of sin ; yet our firm conviction is that we shall bear the image of the heavenly even as we now bear the image of the earthly. These are subjects of hope, and therefore outside of present experience.

Away, then, with judging by what you do, or see, or feel, or are. Rise into the sphere of the things which shall be. Can you not do that? When there is no joy in the present, there is an in- finite joy in the future. Do not say, " Oh, but it is a long way off." It is not so. Many among you are sixty, seventy, or even eighty years of age ; your time for the sight of Christ in your disem- bodied state cannot be far away, for the thread of life is snapping. Some of us are in middle age, but as we have already reached the average of life, we are bound to reckon that our lease is far ad- vanced ; and as so many are snatched away in their prime, we may at any moment be caught up to the land for which we hope.

V. Our time has fled, and we must close by merely glancing at which is thus described : " Then do we with pa- tience wait for it." We wait, and must wait, but not as criminals for execution ; our tarrying is rather that of the bride for the wedding. We wait with patience, constancy, desire, and submission.

Dear Rowland Hill is said to have searched out an aged friend who was dying, that he might send a message up to heaven, to John Berridge and other beloved Johns who had gone before him, and he playfully added a word of hope that the Master had not forgotten old Rowland, and would let him come home in due time ; yet he never dreamed that he could be passed over. Among the last ex- pressions of the famous John Donne was this—" I were miserable if I might not die." This would be a horrible world, indeed, if we were doomed to live in it for ever.

I saw a gentleman some time ago who told me that he would never die, but should at certain in- tervals cast off the effects of age and start on a new term of life. He kindly came to tell me how I might enjoy the same favor ; but as I am not ambitious of earthly immortality, such an offer did not tempt me. He told me I could renew my youth and become young again, for the space of hundreds of years, but I refused his conditions, and declined the boon at any price. I have no desire for any- thing of the sort ; about this life is that it will melt away into life eternal.

MY MOST COMFORTABLE PROSPECT

It seems to me that the most joyous thing about the most joyous life is that it leads upward to another and a better state. I am not unhappy or discontented, but since I have a good hope of per- fection for my soul and body, and a sure prospect of face-to-face fellowship with God, how can I speak well of anything which divides me from my joy? Yes, it will come, surely come ; therefore let us patiently wait for it. When Satan would buffet us, when temptation would overcome us, when affliction would wear us down, when doubts would torment us, let us bear the temporary trial with constancy, for we shall soon be out of range of gunshot. The consummation shall come, and must come, and when it cometh we shall remem- ber no more our travail for joy that our heaven is born to us and we to it.

Now, then, ye that do not believe in God, tell us what your hope is. Publish it in the world, and let all men estimate it. What is your hope? To live long? Yes, and what then? To bring up a family? Yes, and what then? To see them com- fortably settled in life? Yes, and what then? To be a grandfather to a numerous progeny? Yes, and what then? To reach extreme old age in peaceful retirement? Yes, and what then? The curtain falls. Let me lift it. The cemetery. The throne of God. Sentence on your soul. The trumpet of resurrection. Final doom. Body and soul in hell for ever. You have no better prospect. Pray look out of the window, and see what is to be seen. The Lord have mercy upon you, and give you a better hope. As for you, believers in Christ, I charge you, begin to sing to-day the son- nets of the hereafter. Charm your pilgrim life with the minstrelsy of hope.

Edith's Ministry.

A Perilous Drive.

EDITH HURST'S LOVING MINISTRIES.

"DEAR papa, is there anything I can do for you? Nothing would make me happier than to relieve or comfort you." So said a gentle girl, whose soft and musical voice fell on the ear of Mr. John Hurst, as he sat one evening in no enviable state of body or mind, in a roomy, old-fashioned easy chair, in which, however, he found there was no ease for him. Every position seemed painful. His medicine, he complained, did him no good; his nerves were frightfully sensitive, he could neither eat nor sleep. Having had an iron constitution, and been accustomed to active life, this enforced retirement was irksome to him. He looked the very picture of wretchedness, and well he might, for neither memory nor hope could solace him now.

For thirty years he had been a hard and unscrupulous money-lender, eagerly grasping at every advantage, and making it his one object to accumulate wealth. To attain that object he had risen early and sat up late, worried himself with countless cares, and undergone all sorts of privations. Health, ease, social enjoyment, conscience, reputation, had all been sacrificed to mammon. And now there began to dawn upon the mind of John Hurst the fact that wealth, to him who cannot enjoy it, is but an encumbrance, which adds to care and makes pain more painful. Querulous, irritable, and hard to please, his mind was out of harmony with itself and with all around him. Even Edith, with all her filial patience and forbearance, found her powers of endurance taxed to the uttermost in her attempts to give effect to the promptings of her love. Still she held on to the hope that a favorable change might reward her efforts, and prayed especially that the bodily illness of her father might lead to his spiritual welfare. Inspired by this hope and by the beautiful instincts which it deepened and intensified, Edith's devoted watchfulness might well remind the observer of Sir Walter Scott's lines:

> "When pain and anguish wring the brow.
> A ministering angel, thou;"

adding, as it did, another to the already innumerable proofs of woman's pre-eminence in scenes of affliction, where she is so often God's chosen instrument for good after all other instruments have failed.

The most valuable service that can be rendered to any man is to bring home to him the existence and the power of real love. Without this he may be orthodox as an apostle, and hard as granite; "deep read in books and shallow in himself," possessed of much, and worth nothing. That priceless service Edith Hurst rendered to her father. He could find no comfort in reflection, no refuge in anticipation. The angry faces of clients, whom his exhorbitance had enraged, rose before him. Many a long-forgotten act of heartlessness came forth from its grave and stared him in the face with all its native ghastliness and deformity. He was literally haunted by the ghosts of his ill-deeds, until he shuddered alternately at the terrible isolation in which his selfishness had placed him, and at the more terrible visitations that disturbed his solitude.

Then it was that, weak, helpless, and despairing, he was won by the love of Edith's heart. He said to himself, "I have cared for nobody, and yet this dear girl cares for me. I have given her rebuffs and petulance, and complaints and surliness, and still she attends me, at all hours, with as much love as if I had done nothing but good all my days." As these thoughts rose within him, the tears filled his eyes, and he was fairly broken down. Edith watched the change with an interest that no words could express, and it was her daily endeavor to make her father feel—what she felt so profoundly—that love, so far as it is pure and real, is a divine thing—a thing of which it is the very purpose and design to lead the soul up to Him who is its Fountain—to Him whose name is Love, whose nature is love, whose providence is love's foresight, whose beneficence is love's bounty, whose almightiness is love's energy, whose universe is love's realm, whose eternity is love's measure and perpetuity. That great thought had literally taken possession of Edith's heart, and she gave herself no rest until her father, with joy unspeakable, saw what she saw, and felt what she felt.

The simple apprehension of God's love in Christ, and the trust of the soul in the love so manifested, brought to his troubled spirit perfect peace and unclouded joy.

Health of soul soon did what the doctors had been unable to do—restored the invalid to health of body. In the new-found happiness which filled the heart of John Hurst, his uppermost thought was: "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me?" He saw that gratitude to God could best be shown by justice and kindness to man. He recompensed many whom he had wronged; he gave largely in charity of that part of his income which he could honestly regard as his own; and when he died many years afterward he left to Edith all that remained, with the assurance that in her hands it would be turned to the best account, and held in trust for Him to whom the gold and the silver belong.

A PERILOUS DRIVE.

THE claims of Australia on the energies of Christians, and especially of Christian ministers, were pressed very earnestly some thirty years ago by returned emigrants. It was represented that large districts of the country were wholly without the means of grace, and in others the services were irregular and were often for months together omitted because no minister could be secured.

Mr. John Bunyan McCure was among those whose hearts were moved by this recital. He was the minister of a small church in which he labored with but slight success. He had a large family, and the remuneration his people were able to give him was so small that it barely sufficed for food and clothing, and he often grieved that his children could not have the advantages of even the poorest education. Gradually the thought of emigrating to Australia took possession of his mind, and having committed the matter in prayer to God, he decided on the momentous step. The way was opened for him to make the voyage with his family free of cost, and bidding adieu to his congregation and friends, he set out to begin life afresh under southern skies.

On his arrival, however, he was disappointed to find that for his proposed labors as a minister of the Gospel he had no opportunity, that those to whom he expected to have ministered had caught the gold-fever, which had recently broken out, and had gone to the far-distant "bush."

But Mr. McCure was not a man to be easily daunted. Nerved by the thought of his family, he accepted one of the humblest of occupations, from which, by dint of downright energy and perseverance, he rose to a position of great influence and usefulness. But in his early experience of Australian life his privations were many, and to a man of his education and culture they were very humiliating. He was glad to work for any one who would employ him, and often those were men of ignorant and brutal manners who imposed on him very uous labors. These would not dare to use, lest he should discharged, and his e and family be left starve.

n one occasion, when y partially recovered n a severe illness, employer requested to take the mail the country, a dis- ce of ninety miles. e roads were in an ul state, and many he creeks so flooded t they could only be ssed by swimming.

I am not sufficient- ecovered," said Mr. Cure. "I am not ng enough. If I it, I should never ch my destination." hen go and get the er," he angrily re- d, "from the Bar- n." The Barwon er was one mile dis- . "I put the horse," Mr. McCure, "in- he water-cart, and ted off. But the e walked too fast for me; I was obliged to get he top of the cart; but, in consequence of the ful state of the roads, and the cart having no ngs, I was fearfully shaken. After a while I ght sight of the river, and also an immense y before me, which I had to go round before I d come to it; it was a deep ravine between the l and the river. It was a fearfully hot day; and ctly the horse saw the water he pricked up his and started off in a direct line for the river, ead of skirting the ravine. I tried all I could to him out into the road, with one hand pressed n my aching side and the other pulling at the s, but I had not sufficient strength.

With what seemed like superhuman energy I aged to keep the cart up to the side, with one el crushing the edge of the ravine for over one dred yards. I was mercifully delivered from g turned over with the horse and cart down mbankment. I drove to the water in a faint- condition; and, when somewhat recovered, menced pumping the water into the cask, at vals dashing it into my face, to prevent me fainting. At last I succeeded in filling the and, in great suffering and pain, managed to h home, and was put to bed, fully believing I ld never rise again. But God was merciful to for in the morning I felt much better, and was led to resume my duties."

DR. BONAR AT THE NORTHFIELD CONFERENCE.

The Coming of the Lord.

THE Lord's coming was the theme taken up at the Believers' Bible Conference, Northfield, Mass., on Friday, August 19th. At the morning meeting for prayer in the Seminary it was proposed that believers should briefly mention texts and passages which had been the means of specially fixing their attention on the premillennial coming. One rose and said that 1 Cor. 1 : 5–7 had guided him: "Ye come behind in no good gift, waiting for the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ." Another spoke of having been led to inquire by hearing the translation of Enoch preached upon as a type of the translation of the living saints.

Another referred to the 24th chapter of Matthew as a portion of Scripture that conclusively settled the question of the premillennial coming, and mentioned how he had been led by it to see that all was trouble and tribulation till the Lord comes in glory. Another said that he had drunk in this truth from his spiritual infancy, and had never thought of any other view as agreeing with the plain words of Scripture. Another spoke of having been led to study Acts 1 : 8, and Christ's words about Noah's days being the type of what is to precede the millennium.

At the usual meeting for conference in the afternoon from Glasgow, entered into the subject at some length. He said: "Let us look at the contrasts found in the first and the second coming. The sign of the Son of man at His first coming (Luke 2 : 12) was, 'Ye shall find a babe in swaddling clothes, in an inn, in the manger of the inn,'—feebleness, helplessness, obscurity, neglect. Whereas the sign of His second coming is to be 'the clouds of heaven,' 'bright clouds,' 'great power,' 'great glory' (Mark 13 : 26, etc.).

"Another contrast is 'Behold the man,' in Pilate's hall, with 'Behold, He cometh,' on that day. Again, they 'bowed the knee' to Him in mockery; but 'every knee shall bow' to Him then. Then there are the crown of thorns and the reed for a sceptre, to be contrasted with the many crowns and the rod of iron (Rev. 19 : 12, 15).

"In the next place let us notice that that day will be to Christ Himself a day of supreme delight (Song. 4 : 6; Rev. 22 : 20). It is indeed 'the joy of the Lord' into which His saints shall enter.

"Now we may see how many graces and duties are enjoined on believers under the shadow of this great motive, the Lord's coming. There may be patience, there may be labor, there may be liberality, there may be diligence, there may be special holiness; this thought, 'the Lord is at hand,' enforces all. Then again, the Lord's appearing will be sudden; 'as a thief,' 'as a snare,' 'in an hour ye think not.'

"But let me more specially impress this fact, that there can be no millennium till Christ returns. For it is written that Israel has no rest till then (Matt. 24 : 21–29); the Gentiles have none till then (Luke 21 : 25–27); creation at large has none (Rom. 8 : 19–22); the Church of Christ can have full rest only then, 'the rest that remaineth' (2 Thess. 1 : 7; Heb. 4 : 9); for Antichrist is only then destroyed and only then is earth without a devil (Rev. 20 : 1).

"In conclusion I will say that I think the fear of some believers regarding that day is an entire mistake. For the full sight of Christ our Priest coming back to lift up His pierced hands in blessing will at once dispel all doubt, and the smile of ineffable love toward His own will render all fear impossible. It will be as true of dread and doubt as of sin—

"'One look of Jesus as He is Will strike all fear for ever dead.'"

A THRILLING SIGHT AT A FIRE.

YEARS ago the superb Sailors' Home in Liverpool, that was the pride of that commercial city, took fire at midnight, and the flames kindling very high, attracted thousands to the spot. When the crowd reached it, the building was already enveloped in flames, and they said, "Oh! everybody is out—it must burn. Let it go; it can't be saved." But by-and-bye there appeared through the smoke on the fourth story four arms thrust out of the windows, and two pale faces behind them.

Half a dozen gallant blue-jackets from one of her Majesty's ships in the Mersey, said, "Give us a ladder; we will save these men." The foremost of them climbed the ladder amid the smoke, but only came within ten or twelve feet of the outstretched hands. Again the shriek of horror ran through the crowd, and they cried, "Pass up another ladder." They sent up a short ladder, but that didn't reach by a foot or two. What did the sailor do? He lifted the ladder upon his shoulders, and grasping the casement firmly, the two men left the window, climbed over the ladder, over the stout burly man, down to the street, and were received with the huzzas of the rejoicing multitude. What did the man do? Simply this—added his own length to the length of the ladder; that is all. Would you save that young man you know to be in danger? Add the length of your own example to the length of the ladder to save the poor and the degraded. When poor humanity was to be saved from perdition, the Divine Lord of glory descended to earth, and by His personal suffering provided a ladder of hope, rescue, and salvation. Blessed Saviour, if Thou wouldst give Thyself for the tempted and the dying, teach us how to be self-denying for others' sakes, that we may save them for Thy glory.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

A New Home.

RUTH closed her eyelids, and lay still, breathing heavily and fitfully; while all around her her old neighbors looked on in mournful silence.

"He's long in coming," she murmured at last, "and it's growing dark, very dark. It's time to sing, 'Glory to Thee;' it 'll cheer him, maybe, wherever he is. Only I can't begin."

"She wishes us to sing 'Glory to Thee,'" said Mrs. Clift, looking round at the circle of grave and sorrowful faces surrounding them; "she says it will cheer Ishmael; and it will, if he can only catch a distant sound of it. Some of you belong to the choir; please start it, for I cannot."

Her voice was broken and low; and for the first two or three lines the hymn was sung very tremulously by the villagers. But Ruth's eyes brightened, and a smile broke over her gray and withered face, as the familiar strain and the old words reached her dull ear. Her lips moved, and now and then the feeble whispering of a word or two was heard by the schoolmistress. But when the "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow" had been sung in a loud, clear, hearty chorus of every voice, there came, in the silence that followed, a sound as of an echo repeating it in the winding galleries of the old quarry. Ruth lifted up her head, and with sudden strength raised herself to her feet, and leaned against the opening to listen.

"I can hear him," she said, joyously, "and I shall see him again! I bid him go, for I was afeard he hadn't forgiven Nutkin; but my heart went with him. He's the only one of 'em all as cares for their old mother; it's the way of young folks," she added, as if to excuse them herself; "but Ishmael was loth to leave me, for fear I should die afore he got back. But I'm here, Ishmael, my lad; I'm close beside thee. Thee and me 'ull see each other again."

She sank back slowly to the ground; and the neighbors gathered round her again. She was only a poor old, toiling woman, for years well known to them all, and little thought of; but there was not one of them who did not grieve for her, or say to themselves how they could have made her hard life a little easier for her. Nutkin knelt down beside her, and his red, sunburnt face looked more full of life and health than ever, beside her thin, pinched, pallid features.

"Ruth, forgive me!" he said. "I'd rather have had my right hand shot off, if I'd ha' known it before. It were my wicked hatred as did it. I'd h'a winked at any other lad robbing a pheasant 's nest; but I hated the very name o' Medway."

"I never thought myself as there were anything to forgive," she answered. "It's the law, I know; and the justices are wise men. But Ishmael couldn't forgive it, not till now."

But before any one could speak again, there came a shout through the narrow opening, and the sound of a child's voice calling "Father."

Ruth lifted up her head again, and turned her smiling face to the opening.

"He's coming," she said. "God is very good to us."

Yet a few minutes passed away, long, slow minutes, before they could hear Ishmael's footsteps, and his voice speaking gently to the child, who was chattering back again, as if he felt no fear of him, or of the strange place they were in. Very soon the child's tear-stained face was seen crawling back through the archway; yet no one stirred or spoke but Nutkin, who caught his boy in his arms, and hushed him into silence. Ishmael was coming back; and his old mother was leaning forward with her eager, dying face, waiting to see him once more. The lad crept out slowly and reluctantly, unwilling to face so many of his old neighbors, and anxious to get away out of sight. His dazzled eyes saw nothing but a cluster of faces about him; and he did not perceive his mother until her feeble voice broke the utter silence which astonished and affrighted him.

"Ishmael!" she called.

"Mother!" he cried, in a loud, shrill tone of surprise and gladness, as he flung himself upon the earth beside her, and put his arm about her, drawing her head down upon his breast.

"I couldn't keep away," she murmured, "and God helped me to come. Be good, Ishmael. God sees us every one, always. I shall watch for thee on the door-sill—to come into the Father's house—boldly—where He's gone to prepare a place—and then we'll be at home again—with Him."

The words dropped slowly, one by one, from the failing lips which were growing stiff with death; and the bright light in her sunken eyes flickered and died out. But there was still a faint, patient smile on the wrinkled face, and as Ishmael called to her for the last time, in a voice of bitter grief and loneliness, she tried to raise her head, and look again into her boy's face. "Ishmael," she whispered, "because the Lord has heard thy affliction."

It was a solemn and almost speechless procession that marched thourgh the midnight woods, waking up the sleeping birds in their nests, and frightening timid rabbits in their burrows. The moon shone down from the cloudless sky, filling the open spaces with a white light, but deepening the shadows where the hazel bushes grew thickest. Elsie walked beside Ishmael with her hand in his; remembering, oh! how keenly, that day five years ago, which had laid the foundation-stone of all his sorrow.

But beyond the present sadness there shone a bright hope in the future, though he could not at this moment catch its light. Only a few days, and she and her mother were going to sail for America; and now, when Ishmael had seen his mother's feeble worn-out body laid in the old churchyard, he would be free to go with them, and begin his new life in a new country.

They found old Humphrey lying in a drunken sleep on the damp floor of the hut, at the foot of the ladder, which he had not been able to climb up; and they had to drag him on one side to carry their burden to its resting-place in the loft overhead. He was an old man, with his brain softened and soddened with drink, and he could not be made to understand what had happened, or be persuaded to let Ishmael remain even for a few hours in his old home.

It was only now and then, when his father was away during the few days that intervened before the funeral, that he could steal in to look at his mother's calm and placid face, from which the wrinkles, graved sharply on it by many troubles, seemed almost smoothed away. But every house in the parish was open to him, the castaway who had been driven from his home, and thrown upon the world. He followed his mother to the grave, and stood for the last time amid his father and brothers. There was a whole crowd of villagers and neighbors gathered about the grave; and Nutkin was there, with the little boy whom Ishmael had sought and found in the windings of the old quarry.

"I'd like to shake hands with all the Medways," said Nutkin, as the crowd began to melt away, "and let bygones be bygones. And, Ishmael, the squire bid me say, is there nothing as he can do for you; nothing as 'ud make it worth your while to stay at home, 'stead o' going to America?"

"Nothin'," answered Ishmael; "there's no home for me now mother's gone. It was home, sweet home, and I shall never have another."

But ten years after, when Ishmael came back to England, not to stay, but only to visit the old place, he had made a home for himself, with Elsie in it for his wife. He owned a farm of his own, and was prospering in every way. He found the old hut fallen into ruins, for his father had died in the workhouse the year after he had left England; and no one had lived in the desolate hovel since. The old door-sill was there yet, though the thatched roof had long ago mouldered away; and he could almost fancy he saw his mother sitting there, and looking out for him. The trees behind the ruins tossed their green branches in the wind, and the blue sky, flecked with clouds, shone above them, as in the bygone days. There were the old pleasant sounds, the song of the birds, and the hum of insects, and the rustling of myriads of leaves; but still it was no more home. His mother, who had made this poor hut a home for him, was no longer there.

"I remember," said Elsie, softly, with her hand in his, "how she said, 'I shall watch for thee on the door-sill, to come into the Father's house, boldly, where He's gone to prepare a place; and you and me 'll be at home again, with Him.'"

THE END.

In the next Number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will appear the first chapter of a New Serial Story by Hesba Stretton entitled Cobwebs and Cables.

"STRANGE FOOTSTEPS."

IN a work under the above title, by Rev. Charles Kendall, the new President of the British Primitive Methodist Conference, whose portrait appeared in our last week's issue, the following remarkable incidents are related:

THE STING OF A FLY.

In the last century a clergyman of considerable note preached, on taking possession of his living at a certain place, with such earnestness and power, that a great deal of excitement was created, and his church was crowded. One man, however, an innkeeper, who was fearfully addicted to drunkenness and blasphemy, swore he would never go to hear him; but, some time afterward, on learning that the singing was remarkably good, he, being fond of vocal music, went to the service with a view of hearing the singing, declaring, at the same time that he would not hear a word of the sermon. When the hymn had been sung, he placed his fingers in his ears during the prayer before the sermon, to keep out the sound, and kept them in when the text was announced.

The minister, however, had not proceeded far in his sermon, before a large fly alighted on the innkeeper's face, and stung it sharply; this made him hastily withdraw one finger from one ear, to drive the assailant away, when by a curious coincidence, as it would generally be called, the clergyman was pronouncing these words, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." The man's attention was arrested by the sentence, so singularly appropriate, and he determined to listen to a few sentences. By-and-by, the finger was withdrawn from the other ear; and he heard with deep attention all the rest of the sermon. From that day he became a new man, and at last died rejoicing in hope, and blessing God that he had employed one of the meanest of His creatures to open his ears to hear words whereby he might be saved.

THE WIDOW'S PRAYER ANSWERED.

While stationed at North Shields, a friend of Mr. Kendall enjoyed very much an occasional visit to an old member of the Primitive Church in that town called Mrs. T——, a poor widow, who supported herself by washing and kept out of debt. One time her daughter was at home with her, out of health, and at the same time she was herself afflicted with a bad knee. She was confined to bed through it, and her scanty stock of provisions ran short. One morning at breakfast-time, as she lay in bed, she asked her daughter to look into the cupboard and see what they had left. The daughter reported that there was just one potato and a spoonful of tea. There was not a single coin in the house to buy anything with, and Mrs. T—— had a conscientious objection against running into debt or purchasing anything on credit.

Having now nothing left, and no money where with to procure anything, she felt she had good grounds for an appeal to heaven. In her distress she offered this prayer, "O Lord, dispose some kind Christian friend to help us this day." This prayer she kept on repeating at intervals from hour to hour. With great difficulty she rose from her bed, and resting her knee on a chair, contrived to finish some clothes which had been washed. No help came and no relief. There was no dinner for either mother or daughter, and the same petition had still to be urged.

About three o'clock in the afternoon there was a knock at the door, and Mrs. T—— called "Come in," and in walked a daughter of Alderman M——, a benevolent Christian lady, well known to her, who finding she had been ill for some time inquired more particularly about her affliction, and then gave her five shillings. Mrs. T—— burst into tears on receiving the gift, and exclaimed, "And so my prayer has been answered."

This led to further inquiries and explanations, in the course of which the visitor said, "You do gladden my heart, Mrs. T——. I was going into the town to make some purchases, having no thought of coming to see you, when all at once, something seemed to say to me, 'Go see Mrs. T——.' I did not see why I should come, and so I went to buy what I wanted; but when I was returning, the same impression that I must call to see you came on me again; and since you have been praying for some Christian friend to be sent, I may conclude that I'm the Lord's messenger sent in answer to your prayer. And now," added the lady, with tearful countenance, "let me beseech you, if ever you are in want in future, to let me know."

FREE GIVING.

S. S. Lesson for October 2. Exod. 35 : 20–35. Golden Text, 2 Cor. 9 : 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE subject of giving is one of the utmost practical importance, and we implore the special wisdom of God that we may treat of it in the spirit of Christ and to the glory of God. Our golden text says with regard to giving, "Let each man do according as he hath purposed in his heart; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver" (Revised Version). The Old Testament rule of giving was an enforced tithe, under the New Covenant rule law is done away with, the law is written on the heart, and the giving will be in proportion to the purpose of that heart that Christ shall be Proprietor and King. In exactly that degree in which I recognize the Lord Jesus as my Owner and myself as His property, just so far shall I devote myself and all I am, and all which I possess, to Him and to His service. The question will not be, "How much can I spare from my own necessities, desires, habits of life, etc., for Him and for His cause," but, "How can all my necessities and habits of life be brought so to work together for His glory, that I may use no moment and no penny which I cannot say is spent for Him? With the privilege of living for, and giving to, such a Master, how can I afford to spend anything only for myself?"

We must be clear about one thing, that the value of giving does not consist in the value of the thing given; a cup of cold water given in the name of a disciple shall in no wise lose its reward, the two mites of the poor widow were a richer offering than the munificent gifts of richer donors. "For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not" (2 Cor. 8 : 12). This is clearly in condemnation of such as give money to the work of God while they are owing money to their creditors; such are guilty of giving away other people's money, this must be in God's sight sheer dishonesty. The real root of such giving is not the "willing mind," but the fear of being thought mean, or perhaps of being thought poor; it is ministering to an untrue and unreal position, a semblance and not a reality.

The chapter from which our subject is taken, treats of the time immediately after Moses' second descent from Mount Sinai, when the reflection of the face of God so cast its lustre upon him, that no eye of man could bear its glory, and he was obliged to cover his face when he spoke to the people. After enforcing the observance of the Sabbath, he said to the congregation, "This is the thing which the Lord commanded, saying, Take work of the Tabernacle of the congregation, and for all His service, and for the holy garments." "The Lord's offering" because He had expressed His willingness to accept it, not the people's offering, as though the thought had originated with them. The offering must be the product of a heart which stirred up the donor, and of a will which corresponded. In giving, the heart and not the head comes into play. How often have some of us felt stirred up to do some generous thing, and the heart has made a strong appeal to the will, but the will, instead of an instant surrender, has called in the counsel of the head, and then calculations began. "How much will this cost me? how far will it influence such and such things which I propose to do? Am I called upon to make so much sacrifice? Is not the half enough? I will sleep a night over it." In the morning the half has become a quarter, because the head which God did not call into counsel has been usurping a place which God gave to the heart, and perhaps a precious opportunity of giving has passed irrecoverably away.

Let us not forget the solemn words in Lev. 27. "If it be a beast, whereof men bring an offering unto the Lord, all that any man giveth of such unto the Lord shall be holy. He shall not alter it, nor change it, a good for a bad, or a bad for a good: and if he shall at all change beast for beast, then it and the exchange thereof shall be holy . . . . Every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. . . . And concerning the tithe . . . . [a man] shall not search whether it be good or bad (no calculations for his own interest), neither shall he change it; and if he change it at all, then both it and the change thereof, shall be holy: it shall not be redeemed." So holy does God hold all which we have given unto Him, even by a purpose of our hearts, it must not be changed, and cannot be redeemed. One more Scripture on this head. "When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for He hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed. Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay" (Eccl. 5 : 4, 5).

The offerings of the children of Israel for the work of the Tabernacle were diverse. "Bracelets, earrings, rings, tablets, and every man an offering of gold, then blue, purple, scarlet, fine linen, goats' hair, etc., etc. But there was another order of offering altogether: some of the women were poor and had nothing to bring; would the Lord accept their work? Yes, indeed, "All the women that were wise hearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine linen. And all the women whose heart stirred them up in wisdom spun goats' hair." Imagine the activity in the camp of Israel, the spinning wheels which were brought into requisition, the children employed in picking and cleaning the goats' hair, the dyeing and weaving, the searching out jewelry and cleaning it, and the one solemn, joyous sound heard in every house, "It is for the Lord." Carpenters, silversmiths, forgers, oil pressers, all were employed, and the whole camp must have been thrown into one busy scene of industry. "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20 : 35); the children of Israel were tasting of this blessedness.

There is contained in our subject a precious indication how thoroughly the work of our earthly calling, when it is done in the true spirit of consecration, may be both of God and for God. Moses called the attention of the children of Israel to the fact that God had called by name Bezaleel and had filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, in [illegible]anding, and in knowledge, and in all manner workmanship. It is a common idea that Spirit of God may empower a man to under- and the Bible, to speak for God, to write on holy subjects, and all such things; but most people repudiate the idea that working in gold, in silver, and in brass, that cutting of stones and carving of wood, need the power and guidance of His Spirit when done in obedience to the call of God.

Our God is a Father, knowing and feeling all the needs of His children, our lives in His eyes are not divided into religious and secular, but into self and Christ. The stamp of Christ is perceptible when a man of business gladly renounces an advantage to which he is legally entitled, because for some reason the glory of God would suffer loss. When a Christian woman, whose income had been derived from the beer trade, although not herself engaged in it, was willing rather to suffer loss, to renounce all the comforts she had been used to for many years, and take a situation rather than touch the unclean thing, even when no one but God knew her connection with it, the mark of Christ was upon it. When a man is ready to face ruin rather than to pursue his business on the unchristian principles which obtain in the present day, regarding his connection with commerce as a trust which he holds under the guidance of the Spirit of God, the mark of Christ is on such a business. Let every Christian man of business work under the unction and direction of God's Holy Spirit, that a standard for Christ may be raised in commerce to the glory of God.

"And He hath put in his heart that he may teach." What a precious truth for teachers and for such as have apprentices. To many minds nothing is so difficult as to impart knowledge to others, but this also the Spirit of God is ready to put in our hearts, whether the instruction be of a spiritual, an intellectual, a mechanical, a scientific nature, or whether it be in embroidery or other work with the needle, nothing is beneath the notice of our loving God. And all this is connected with our subject of Free Giving; for all which is done unto the Lord is given unto Him. The early Christians lived such a life of self-renouncement that none of them said of aught of the things which he possessed that it was his own, but they had all things common. And even in the time of Hezekiah, when the hearts of the people of Judah had been warmed by a blessed revival of religion, so numerous were the offerings which were given out of hearts made warm by the grace of God, that they "laid them by heaps" (2 Chr. 31 : 6). If this was only the tithes, the tenth part of their possessions, how great a time might there be, if Christians used their great privilege of giving all and holding nothing more to be their own!

THE ITALIAN BRIGAND AND THE LEAFLET.

AN Italian evangelist recently related the following incident which occurred in Leghorn: In the summer a rather striking-looking stranger was observed to come frequently as a listener to the school which is taught by Signor S—, both on Sundays and in the week. On the 24th of September, while Signor S— was concluding with prayer, in which he asked that even "the greatest sinners might be saved and receive the full pardon of their sins," he was interrupted by the sound of violent weeping, so that he could not continue to pray. Upon this a conversation ensued, and the stranger said he wept because he could not believe that it was possible to be saved by simple faith in Christ.

After explaining to him the Gospel way of salvation a little further, the school was dismissed, and the same evening the stranger came to speak to Signor S— at his own house, when he related that he had in earlier life murdered his cousin, a priest; he had then betaken himself to the career of a brigand in the south of Italy, and had committed so much wickedness that he doubted the possibility of being saved. One day, as he was passing by the little old chapel, he picked up one of the R. K. leaflets, entitled—"Come to Jesus."

This tiny leaflet proved to be the means used by God of leading this great sinner to seek a great Saviour. A pupil of the school lent him some evangelical books, and explained to him that these leaflets are distributed every Sunday to all the children who can read, to be learned by heart for repetition in the school.

This led to his going to hear the instruction given by Signor S—, who has good hope that this man, once a brigand, is now converted to the faith of Christ and His Gospel.

"In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The National Land League Convention Assembled in Dublin September 15th. Over twelve hundred delegates were present, among whom were twenty-one members of Parliament and many Roman Catholic priests. Considerable sensation was caused by the reading of several telegrams threatening stoppage of supplies from America unless a policy of "No rent, no compromise with landlordism" were adopted. The impression produced by these threatening communications was painful in its character, though very little reference was publicly made to this unpleasant incident. Many more intelligent delegates expressed privately their indignation at the attempt made by a section of the Irish-American organization to "boss" the Irish people.

After a prolonged discussion, which ran over two days, the delegates were induced to give the Land Bill a trial. The Executive Committee were empowered to select certain cases and bring them before the arbitration court as test cases, to ascertain the value of the Act to the tenants. It was, however, the prevalent feeling that the Land Bill, if accepted, would destroy the power of the League. On the other hand, if it were rejected, many tenants would desert the League in order to secure the advantages offered by the Bill.

The veil was dropped by the leaders when the following resolution was proposed and adopted: "That this Convention declares that no settlement of the land question can be satisfactory, no effect practicable, which does not abolish landlordism, root and branch, and make the tiller also the owner of the soil; that the Land Act cannot be accepted as just or wise, still less as a final, settlement of the question; that its radical insufficiency and many defects, prevent it from being regarded as even a temporary remedy of a satisfactory character; that this Convention binds itself to maintain the same solid combination against landlordism which has worked such magnificent results in the past two years."

The Czar of Russia is Believed to Have Attended the imperial conference mentioned last week, principally for the purpose of consulting the Emperor of Germany and Prince Bismarck on the subject of the Nihilist plots against his life. The difficulties of the Czar's position are almost insuperable. The Prince of Wales is said to have thus described one of them. The prince said: "When I stood in the Church of St. Petersburg on the memorable day when the funeral ceremonies of the late Czar took place, I never felt so uncomfortable in my life. I wondered whether the entire structure might not be blown up, and whether mines were not laid under our feet to blow us all into eternity. In St. Petersburg I first gained a clear idea of the terrible situation in which Alexander found himself. The Czar has no less than 600 aides-de-camp. To begin such reforms as the nihilists wish, the Czar must first dismiss most of these and thousands besides, and every person thus dismissed from the court would become an enemy quite as dangerous as the individual nihilists. Even the nihilists themselves do not know the difficulties of the Czar's position, desirous as he is of promoting the interests of the empire and of the people committed to his care."

The Arrangement Forced on the Khedive of Egypt last week by his army, is regarded by Europeans in Egypt as merely temporary. The Khedive was at the mercy of his troops, even his own body guard having joined the insurgents. At the dictation of the leader Araby Bey, the Khedive dismissed his chief minister and appointed in his place Cherif Pacha, a man of little ability, who has made himself popular by his hatred of foreigners. The Khedive's financial affairs have latterly been managed by the representatives of England and France resident at Cairo. These gentlemen have acted in the interest of the creditors of Egypt, and have by economy and honest collection of revenue succeeded in extricating the finances from their former hopeless condition. They proposed to reduce the army, which did not maintain order and could not repel foreign invasion if it were attempted. It is expensive, useless, and as it now appears, dangerous to public tranquillity. The soldiers, therefore, have risen in alarm, with the avowed object of liberating the Khedive from foreign control. It is plain that foreign intervention will be required to control the army, or the bondholders will lose their money, and the Suez Canal will be closed against foreign ships. It is uncertain what England may do, but it is of vital importance to her to protect the Suez Canal, and she may, therefore, undertake the duty of armed interference. It is thought probable that Lord Beaconsfield foresaw the difficulty when he arranged to occupy Cyprus, which is little more than 200 miles from the Egyptian coast.

The Cotton Corner in England is Being fought by the spinners, but the real sufferers in the struggle are the operatives who are thrown out of employment. Tens of thousands of hands have already been discharged, and every day adds to the number. The corner was originally formed by Mr. Morriss Ranger, a large speculator of Liverpool. Last year and this spring he bought up all the cotton he could lay his hands on at ten and twelve cents a pound, and has now advanced the price to fifteen cents. This represents a ruinous loss to the largest cotton spinners. They believe that by stopping their spindles the corner can be broken down, but it is thought by those who know the circumstances that the result of the struggle is doubtful, and that it will be fought with obstinacy. Meanwhile there will be great suffering. At Oldham alone, wages to the amount of $100,000 a week have been stopped. If this continues there must be great misery and probaby serious disturbances in the cotton districts.

An English Land Bill will, it Seems Probable, be demanded at an early date, of similar provisions to that of the Irish Land Bill. The correspondent of a New York journal thus describes the situation: "The immense amount of damages that the rain of last month has done to the English crops must be followed by some alteration in the condition of the landlords, the tenants, and the laborers. For some time past the wages of the last named have been reduced to almost the starvation point. Each year since 1871 has brought the tenant farmer nearer to bankruptcy, and the harvest of 1881 will complete his fall. It is clear, therefore, that these two classes can be brought no lower in the scale of poverty, and it follows that the landlord will have to give up a considerable part of his income. For centuries the land has been sufficiently prolific to support these three classes. It has recently ceased to do so, and the result is inevitable."

The average rate of pay now received by an English farm laborer does not exceed two dollars a week. Out of this he has to pay rent for his cottage and support his family, which often includes eight children.

A Distinguished Convert from Roman Catholicism.—A telegram from Venice, in Italy, says that Count Henrico Campello, the archpriest of the Basilica of St. Peter, in Rome, has publicly abjured Catholicism and entered the little Methodist church in the Piazza Poli. He read a discourse on the occasion, embodying his various reasons for leaving the Church of Rome, conspicuous among which were his objections to a church which prevented a man from expressing sentiments toward his country and government which a patriot should cherish. The high position, social and ecclesiastical, of Count Campello, causes his abjuration to produce an immense sensation in Catholic circles.

A Journey on Floating Ice is thus Described by Mr. A. Hlavatschek, the Moravian missionary at Hebron, Labrador: "At the beginning of March, 1880, a company of nineteen Esquimaux men and boys were walrus-hunting on the ice found the considerable distance from the shore, when had died in lent storm suddenly broke upon them, England; strong a ground swell that a large piece since. which they were, was separated from the [illegible] mass, and carried out to sea! No one observed would what had occurred until it was too late to retreat. and Tidings of the terrible accident soon reached us, ruins and caused terrible distress; but the huge cakes the of ice which were tossing wildly about rendered them, any attempt to rescue them hopeless. In our trouble we had recourse to God. In the huts of the natives as well as in our house, many prayers were offered up that night. By noon of the next day it was reported that some men had been seen on a rock about twenty miles off; but communication between us and them was impossible. Three days later, drift ice came from the north, by means of which the whole company was able to reach the firm shore-ice and return home. While imprisoned on the island, they had succeeded in catching a walrus, which had provided all with sufficient food.

Another Fatal Landslip in Switzerland.—A despatch from Berne says that a landslip occurred last week near the village of Elm, Canton Glarus. Two hundred persons were killed and thirty houses destroyed, The London Standard's Geneva despatch says that the government has sent troops to Elm to render assistance.

In India, Under the Governor Generalship of the Roman Catholic nobleman appointed by Mr. Gladstone, several missionaries were arrested for preaching in the streets of Calcutta. They have recently been tried before the local courts of Calcutta, and unanimously acquitted. The prosecutor was the commissioner of police, who is an English Roman Catholic; the court included two Christians, one Mohammedan, and one Hindoo, while among the lawyers that defended the missionaries were two educated Hindoos, one of them a Mohammedan.

An Alarming Outbreak of Typhoid Fever has taken place at Mr. Müller's Orphanage, Bristol, where there are upwards of two thousand children. They are distributed in five houses, and the outbreak is confined to No. 2 house, occupied by girls, sixty of whom are affected, some of the cases being of a very serious character. The water supply is obtained from two wells on the premises, and it is feared that the water has become contaminated. Mr. Müller himself is evangelizing on the continent of Europe, and the prayers of our readers are asked both for him and for the orphanage in this its hour of trouble.

Insanity Treated by Prayer.—A Spanish schoolmaster of Barcelona, has just been received in the Cottage Hospital, in that city, by Mr. G. Lawrence, who says of his patient: "I have received a poor schoolmaster, who has gone out of his mind on account of the misery he has suffered through the government not paying him his salary for the past three years. The priest of the village has also greatly helped to bring him to this condition through his intolerance." Mr. Lawrence says: "We believe prayer will be answered for him. Our children sang 'the old, old story' for him. As we sat out in the cool night in our lovely garden I saw the tears rolling down his face as he turned to his wife and friend who accompanied him, and to whom, for Christ's sake, we show hospitality. He said, 'I shall be all right here. What a happy man you must be to have such a singing family. Not many families like yours in Spain, sir.' He has slept well, without restraint, and without medicine. I believe we shall see him sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind. I also believe that this case will be the means of introducing the Gospel in his mountain village."

AMONG the distinguished ministers of the Gospel in Great Britain whose fame has travelled across the Atlantic, probably Dr. Guthrie, the talented preacher of Edinburgh, Scotland, whose portrait we publish this week, was one of the most prominent. American citizens visiting the splendid capital of North Britain during the period of his ministry generally contrived to spend a Sunday there for the sake of hearing Dr. Guthrie, and once heard, his sermons were not soon forgotten. To others, who never heard him, Dr. Guthrie is well and favorably known by his works.

Thomas Guthrie was born at Brechin, Scotland, in the year 1803. Bearing the name of the famous martyr of the Covenant, he would have considered it an honor if he could have traced a relationship with him; but though he was not able to do this with certainty, the probability that he was a branch of that heroic stock had a beneficial influence on his life, determining him to uphold, at all hazards, the truths for which the great Guthrie suffered.

His father was a merchant at Brechin, and was for some years Provost of the town. He was a worthy, godly man, but it was from his mother that Thomas inherited the finest features of his mind and character. He never forgot what he owed to her influence, and when eminent and honored as a leader in the Christian and philanthropic movements of his time, said, "It was at my mother's knees that I first learned to pray; that I learned to form a reverence for the Bible and that I learned to regard the sanctity of the Sabbath."

Sunday was strictly observed in the home at Brechin; no worldly amusements or occupations were suffered to intrude themselves on that day. The earnest Christians at the head of the household endeavored to lead those who looked to them as examples, to observe in spirit and in outward deportment the Lord's Day. Even whistling was regarded as an indication of unbecoming levity of mind, and was accordingly forbidden, and Thomas and his brothers were accustomed to show their feeling as to the difference between the Sabbath and the fast day in point of sanctity, by indulging in one short whistle on the latter. It was no small advantage to the future preacher that many hours of the Lord's Day were spent in reading the Bible, for he then became familiar with its stirring incidents, its glowing poetry, and sublime doctrines, and had large portions of it indelibly impressed on his memory.

Though not a dunce, the lad did not show any special aptitude for study in the different schools he attended in Brechin, but he was not behind any of his companions in swimming, climbing, and other athletic exercises. In boyhood he had some one of which may be mentioned. He and a brother were at their uncle's house at Maison-dieu, about a mile from their own home. They found their uncle's gun, and not supposing that it was loaded, amused themselves by pointing it at each other, and snapping its flint-lock. The gun went off; the charge struck deep into the wall, and their boyish fun was changed to horror as they saw how near one of them had been at that moment to a terrible death.

When twelve years of age, Thomas set out, under the care of a young man who acted as his tutor, for the Edinburgh University. They had one apartment for bedroom, parlor, and study; and cultivated science, as Edinburgh students of that day often did, on oatmeal, and fresh herrings and potatoes. During some of Thomas's later sessions his younger brother lodged with him, and the mistress of the house was frequently drawn to the door of their room by what she had seldom observed in the rooms of other students, audible reading of the Scriptures, and prayer. Memories of their godly home clung to them in the great city, and they continued the household worship to which they had been accustomed from infancy.

By the death of his father the awful realities of eternity were brought near him, and he was impressed by what he saw of the power of faith in Christ to sustain the soul in nature's extremity. As this event took place just at the close of his university career, it has been well said, "His heart was awed and made tender by affliction, just when his hand was on the pulpit door."

The high position his father had held in Brechin secured for him such influence that he had the offer of one of the best livings in Scotland, but for conscientious reasons declined it. No suitable opening for ministerial work presented itself, and being in easy circumstances, he went to Paris as a student at the Sorbonne. Returning thence to Brechin, but still without a call to a church, he took temporary charge of a bank agency which had been held by his father and a deceased brother. So efficiently did he perform its duties, that one of the bank authorities said to him, "If you only preach, sir, as well as you have banked, you will be sure to succeed."

At length, in 1830, he was

of Arbirlot, a parish near to Arbroath. The manse and the church were in a ruinous condition, but Mr. Guthrie soon effected considerable improvements; and with a bright, affectionate wife by his side, healthful sea-breezes to invigorate his body, beautiful scenery to charm his eye, and pastoral duties to call out his mental powers, his Arbirlot life was very happy.

The Sabbath was a great day in the parish while Mr. Guthrie was its minister. From cottages and farm-houses in the district, and from villages miles distant, glad groups of people gathered to hear the man who was able to stir their deepest emotions, and give them thoughts to make music in their souls through the week.

His sermons were representations of evangelical truth instinct with feeling, illustrated by telling anecdotes, and by figures drawn from earth and sky and sea. As he went on from topic to topic, the faces of his rapt hearers were now in a glow of exultation, and now wet with tears. When they left the church, they were all prepared to indorse the verdict of the blacksmith, who, though a plain working-man, was regarded in the village as an authority on the subject of pulpit efficiency, when he said, after hearing Mr. Guthrie for the first time, "That's the preacher, lads; that's the preacher!"

REMOVAL TO EDINBURGH.

After seven years of successful work in Arbirlot, Mr. Guthrie was translated to the Collegiate Church of the Old Greyfriars, in Edinburgh. It was not without a pang that he left his country charge, the wooded banks, the stream of the Elliott, the cottages overshadowed by ancient trees, the manse from which he could look on the sea in its varying aspects of storm and calm, and the white sails passing to and fro. But he had not hasted to go, and had there not been a clear intimation of Providence, he would thankfully have remained in his rural parish.

Henceforth Edinburgh was his home, and its romantic features and historic glories accorded well with his imaginative spirit. He delighted in it himself, and delighted in showing it to visitors. "Ere the heart of the day," he said, "has cast a misty veil upon the rocky scene, I take a stranger, and conducting him to yonder rampart, I bid him look. Gothic towers and Grecian temples, palaces, spires, domes, monuments, and verdant gardens, picturesquely mingled, are spread out beneath his eye. Wherever he turns he finds a point of view to claim his admiration. What rare variety of hill and hollow! What happy combinations of ancient and modern architecture! Two distant ages gaze at each other across the intervening valley." But and vice in its most repulsive forms, and misery to fill the heart of the spectator with dismay, mingled strangely with those grandeurs of beetling precipice and lofty pinnacle, storied rocks and stately streets. From the first Mr. Guthrie threw himself into earnest effort for the neglected and heathenish thousands which thronged the dark wynds and alleys of this "Northern Athens." He was appalled by the wickedness and destitution which he witnessed, but he had a bright and ever deepening confidence in the power of the Gospel of Christ to transform and elevate the vilest and lowest in those foul and crowded neighborhoods.

On one occasion, looking from the George IV. Bridge on the dingy houses, the filthy street, and squalid people below, he felt sad as he contrasted the scene with the one he had left, "its singing larks, daisied pastures, decent peasants, and the grand blue sea rolling its lines of snowy breakers along the shore." While thus musing, a hand was laid upon his shoulder. Turning round, he saw Dr. Chalmers at his elbow. The great man looked on the scene, and then with enthusiasm glowing on his rugged face, and his arm raised as if in exultation, exclaimed, "A beautiful field, sir; a very fine field of operation." Mr. Guthrie applied all his powers to the culture of that field, and had the satisfaction of seeing that his labors were not in vain in the Lord.

In 1840 he took charge of

in Edinburgh, called St. John's, which had been erected in consequence of his popularity, and which became the centre of a parish bearing the same name. The building was filled as soon as opened, and people even sat on planks placed on rafters near the ventilating apertures in the roof. He believed that what reached the hearts of the people in the village would reach the hearts of the people in the city, and therefore never thought of clipping the forest-like exuberance of stirring words, which from the first characterized his sermons.

He studied the art of preaching thoroughly, but he preached in his own way. Yet he was no mere pulpit artist, caring only to fill up an hour with a succession of word-pictures, or to stir the blood of his audience with thrilling anecdotes of Scottish heroism. Picture and anecdote were made subservient to the enforcement of Christian truth, and he sought and often rejoiced in the salvation of those who heard him.

It was at this period that

was waged with volcanic energy, and found one of its foremost participants in Mr. Guthrie. He could not brook the control which the government claimed they had a right to exercise in return for the money paid to ministers, but which Dr. Guthrie and his friends regarded as "an unwarrantable and ungodly interference with the spiritual independence of the Scottish Church." Much as he loved that Church, he would not remain in it when its movements were trammelled by secular authority; and when he left his home for the General Assembly on the memorable morning of May 18th, 1843, he said to his wife, "Well, Anne, this is the last time I go out of this door a minister of an Established Church."

Mr. Guthrie was requested to travel through the country, making appeals both in public and in private for the Sustentation Fund. He accepted the task, and such was his success that in twelve months he had secured the magnificent sum of $580,000. The money was disbursed in the erection of churches and school-houses, and in building suitable manses for the ministers.

THE RAGGED-SCHOOL MOVEMENT.

But Mr. Guthrie's benevolence did not exhaust itself in efforts to provide homes for his brethren in the ministry. The condition of the starving, neglected children of Edinburgh pressed on his heart, and he meditated plans by which both to feed and educate them. Strolling one day with a friend through "the romantic scenery of the crags and green valleys round Arthur's Seat," they came near to St. Anthony's Well, and, sitting on a black stone near to it, began to talk to two boys who were there with tin [illegible]s, in the hope of getting a few coppers by drawing water for visitors. Mr. Guthrie ascertained their history, and, by way of experiment, said to them, "Would you go to school if, besides your learning, you were to get breakfast, dinner, and supper there?" One of them, with a sudden flash of the eye, leaped to his feet, and exclaimed, "Ay, will I, sir, and bring the haill land too!" but fearing that three meals were too much to expect, added, "I'll come for but my dinner, sir."

A large room under Mr. Guthrie's church was fitted with apparatus for making soup and porridge, and a number of ragged children were got together, and fed and taught there. The scheme widened, and in a year there were three ragged schools in Edinburgh, with an attendance of two hundred and sixty-five children. In furtherance of his object Mr. Guthrie published his "Plea for Ragged Schools," which touched many hearts, and was the cause of good even in distant regions. In 1848 a Barbadian merchant visited Scotland, and was taking back with him goods worth $10,000. He was wrecked on one of the West Indian Islands, and all his property was lost, with the exception of a copy of the "Plea" which was washed on the beach. It was handed about, and led to the formation of a ragged school for negro children.

Mr. Guthrie's work in Edinburgh assumed such proportions as to become a matter of national interest. His name was honored as that of a true philanthropist, and men illustrious in statesmanship and literature came forward with eloquent eulogies of the noble spirit evinced by him in his struggles with destitution and ignorance. Even lips accustomed to vilest blasphemies had a word of praise for him. In in Glasgow, a number of low drunkards were making remarks not at all complimentary to ministers, when one of them interposed with, "I'll tell ye a gude mon, a really gude mon." "Wha's that?" asked three voices at once. "Weel," was the reply, "that's just Tam Guthrie." "Ay! you've said it noo," was the remark of another. "I believe Dr. Guthrie to be as gude a mon as ever waggit his pow in a poopit. He's different frae the ithers a'thegither. He practises mair than he breaches."

Mr. Guthrie was also distinguished as an advocate of temperance principles; and both by his genial and eloquent speeches, and his beautiful little book, "The City: Its Sins and Its Sorrows," rendered great and lasting service to the cause.

His efforts for the Sustentation Fund told seriously on his constitution, and for two years he was compelled to rest, but in 1849 he was able to resume his ministry to the extent of preaching one sermon on the Sabbath, the Rev. Dr. Hanna, the son-in-law and biographer of Dr. Chalmers, becoming his colleague. In the same year he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Edinburgh; a distinction gratifying to him as coming from his Alma Mater, and as indicating good feeling on the part of those from whom, on conscientious grounds, he was ecclesiastically separated.

Through all the stages of his ministry, Dr. Guthrie was highly popular. Few men have excelled him in the art of pictorial representation, and his hearers were often strangely charmed by the power, the vividness, and the pathos of his words. One Sunday a man, having the appearance of

was in St. John's Church. He was evidently enraptured by what he heard, and as the doctor concluded one of his grand and picturesque illustrations, he turned round to the crowd behind him, and loudly exclaimed, "Na, sirs! but I never heard the like o' that."

Another time Dr. Guthrie described a wreck, and so vividly did he present the scene that when he described the lowering of the life-boats in front of the gallery started to his feet and began to take off his coat in preparation for manning the boat, and was only called to consciousness of the place and the time by his mother laying hold of him and drawing him back to his seat. Strangers to Edinburgh thought it as necessary to hear Dr. Guthrie as to see the Castle and the Calton Hill; and noblemen and titled ladies, authors and artists, might have been seen crammed with peasants, mechanics, and poor women in pews and aisles, all listening with equal eagerness to the magnificent periods of the Christian orator.

In 1862 Dr. Guthrie was elected Moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church. Two years later the state of his health compelled him to give up all but a nominal connection with St. John's; but though he could not preach Christ as he had done from the pulpit, he was still able to serve the cause of truth by his pen. Authorship, in which he had already been very successful, was henceforth his principal function, and in editing the Sunday Magazine and publishing several volumes of discourses he rendered abiding service to religious literature.

Hoping for benefit from a milder atmosphere, he went to Hastings, in the south of England, in December, 1872, and there he died. His last days were cheered with the brightest hopes of immortality and of happy communion with Christ, while the sympathy of friends was deep and true. On the evening of February 21st, 1873, from Windsor, inquiring as to his state. When he heard of it, he said, "It is most kind." He suffered much, but singing seemed to soothe him, and a psalm or hymn, softly sung to the piano in the adjoining room, was often requested. Once he asked that they should sing him "a bairn's hymn." Sunday, February 23d, was his last day on earth. Lying quietly, he was heard to say, "A brand plucked from the burning." Midnight approached, and as his friends were commending the passing spirit into the Redeemer's hands, he departed as in a quiet sleep.

His body was borne to Edinburgh, and interred in the Grange Cemetery. The funeral was imposing from the numbers who attended it, but nothing was more touching than the presence of two hundred and thirty Ragged-School children, who stood at the grave and sang, while the tears stood in their eyes,

"There is a happy land, Far, far away."

These children, rescued from squalor and vice, were bright memorials of Dr. Guthrie's work, and he was honored more by their simple strain than he could have been by the tolling of muffled bells, or by organs sounding the notes of a labored requiem.

THE CITY OF EDINBURGH.

The Old and New Towns—Princes Street—Increase of the City—State Ceremonies—Its Philanthropy.

OF Edinburgh, the ancient capital of Scotland, where Dr. Guthrie so successfully labored, it may be said there are two cities, the Old Town and the New. We speak of "Old London" and of the "old town" of other cities, but "Old Edinburgh" has a peculiar meaning of its own. Nobody can tell where Old London begins and where it ends; nobody can mistake Old Edinburgh. Between the Old Town and the New of "the Gray Metropolis of the North" there is a great gulf fixed. On the one side the old High Street, "its ridgy back heaved to the sky," and its precipice of stone and lime. On the other side the gay promenade of Princes Street, with its garden terraces sloping to the sun, its palatial hotels and public buildings, its monuments and boulevard. It is a gulf that has been bridged geographically.

Edinburgh rivals Paris and the fashionable spas and watering-places for its abundance of people who have nothing to do but air themselves and amuse themselves. A common ambition of a pushing Scotsman is to make his fortune anywhere in the wide world, and come back to Edinburgh with the spoils of the Egyptians, set up as a gentleman, and never more soil his fingers with trade or tradesmen. To live in aristocratic style is not so costly in Edinburgh as in London, and not only natives but strangers have begun to find this out. The increase of Edinburgh at the West End and suburbs in recent years is owing very much to the influx of persons of moderate fortune from England and the colonies.

Once a year the Queen's "trusty cousin," the Lord High Commissioner, holds his levées in Holyrood Palace. It has still its convention of royal burghs, as a relic of old national independence, but in popular estimation the general assemblies, Established Church and Free, are the true representatives of the old Scottish Parliament. The Free Church Moderator, as well as the Established, dresses himself in court costume for the august occasion.

There are two "seasons" as well as two cities in Edinburgh. The Court of Session rises on the 20th of July; the numerous tribe of barristers, here called advocates, the writers to the Signet and solicitors, flit to summer quarters; and these constitute, in the main, the aristocracy of Edinburgh.

But the leading thoroughfares are as busy as ever. As the residents go, the strangers come, Americans and Londoners, the most welcome of all, for they pay well.

In Old Edinburgh some good Christians have established a free breakfast every Sunday morning for as many as can plead hunger, and are willing to listen to preaching and Mr. Sankey's hymns along with a substantial meal. As many as 1100 have been provided for. There is no place where so much is done for the poor as in Edinburgh. Free breakfasts, free dinners, free schools, free day homes and victuals for poor children at the schools, ragged schools, soup-kitchens, free medical dispensaries, associations for providing coals and clothing free or at nominal prices, associations for providing work for poor artisans, laborers, and women, a night asylum, a house of refuge for the destitute, besides all the other refuges for the morally and physically diseased and helpless to be found in other towns. With all these open doors one would expect the poverty of the city to be fairly met. And so perhaps it would, but for the whiskey, and the numbers of poor who flock in from the country believing that in the city money is plenty, and their chances it are better than in their native villages.

The Saturday Night of the World was the phrase used in a recent sermon by Canon Fleming, a dignitary of the Church of England, to describe the present period. The Canon was preaching on August 28th, in the nave of York Minster. At the opening of his sermon he said: "During the present week the most august scientific body in England will visit this city as the cradle of the British Association. Born here, fifty years ago, it will celebrate its jubilee among us in a few days. We live in an age of increasing light. The signs of the times on all sides justify us in saying that the clock is striking the eleventh hour of the world's misery and bondage. We live in the Saturday evening of the world, and the peerless Sabbath of its redemption is drawing nigh. We know enough to tell us that we are on the dawn of that day of which enraptured prophets sung, for which martyrs prayed, and for which myriads of eager eyes watch. The Bible and nature explaining each other proclaim the same Divine Author. Science and revelation are mutually clearing up long-vexed questions and evincing the truth of each other."

"Don't be Hard Upon Him!"—In a Most Interesting address delivered by the Rev. Canon Wilberforce recently, at Frome, England, he said: "Not long ago there was in my own parish one of the bravest, purest, and brightest of the wives of workingmen I have ever seen. All through her married life she had been praying for, bearing with, and forgiving the man who at the altar had sworn to love and cherish her. A short time ago he set his seal upon years of cruelty by raising his foot and kicking her savagely, and three hours after she had gone 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.' The last words she spoke were whispered into my own ear —'Don't be hard upon him when I am gone. He is so kind when he doesn't drink.' They laid the little form of her prematurely-born infant by her side, and four other little ones followed to the grave one more victim of the arch-fiend Rum."

MIGHTIER DEAD THAN ALIVE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, September 25, 1881.*

[At the opening of the service Dr. Talmage read the story of Naomi's return, after the death of her husband, to Bethlehem, her early home, in desolation, wonderfully descriptive of the return of our late President's wife to her country home after her great affliction.]

SAMSON in the text was deified and became the Hercules of Greece. He was a giant warrior born to be a leader, and Paul applauds him as a man who "through faith subdued kingdoms." He was a friend of God and an enemy of unrighteousness. But the most memorable scene in his life was the death scene. The Philistines, his enemies, gathered round him in a great building to mock him. With supernatural strength he laid hold of the pillars and flung everything into ruin, destroying the lives of the three thousand scoffers, among them the lords of Philistia.

He had slain many of the enemies of God during his life; but my text says his last achievement was the mightiest. "So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life." It is sometimes the case that after a most industrious, useful, and eminent life, the last hours are more potent than the long years that went before.

In the overshadowing event of this day we find illustration of my text. President Garfield, as many orators will say, was all his life the enemy of sin, the enemy of sectionalism, the enemy of everything small hearted, impure, and debasing, and he made many a crushing blow against those moral and political Philistines, but in his death he made mightier conquest. The eleven weeks of dying have made more illustrious record than the fifty years of living. "So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life."

I. THE TRIUMPHS OF HIS DEATH-BED.

As a matter of inspiration and comfort I propose to show you that President Garfield's expiration is a mightier good than a prolonged lifetime possibly could be. Mind you, there was no time at which his death-bed could have been so emphatic. If he had died a few years before, his departure would not have been so conspicuous. If he had died one month before, his administration would not have been fairly launched. If he had died six months later, his advanced policy of reform would have cut the friendship of a great multitude, and if he had died years after, he would have been out of office and in the decline of life.

But he died at the time when all parties had turned to him with unparalleled expectation. There has not been a time in all the fifty years of his past when his death-bed could have been so effective; and in the next fifty years there could not have been a time when his death-bed would have been so impressive.

1. RELIGION EULOGIZED.

First our President's death, more than his life, eulogizes the Christian religion. We all talk about the hope of the Christian and the courage of the Christian and the patience of the Christian. Put all the sermons on these subjects for the last twenty years together, and they would not make such an impression as the magnificent demeanor of this dying chief magistrate.

He was no more afraid to die than you are to go home this morning. Without one word of complaint he endures an anguish that his autopsy alone could reveal to the astonished world. For eighty days in inquisition of pain, yet often smiling, often facetious, always calm, giving military salute to a soldier who happened to look in at the window, talking with Cabinet officers, about the affairs of State, reading the public bulletins in regard to his condition, watching his own pulse; and so undisturbed of soul that I warrant you if it had not been for his dependent family and the nation, whom he wanted to serve, he would have been glad to depart any time.

O, sirs! all he ever did in confirmation of religion in days of health was nothing compared with what he did for it in this last crisis. James A. Garfield learned his religion from his mother in the days when she was trying in widowhood and poverty to bring up her boys aright; from that same old mother that sat with her Bible in her lap in her bedroom last Tuesday morning, when the dreadful news came that her son was dead. James A. Garfield had no new religion to experiment with in his last hours. It was the same Gospel into the faith of which he was baptized, when in early manhood he was immersed in the river in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. That religion had stood the test through all the buffetings and persecutions through the hard work of life, and did not forsake him in the tremendous close. There have been thousands of death-beds as calm and beautiful as this, but they were not so conspicuous.

This electrifies Christendom. This encourages all the pain-struck in hospitals and scattered all up and down the world to suffer patiently. The consumptive, the cancered, and the palsied, and the fevered, and the dying of all nations lift their heads from their hot pillows, and bless this heroic, this triumphant, this illustrious sufferer. The religion that upheld him under surgeon's knife, and amid the appalling days and nights at Long Branch and at Washington, is a good religion to have. Show us in all the ages among the enemies of Christianity a death-bed that will compare with this radiant sunset!

2. NORTH AND SOUTH UNITED.

Again, our president's death will do more for the consummation of right feeling between North and South than all his administration of four years could have accomplished. This is not "shaking hands across the bloody chasm" according to the rhetoric of campaign documents. This is shaking hands across the palpitating heart that was large enough to take in both sections.

This expiring man took the hand of the North and the hand of the South and joined them together, and practically said, with a dying pathos that can never be forgotten: "Be brothers!" Where now are the flags at half mast? At New Orleans and Boston, Chicago and Charleston. There is absolutely to-day no Republican party and no Democratic party. A new party has swallowed up all—a party of national sympathy. The bulletins on the south side of Mason and Dixon's line have been as carefully watched as on the north side.

We have been trying to arbitrate old difficulties and settle old grudges, yet the old quarrel has ever and anon broken out in a new place. But this requiem which shakes the land forever drowns out all sectional discords. After all that has been done and said during the last eleven weeks the people of the South will be welcome in all our homes as we shall be welcome in theirs. He who tries hereafter to kindle the old fires of hatred will find little fuel and no sulphurous match.

Alabama and Massachusetts; stand up and be married! South Carolina and New York; join hands in betrothal! Georgia and Ohio; I pronounce you one! Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder. The seal is set by the cold emaciated hand of our dead President. No living man could have accomplished it. More of the sectional prejudices and the misinterpretations and the bitternesses of old war times have perished in the last eleven weeks than in all the seventeen years since the war ended; and so the dead which Garfield slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his whole life.

3. THE WORLD EDUCATED.

Again, President Garfield's sickness and death have educated the world, as all his life and the life of a thousand men beside could not have educated it in the wonders of the human body. For the last two months all Christendom have been studying anatomy and physiology. Never since the world stood has there been so much known about respiration, about pulsation, about temperature, about gunshot wounds, about febrile rise, about digestion, about convalescence.

The vast majority of the race have hitherto wandered about stupidly ignorant of this master-piece of God, the human mechanism. The last eleven weeks have educated ten thousand nurses for the sick. The invalids of all lands for this experience will have better attendance, more kindness, more opportunity of restoration. Never has there been such examination of dictionaries to find the meaning of a medical phrase. One new word of the morning bulletins has set the leaves of all the lexicons in America a-flutter.

Since the time when David the psalmist, probably returned from an Oriental dissecting-room, wrote the autopsy "we are fearfully and wonderfully made" (Psa. 13 : 14), and Solomon, who was wise in physiology as well as in everything else, called the spinal marrow the silver cord (or "ever the silver cord be loosed") ; and called the head the "golden bowl," because the skull is round like a bowl, and the membrane which contains the brain is yellow like gold (or "the golden bowl be broken") ; and called the veins of the human body a pitcher because they carry the crimson liquid from the heart, the fountain, all through all the organs of the body (or "the pitcher be broken at the fountain") ; and called the lungs a wheel because they draw to themselves and let go away like a well bucket, and called the stomach the cistern (the "wheel broken at the cistern") (Eccles. 12 : 6) ; and showed that he knew what Harvey thought he was discovering thousands of years after concerning the circulation of the blood. I say since those obscure times down to these days when all physicians are busy instructing the people, and all medical colleges, and all high schools, are scattering physiology and anatomical information, there has never been so much wisdom on these subjects as to-day ; and the most potent of all the teachers has been the sick and dying bed of our President.

He had often spoken and lectured on these subjects in college and on lyceum platform, and was a scientist in all these fields. But in the last eleven weeks he has overthrown more ignorance on these important subjects than during all his half century of existence. "And so the dead which he slew in his death were more than they which he slew in his life."

4. MORTALITY EMPHASIZED.

Again these last scenes must impress the world, as no preachment ever did, that when our time comes to go, the most energetic and skilful physician cannot hinder the event. Was there ever so much done to save a man's life as the life of President Garfield? Is the season too hot? there is manufactured for his sick room in August an October day. Is he to be transported to the sea side? All the wheels and all the steam whistles and all the voices along the line of progress are hushed for two hundred miles, and a new section of railroad is built to let him pass over.

Added to the medical skill of the capital are the skill of Philadelphia and New York. All the medical ingenuity of the last three hundred years flashes its electric light upon the wound. Paris and London, and Edinburgh applaud the treatment. He had all the courage that comes from the hand of a wife who was sure he would get well. He had physicians who did not stand with cold, scientific calculation, studying the case; but splendid men whose hearts grew strong or faint as the patient's pulse was strong or faint, and they were as great nurses as they were great surgeons. But the doctors could not keep him. His wife could not keep him. All the arms of his five children hung around his neck could not keep him. His great spirit pushes them all back from the gates of life, and soars away into the infinities. My Lord and my God! Solemnize us with this consideration.

My hearer, if you and I were sick I am sure we will have good medical attendance and good nursing, plenty of watchers and plenty of attendants. The world is naturally very kind to the sick. We who have good homes would have sympathetic though trembling hands to hold ours in the last exigency. We all have those who love us as we love them, and when the time fixed by the merciful God arrives we must be off. There is no need of our getting nervous about it or fretting about it. All we have to do is to keep our hearts right with God and do our best, and then be as unfluttered as was our dying President. After the mightiest surgery of America and the world had to surrender on Monday night at the stroke of the Death Angel, surely we cannot resist it!

In the emphasizing of all these great truths, James A. Garfield is mightier lying on his catafalque at Cleveland than in the White House receiving the honors of foreign embassage. Who knows but that this death will save millions of people for this world and the next. Fifty millions of people—nay, North and South America and Europe, and parts of Asia—called to thoughts of mortality and the great future! Who knows but it may awaken whole nations from the death of sin to the life of the Gospel.

When last week I saw one line of mourning from Detroit, Michigan, to Brooklyn, I wondered if God would not use this great grief for the purification of the nation. O Lord, revive Thy work in the midst of the nation! Enough of the Sabbath breakings, and the impurities, and the blasphemy, and the official corruption in this country! By the result of this terrific event let these dogs of hell be driven back to their fiery kennels. Against all these evils the Presidential giant is mightier dead than when alive.

II. THE PATHOS OF THE PICTURE.

But while the nation has this comfort there are three words that will leap to our lips, and they have been reiterated oftener than any other words for the past few days. Poor Mrs. Garfield! More pathetic words I never read than these in the Friday newspapers which said that with two of her children she had gone over to the White House to get the property of her family and have it sent to her home in Ohio. Can you imagine anything more full of torture than to walk through the rooms filled with associations of her husband's kindness, of her husband's anxieties, and of her husband's long-continued physical anguish?

She had with her womanly arms fought by his side all the way up the steep of life. She had helped him in their economies when they were very poor; with her own needle clothing their family, with her own hands making him bread. When the world frowned upon him in the days of scandalous assault she never forsook his side. They had together won the battle, and had seated themselves at the very top to enjoy the victory. Then the blow came. What a reversal of fortune! From what midnoon to what midnight! It is said that this will kill her. I do not believe it. The God who has helped her thus far will help her all the way through. When the broken circle gathers in the future days at the old home at Mentor, the mighty God who protected James A. Garfield at Chickamauga and in the fiery hell of many battles will protect his wife, his children, and his old mother.

CONSOLATION.

Upon all the seven broken hearts let the grace descend! What consolations they have! It was a great thing to have had such a son! It was a great thing to have been the wife of such a man! It was a great thing to have been the children of such a father! While theirs and ours is the grief, I am glad on his account that he has gone. He had suffered enough. Enough the cut of the lancets, and the thrusts of the catheter, and the pangs of head, and side, and feet, and back! Ascend, O disenthralled spirit, and take thy place with those who came out of great tribulation, and had their robes made white in the blood of the Lamb! (Rev. 7 : 14.)

This Samson of intellectual strength, this giant of moral power, had—like the one in the text—in other days slain the lion of wrathful opposition, and had carried off the gates of wrong from the rusted hinges. But the peroration of his life is stronger than any passage which went before. The dead which this giant slew in his death were more than those whom he slew in his life.

PRACTICAL LESSONS.

May we all learn the practical lessons with which our subject is filled! Oh, behold the contrast between Friday, the fourth of March, 1881, and Friday the twenty-third of September, 1881!

On the former day Washington was ablaze with banners. Each State of the Union had its triumphal arch. Great men of this country and vast populations filled the streets! Procession such as had never moved from the White House and the Capitol! Military display that would have confounded hostile nations. The city shaken with cannonading by day, and the night on fire with pyrotechnics! Thousands of all political parties who congratulated the President pronounced that fourth of March the brightest day that had ever shone on American institutions. That night, or soon after, in some room of the Presidential mansion, I warrant you, there assembled husband and wife and five children, and the aged mother, taking a long breath after the excitement of the inauguration.

But behold, Friday September 23d, the dead President in the Rotunda, his bereaved wife at a friend's house! a dangerously sick child four hundred miles away at Williamstown, Massachusetts; military on guard around the casket; hundreds of thousands of people gazing on the face so emaciated that none would know it; the poor black woman falling on her knees beside the coffin, expressing the anguish of speechless multitudes when she said: "Oh, dear! how he must have suffered!" Friday, 4th of March, 1881! Friday, September 23d, 1881!

Of all the words of comfort I have uttered today I have this lesson, which seems to sound out from the tramp of pall-bearers and from the rolling of the draped rail-train moving Westward, and from the open grave now waiting to receive our dead President: "Put not your trust in princes nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish" (Psa. 146 : 3, 4). Fare thee well, departed chieftain!

A Hack-Driver's Resistance to Temptation is thus described in an English journal: "There is a man on this stand," said a gentleman at the West End of London, "whom you can't get to touch a drop of drink!" "I won't believe that," said one of the company; "I'll lay a wager that I'll make him drink a glass of grog!" The man was called, apparently to take a fare. The glass of gin was offered him, but respectfully declined. Dropping a coin worth five dollars into it, the tempter said, "Drink it off and the sovereign is yours." The cabman was unmoved. A second, a third, and even a fourth sovereign was dropped in by the wretched tempter, but the driver was as firm as ever. "No," said he; "if you fill it with gold I'll not drink. I'm a happier, healthier, and wealthier man since I gave up the drink. By God's help I'll never, no, never, touch it again." He had sense enough to realize that his tempter was trying to purchase all that made life worth having to him, and he very wisely would not sell it for gold.

First-fruits to Christ in Livingstonia, in Central Africa, are now being reaped. The Rev. Dr. Laws writes: "Yesterday I had the privilege of baptizing the first native who has sought this ordinance here. Albert Namalambe has thus come forward fully to testify of his faith in Christ. It was a glad, solemn day. At half-past six this morning another inquirer came to me seeking instruction. This is now the third month during which he has been praying thrice daily for the true light; but he has not yet experienced the happiness which he notes as a characteristic of Albert's Christianity. A week ago eight couples were married. This means a great deal for the new social life of this land.

Escape of an Infuriated Bull—The Lady Injured—Dr. Gilbart the Man to Help—A Tedious Illness—The Lady's Sudden Death.

AT length, after an hour's savage joy on the one hand, and of dreadful deeds of offence and defence on the other, the enraged bull—all his energies roused to the highest frenzy—made a tremendous drag upon the cruel chain that held him, straining it with all his force of weight and muscle. The great stake from which it stretched, bent and trembled and creaked. One more powerful tug of the colossal creature, and the iron band was snapped in twain like a packthread, and the once captive giant was free. With glaring eyes and lowered head, and bellowing forth his threat of vengeance, he charged upon his human foes.

In an instant their yells of savage delight were changed into a wild cry of terror. Men, heedless of whom they almost pressed to death, in their efforts for personal safety, forced themselves back in irresistible mass on each side, to leave a clear passage before the terrible onset of the infuriated animal. Women, and the weak ones of the other sex in the crowd, squeezed as in a vice or trampled under foot, screamed out their dreadful fear and suffering; but the object of those who had injured them was gained.

The bull, still keeping his head close to the ground, blind with rage, turned neither to the left nor to the right, but rushed on straight through the opening in the crowd that had been made for him, and, as by a miracle, no one present fell a sacrifice to his fury.

Clear of the bull-ring and apparently abandoning his purpose of reprisal the huge beast, a vociferous rabble following him, hurried up the street which led to the Water Gate. Reaching this archway he rushed through it like an avalanche, and then hastened on to the old seven arched bridge which spanned the Dee, and which at the period before us was the only approach from the south to the city.

As fate—or rather Providence—would have it, just at this moment, the lady whom Owen Oliver had succored was with her little girl upon the narrow causeway. To avoid the scrutiny of the wagoner, whose curiosity about her she more than suspected, she had lingered on the road after he left her, and now, avoiding, as far as possible, all observation, was seeking to stealthily enter the city.

When nearly midway on the bridge she observed the runaway animal and the noisy crowd behind suddenly revealed to her. Instantly she turned back, and had retreated some distance, dragging with her the child, to seek a place of safety somewhere along the wider path upon which she had come, but the huge brute, his rage not diminished, but rather increased by the voices of his pursuers, was too swift for her. In passing he spared the child, perhaps deeming her too mean a victim, but, alas! he tossed and cruelly gored the unknown lady wayfarer.

Most of his pursuers, in savage temper from their interrupted sport, through the snapping of the iron chain, were in no mood to heed the mishap of a stranger. Scarcely deigning to look at her prostrate form, they hurried on, eager to recapture their self-emancipated prisoner, one fellow saying, with an oath, as he ran past, "that women were plentiful, but that bulls, for the royal sport of bull-baiting, were scarce."

A few, however, of better mind, gathered round the bleeding and unconscious one, and words, some of sympathy and others of horror, were expressed, as they observed her ghastly wounds. Her little girl, too, weeping as bitterly as she had done near Wrexham, early in the day, called forth, as it then had Owen's, their heartfelt pity. A glance or two told them likewise, as it had the wagoner, that the injured one was a lady, which fact increased, of course, their compassion and interest.

After a hasty inspection of the wounds a consultation was held as to what had best be done, and since the mangled form still breathed there was an all-but unanimous decision to bear it for surgical aid to the house of Dr. Gilbart.

"If any wan can save her life," said one man, "he's the gaffer to do it."

"Aye, aye; right you are, neighbor," said another; "and not only that, but he's the very chap to do it with a heart and a hand, for he's one of the kindest coves going."

"Not a doubt of it," said a third, "as I have good reason to know, for I owe it to his wise head and lucky hand, that I'm out of the grave this minnit."

This measure resolved upon, two or three of the men hastened to a house near and obtained leave to take a stable door from off its hinges. This laid on the ground near the yet unconscious lady, she was deftly and gently placed upon it. Four men lifted the door and its burden upon their shoulders, and then followed by all, one elderly man taking, in a fatherly way, the weeping child by the hand, the whole group—their recent shouting reduced to a low murmur of earnest conversation—moved through the Water Gate within the walls of the city.

When they arrived at the doctor's house they found, to their great disappointment, that he was not at home; but his married sister, on a visit from Ireland, told the men to carefully bear the injured lady to the room in which the doctor was wont to receive his patients, promising to despatch Hugh, the doctor's man, to hasten his master home.

Carefully informing Hugh where he might likely be found—a necessary step, for Hugh was something of what is called a character—and who, remembering a former vain search within the city, as already related, would, unless cautioned, have no doubt now gone to the Hypocaustum, or Roman bath, without the walls, to discover him. Master and man soon met, and in a few minutes Dr. Gilbart was dressing the wounds and applying powerful restoratives to recall the severely wounded one to life and consciousness.

The evident tokens about her and her child of belonging to an upper social class excited Dr. Gilbart's keen interest and curiosity, as they had the inquiry of all who had noticed them. There was plainly some mystery about this stranger which it would be a pleasure to unravel. Her dress, her personal ornaments, her valuable rings, were closely scrutinized, but in vain. No name was upon any article of apparel, nor monogram on gold or jewels, to give the slightest clue as to the identity of the nearly lifeless lady stranger; and his question to the little girl—as had been proved to Owen Oliver—could elicit nothing, for such was the outcome of the words—"Silf, and mamma's own pet darling."

This ignorance, however, of the lady's name, antecedents, and connections, abated nothing from Dr. Gilbart's professional zeal and compassionate services. And after no little effort he succeeded to his great satisfaction in staunching the deep and jagged wounds and in restoring the stunned one to consciousness.

The lady was about the age of the beloved wife he had lost a few years before, and some of her features reminded him greatly of the grace and delicate beauty, which long ago had won his admiration and devotedness. The little girl, too, about the age of his Lillie, not long ago laid in the inexorable grave with many tears, awoke in his heart very tender associations.

That evening he said to his sister, "Dorah, dear, we must not, I think, send this lady, whoever she is, from the house before some advance, at least, to recovery. Indeed, after thinking the matter over, I do not know to where in Chester we could well transfer her. A strange fate has brought her under this roof, and one that excites my liveliest interest and curiosity. Believe me, there is some mystery about her that would be worth unfolding. Can you not, like the good soul that you are, make some arrangement for the housing and nursing of her?"

Mrs. Denzille, with a mixture of surprise and disapproval, looked keenly into her brother's face. She was generous and kind, but had also a woman's instinctive caution and scrupulousness, and felt it would be rather a compromising and hazardous step to receive into her brother's house and take under her charge a woman of whose antecedents she knew nothing. She, therefore, put in a decided demur, pressing upon her brother's attention the imprudence of harboring a stranger and what people were likely to say, if he admitted to his house an unknown female.

"Dear me," exclaimed the doctor, "but you Christian people, as you call yourselves, do sometimes surprise me. There is a passage of Scripture, I believe, which you declare He spoke, whom you name 'the Master,' which enjoins the sacred obligation, if I mistake not of 'ministering to the sick and of taking the stranger in.' Now, Dorah, I do not profess your creed, you know; am, I suppose, what they call an unbeliever; and yet I propose to obey this most excellent injunction, while you, Dorah dear, coolly propose to reject it; and what is worse, because, forsooth, some silly, selfish, and censorious tongues in Chester may wag their malignant and baseless scandal. I declare, Dorah," he added, with a smile, "I am, I fear, a better saint than you are, since for the recovery and comfort of this lady, I am willing to sacrifice a little—even as you put it—my reputation. And is not the very essence of your Christianity self-surrender for another? Has not Christ Himself set us all this noble example." The appeal was irresistible, so felt the really kind and Christian heart of the doctor's sister, and the unknown lady, very faint and weak, was borne to a chamber in Doctor Gilbart's dwelling.

The restoration of his patient to normal health was a more tedious process than Dr. Gilbart had reckoned upon. Not only had her bodily frame received a very severe shock, it also became plain to the doctor that her mind had lately passed through some very painful experiences. Her sojourn, therefore, in the antique abode in the Rows, extended from days, as originally meant, into many weeks.

A lengthened course of interviews only served to increase the doctor's interest in his patient. She displayed a cultivation of mind, and a refinement that called forth his pleasure and admiration, and she spoke and acted as one accustomed, without question, to move in the best society. But one thing exceedingly surprised him, she revealed nothing of her friends or kindred and kept her name a profound secret.

Many were the attempts of the doctor and his sister, in the politest way possible, of course, to extract some clue to the mystery of her life, but every attempt was skilfully and successfully, yet courteously, parried. All the stranger would communicate was, that she was on her way to Ireland, and would again pursue her journey thither, as soon as Dr. Gilbart judged she might do so with safety.

One day, after Dr. Gilbart's unknown lady patient had been some weeks in the house, and was fast approaching convalescence, she drew from her finger the most brilliant and unique of her rings, and with tears in her eyes pressed it upon the acceptance of the doctor, saying, "She was aware that she owed her life to his unspeakable kindness and skill; that from circumstances, which just then she could not explain, she could not duly remunerate him, but as an expression of her deep sense of obligation," asked, "would he favor her by receiving the ring which, she believed, was of some value."

Doctor Gilbart positively refused to do any such thing, and, in the usual and conventional way, declared the great pleasure which it gave him to be of any service to her; and then, overborne by the warmth of his feelings, had the boldness to say, "that the privilege of her society was far more than compensation for all he had been enabled to do for her." There was a guarded yet an evident rebuke of this gallant speech in her manner as she still held forth the ring, and in more decisive tones urged her offering upon him; the meaning of which Doctor Gilbart was not slow to interpret. It meant that he whom he had addressed was a wife, and therefore not in a position to be effusively complimented and wooed. Yet, still he shrunk from accepting the fee in kind, which was held out to him.

In a moment, however, the thought struck him—"This ring is rather peculiar in its style and setting, and may some time serve to trace and identify this mysterious woman. I should, therefore, perhaps gain possession of it." He consequently, with many expressions of reluctance, took the proffered piece of jewelry, and, in the presence of the giver placed it upon his own finger.

Not long afterward, in answer to an inquiry one morning from his sister, Dr. Gilbart said, "That in another week or so, he thought, his home patient would be quite well enough to proceed upon her journey," but the sequel proved the adage that doctors are not infallible. During that very day his patient, during his absence in the city, was taken with what seemed a heavy swoon. The doctor was summoned as soon as possible to her assistance, but before he arrived the stranger's spirit had winged its flight to another world.

The sudden death of the "incognita" was a most untoward event. How were her friends to be informed of her decease? What was to be done with her personal effects, her rings, etc., even? Under what name was she to be buried? Above all, what was to be done with the little child? All these in an age when police and newspaper advertisement facilities were little more than in an embryo state, were most perplexing questions, to which there seemed no possible method of getting a satisfactory answer.

THE SEVENTY WEEKS OF DANIEL.

By P. W. E.

Dan. 9 : 24—27.

Subject of the Prophecy—The Jews, Not the Church—The Time of 70 Weeks—490 Years—I. First Period—49 Years—Jerusalem Rebuilt by Nehemiah—II. Second Period—434 Years—Messiah Comes—His Rejection—III. An Interval—Centuries Passing—Time of the Gentiles—Messiah Cut off—The Church to Wait for His Return—Israel Rejected—IV. Third Period—Seven Years—A Roman Prince to Rule the Ancient Roman Empire—Three and a Half Years of Oppression—Election of 144,000 Saints—Fall of Babylon—Marriage of Christ and the Church—Satan Bound—Israel Restored—The Millennium.

WHEN Daniel had "understood by books" that the seventy years, which had been declared by Jeremiah, the prophet, to be the assigned limit of the Babylonish captivity, were now expiring, or had expired, he set himself by prayer and fasting to seek the Lord his God, on behalf of his beloved country and nation. At the close of his prayer, so simple, so touching, so earnest and importunate, he informs us, "And while I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the Lord my God for the holy mountain of my God. . . . the man Gabriel. . . . being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation." *

He brought to Daniel intelligence from God as to the subject of his deep solicitude, saying "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy." † As Daniel's prayers, so this prophetic answer, through the angel Gabriel, referred to Daniel's people and Daniel's holy city. "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city."

It is important to bear this in mind, as Daniel's sympathies were not aroused in behalf of the Christian church, nor were his supplications poured forth in behalf of Christianity. There was no Church at that time, for it was not formed until the day of Pentecost. Then believers were baptized into one body by the Holy Spirit, and this one body is called the Church of which Christ is the Head. The Church is that "mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints." This mystery was revealed through Paul, he having been made a minister for that purpose, that the purposes and the word of God might be fulfilled.*

The context, with other scriptures, proves that the "seventy weeks" are weeks of years;† that is four hundred and ninety years were determined upon Daniel's people and upon the holy city. Within this prophetic period all the events enumerated in the verse just quoted were to be accomplished.

Such is the general, comprehensive statement of the whole burden of the prophecy with which Gabriel's communication opens. It is the transgression of Israel and Jerusalem that is to be finished, the sins of Israel and Jerusalem that are to be ended, reconciliation for Israel and Jerusalem that is to be made; everlasting righteousness for Israel and Jerusalem that is to be brought in. Who will say that this has happened? Israel is still "Lo-ammi," "not my people," and her reconciliation and restoration are still future. Until these are accomplished the prophecy remains unfulfilled. Till then the people and the city shall be under the Gentile yoke. The reconciliation will take place when the Messiah comes to reign over the earth.

Evidently there is a purpose for dividing the whole space of seventy weeks into "seven weeks," "sixty and two weeks" and "a week." For the sake of perspicuity, order and brevity, we will take up each of the various parts in the order named.

FIRST PERIOD.

"Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem. . . . shall be seven weeks. . . . the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times." There was to be a period of seven weeks, or forty-nine years, during which the wall and the street of Jerusalem should be rebuilt. Ezra and Nehemiah record the fulfilment of this part of the prophecy.

Nehemiah, by a decree of the King of Persia, in the twentieth year of his reign, was allowed to return home and to rebuild the city, even the holy city, Jerusalem. Notice, not the temple, as that was rebuilt by Ezra, a certain priest, in the seventh year of that reign, or thirteen years before.‡

SECOND PERIOD.

We next learn that from the time of the completion of the rebuilding of the street and the city Jerusalem, to the announcement of the promised Messiah, the Prince, through John, his forerunner and witness, "shall be three score and two weeks." From the close of the first period of seven weeks, nothing was to be recorded till the close of the second period of sixty and two weeks, making, with the first period, sixty-nine weeks, or four hundred and eighty-three years. Near or at the close of the sixty-nine weeks, Messiah came in fulfilment of all the promises to Israel, or Daniel's people, and to their holy city.

The Messiah, instead of being welcomed as such, and sitting on the throne of His father David, and reigning in peace over the house of Israel and over the whole earth, was rejected and crucified between two thieves. He had none of the earthly dignities and glories to which, as Israel's promised Messiah and as son of David, he was entitled.

PARENTHETIC TIME.

There is obviously a term of one week, or seven years, remaining over, necessary to complete the whole cycle after the Messiah's death. This fact, as well as the express language of the prophecy itself, shows that the finishing of the transgression and making an end of sins, is not Christ's death upon the cross, or the redemption there accomplished, but another work altogether, namely, the reconciliation and restoration of Israel, which, though of course resulting from Christ's death, is to take place at a later period. Thus, after the sixty-nine weeks, He was cut off, while the Jews, Daniel's people, invoked the guilt of His blood on their own heads. What marvel that God should take them at their word, visit them with terrible judgments and set them aside while He gathers out the Church from every kindred and tongue and people.

This interval, during which Christ is hidden in the heavens and the Holy Spirit is dwelling on earth, in contradistinction to His working in other ages, has no computation in Scripture. The present interval is not "time," properly speaking. "Times and seasons" belong to the Jews and the earth. The clock of prophetic time was, therefore, stopped with the cutting off of Messiah, and will not beat out its last week until the fulness of the Gentiles is come in. Then God will resume His dealings with Israel.

The Church period, our time, lies outside of prophetic history. Dates may be fixed before and after, but now as "the times and the seasons" are in God's hands, the Church is to look, not for the epoch of earthly blessing, but for the return of the Lord from heaven for His saints, which He will do just at the close of this parenthetic time, and which may occur at any moment.*

During this interval the prophecy informs us that "the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined." After the Messiah was cut off, terrible judgments fell on the Jews. The Roman army destroyed "the city and the sanctuary," with a fearful overthrow, compared to a flood, and from that time to the present wars and desolations have visited the city.

THIRD PERIOD.

Between the first and second periods there was no break, but between the second and third over eighteen hundred years have already passed, and how much longer before the seventieth or last week will come, we have no means of knowing.

The Romans who effected the destruction of Jerusalem are described as "the people of the prince that shall come." This shows that the prince here referred to is not Christ, but a prince or sovereign of the Roman Empire, who will be raised up at the right time; and he, that is the prince that shall come, "shall confirm a covenant with many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate (marg. desolator)."

Here we have the "covenant with death" and the "agreement with hell"† on the part of the Jewish rulers. The Jews having been established in their land, under the protection of "the prince that shall come," with him the mass of them will enter into an alliance for the week of seven years. Their worship being restored, their sacrifices and oblations will begin again to smoke on their altars. But in the midst of the week, "the prince" will break his covenant with this guilty race, and he will cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and set up some abomination or idol causing desolation to the end of the epoch, when some predetermined fate overtakes the desolator.

This last half week, when wickedness and misery culminate, is three and a half years, or "a time and times and half a time," or "forty and two months," or "one thousand two hundred and sixty days," expressions which we frequently find in connection with the description of those fearful events preceding the restoration of Israel, and the establishment of the Messianic reign. This abomination is elsewhere spoken of by the prophet as "the abomination that maketh desolate," and by our Lord as "the abomination of desolation."‡

During this time the wickedness and idolatry of this prince, who, in the Revelation of Jesus Christ, is called the beast, manifest themselves. "Power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations."§ The Anti-Christ also appears, who is at the head of ecclesiasticism or Christendom. He is "that man of sin, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."* It is the time that Jerusalem is trodden under foot after she again appears as the centre of God's purposes.†

During this time, the two witnesses appear in Jerusalem and prophesy, and are put to death.‡ And the persecuted saints flee to the wilderness and are cared for by God.§ The angel goes forth and preaches "the everlasting gospel. . . . to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people."‖ "Then were sealed an hundred and forty and four thousand of all the tribes of the children of Israel."¶ "And a great multitude which no man could number," of all nations, and tongues . . . . were clothed with white robes." Then there "were one hundred and fortyfour thousand redeemed from among men, being the first fruits unto God and to the Lamb."††

Near the close of this last half week, "Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth," who represents Romanism, that sits on the seven mountains, out of whom have come all the systems, called Churches, is overthrown, because she is the false bride, an enemy of the Lord Jesus Christ.‡‡

Following this is the marriage of Christ and the Church in heaven,§§ who then come to the earth in judgment, and He "rules His enemies with a rod of iron, and treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God."‖‖

The beast is taken and with him the false prophet, or the Antichrist, and both are "cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."¶¶ And the old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, is bound in the bottomless pit. "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince,"—who is the Lord Jesus—"who standeth for the children of thy people"—the Jews—"and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."†††

Jerusalem is delivered and the full end of her woes comes at the very moment when the desolating force is flushed with apparent triumph, when "the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished, and half of the city shall go forth into captivity. . . . Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle. And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem."‡‡‡ A mode of escape is then provided for His people, and the result is that Jehovah "shall be King over all the earth."§§§

This is "the consummation," when the determined judgment having at length been "poured upon the desolator," Jerusalem is again restored to favor and blessing. "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate; but thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah—my delight—and thy land Beulah—married—for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married."¶¶¶

Happy conclusion of the dreary scenes we have been called to contemplate! The millennium of one thousand years now begins.

Respecting God's dealing with both the Church and the Jews, we may well adopt the words of Paul: "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been His counsellor? or who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed unto Him again? For of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things; to whom be glory forever. Amen."¶¶¶

* Col. 1 : 25, 26. and Rom. 16 : 25, 26.

† The Jews had sabbatic years, (Lev. 25 : 8.) by which their years were divided into weeks of years, as in this important prophecy, each week containing seven years. The seventy weeks here spoken of, therefore, amount to four hundred and ninety years.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Solemn Scene was Enacted at the Residence of General Arthur soon after midnight of September 19th. The Cabinet telegraphed to the Vice-President formally announcing the death of President Garfield and advising him to take the oath of office without delay. Acting on this advice, a messenger was sent out for a proper officer to administer the oath. About two o'clock in the morning Judge Brady of the Supreme Court waited on General Arthur, and the Vice-President took the oath, and thus became the legal President of the United States. Lest there should be any technical objection raised at any time as to the right of a State Judge to administer the Presidential oath, General Arthur was regularly sworn in at the Capitol on Thursday, September 22d, by Chief Justice Waite of the Supreme Court.

Chester Alan Arthur, who has thus, as he sorrowfully said, "received the Presidency at the hands of an assassin," is nearly fifty-one years of age. He is the son of a Baptist minister named William Arthur, and was born at Fairfield, Vt., October 5th, 1830. He studied at Union College, Schenectady, and graduated in 1849. He served two years as principal of the North Pownal Academy, Vermont, after which he studied law and practised in New York. At the outbreak of the war Governor Morgan made Mr. Arthur Quartermaster General; but at the end of Governor Morgan's term Mr. Arthur returned to his legal practice. He had always been an active politician, and in November, 1871, President Grant nominated him Collector of the New York Custom House, a position he occupied until removed by President Hayes on July 12, 1878. At the evening session of June 10th, 1880, of the National Republican Convention at Chicago, he was nominated for the Vice-Presidency on the same ticket with General Garfield, was elected in November, and on March 4th, 1881, was sworn in as presiding officer of the Senate. He is a widower, his wife, who was a daughter of Lieutenant Commander Herndon, of the United States Navy, died in January, 1880. He has two children, a son aged seventeen, and a daughter aged eleven.

A Short Inaugural Address was Read by General Arthur after taking the oath of office in the Capitol on Thursday. The ceremony was rendered impressive by the surroundings and the difference in the circumstances from those which usually characterize Presidential inaugurations. Instead of the gayly decorated buildings and the attending throngs, the Capitol was draped with the emblems of woe, the only persons present to witness the ceremony were the Cabinet, the two ex-Presidents, and a few personal friends, while under the rotunda adjacent, lay the mangled remains of the late President. It was a sad and deeply solemn occasion.

The new President commenced his address with a glowing eulogy of his predecessor's abilities and character. He did not explain minutely his intended policy, but said, referring to the late President: "All the noble aspirations which found expression in his life—the measures devised and suggested during his brief administration to correct abuses and enforce economy, to advance prosperity, and promote the general welfare, to insure domestic security and maintain friendly and honorable relations with the nations of the earth—will be garnered in the hearts of the people, and it will be my earnest endeavor to profit, and to see that the nation shall profit, by his example and experience."

The Appointment of a Day of Fasting, Humiliation and prayer was the object of the first proclamation issued by President Arthur. The proclamation says: "It is fitting that the deep grief which fills all hearts should manifest itself with one accord toward the throne of infinite grace, and that we should bow before the Almighty and seek from Him that consolation in our affliction and that sanctification of our loss which He is able and willing to vouchsafe." The President, therefore, appointed Monday, 26th, "on which day the remains of our honored and beloved dead will be consigned to their last resting-place on earth, to be observed throughout the United States as a day of humiliation and mourning; and I earnestly recommend all the people to assemble on that day in their respective places of divine worship, there to render alike their tribute of sorrowful submission to the will of Almighty God and of reverence and love for the memory and character of our late Chief Magistrate."

A Proclamation Calling for an Extraordinary session of the Senate has been issued by President Arthur, "to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive." The day of meeting is Monday, October 10th, at noon. This call has probably been prompted in some measure by the failure of the Senate at its last session to elect a President pro tem. If President Arthur were to die before the election of such an officer, the succession to the Presidency would be in doubt, as the next in order is the Speaker of the House, which office is also vacant.

In Lake View Cemetery, Cleveland, O., the remains of the late President were interred on Monday, September 26th. On Wednesday, September 21st, after a short religious service, they were removed from Elberon to Washington over the same track used only two weeks before in conveying the wounded sufferer to a purer air, in the vain hope of saving his life. All along the line, and at the depots on the route, people were seen standing silent, with uncovered heads as the train draped in mourning passed by. As it passed Princeton Junction the students stood in single file and strewed the track with flowers. Arrived at Washington the body was carried to the Capitol and placed in the Rotunda on a catafalque prepared for it. There it lay in state, dressed in the suit of black the President wore on Inauguration day, and thousands assembled to gaze on the features altered by suffering beyond recognition. On Saturday the last journey was made, the corpse was taken to Cleveland, and there, in accordance with the late President's wishes, it was interred in the ground offered for the purpose in Lake View Cemetery. In all the chief cities of the country signs of mourning were seen. Public buildings, warehouses, stores, and private houses were draped in mourning; even the express wagons showed a festoon of black, and few shoeblacks were so poor as not to surround their chairs with a cord of black muslin. Never was seen so heartfelt and general an expression of national sorrow.

The Garfield Fund has, Since the Fatal Monday, received several large additions. On Wednesday, $54,796 was forwarded to Mr. Cyrus Field for the benefit of the widow and her children. Other sums were sent in on the following days until the limit of a quarter of a million dollars was far past. On Saturday the total amount acknowledged to date was $287,514.

The Result of the Post Mortem Examination of the late President's body caused general surprise to the doctors and to the public. The ball was found completely encysted, as the physicians engaged in the case expected, but it was not in the part of the body in which they thought, from observation and from electrical experiments, it would be found. It appears that the ball, after fracturing the right eleventh rib, had passed through the spinal column in front of the spinal canal, fracturing the body of it, driving a number of small fragments of bone into the adjacent soft parts, and lodging below the pancreas, about two inches and a half to the left of the spine. The long channel into which the physicians thrust the catheter every day when the wound was dressed, turns out not to have been, as was supposed, the track of the ball, but a burrowing of pus, the bullet having travelled in the opposite direction. A pus cavity six inches by four was discovered near the gall bladder. It is a relief to hear that the mistakes made in diagnosing the case were not responsible for its fatal termination, that the injuries inflicted were necessarily fatal, and that only the magnificent constitution of the sufferer delayed his death so long.

The Assassin Guiteau is Now in All Men's thoughts, and much well-deserved execration is heaped upon him. But people forget how much he sinned against God before he sinned against the nation. Lying, cheating, forgery, and religious hypocrisy were his common practices for years, and he was engaged in an unusually infamous passage through the divorce court at a time when he was imposing himself upon religious circles as a Christian teacher. If society had meted out his deserts to him for one of those offences, he might never have committed his last great crime. There is also a danger of our forgetting, in our overwhelming grief and indignation that the execution of the law by man does not prevent the exercise of mercy by God; and that even the wretch Guiteau is not shut out from the atoning sacrifice of Christ. By the grace of God he may repent, and after he has paid the just penalty of death he may be washed in the fountain opened for uncleanness. But we ought on no account to regard with approval or allowance the attempt made upon the assassin's life by Sergeant Mason of the jail guard on September 11th. That was an act so wicked, disloyal, and treacherous, that there can be no extenuation of it except the possible temporary derangement of the sergeant.

The Sufferers by the Michigan Forest Fires are in danger of being forgotten during the excitement caused by President Garfield's death. As yet New York has contributed only $64,489. That amount has been gratefully acknowledged, but, considering the wealth of the Empire State, her generosity does not in this case compare favorably with that of other States. In acknowledging the receipt of the money, Mr. Farrington writes: "Michigan thanks New York for her liberal donations, and hopes she will still help us in relieving the suffering. It will require at least $1,000,000 to take care of these people until another harvest. More help must be obtained outside the State, for Michigan is not able to bear the entire burden."

The Rev. Dr. Deems Preached a Remarkable sermon last Sunday morning on the subject of the national woe. Arrangements have been made to publish a report of it in next week's CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Arrival in New York on Friday of Kal-ıkaua, King of the Sandwich Islands, whose por-rait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 1st, is announced. The following is ın account furnished by Colonel Judd, the King's ecretary, of his tour :

"We sailed from Hawaii," said Colonel Judd, ' January 20th, and stopping in San Francisco for .short time, took the steamer for Yokohama, where ve arrived early in March. Leaving Japan, we ailed westward, visiting Singapore, Penang, Cal-utta, and other cities of Southern Asia. We went hrough India by rail, and after brief visits to Bom-ay and Aden, passed through the Suez Canal and vent to Cairo. Here we were magnificently enter-ained by the Khedive. We saw the Pyramids, hen came down and took ship for Sicily. The rst port where we landed upon the Continent was Naples. In Italy we visited Rome and Pompeii. We then went to Paris, but after a short stay astened to London. We returned to the Continent gain, visiting Brussels, Cologne, Berlin, Vienna, 'aris, Madrid, Lisbon, and many other cities. 'hen we returned to London once more." In pite of the wonderful sights the King has witnessed e expresses a preference for his own land, espe-ially on account of the climate.

Another Train Robbery is Reported. A pecial dispatch to the Gazette, of Little Rock, ark., from Arkadelphia, says : "The train on the ron Mountain and Southern Railway which depart-d from Texarkana at eight o'clock on September 2d, was boarded at Hope by three young men, who, after passing Prescott, and when near Ken-ett, suddenly drew revolvers and ordered the con-uctor to stop the train, which he did. They then roceeded to make the passengers throw up their ands, and robbed them, getting $700. They then isited the express car, opened the messenger's safe, nd took $30,000 in currency. Before leaving the ain they threw away a package containing $15,-00, under the impression that it was valueless."

When the Rev. A. Atwood, of Philadelphia, vas a small boy standing inside the door of his ather's house, with his hat under his arm, waiting to ee the minister, who had been making a call there. ıount his horse, the minister, after shaking hands ith all in the room, as he passed him, put both ands on his head, saying, "The Lord bless this ıd and make him a minister of the Gospel of hrist." It scared the boy terribly, but did him ıore good than any one thing in his life. When a rong, ill-tempered word would slip from his lips, ıe form of that old minister would appear to his nagination with his light hat and plain coat, with is hands on his head, blessing him in the name f the Lord, a sort of chill would run over his whole ystem, and through all his subsequent life it has ıore or less influenced his habits.

Mr. Moody's Mother.—The Rev. E. R. Davies, visitor at the recent Northfield Convention, says f Mr. Moody : "He has Dr. Andrew Bonar and thers as guests now, and all his friends are re-eived and welcomed with the greatest cordiality. ear his own is the home of his mother and a ounger brother. 'I'll introduce you to my mother,' e said. She is over seventy-six years of age, er black eyes are not dim, nor her form bent. he has a sweet face, a pleasant motherly way, ıd wins your heart at once. It is not hard to see here the son got his good sense and tact in man-ging things."

An Exciting Race with a Runaway Car is ported in one of the Arizona journals. It ap-ears that a car laden with ties, in some way be-ıme loosened and began moving slowly on a slight own grade. Soon the steep grade toward Cie-ega was reached, and then the speed of the car creased rapidly. An engineer sitting on his en-ne at Puntano saw the car travelling alone, and new that the grade being downward for a long stance a serious accident would probably be ıused. Attached to his engine was a car full of hinamen, but without waiting to detach it, he arted in pursuit of the runaway car at the full eed of his engine. It was a race for life. Every rn of the wheels increased the speed of the car, ıead, but the engineer's practised eye told him ıat he was gaining upon it. Far ahead too he saw laborers at work on the roadway and the car running noiselessly was dangerously near them. The locomotive, however, was now going at a speed of sixty miles an hour, and was gaining every moment on the car. Finally, the engineer, placing the lever in charge of his fireman, crawled to the cowcatcher, and, taking the heavy coupling rod in his hand, balanced himself in that perilous position. Soon the few feet intervening disappeared, and with a dexterity that comes from practice and a cool brain, the coupling was made. The locomotive was reversed and the train came to a standstill within fifty feet of the spot where the laborers were at work. They had expected no train to pass, and were unconscious of their danger until they were saved. The brave engineer by his promptitude and the gallant risk of his own life saved many from a terrible death. The story of the rescue excites our enthusiastic admiration, while the Gospel message of a world rescued from a worse fate by the sacrifice of Jesus is too often heard with indifference.

An Unexpected Bonanza Has Been Discovered by accident, according to a statement in a Nevada journal. It appears that a man living at Ophir was unable to go to his employment, and thought he would spend his time in repairing and setting back a dilapidated bulkhead in front of his lot, when he struck into a three-foot vein of decomposed material completely filled with pure gold. This is said to be the same kind of rich vein ore that was encountered near the surface when the first discovery was made at the Ophir in early days. The vein is supposed to be a feeder from the old Ophir vein. It might never have been discovered but for the tumbling down of the old bulkhead. One old surface tunnel passes through the ground some distance to the northward of the deposit, and another to the southward. Thus the rich pocket was left concealed between. This treasure unexpectedly discovered will, since the secret is known, excite the envy of the finder's associates, who will doubtless endeavor to obtain a share of his wealth. Those to whom God has given a treasure whose value far surpasses that of the purest gold, are placed in a different position from that of this lucky miner. They do not keep their knowledge secret, and in imparting it to others their own happiness is increased.

The Exhibition of a Chinese Idol was a method chosen by a little girl in Dr. Talmage's congregation to collect money for the relief of the sufferers by the forest fires in Michigan. The destitution of the numerous families who had just escaped with their lives was described by the pastor on Sunday, the 18th September, and an appeal was made for relief. The appeal was nobly responded to in the following week, and one of the contributors was the little girl, who, happening to possess the curiosity, put it on exhibition and collected more than four dollars in admission fees. This use for a purpose of love by a Christian child of an idol that was once worshipped as a god in China is a remarkable exemplification of the saying of the Bible, "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee" (Ps. 76 : 10).

The Condition of Affairs at the Panama Canal is described by a physician who returned from the Isthmus last week, as deplorable. He says there are about 250 people at work on the canal, 200 of whom are negroes. Half of them are sick, haggard, and starving, and the death-rate is alarming, although the facts are suppressed as much as possible. There are not more than 100 able-bodied men at work at any time, and the force is constantly being renewed, because the laborers fall victims to disease, then lose their places and starve, or die of fevers and a peculiar wasting away of the system. As to the progress of the work, the doctor reports that "it is advancing very slowly, and there is nothing to show for the money spent. It is generally believed in that country that the canal will never be finished. It is about as wide as Broadway from house to house. There are some stakes driven down and planks laid along and the earth stirred up a little, but that is all. It seems hardly possible to live in that country. It is marshy and malarial, and infested with alligators and serpents and poisonous insects."

LOVE'S LABORS,

A Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon,

"Charity beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."—1 COR. 13 : 7.

Love Essential to True Godliness—The Christian's Every-day Livery—I. Love's Difficulties They are Many—In Self—In Others—In the World—In Hell—Love Overcomes All—Conquers on Four Sides—In all Stages of Life—II Love's Triumph—1. In Bearing—Covering—As to Brethren—Refuses to See Faults—The Pearl Oyster and the Dripping Well—As to Unconverted—2. In Believing—As to Fellow-Christians—Believes the best of them—An Old Legend—3. In Hoping—4. In Enduring—III. The Sources of Love's Energy—The Nature of Love—Her Companions—The Man with a Twist.

THE grace of charity, or love, of which so much is most admirably spoken in this chapter, is absolutely essential to true godliness. So essential is it that, if we have everything beside, but have not charity, it profiteth us nothing. The absence of charity is absolutely fatal to vital godliness ; so saith the Holy Ghost in this chapter. When, then, you read the apostle's high encomiums of charity, do not say, "This is a fancy virtue to which certain special saints have attained, and we are bound to admire them for it, but we need not imitate them." Far from it. This charity is the common, every-day livery of the people of God. It is not the prerogative of a few ; it must be the possession of all. Do not, therefore, however lofty the model may be, look up to it as though you could not reach it : you must reach it. It is put before you not only as a thing greatly desirable, but as absolutely needful ; for if you excelled in every spiritual gift, yet if you had not this all the rest would profit you nothing whatever. One would think that such excellent gifts might benefit us a little ; but no, the apostle sums them all up, and saith, "it profiteth me nothing."

What does this teach us at the outset but that a salvation which leads to this must be of God, and must be wrought in us by His power? Such a comely grace can never grow out of our fallen nature. Shall such a clean thing as this be brought out of an unclean? This glorious salvation unto pure love must be grasped by faith, and wrought in us by the operation of the Spirit of God. If we consider salvation to be a little thing, we bring it, as it were, within the sphere of human possibility, but if we set it forth in its true proportions as involving the possession of a pure, loving, elevated state of heart, then we perceive that it is a divine wonder. When we estimate the renewed nature aright we cry, "This is the finger of God," and right gladly do we then subscribe to Jonah's creed, "Salvation is of the Lord."

Notice, then, first, the multitude of love's difficulties ; it has to bear all things, believe all things hope all things, and endure all things ; secondly, observe the triumph of love's labor ; it does all these four things, it "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things ;" and then, thirdly, this will bring us back to the point we have started from, the sources of love's energy, and how it is she is able thus to win her fourfold victory over countless difficulties.

I. Consider well the multitude of

LOVE'S DIFFICULTIES.

When the grace of God comes into a man he is born at once to love. He that loveth is born of God, and he that is born of God loveth. He loveth him that begat, even God, and he loveth him that is begotten of Him, even all the saved ones. He commences to obey the great command to love his neighbor as himself. His motto is no longer that of an earthly kingdom, Dieu et mon droit—God and my right ; but he bears another word on his escutcheon, Dieu et mon frère—God and my brother.

No sooner is love born than she finds herself at war. Everything is against her, for the world is full of envy, hate, and ill-will. I would warn the most loving-hearted that they have entered upon a war for peace, a strife for love : they are born to hate hatred, and to contend against contention. As the lily among thorns, so is love among the sons of men. As the hind among the dogs, so is charity among the selfish multitude.

Evidently the difficulties of love are many, for the apostle speaks of them as "all things," and as if this were not enough he repeats the words, and sets forth the opposing armies as four times "all things." I do not know whether you can calculate this mighty host. "All things" would seem to comprehend as much as can be, but here in the text you have this amount multiplied by four. For, my brother, you will have to contend with all that is within yourself. Nothing in your original nature will help you. God has put within you a new life, but the old life seeks to smother it. You will find it to master yourself, and if you succeed therein you will be a conqueror indeed.

Besides that you will have to contend with "all things" in the persons whom you are called upon to love. You must have fervent charity toward the saints, but you will find very much about the best of them which will try your patience; for, like yourself, they are imperfect, and they will not always turn their best side toward you, but sometimes sadly exhibit their infirmities. Be prepared, therefore, to contend with "all things" in them. As for the ungodly whom you are to love to Christ, you will find everything in them that will oppose the drawings of your love, for they, like yourself, by nature are born in sin.

When you have mastered that kind of "all things" you will have to contend with "all things" in the world, for the world lieth in the wicked one, and all its forces run toward self, and contention, and hate. Every man's hand is against his fellow, and few there be who honor the gentle laws of love; they know not that divine charity which "seeketh not her own." The seed of the serpent is at enmity with all that is kind, and tender, and self-sacrificing, for these are the marks of the woman's seed. Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.

And then remember that "all things" in hell are against you. What a seething mass of rebellious life, all venomous with hate, is seen in the regions of darkness. The prince of the power of the air leads the van, and the host of fallen spirits eagerly follow him, like bloodhounds behind their leader. All these evil spirits will endeavor to create dissension, and enmity, and malice, and oppression among men, and the soldier of love must wrestle against all these. See, O my brother, what a battle is yours! Speak of crusades against the Paynim, what a crusade is this against hate and evil! Yet we shrink not from the fray.

Happily, though love has many difficulties, it overcomes them all, and overcomes them four times. There is such vitality in evil that it leaps up from the field whereon it seemed to be slain, and rages with all its former fury. First, we overcome evil by patience, which "beareth all things." Let the injury be inflicted, we will forgive it, and not be provoked: even seventy times seven will we bear in silence. If this suffice not, by God's grace we will overcome by faith: we trust in Jesus Christ, we rely upon our principles, we look for divine succor, and so we "believe all things." We overcome a third time by hope: we rest in expectation that gentleness will win, and that long-suffering will wear out malice, for we look for the ultimate victory of everything that is true and gracious, and so we "hope all things" We finish the battle by perseverance: we abide faithful to our resolve to love, we will not be irritated into unkindness, we will not be perverted from generous, all-forgiving affection, and so we win the battle by steadfast non-resistance. We have set our helm toward the port of love, and toward it we will steer, come what may. Baffled often, love "endureth all things."

Yes, brethren, and love conquers on all four sides. Love does, as it were, make a hollow square, and she sets the face of her warriors toward all quarters of the compass. Does God seem Himself to smite love with afflictions? She "beareth all things." Do her fellow-Christians misrepresent her, and treat her ill? She believes everything that is good about them, and nothing that is injurious. Do the wicked rise against her? When she tries to convert them, do they return evil for good? She turns her hopefulness to the front in that direction, and hopes that yet the Spirit of God will bring them to a better mind. And does it happen that all her spiritual foes attack her with temptations and desperate insinuations? She lifted up the banner of patience against them, and by the power of God's grace she putteth the infernal enemy to the rout, for she "endureth all things."

It seems to me that I might read my text as if it said that love conquers in all stages of her life. She begins in conversion, and straightway those that mark her birth are angry, and the powers of evil are at once aroused to seek her destruction Then she "beareth all things." She gathers strength and begins to tell out to others what she knows of her Lord and His salvation. She "believeth all things," and so she confesses her faith, and her fellow-Christians are confirmed by her witness. It is her time of energy, and so she tries to woo and win others, by teaching them the things which she believes.

She advances a little farther; and, though often disappointed by the unbelief of men and the coldness of her fellow-Christians, she nevertheless "hopes all things," and pushes on in the expectation of winning more of them. Her dove's eyes see in the dark, and she advances to victory through ever-growing conflict. Ay, and when infirmities thicken upon her, and old age comes, and she can do little else but sit still, and bear and believe and hope, she still perseveres, and accepts even the stroke of death itself without complaining, for love "endureth all things."

I do not think I need say more upon the difficulties of love. I am sure that every experienced person knows that these difficulties are supreme, and that we require superlative grace if we are to master them. Love does not ask to have an easy life of it: self-love makes that her aim. Love denies herself, sacrifices herself, that she may win victories for God, and bring blessings on her fellow-men. Hers is no easy pathway, and hers shall be no tinsel crown.

II. Secondly, let us survey

of love's labor. Her labors are fourfold.

First, in bearing all things. The word here rendered "bear" might as correctly have been translated "cover." You that have the Revised Version will find in the margin, "Love covereth all things." "Covereth" is the meaning of the word in ordinary Greek, but Paul generally uses the word in the sense of "bear." Our translators, therefore, had to choose between the usual meaning and the Pauline usage, and they selected Paul's meaning, and put it down in the first place as "beareth," giving us in the margin the other sense of "covereth." The two ideas may be blended, if we understand it to mean that love bears all things in silence, concealing injuries as much as possible even from herself.

Let us just think of this word "covers" in reference to the brethren. True love refuses to see faults, unless it be that she may kindly help in their removal. Love has no wish to see faults. She painfully fears that there may be something wrong, but she is loath to be convinced of it: she ignores it as long as she can, and wishes that she could deny it altogether. Love covers; that is, it never proclaims the errors of good men. There are busybodies abroad who never spy out a fault in a brother but they must needs hurry off to their next neighbor with the savory news, and then they run up and down the street as though they had been elected common criers. It is by no means honorable to men or women to set up to be common informers. Yet I know some who are not half so eager to publish the Gospel as to publish slander.

I would, brothers and sisters, that we could all imitate the pearl oyster. A hurtful particle intrudes itself into its shell, and this vexes and grieves it. It cannot eject the evil, and what does it do but cover it with a precious substance extracted out of its own life, by which it turns the intruder into a pearl. Oh that we could do so with the provocations we receive from our fellow-Christians, so that pearls of patience, gentleness, long-suffering, and forgiveness might be bred within us by that which else had harmed us. I would desire to keep ready for my fellow-Christians a bath of silver, in which I could electro-plate all their mistakes into occasions for love. As the dripping well covers with its own deposit all that is placed within its drip, so would love cover all within its range with love, thus turning even curses into blessings. O! that we had such love that it would cover all, and conceal all, so far as it is right and just that it should be covered and concealed.

As to bearing all, taking the words as they stand in our version, I wish to apply the text mainly to our trials in seeking the conversion of the unconverted. Those who love the souls of men must be prepared to cover much when they deal with them, and to bear much from them in silence. When I begin to seek the conversion of any one I must try as much as ever I can to ignore any repulsiveness that there may be in his character. I know that he is a sinner, else I should not seek his salvation; but if he happens to be one who has fallen very low in the esteem of others, I must not treat him as such, but cover his worst points. You cannot possibly bring the Samaritan woman who has had five husbands into a right state of mind by "wondering that he spake with the woman." Thus the disciples acted, but not so their Master, for He sat on the well and talked with her, and made Himself her willing companion that He might be her gracious Saviour He ignored her sin so far as to converse with her for her good.

You will not long have begun this holy work before you will discover in the heart you seek to win much ignorance of the Gospel. Bear with it, and bring forward the text which sheds light on that darkness, and teach the truth which will remove that error. Erelong you will have to contend with hardness of heart, for when a man knows the truth he is not always willing to receive it. Bear it, and be not vexed. Did you not expect the heart to be hard? Do not you know what business you are upon? You are sent to turn men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God Be not astonished if these things should not prove to be child's play. In addition to this perhaps you will have ridicule poured upon you; your attempts to convert will be converted into jests. Bear it bear all things!

Now let us look at the second of love's great labors. You have heard of the labors of Hercules but the fabulous hero is far outdone by the veritable achievements of love. Love works miracles which only grace can enable her to perform. Her is the second of them—love "believeth all things." In reference, first, to our fellow-Christians, love always of them. I wish we had more of this faith abroad in all the churches, for a horrid blight falls upon some communities through suspicion and mistrust Though everything may be pure and right, yet certain weak minds are suddenly fevered with anxiety through the notion that all is wrong and rotten. This unholy mistrust is in the air, a blight upon all peace: it is a sort of fusty mildew of the soul, by which all sweet perfume of confidence is killed. The best man is suspected of being a designing knave, though he is honest as the day, and the smallest fault or error is frightfully exaggerated, till we seem to dwell among criminals and to be all villains together.

True love believes good of others as long as ever it can, and when it is forced to fear that wrong has been done, love will not readily yield to evidence but she gives the accused brother the benefit of many a doubt. When the thing is too clear, love says, "Yes, but the friend must have been under very strong temptation, and if I had been there I dare say I should have done worse;" or else love hopes that the erring one may have offended from a good though mistaken motive; she believes that the good man must have been mistaken, or he would not have acted so. Love, as far as she can believes in her fellows.

Somewhere or other I met with an old legend—I do not suppose it to be literally true, but it spirit is correct. It is said that, once upon a time, in the streets of Jerusalem, there lay a dead dog, and every one kicked at it and reviled it. One spoke of its currish breed, another of its lean and ugly form, and so forth; but one passed by who paused a moment over the dead dog, and said, "What white teeth it has." Men said, as he went on his way, "That is Jesus of Nazareth." Surely it is ever our Lord's way to see good points wherever He can. Brethren, think as well as you can even of a dead dog.

If you should ever be led into disappointments and sorrows by thinking too well of your fellow-men, you need not greatly blame yourself. I met, in Anthony Farrindon's Sermons, a line which struck me. He says the old proverb has it, "Humanum est errare"—to err is human; but, saith he, when we err by thinking too kindly of others we may say, "Christanum est errare"—it is Christian to err in such a fashion. I would not have you credulous, but I would have you trustful, for suspicion is a cruel evil. Few fall into the blessed error of valuing their fellow-Christians at too high a rate.

In reference to the unconverted this is a very important matter. Love "believeth all things" in their case. She does not believe that the unconverted are converted, for, if so, she would not seek their conversion. She believes that they are lost and ruined by the Fall, but she believes that God can save them. Love believes that the precious blood of Christ can redeem the bondslaves of sin and Satan, and break their iron chain; she believes that the power of the Holy Spirit can change a heart of granite into a heart of flesh. Love, therefore, believing this, believes also that God can save this sinner by herself, and she therefore begins to speak to Him, expecting that the word she speaks will be God's instrument of salvation. When she finds herself sitting next to a sinner, she believes that there was a necessity for her to be there, even as Christ must needs go through Samaria.

Brethren,

DO YOU WANT A MODEL

of this? Then I beseech you look to your divine Master once again. See Him in the morning when the sheep are counted, missing one of them, and so full of faith is He that He can find the lost one that He leaves the ninety and nine, and cheerfully enters the pathless wilderness. See how He bounds over the mountains! How He descends the ravines! He is seeking His sheep until He finds it, for He is fully assured that He shall find it. He shall not fail nor be discouraged, for His faith is great in the salvation of men, and He goes forth to it believing that sinners shall be saved. I delight in the deep, calm faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. He had no faith in man's goodness, for "He knew what was in man;" but He had great faith in what could be done in men and what could be wrought for them.

Here is the second grand victory of love: she "believeth all things." Herein let us exercise ourselves till we are skilled in it.

Love's third great labor is in "hoping all things." Love never despairs. She believes in good things yet to come in her fellow-men, even if she cannot believe in any present good in them. Hope all things about your brethren. Suppose a friend is a member of the Church, and you cannot see any clear signs of grace in him, hope all things about him. Many true believers are weak in faith, and the operations of grace are dim in them; and some are placed in positions where the grace they have is much hindered and hampered; let us take these things into consideration. It is hard to tell how little grace may yet suffice for salvation: it is not ours to judge. Hope all things.

As to the unconverted, you will never do anything with them unless you hope great things about them. When the good Samaritan found the poor man half dead, if he had not hoped about him he would never have poured in the oil and the wine, but would have left him there to die. Cultivate great hopefulness about sinners. Always hope of them that they will be saved yet, though no good signs are apparent in them. If you have done your best for them, and have been disappointed and defeated, still hope for them. Hope because you are moved to pray for them. Get other people to pray for them, for as long as they have some one to pray for them their case is not given over. If you get others to pray, there will be another string to your bow. If they are very ill, and you cannot get at them, or they are on their dying beds, still have hope about them, and try to send them a message in some form or other. Pray the Lord to visit and save them, and always keep up your hope about them. Till they are dead, let not your hope be dead.

Would you see a model of this? Ah, look at our blessed Lord, and all His hopefulness for us: how, despairing of none, he went after those whom others would have given up. If you ask a proof, remember how he went after you. Will you despair of anybody since Christ did not despair of you? Wonders of grace belong to God, and all those wonders have been displayed in many among us. If you and I had been there when they brought the adulterous woman taken in the very act, I am afraid that we should have said, "This is too bad; put her away, she cannot be borne with." But oh, the hopefulness of the blessed Master when even to her He said, "Woman, where are thine accusers? Neither do I condemn thee. Go, and sin no more."

The last victory of love is in enduring all things, by which I understand a patient

PERSEVERANCE IN LOVING.

This is perhaps the hardest work of all, for many people can be affectionate and patient for a time, but the task is to hold on year after year. I have known some men earnestly check their temper under provocation, and bear a great many slights, but at last they have said, "There is an end to everything: I am not going to put up with it any longer. I cannot stand it." Blessed be God, the love that Christ gives us endureth all things. As His love endured to the end, so does the love which the Spirit works in us endure to the end.

In reference first to our fellow-Christians, love holds out under all rebuffs. You mean that I shall not love you, my good man, but I shall love you. You give me the rough side of your tongue, and make me see that you are not a very lovable person, but I can love you notwithstanding all. What? Will you do me a further unkindness? I will oppose you by doing you a greater kindness than before. You said a vile thing about me; I will not hear it, but if it be possible I will say a kind thing of you. I will cover you up with hot coals till I melt you; I will war against you with flames of love till your anger is consumed. I will master you by being kinder to you than you have been unkind to me.

As to your dealing with the unconverted, you will have to endure all things, for it will come to pass that some whom you have been seeking for a long time will grow worse instead of better. Endure this among the all things. Those whom you seek to bless may seem to be altogether unteachable; they may shut their ears and refuse to hear you; never mind, endure all things. They may grow sour and sullen, and revile you in their anger, but be not put about by them; let them struggle till they are wearied, and meanwhile do you quietly wait, saying to yourself, "I must save them." A warder who has to take care of insane persons will frequently be attacked by them, and have to suffer hard blows; but what does he do? Strike the patient and make a fight for it? No, he holds him down and pins him fast; but not in anger, for he pities him too much to be angry with him.

I pray God give you this blessed unmannerliness, this sweet casting of all things to the wind, if by any means you may save some.

If you desire to see the mirror and the paragon of persevering endurance, look you there! I wish you could see it. I wish these eyes could see the sight as I have sometimes seen it. Behold the cross! See the patient Sufferer and that ribald multitude: they thrust out the tongue, they sneer, they jest, they blaspheme; and there he hangs, triumphant in his patience, conquering the world and death and hell by enduring "all things." O love, thou didst never sit on a throne so imperial as the cross, when there, in the person of the Son of God, thou didst all things endure. Oh that we might copy in some humble measure that perfect pattern which is here set before us. If you would be saviors, if you would bless your generation, let no unkindness daunt you; let no considerations of your own character, or honor, or peace of mind, keep you back, but of you may it be said, even as of your Lord, "He saved others, Himself He could not save."

Have not I shown you four grand battles, far excelling all the Waterloos, and Trafalgars, and Almas, and Inkermans on record? Heroes are they that fight and win them, and the Lord God of love shall crown them.

III. I close by noting

THE SOURCES OF LOVE'S ENERGY.

The time is gone, as I thought it would be, but it has brought us round in a circle to where we started from. The Holy Ghost alone can teach men how to love, and give them power to do so. Love's art is learned at no other school but at the feet of Jesus, where the Spirit of love doth rest on those who learn of Him. Beloved, the Spirit of God puts love into us, and helps us to maintain it, thus: first, love wins these victories, for it is her nature. The nature of love is self-sacrifice. Love is the reverse of seeking her own. Love is intense; love is burning; therefore she burneth her way to victory. Love! Look at it in the mother. Is it any hardship to her to lose rest and peace and comfort for her child? If it costs her pain, she makes it pleasure by the ardor of her affection. It is the nature of love to court difficulties, and to rejoice in suffering for the beloved object.

Next to this, love has four sweet companions. There are with her tenderness that "beareth all things," faith that "believeth all things," hope that "hopeth all things," and patience which "endureth all things," and he that hath tenderness, and faith, and hope, and patience hath a brave quaternion of graces to guard him, and he need not be afraid. Best of all, love sucks her life from the wounds of Christ. Love can bear, believe, hope, and endure because Christ has borne, believed, and hoped, and endured for her.

I have heard of one that had a twist: they say that he saw something that others never saw, and heard a voice that others never heard, and he became such a strange man that others wondered at him. Oh that I had more and more of that most solemn twist which comes through feeling a pierced hand laid on my shoulder, and hearing in my ear a sorrowful voice—that self-same voice which cried, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" I would see that vision and hear that voice, and then—what then? Why, I must love; I must love; I must love. That would be the soul's strange bias and sweet twist.

Love makes us love; love bought us, sought us, and brought us to the Saviour's feet, and it shall henceforth constrain us to deeds which else would be impossible. You have heard of men sometimes in a mad fit doing things that ordinary flesh and blood could never have performed. Oh to be distracted from selfishness by the love of Christ, and maddened into self-oblivion by a supreme passion for the Crucified. I know not how otherwise to put my thoughts into words so that they may hint at my burning meaning. May the Lord of love look into your very eyes with those eyes which once were red with weeping over human sin; may he touch your hands with those hands that were nailed to the cross, and impress the blessed nail-marks upon your feet, and then may he pierce your heart till it pour forth a life of love, and flow out in streams of kind desires, and generous deeds, and holy sacrifices for God and for His people. God grant it, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Lieutenant's Appeal.

A Missionary Hero.

WHAT REACHED THE HEART OF GEORGE MOSS.

George Moss was a young soldier who went out with his regiment to India. His joining the army had been a source of great anxiety to his parents, who were both God-fearing people, and who regarded with feelings of painful apprehension his departure from England. The profession of a soldier and all that they had heard of the loose living and corrupting example of many Anglo-Indians, made them dread the thought of their only son being surrounded by such influences. Still, their loving prayers for him were animated by the assurance that, dear as he was to his old father and mother, he must be yet dearer to the God who made him, and whose providence could take care of him even amid all the dangers of a soldier's life in a distant land.

Upon his arrival in India George Moss found life there more congenial than he had expected, and, indeed, more so than he could have found it if he had been a young man of decided piety. But he was, in truth, far from that. He could not help respecting the beautiful affection which his father and mother had always displayed toward him, and their tender solicitude for his best interests.

It was evident from letters he sent home shortly after his arrival in India that George Moss was a keen and close observer of all that went on around him, and that he was quietly taking the gauge of officers and men with whom he was brought into contact. It was also evident that one of them, Lieutenant B——, had made a striking impression upon his mind.

Poor Moss had displayed even more than common aptitude for getting into scrapes, some of them of a character so serious as to bring him under the unfavorable notice of his military superiors. In the ordinary course of things the lieutenant would have been supposed to take no notice whatever of the young scapegrace beyond the requirements of professional duty. But Lieutenant B—— had other notions of duty than those which pass current with men who see in life only that which a worldly conventionalism recognizes. Though naturally one of the most retiring of men—so retiring that people wondered how he had found his way into the army—he lost no opportunity of speaking privately with Moss about those features of his character which had become only too conspicuous.

Moss was particularly struck by the absence of cant which he had learned with all his heart to despise. There was a transparent sincerity, a quiet earnestness, and an evident fellow-feeling on the part of the officer, which gave him a warm place in the affectionate esteem of young Moss. There was that in his gentleness, in his persistent kindness, in his winning tone and manner, which Moss felt to be more Christ-like than anything he had ever seen, except under his father's roof.

One day, when the two happened to be thrown together for a few minutes, and the lieutenant had spoken to him with more than usual tenderness, Moss looked up into his face, and said, not without emotion, "What is it, sir, that makes you speak and act so differently from everybody else. You speak as if you really cared for one." "You must know by this time," said the officer, "that it is not my way to talk much about the things I feel most deeply, but, Moss, I wish to be kind to others because I owe my all to kindness. Whoever truly knows the kindness and love of God our Saviour, and believes that He and all mankind are the objects of it, must needs be kind himself."

The conversation ended abruptly, for duty called the two in different directions, but the few words dropped that morning were never forgotten by Moss. As soon as he could get into a quiet spot he took out his long-neglected Bible, and in its pages met with Him of whom the lieutenant had spoken. On the arrival in England of the next mail from India there was great rejoicing in the humble home of the young soldier's parents, for they received tidings of their son's conversion. After the expiration of his term of military service he entered the active service of Christ, and was very successful. He was often heard to declare that whatever good he had been the means of doing was entirely due to the beautiful example of Lieutenant B——, who though he said little, lived in the very spirit of his Master.

A MISSIONARY HERO.

Some years ago Captain P——, an officer in the British Royal Navy, returned from the North Pacific, having had command of a vessel stationed there. He came up to the committee of the Church Missionary Society in London, and said, "I want you to send out a missionary to those poor red Indians in the north of Canada. I know what dreadful people they are—cannibals, savages; the crimes they commit are most horrible; but still, for all that, they are fine fellows. Do send a missionary to them."

The committee felt that the funds at their disposal would not allow them to comply with this request, nor was the right man for the work forthcoming. Nevertheless, they permitted the captain to publish a little appeal in The Church Missionary Intelligencer. That appeal so impressed a gentleman who read it that he sent in $2425 toward the object thus set forth.

A short time after this Captain P—— again visited London, and told the committee that in the providence of God he was again appointed to the very same station in the North Pacific. "Now," said he, "I want you to give me a missionary to go out with me in my ship." The committee then began to think that the proposal was of the Lord; but still they could not think of the right man. Captain P—— then said, "If you have not a missionary, let me have a schoolmaster. I must take some one out with me to teach these poor people; and mind, it must not be an ordinary man. I shall want a man who is calm, collected, bold, courageous, and can turn his hand to anything."

After Captain P—— had made his appeal for a schoolmaster, it suddenly struck one of the gentlemen that a Yorkshire man, William D——, then in training for missionary work, would be exactly the man that was wanted. Accordingly he was sent for, and, after consideration and prayer, undertook to be ready to sail with the captain in ten days. The vessel arrived safely, and William D—— was left by the captain at Port Simpson, where for the present he was to make his home. It was a trading port, and many Indians came there with different things to exchange for European goods. William D—— therefore settled down among their camps, making a determined effort to learn their language, gain the hearts of their children, and make himself acquainted with their various customs, and their modes of thought and feeling. He appeared to be quietly gaining ground, when Legaet, a "medicine man" or priest, who was, however, more of a conjurer than either, held with some others a consultation about the white man who had come among them, and they determined to go and tell him the conclusion to which they had come.

Accordingly, to William D—— they went, and thus addressed him: "Now look here, white man, we don't want you here any longer. We don't want your Bible. We don't want you to teach our children." But this did not frighten the brave missionary, who answered, by God's grace he would still remain, and go on as before. A few days passed. William fancied that there was a storm brewing (Legaet had told him that if he did not close the school-house he would make him), when one morning a little boy came up to him, as they came in to their morning lessons, and said, "Oh, sir, please shut up our school to-day." The answer was, "No, my boy; all will go on as usual." In the afternoon Legaet's wife came to the room and entreated that it might be closed; but no, William D—— was steadfast. The children had just assembled in the afternoon. A boy was standing at the door striking two bars of steel together, as they had no bell. They had taken their seats, and there was some confusion outside the door. William looked out, and saw Legaet, with a band of Indians following, all in their war-dress, approaching the school-house. The door opened, and Legaet entered, ordering the boy at once to be silent, and telling the children to leave the room. They obeyed, and in came the band of Indians. There stood God's servant quite alone before him Satan's agents. Who should gain the day? Legaet advanced toward the servant of God with a weapon in his hand, and, telling him he was determined the school should be closed, drew the weapon, saying, "I have taken many a white man's life, and I want to take yours." There stood William, calm and collected, trusting in the Lord of hosts to deliver him. That was a moment of danger. But the faith of the Christian in his God did not fail. Appeals and explanations were made, and at the end of one hour the Indians one by one left the room. At last Legaet went away, and William was left unhurt, alone.

He remained in that place upward of two years, and was the honored instrument of leading many to righteousness.

That same Legaet was among the converts, and bore testimony not long ago at a public meeting, at which an old chief with white hair rose from his seat, and said, "Oh, white man, you should have come and told us the good news before! It is too late now. I have grown old in sin." In a moment Legaet rose and said, "No, chief, you are not too old. You all know what I have been. There was nothing bad but what I took a part in it; there is no murder but what I have committed; no sin you can possibly think of but what I have engaged in, and now I am a changed man. And what has done it? Why, in this precious Bible William D—— has brought us, I found these words: 'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin.' All sin—yes, even my sin. It is to that blood that I am trusting. I came to Jesus, and He has not cast me out; and what He has done for me He is willing to do for you; only come to Him."

THE MILDMAY CONFERENCE HALL.

FEW Christian people there are, especially those to whom the doctrine of Christ's second coming is precious, but are familiar with the name of the Mildmay Conference Hall in London. There those meetings of Christians have been held from which have gone out influences operating on Christian pulpits and churches throughout the world. Conferences at which the truths most dear to the Christian in the higher developments of his inner life have been reverently discussed, and prayers offered that have been abundantly answered by the outpouring of God's blessing. It is impossible to avoid feeling an interest in a building so hallowed by association, and though this Conference Hall is plain and unpretentious, and cannot, like St. Peter's in Rome and other famous ecclesiastical buildings, claim architectural merits, yet there the servants of God have met together, and there they have held converse with each other in Christian fellowship, and the place is hallowed.

In the Rev. R. Braithwaite's "Life and Letters of the Rev. W. Pennefather, B.A.," we are told the following story concerning the first steps toward the erection of the hall at Mildmay Park.

"Inquiries had been made in various directions with respect to ground, but for some time without success. The spot on which the hall was actually to stand had not even been thought of when a gentleman called at Mr. Pennefather's house very unexpectedly, to inform him that a plot of nursery ground held by a neighbor on a long lease might probably be obtained for his purpose.

"The situation was in many respects desirable, and if God was indeed pointing out the appointed site, who could doubt that every obstacle would be removed? But as yet all was very vague.

"It was at this juncture that, as he was going down the street one morning, some large placards caught his eye announcing the freehold of several adjoining properties for sale, and among them this very plot of ground. A member of the Mildmay family (who formerly owned a considerable part of the neighborhood) had died, and the sale had become necessary.

"Mr. Pennefather immediately requested a man of business to look at the piece of land, and give him his opinion as to the probable value of the freehold. He had at this time $2425 in the bank, given to him by a lady who was much distressed at the crowded state of the church, and placed it in his hands as a deposit toward any building he might be led to erect. As yet it had not been added to, but when the valuer returned and estimated the freehold of the nursery ground at $2425, the unseen hand seemed to point again in the same direction.

"'Go to the auction, then,' was Mr. Pennefather's answer, and bid for me $2425, not a penny more.' 'I might have added a little,' he said, in speaking of it afterward, 'but I did not choose to do it. I felt if that were the spot to be obtained for the Lord's work it would be bought for the $2425.'

"The man went to the auction mart. The bidding went gradually up from $485, and it was knocked down for the exact sum I had in the bank. I felt it was the Lord's doing, and it was marvellous in our eyes!"

The useful work of which the Conference Hall was the centre under Mr. Pennefather, was continued after his death in 1873, by Captain the Honorable Reynolds Moreton, R.N., who after quitting the navy devoted himself to Christian work. He lived at Norwood, near London, where he conducted some evangelistic services, and here he had the gratification of meeting Mr. and Mrs. Pennefather. A passing remark which Captain Moreton made about "being on the wrong side of London for work" was not lost upon the good vicar of St. Jude's. Mr. Pennefather wrote him the next day, saying, "If you will come to Mildmay, I will try to put you on the right side for work. I want some one to help me."

Captain Moreton, after some correspondence on the subject, consented, and a very touching and abiding interest now attaches to the letters which passed between him and Mr. Pennefather, and to the date of his deciding to begin work in the Lord's name at Mildmay.

The trustees afterward appointed Captain Moreton as superintendent, and under his judicious and unfailing care, in conjunction with Mrs. Pennefather, the good work in connection with the world-renowned Conference Hall has since steadily and surely progressed. He lately found the work too much for his health, and determined to emigrate to America with his wife and three sons and two daughters, hoping to find in the Western States a better opening for occupation for his sons than in the overcrowded cities of England, and where also Captain Moreton's great ability as a popular preacher and his missionary spirit will have plenty of scope for exercise.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Absconded.

LATE as it was, though the handsome office-clock on the chimney-piece had already struck eleven, Roland Sefton did not move. He had not stirred hand or foot for a long while now; no more than if he had been bound fast by many strong cords, which no effort could break or untie. His confidential clerk had left him two hours ago, and the undisturbed stillness of night had surrounded him ever since he had listened to his retreating footsteps. "Poor Acton!" he had said half aloud, and with a heavy sigh.

As he sat there, his clasped hands resting on his desk and his face hidden on them, all his life seemed to unfold itself before him; not in painful memories of the past only, but in terrified prevision of the black future.

How dear his native town was to him! He had always loved it from his very babyhood. The wide old streets, with ancient houses still standing here and there, rising or falling in gentle slopes, and called by quaint old names, such as he never heard elsewhere; the fine old churches crowning the hills, and lifting up delicate tall spires, visible a score of miles away; the grammar school where he had spent the happiest days of his boyhood; the rapid river, brown and swirling, which swept past the town, and came back again as if it could not leave it; the ancient bridges spanning it, and the sharp-cornered recesses on them where he had spent many an idle hour, watching the boats row in and out under the arches—he saw every familiar nook and corner of his native town vividly and suddenly, as if he caught glimpses of them by the capricious play of lightning.

And this pleasant home of his; these walls which inclosed his birthplace, and the birthplace of his children! He could not imagine himself finding true rest and a peaceful shelter elsewhere. The spacious old rooms, with brown wainscoted walls and carved ceilings; the tall and narrow windows, with deep window-sills, where as a child he had so often knelt, gazing out on the wide green landscape, and the far distant, almost level line of the horizon—his boy Felix had knelt in one of them a few hours ago, looking out with grave childish eyes on the sunset; the broad, shallow steps of the oaken staircase, trodden so many years by the feet of all who were dearest to him; the quiet chambers above, where his mother, his wife, and his children were at this moment sleeping peacefully—how unutterably and painfully sweet all his home was to him!

Very prosperous his life had been; hardly ever shadowed by a single cloud. His father, who had been the third partner in the oldest bank in Riversborough, had lived until he was old enough to step into his place. The bank had been established in the last century, and was looked upon as being as safe as the Bank of England. The second partner was dead; and the eldest, Mr. Clifford, had left everything in his hands for the last five years.

No man in Riversborough had led a more prosperous life than he had. His wife was from one of the county families; without fortune, indeed, but with all the advantages of high connections, which lifted him above the rank of mere business men, and admitted him into society hitherto closed even to the head partner in the old bank; in spite even of the fact that he still occupied the fine old house adjoining the bank premises. There was scarcely a townsman who was held to be his equal; not one who was considered his superior. Though he was little over thirty yet, he was at the head of all municipal affairs. He had already held the office of mayor for one year, and might have been re-elected, if his wife had not somewhat scorned the homely bourgeois dignity. There was no more popular man in the whole town than he was.

But he had been building on the sands; and the storm was rising. He could hear the moan of the winds growing louder, and the rush of the on-coming floods drawing nearer. He must make good his escape now, or never. If he put off flight till to-morrow, he would be crushed with the falling of his house.

He lifted himself up heavily, and looked round the room. It was his private office, at the back of the bank, handsomely furnished as a bank parlor should be. Over the fireplace hung the portrait of old Clifford, the senior partner, faithfully painted by a local artist, who had not attempted to soften the hard, stern face, and the fixed stare of the cold blue eyes, which seemed fastened pitilessly upon him. He had never seen the likeness before as he saw it now. Would such a man overlook a fault, or have any mercy for an offender? Never! He turned away from it, feeling cold and sick at heart; and with a heavy and very bitter sigh he locked the door upon the room where he had spent so large a portion of his life. The place which had known him would know him no more.

As noiselessly and warily as if he was a thief breaking into the quiet house he stole up the dimly-lighted staircase, and paused for a minute or two before a door, listening intently. Then he crept in. A low shaded lamp was burning, giving light enough to guide him to the cot where Felix was sleeping. It would be his birthday to-morrow, and the child must not lose his birthday gift; though the relentless floods were rushing on toward him also. Close by was the cot where his baby daughter, Hilda, was at rest. He stood between them, and could lay a hand on each. How soundly the children slept while his heart was breaking! Dear as they had been to him, he had never realized till now how priceless beyond all words such little tender creatures could be. He had called them into existence; and now the greatest good that could befall them was his death. It was unutterable agony to him.

His gift was a Bible, the boy's own choice; and he laid it on the pillow where Felix would find it as soon as his eyes opened. He bent over him, and kissed him with trembling lips. Hilda stirred a little when his lips touched her soft, rosy face, and she half opened her eyes, whispering, "Father;" and then fell asleep again, smiling. He dared not linger another moment, but passing stealthily away, he paused listening at another door, his face white with anguish. "I dare not see Felicita," he murmured to himself, "but I must look on my mother's face once again."

The door made no sound as he opened it, and his feet fell noiselessly on the thick carpet; but as he drew near his mother's bed, her eyes opened with a clear, steady gaze, as if she had been awaiting his coming. There was a light burning here as well as in the night-nursery adjoining, for it was his mother who had charge of the children, and who would be the first the nurse would call if anything was the matter. She awoke as one who expects to be called upon at any hour; but the light was too dim to betray the misery on her son's face.

"Roland!" she said, in a slightly foreign accent.

"Were you calling, mother?" he asked. "I was passing by, and I came in here to see if you wanted anything."

"I did not call, my son," she answered; "but what have you the matter? Is Felicita ill? or the babies? Your voice is sad, Roland."

"No, no," he said, forcing himself to speak in a cheerful voice; "Felicita is asleep, I hope; and the babies are all right. But I have been late at bank-work; and I turned in just to have a look at you, mother, before I go to bed."

"That's my good son," she said, smiling, and taking his hand between her own in a fond clasp.

"Am I a good son?" he asked.

His mother's face was a fair, sweet face still, the soft brown hair scarcely touched with white; and with clear, dark gray eyes gazing up frankly into his own. They were eyes like these, with their truthful light shining through them, inherited from her, which in himself had won the unquestioning trust and confidence of those who were brought into contact with him. There was no warning signal of disloyalty in his face to set others on their guard. His mother looked up at him tenderly.

"Always a good son, the best of sons, Roland," she replied, "and a good husband, and a good father. Only one little fault in my good son: too spendthrift, too lavish. You are not a fine, rich lord, with large lands, and much, very much money, my boy. I do my best in the house; but women can only save pennies, while men fling about pounds."

"But you love me with all my faults, mother?" he said.

"As my own soul," she answered.

There was a profound solemnity in her voice and look which penetrated to his very heart. She was not speaking lightly. It was in the same spirit with which Paul wrote, after saying, "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord"—"I could wish that myself were separate from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh." His mother had reached that sublime height of love for him.

He stood silent, looking down on her with dull, aching eyes, as he said to himself it was perhaps for the last time. It was the last time she would ever see him as her good son. With her, in her heart and memory, all his life dwelt; she knew the whole of it, with no break or interruption. Only this one hidden thread, which had been woven into the web in secret, and which was about to stand out with such clear and open disclosure; of this she had no faint suspicion. For a minute or two he felt as if he must tell her of it; that he must roll off this horrible weight from himself, and crush her faithful heart with it. But what could his mother do? Her love could not stay the storm; she had no power to bid the winds and waves be still. It would be best for all of them if he could make his escape secretly, and be altogether lost in impenetrable darkness.

At that moment a clock in the hall below struck one.

"Well," he said, wearily, "if I'm to get any sleep to-night, I must be off to bed. Good-bye, mother."

"Good-bye?" she repeated, with a smile.

"Good-night, of course," he replied, bending over her and kissing her tenderly.

"God bless you, my son," she said, putting both her hands upon his head, and pressing his face close to her own. He could not break away from her fond embrace; but in a few moments she let him go, bidding him get some rest before the night was passed.

Once more he stood in the dimly-lighted passage, listening at his wife's door, with his fingers involuntarily clasping the handle. But he dared not go in. If he looked upon Felicita again he could not leave her, even to escape from ruin and disgrace. An agony of love and of terror took possession of him. Never to see her again was horrible; but to see her shrink from him as a base and dishonest man, his name an infamy to her, would be worse than death. Did she love him enough to forgive a sin committed chiefly for her sake? In the depths of his own soul the answer was no.

He stole downstairs again, and passed out by a side door into the streets. It was raining heavily, and the wind was moaning through the deserted thoroughfares, where no sound of footsteps could be heard. Behind him lay his pleasant home, never so precious as at this moment. He looked up at the windows, the two faintly lit up, and that other darkened window of the chamber he had not dared to enter. In a few hours those women, so unutterably dear to him, would be overwhelmed by the great sorrow he had prepared for them; those children would become the inheritors of his sin. He looked back longingly and despairingly, as if there only was life for him; and then hurrying on swiftly, he lost sight of the old home, and felt as a drowning wretch at sea feels when the heaving billows hide from him the glimmering light of the beacon, which, however, can offer no harbor of refuge to him.

Though the night had been stormy the sun rose brightly on the rain-washed streets, and the roofs and walls stood out with a peculiar clearness, and with a more vivid color than usual, against the deep blue of the sky. It was May-day, and most hearts were stirred with a pleasant feeling of a holiday; not altogether a common day, though the shops were all open, and business was going on as usual. The old bethought themselves of the days when they had gone a-Maying; and the young felt less disposed to work, and were inclined to wander out in search of May-flowers in the green meadows, or along the sunny banks of the river, which surrounded the town.

Early, very early considering the ten miles she had ridden on her rough hill-pony, came a young country girl across one of the ancient bridges, with a large market-basket on her arm, brimful of golden May-flowers, set off well by their own glossy leaves, and by the dark blue of her dress. She checked her pony and lingered for a few minutes, looking over the parapet at the swift rushing of the current through the narrow arches. A thin line of alders grew along the margin of the river, with their pale green leaves half unfolded, and in the midst of the swirling waters, parting them into two streams, lay a narrow islet on which tall willow wands were springing, with soft, white buds on every rod, and glistening in the sunshine. Not far away a lofty avenue of lime-trees stretched along the banks, casting wavering shadows on the brown river; while beyond it, on the summit of one of the hills on which the town was built, there rose the spires of two churches built close together, with the gilded crosses on their tapering points glittering more brightly than anything else in the joyous light. For a little while the girl gazed dreamily at the landscape, her color coming and going quickly, and then with a deep-drawn sigh of delight, she roused herself and her pony, and passed on into the town.

THE TABERNACLE.

S. S. Lesson for October 9. Exod. 40 : 1-19. Golden Text, ver. 34. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Tabernacle originated with God, not with man. After He had brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, had taken upon Himself to guide them through the desert, had provided them with food and with water, and had make known His law to them, He called upon them to bring Him an offering, as we have seen in our last lesson, and He added, "Let them make me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them" (Ex. 25 : 8). It is an unfathomable mystery of God's love, that He, the mighty Maker and Ruler of the universe, should conceive the thought of dwelling among such as we are. And He wills it still, for He says, "Ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people; wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing" (2 Cor. 6 : 16, 17). In order that by the grace of God we may be practical, let us remember that it is written, "Or know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have from God? and ye are not your own, for ye were bought with a price; glorify God, therefore, in your body" (1 Cor. 6 : 19, 20. R. ver.). Just as the deeds of the body are the index of the heart and mind which dwell within, so God wills that the bodies of His people in all their words and actions should indicate an indwelling God.

The first thing we notice in the chapter chosen for our subject is that the tabernacle was to be set up "on the first day of the first month." "Seek ye first the kingdom of God" (Matt. 6 : 33). Let nothing take precedence of this fact in a sanctified child of God. "I am God's dwelling-place;" and let there be no occasion for the world to make any mistake. "The Lord is with them, His interests are more to them than their own." Then we find that the ark of the testimony was to be placed in the tabernacle and covered with the vail. Here there was the Holy of Holies where the high priest went "alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people; the Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest" (Heb. 9 : 7, 8).

But blessed be God, the way into the holiest is now made by the blood of Jesus; the vail, which is His flesh, was rent like the vail of the temple, from the top to the bottom, from God's side to man's; and now, not in ourselves, but as crucified with Christ, as they who have willingly renounced themselves in favor of another, we, as members of the body of the one High Priest, can enter into the holiest. But this can only be if we "draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10 : 22). Then the ark of the testimony, the sign and pledge of God's covenant with us, becomes manifest to the world. It was the presence and power of God with them which made the first disciples of Christ so powerful in the world, we hear nothing of their talents or learning, but we do hear that they had been with Jesus and that God was with them of a truth.

We next notice that the table was to be set, and the shew-bread (twelve cakes) to be placed upon it (Lev. 24 : 5-8) with frankincense, to testify that the bread was an offering of worship. Jesus is the bread of life, and as the corn has to be destroyed, ground down into powder, in order to be made bread, so He was broken and died for us. But as the loaves were twelve in number, they undoubtedly typified the twelve tribes of Israel, who by laying down their wills, their own lives, might become a satisfaction for God Himself, the bread of their God. The candlestick with its seven branches, all made of pure gold, was to be brought in, and the lamps lit. Light was the first thing which God created. Christ is the Light of the world, and just as He is first foreshadowed in the shew-bread placed upon the table which was overlaid with gold in token of His God-man nature, so first He and then His Church is foreshadowed in the candlestick. He the bread, we in Him the bread, He the light of the world, but we the light of the world in Him. We next read of the golden altar of incense, burning before the ark of the testimony outside the vail (Ex. 30 : 6) No bleeding victim was laid upon this altar; true the blood of the sacrifice on the day of atonement was brought in, for without shedding of blood is no remission of sin; but none could enter here but such as were already cleansed.

Before going on to speak of that which stood without the Tabernacle, let us consider its structure. The framework was made of pillars, boards, and bars, of wood and overlaid with gold, with rings of gold for the bars, and sockets of silver to fit into them. Over this the embroidered curtains were hung with fifty loops, which should exactly fit into one another. "The loops held one curtain to another. And he made fifty taches of gold, and coupled the curtains one unto another with the taches; so it became one tabernacle" (Ex. 36 : 12. 13). Although, as individuals, our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost, yet, in a larger sense, the whole Church of Christ is God's habitation. "An holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2 : 21, 22). But the boards must be sawed until they are of the right length and breadth, the bars must be turned until all the inequalities are gone, and they are round enough to go into the rings; the loops must take their little place, apparently so unimportant, but the weight of the curtains hangs upon these inferior parts of the whole; the taches or hooks are most essential, as well as the strong boards and beautiful curtains. Then the coarse rams' skins and badgers' skins which protect and shelter the embroidery and gold beneath, are perhaps more important than any other part, for without them all would be spoiled by wind and weather. Now, many believers would like to be beautiful curtains, which every one can see and admire and speak of, but they cannot endure to be only hooks or only rings, and yet these little things were made of a more precious metal than the conspicuous portions of the tabernacle. God has made it a rule, "Whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister, and whosoever of you will be the chiefest shall be servant of all" (Mark 10 : 43, 44) It may be, nay, it must be, that believers, however little known, filling a place however small, who serve by faith and love and prayer to cement "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," are in God's eyes the most necessary members. Sawing, planing, turning, stitching, anything which can be done by the hand of man, does not serve to refine the metal from which these parts were made, it is the "gold tried in the fire" the "silver . . . purified seven times." It is comparatively an easy thing to stand out and witness for God with zeal and love, independently of others. But it is not so easy to pass through the fire of misconstruction, coldness, and contempt from brethren in Christ, while yielding only love in return, and hiding one's self in a corner if one may only unite them; yet such is our high calling.

God ordained that the court should be set up with hangings of "fine twined linen" (Ex. 27 : 18), and within the court the altar of burnt offering and the laver. Thus entering in at the door of the court, the first thing that met the eye was the smoking altar, with the victim laid there in token that death is the penalty of sin, and that God has "found a ransom" (Job 33 : 24), and then the laver, in token that he whose sins are atoned for must be also cleansed and remain clean, for no priest might enter the tabernacle to worship and serve God, except by the altar, and having washed in the laver. How, then, can such draw nigh, whose sins are yet unpardoned, and how can pardoned sinners approach who have still a heart which condemns them? After all was set in order the Lord commanded Moses to take the anointing oil and anoint the tabernacle, and all that was therein. No oil was to be made like this anointing oil, on pain of death, and it was expressly said, "Upon man's flesh it shall not be poured" (Ex. 30 : 32). The Holy Spirit, of whom it is the type, cannot mix His work with that of the flesh. But how clearly this teaches us that the very atonement of Christ, of which the altar is a type, the very purifying, the very act of worship, is all nothing without the unction of the Holy Ghost.

The last thing to be done was the anointing of the priests. Aaron and his sons must be brought to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and first they must be washed with water. "There shall enter in nothing that defileth" (Rev. 21 : 27); then they must put on holy garments, the type of that putting on the Lord Jesus Christ of which the Apostle Paul speaks (Rom. 13 : 14); in purification and in clothing they must be separate. On Aaron's head was placed the mitre, with its golden band engraved "Holiness to the Lord," and on his breast was bound the breastplate which contained the names of the children of Israel, as well as the onyx stones upon his shoulders, for Aaron was the property of the people, the representative, his heart was at their disposal to bear their burdens, and to do priestly work for them with God. In his anointing, and that of his sons, the ear, the hand, and the foot were anointed (Ex. 29 : 20), that he might be as a whole burnt offering unto God, and a holy medium of intercourse between Him and the people. And nothing could undo this dedication, "Their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood throughout their generations." "I have given you your priests' office as a service of gift, and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death" (Numb. 18 : 7).

At last the work was finished. God had expressed His willingness to receive a willing offering from His unworthy people, and they had offered with all their heart. How should they know whether the offering was accepted? God never leaves His people in doubt on this head. "A cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. So is it always when we do the will of our God. He never leaves us without a witness that we please Him, His glory alone can fill hearts and tabernacles; He is "the fulness of Him who filleth all in all." Moses could not enter in, God was enough when He was there. O! to be so full of God that we ourselves cannot enter in. This presence of God was the glory, the safeguard, and the guide of the Israelites upon all their journeys.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Europe has been Thrilled by the Intelligence of President Garfield's death, and the expressions of sympathy which have been cabled across the Atlantic from every land have been most gratifying and consoling. It is not the least among good results which may follow our national calamity that there is revealed to us the close bond of sympathy existing between the United States and European countries. From France, Russia, Austria, Germany, Italy, and Spain have come messages of condolence and in these, rulers, courts, press, and people have united.

Great Britain, Especially, has Manifested a sorrow only second to our own. A prominent English daily says: "To the Queen upon the throne as to the poorest peasant, this morning's news from across the Atlantic comes as a message of woe, personal as well as national. Since the death of the Prince Consort and the dreadful illness of the Prince of Wales, the heart of the English nation has not been so moved as it is to-day." Queen Victoria cabled to Mrs. Garfield, immediately on hearing of the sad event, the following sympathetic words, in reading which we hear one widow comforting another, rather than a queen speaking to the President's lady: "Words cannot express the deep sympathy I feel with you at this terrible moment. May God support and comfort you, as He alone can." The Queen also directed her representative at Washington to procure a wreath of flowers and lay upon the casket in her name. The same afternoon there was sent from the British Legation a massive wreath, one of the most beautiful ever seen in Washington. Attached was a card which bore the following touching and significant inscription:

"Queen Victoria to the memory of the late President Garfield. An expression of her sorrow and sympathy with Mrs. Garfield and the American nation.

The Queen has also ordered that every one about her court shall wear mourning for one week. This is a mark of respect rarely paid except in case of personal relationship to her Majesty.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon Writes as Follows: "All through the President's illness a sympathy has been felt among us akin to that which would have been created by the sickness of our own Queen. The bravery of the sufferer, the graciousness of his life, and the goodness of the cause which he represented, all unite in deepening the intense regret felt among the Christian people of England. This sympathy has greatly tended to draw the two nations into closer fraternity. Thus some measure of good has arisen out of gigantic evil."

The Poet Laureate of England, Mr. Alfred Tennyson, has written a graceful and characteristic letter to our minister in London referring to President Garfield's death. It is significant that the late President was an enthusiastic admirer of Mr. Tennyson, often quoting from his poems in his speeches and conversation, and that of all the poems, he liked none so much as the exquisite one entitled "In Memoriam." The poet laureate's letter is as follows: "We learned yesterday that the President was gone. We have watched with much admiration his fortitude, and, not without hope, the fluctuations of his health, these many days. Now we seem almost to have lost a personal friend. He was a good man and a noble. Accept from me and my wife and family assurances of heartfelt sympathy for Mrs. Garfield, for yourself, and for your country."

A Large Meeting of American Citizens Resident in or visiting Europe assembled in Paris on September 22d, to give expression to their grief over the national calamity. Mr. Morton, United States minister, was chosen president, and General McClellan vice-president. Speeches were made by Rev. Dr. Tyng, William Allen Butler, ex-Senator Cattell, Hon. John Jay, General J. Meredith Read, Mr. Hitchcock, Mr. John Jacob Astor, Mr. Thomas Allen, Mr. John Hayes, and Mr. William Seligman. Ex-Governor Hoffman and several other gentlemen were appointed a Committee on Resolutions. On the right and left of the chairman sat General McClellan and Mr. Hayes. Resolutions were passed expressing horror at the crime and sympathy for the widow and mother of the martyr President; also declaring that "this assembly is profoundly sensible of the evidences of affection and regret that France has given to the United States on this occasion."

The Methodist Œcumenical Council Closed its sessions on September 20th, with the adoption of an address to all Methodists, which was read by Bishop Peck, of Syracuse, N. Y., and signed by a representative of every Wesleyan body, recommending the views favored at the various sittings, calling upon all to co-operate in the work of Christ to maintain the traditional Methodist means for the promotion of earnestness, and declaring that a call should go forth for a great spiritual awakening. The meeting of the next council in America, in 1887, was authorized.

The British Secretary for Irish Affairs has definitely refused to release the persons confined in prison under the Coercion Act. Mr. Gavan and Mr. Dickson, members of Parliament, recently waited upon him, asking the release of the political suspects, and of Mr. Davitt. Mr. Forster wrote in reply that the subject has received most careful consideration, and the release of all the prisoners would at once be ordered if this could be done without endangering the public peace. But as yet there are only partial signs of improvement, that in many parts of Ireland outrages are still frequent and the law still resisted, and it is impossible to ignore the fact that there is still an organized system of intimidation amounting frequently to terrorism. Under these circumstances the policy of the government must continue to be the individual consideration of the case of each prisoner, taking into account the condition of the district from which he comes.

The Probabilities of a Revival of the Famous triple alliance between Austria, Germany, and Russia are again discussed by European statesmen. The rumors spring from the announcement that the Emperor of Russia has instructed the Russian ambassador at Vienna to inquire of the Emperor of Austria whether it would be agreeable to him to meet him this month at Warsaw, leaving the choice of time and place, however, to him. In anticipation of an affirmative reply the Emperor of Russia has ordered the Imperial palace at Warsaw to be made ready for the interview.

The Rev. Vishnoo Bhasker, of the American Missionary Board, died at Bombay, India, on August 5th, aged forty-six years. He was a high caste Brahman, and was converted to Christianity twenty-seven years ago, since which time he has maintained a bright and consistent profession. He was a man greatly beloved and an efficient pastor. He had much to suffer and to sacrifice in becoming a Christian, but it was evident that he found in Christ that which abundantly compensated for all trials connected with the renunciation of Hindooism. He had not been many years a Christian when the seeds of a distressing and incurable disease manifested themselves, bringing upon him a life-long burden that would have crushed a man of inferior faith. The day he was medically informed of the character of his disease, he went to his room and spent the night in prayer, and by the grace of God, was enabled before morning to submit to the fiery trial appointed him; and he was ever afterwards kept from any thing like a disposition to complain of the providence that visited him in so grievous a way. He was wonderfully saved from the depressing influences that would naturally accompany such a trial, and was to the very last, cheerful, genial, self-forgetting, and ready to do anything for the comfort or well-being of others.

A Correspondent of the London "Daily News" sought to accompany the Russian General Skobeleff on his expedition against Geog Tepe, and having been frustrated in that, went to Persia in order to reach the scene of war from the south. When, on the fall of Geog Tepe, Merv became the centre of interest, he determined to make his way thither. There he is now, but as a prisoner, and the wonder is that he has not had to pay the forfeit of his life. But no country is so remote, so inaccessible, or so insignificant that it can be allowed to [illegible] the secret of its being in its own bos[om] The [illegible] of the telegraph to all lands u[nless] the sun is just one expression of this mighty t[hirst] for news. The idea that some great event m[ay] occur in some remote land, and nothing be kn[own] of it for weeks, is utterly intolerable. The Typhoid Fever at the Bristol Orphages.—Last week we announced that a numbe[r of] orphan children under Mr. G. Muller's care, [at] Bristol, had been attacked by typhoid fever. [We] have great pleasure in publishing the following [let]ter from Mr. James Wright: "Through the me[rcy] of our prayer-hearing God, I am able to send [you] a very favorable report of the dear children. [The] majority of the cases were very light, and all [are] decidedly improving. We have had no fatal ca[se] and no fresh case for several days." The BRITISH MAIL STEAMER TEUTON, Wrecked on Aug. 30.—Her Commander, Capt. MANNING.

THE WRECK OF THE TEUTON.

The Scene of the Disaster—The Ship Strikes on a Hidden Rock—The Roll-call of the Dead—Captain and Crew Die at Their Post—Previous Losses in the Same Waters—Captain E. Manning, the Commander of the Ship.

THE maritime catastrophe briefly described in our issue of September 8th loses none of its appalling features in the later accounts received. It adds another to the already long list of calamities marked with serious loss of life, of which so many have occurred during this eventful and mournful year. No less than two hundred and thirty-six human beings are believed to have gone down with the Teuton on August 30th, off that treacherous African coast. We give, this week, a picture of the noble vessel in the awful moment when she sank beneath the waves, and also a portrait of Captain Edward Manning, her commander.

The Teuton was one of the steamers engaged in the mail service of the British Colonies in South Africa. She left England on her voyage to Africa on Friday, August 5th, having on board one hundred and thirty-seven passengers, and a crew of eighty-five. She arrived at Cape Town no later than Monday, August 29th, so that the majority of the passengers lost must have belonged to Great Britain, though as the vessel called in at Cape Town, and when wrecked was on her way to Port Durban or Natal, some colonists were among those who have met so sad a death. It would appear that the steamer left Cape Town on Tuesday morning, closely hugging the shore, as is too frequently the custom of the coasting vessels in that part of the world. It is still winter in these southern latitudes, but there are no indications in the telegrams that the weather was stormy. The probabilities are that the voyage was distinguished by no untoward incident until seven in the evening.

THE SCENE OF THE DISASTER.

From Table Bay to Cape Agulhas the coast of the Cape Colony is bold and rocky, and from this point to Algoa Bay several of the lofty mountain ranges which intersect the interior, run, in places, close to the shore. From Cape Point the appearance of the country is less forbidding, but from a seaman's aspect it is among the less pleasing parts of the world. Sharp reefs of rock run out here and there, almost every one of which has a tale of wreck and disaster associated with its name. The currents are also strong. The Cape Stream, which is formed by the junction of the Mozambique current and those of the seas south of Madagascar, deflected by the Agulhas Bank, doubles the Cape of Good Hope, and there mixes with the waters of the South Atlantic. Its mean velocity is about two miles an hour; but sometimes it will carry a vessel at its mercy one hundred miles in the course of a single day.

Between Capes Hangklip and Agulhas—the most southern extremity of the African Continent—several of the bays are open and exposed, though they afford shelter in north-west gales, and have one or two little coves from which farm produce may be shipped. Hence a vessel disabled in this quarter could hardly find shelter until False Bay was reached. Danger Point, a well-known landmark, has a treacherous rock lying to the east of it, on which, on March 25th, 1852, her Majesty's ship Birkenhead struck. The Gunner's Quoin, which is destined to have in future almost as evil a notoriety, is another familiar landmark between Danger Point and Cape Agulhas. So far the coast is unlighted. On the southern tip of the continent, at an elevation of eight hundred feet above the sea, there is a lighthouse, and east of Agulhas is Ostrich Bay, where shelter for vessels may be obtained in north-west gales, though in the sailing directions for these shores seamen are warned to give it a wide berth in south-easters. The entire coast is, however, a dangerous one. During the winter, wild storms sweep it, but even in the finest weather any vessel caught off it runs a slender chance, unless commanded by the most experienced captain, intimately acquainted with the hidden rocks and shoals.

The Cape of Good Hope is a small peninsula, with a narrow and mountainous isthmus, having Table Bay, with Cape Town, on the west side, toward the Atlantic; and, to the south-east, False Bay, of which Simon's Bay, an important naval station, is the inner recess, affording a well-sheltered harbor.

The Teuton, under the command of Captain Manning, after rounding the Cape of Good Hope, proceeded on a south-east course, and passed Danger Point, five miles off, at half-past five o'clock. At twenty minutes past seven, the land being then apparently four miles distant, with fine evening moonlight, clear overhead, but hazy over the shore, the ship struck on a hidden rock off Quoin Point. The vessel, a strong iron one, was fitted with water-tight bulkheads, which the captain appears to have thought would confine the flood of water to one portion of the ship, leaving sufficient compartments vacant to keep her afloat for a time. The captain, as the ship was backed off immediately, decided to run back to the nearest point of land and get into Simon's Bay. The sea was calm, and the weather was fair.

Between eight and nine o'clock, as the water came in rapidly, in spite of pumping, the boats were got ready and provisioned. There was perfect order on board among passengers and crew. At ten o'clock the ship was stopped to lower the boats, the first of which was filled with women and children, accompanied by only two sailors. After the engines were stopped, and before the boats already laden had been got clear of the ship, the bulkhead between the compartments suddenly gave way, letting the water into the engine-room from the forward compartments, which were already full of water. A wild wail of despair rose into the silent night, and in a few seconds the waves closed over the vessel and her precious freight.

THE ROLL-CALL OF THE DEAD.

Three boats out of seven were able to float apart from the wreck, and some people in the sea, after the ship sank, got into the boats, two of which arrived safely at Simon's Bay, but one went down. The other people perished with the ship, and it now appears that the whole number drowned is greater than was originally expected, some twenty-five coolies having joined the steamer at Cape Town for East London. The passengers from England remaining on board after the vessel landed those for Cape Town numbered one hundred and sixty-two; the crew was eighty-five strong, and adding the twenty-five coolies, the total human freight for places east of Cape Town was two hundred and seventy-two. Of these, thirty-six persons, including only eleven passengers, were saved; therefore, the total loss of life is two hundred and thirty-six.

The Teuton was an iron steamer of 2309 tons, built at Southampton in 1869, and classed 100 A 1 at Lloyd's. She was brig-rigged, and had seven bulkheads. Her engines were recently overhauled and put in thorough repair.

CAPTAIN AND CREW DIE AT THEIR POST.

Though the fact that the list of rescued included a far greater number of members of the ship's company than of passengers gave rise at first to the suspicion that the crew had not behaved in a manner creditable to the heroic traditions of British seamanship, we are glad to find that at least the largest portion of the crew with the captain appear to have bravely done their duty in the hour of peril.

After the ship struck on the rock, Captain Manning, who was below at the time, immediately came on deck, mounted the bridge, and remained at his post to the end. Perfect discipline was maintained, and no panic occurred. The surgeon, Mr. Rose-Innes, and the supercargo, Mr. Cowen, seemed to have specially distinguished themselves in preserving order while the boats were being lowered.

"WOMEN AND CHILDREN FIRST,"

was the command given and calmly and cheerfully obeyed, only one male passenger having attempted to disregard it on being implored by his wife to take his seat in the boat. He was forced back, however, by the surgeon, and compelled to wait his turn with the rest of the male passengers, who remained quietly on deck. For none of them the turn ever came.

The circumstances and the locality recall the memory of the wreck of

THE BIRKENHEAD,

February 27th, 1852, which occurred near the same spot, and has been justly described as one of the grandest illustrations of the heroism of the nineteenth century. "The vessel was steaming along the African Coast," says an eminent historian, "having on board 472 men and 166 women and children. The men belonged to several British regiments then serving at the Cape of Good Hope. At two o'clock in the morning, while all were asleep below, the ship struck with violence upon a hidden rock, which penetrated her bottom, and it was at once felt that she must go down. The roll of the drum called the soldiers to arms on the upper deck, and the men mustered as if for parade. The word was passed to save the women and children, and the helpless creatures were brought from below, mostly undressed, and handed silently into the boats. When they had all left the ship's side the commander of the vessel thoughtlessly called out 'All those who can swim jump overboard.' But Captain Wright, of the 91st Highlanders, said 'No, if you do that the boats with the women will be swamped;' and the brave men stood motionless. There was no boat remaining, and no hope of safety; but not a heart quailed, no one flinched from his duty in that trying moment. 'There was not a murmur nor a cry among them,' said Captain Wright, who survived, 'until the vessel made her final plunge. Down went the ship, and down went the heroic band, saluting their officers as they sank beneath the waves.'"

WHAT LED TO THE LOSS?

The Union company lost a vessel named the Celt, in the same locality in 1875, but in her case all her passengers and crew happily were saved. The steamer in question was on the same voyage as the Teuton. There is, of course, no room to doubt that the Teuton was sailing too near the dangerous reefs, "unmarked by any light," but what led to this fatal error is unexplained. Of the two most likely causes, some excessive and unobserved deviation of the compasses, or the force of an unexpected current driving the steamer rapidly inland, the latter is deemed the more probable. Disturbance of the compasses is a danger against which the most skilful seamanship can hardly avail, and this disturbance may have occasioned the disaster. It is a peril, also, most likely to be undiscovered at night. The effect of currents is liable to be equally insidious. In few seas are greater dangers of this kind to be met with than off the southern shore of the Cape Colony.

False Bay and Danger Point express directly, as the Cape of Good Hope, according to one legend, expresses indirectly, how perilous are those forlorn seas. If it be true that the dangerous Quoin Point, over which heavy waves are constantly breaking, is still unmarked by any light, as is asserted, the omission cannot be too soon supplied. That, however, is only one out of many subjects into which the strictest investigation will be imperatively demanded.

CAPTAIN EDWARD MANNING,

who commanded the Teuton, and whose portrait appears on our frontispiece, was the youngest son of Mr. C. J. Manning, of Maitland Park, London, and about thirty-six years of age. He was educated at University College School. He afterward joined the merchant service, and after passing with great credit the examination required by the British Board of Trade, received an appointment in the Union Company as junior officer. Captain Manning bore the character of being a good seaman, the confidence of the company in his judgment being testified by the fact that he has for a very long time been intrusted with the command of one or other among the chief steamers on the Atlantic station. Much surprise, however, is expressed in shipping circles that, with the experience gained by some twenty years' service in the South African trade, he should have lost his vessel in such a place. He was unmarried, and the only relatives he leaves are three brothers and one sister.

The most heartrending circumstance connected n the whole affair is that two precious hours e lost which might have placed the victims out he reach of danger, assuming that there were ugh boats provided by the company; but on head the intelligence is not very clear. It ly appears as if not a life need have been lost, that we might have been spared that unhappy ctacle of happy homes now dark with sorrow, Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing e comforted, which at this moment casts such adow on many households.

E SEVEN HEADS UPON THE WILD BEAST OF REV. 17.

Rev. Richard Chester, A.B., Treasurer of the Cathedral of Cloyne, Ireland.

Suggested Interpretation—1. The Beast Under the Eighth Head—2. The Heads not Individual Sovereigns—The Co-existence of Seven Heads and Ten Horns—The Resuscitated Headship—Not a Roman Emperor—Not the Papacy—The Papacy a Power, not a Head—The Eighth, Napoleonism—Democratic Monarchism—The Eight Sovereignties.

WISH to put before students of prophecy for ir consideration, a view of the angel's explana- n of the seven heads upon "the wild beast car- ng the woman" (Revelation 17:7-11), which ers, in at least one important particular, from se which have been usually adopted, and which, ile I cannot say that I have as yet myself decid- y adopted it, commends itself to me as more mple, and more likely to be correct, than the pre- ling views and opinions concerning this most portant prophecy.

This view, which I desire rather to suggest than advocate, is founded upon an interpretation of angel's words which was put forward exactly hundred years ago, by a then celebrated writer on prophecy, Doctor More, in a work entitled Apocalypsis Apocalypseos." It is as follows: ie Roman empire, as represented by the wild ast in the vision of Revelation 17 (the same as presented by the fourth wild beast of Daniel's ion, Daniel 7:7, 23), is to be governed from its mmencement to its close by eight different sover- gnties, or ruling powers. Of these eight, seven, d only seven, are to exercise the nature and nount of power sufficient to constitute them heads," and to have caused them to be so repre- nted in the vision. Of these seven heads five d arisen and "fallen" (that is, ceased to exist) fore the apostle saw, or the angel explained, the sion.

The sixth head was extant, and in the exercise its power, at the time of the vision and its ex- anation. Between this sixth and the seventh and st head another sovereignty is to intervene, which not to attain to the governmental importance and ominence of a "head," but is yet to be a gov- ning power or sovereignty, thus constituting the mber of the sovereignties eight in all. Eight vereignties, of which, however, only seven are heads." The last of these is accordingly to be eighth sovereignty, and one (the seventh) of e seven heads. According to this view, the an- el's explanation would read thus: "And there are ven kings (or heads, of which) five are fallen, nd one (the sixth head) is; and the other (the venth head) is not yet come, and when he com- h he must continue a short space. And the east that was, and is not, even he is the eighth overeignty), and is (one) of the seven (heads), nd goeth into perdition."

Before, however, we can think of accepting this iew, there are some

o be asked and answered.

1. If the beast that carries the woman be the ntire fourth, or Roman empire with its seven eads and ten horns, how can he also be the ighth, and only the eighth, of the powers which re to rule over that empire? The answer here would seem evidently to be that it is under this ighth and last sovereign power, and not under ny of its predecessors, that the beast (identified or the time being with his ruler) carries the wom- n. This is a most important point. It restricts he predicted time of the carriage of the woman to a brief period in the history of the wild beast, and marks, moreover, that time as belonging to the closing scenes of that history.

2. Why should we adopt this view in preference to that which represents the seven heads, not as sovereignties or ruling powers, but rather as individual sovereigns—"kings," as they are styled by the angel? I reply first, because of the impossibility of finding in the history of the Roman (or fourth) empire throughout the past, five individual sovereigns—no more, and no less—of sufficient prominence among its many rulers to distinguish them as "five heads," and thus to meet the requirement of the angel's assertion, "Five are fallen." The utter failure of every attempt to do this that I have ever met with is, to my mind, perfectly conclusive. I reply again, that if these five kings, or heads, be individuals, then Domitian, who was the reigning emperor when the angel gave utterance to the statement, "one is," must needs have been the sixth head; whereas no conceivable reason for his having been distinguished thus above other governors or emperors—for his being a "head," when there are a multitude of other Roman rulers not so designated—can by any possibility be assigned.

That these "kings," or "heads," are not individuals, but seems to be very apparent from the fact that the terms "kings" and "kingdoms," or forms of government, are interchangeably used in the prophecies of Daniel; also from the fact that six forms of government, corresponding so far with the angel's interpretation, are enumerated by Roman historians as having borne rule over the city and empire of Rome—kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, tribunes, emperors. That the first five of these had ceased to exist before the vision of Revelation 17, and its interpretation by the angel; and that the sixth, the imperial power, was then regnant, admits of no dispute.

It is, however, objected that these first five forms of government were not, properly speaking, successional—that of dictator having been occasional—having co-existed with others, having ceased to exist, and having been again revived when the exigencies of the state required it. The answer to such objection is, that neither the vision of the seven heads as seen by St. John, nor the explanation given by the angel, render it needful that the forms of government should be successional.

In the vision the seven heads were all seen co-existing together upon the wild beast, as also the ten horns; while all that the angel's interpretation requires is that five of these symbolized powers, whether they had been co-existent or successional, should have ceased to exist, and that the sixth alone should be extant, as was the imperial power, at the time at which he spoke. It may be here observed, in passing, that the fact to which I have alluded with regard to the dictatorship, namely, its occasional, or recurrent, character, with intervals between, would seem to furnish an argument not easily to be refuted against the prevalent opinion that the "eighth" king, or power, is so called because he is a revival of one of the preceding seven. If so, ought not the dictatorship to be regarded and spoken of in like manner, upon each occasion of its revival, as a numerically new power? and ought not the number of heads to have been thus extended beyond either seven or eight? I cannot see how this objection can be fairly met, so long as we class the dictatorship among the five fallen kings, unless by the view which I have suggested.

3. But it may be further asked, Why should this view be adopted in preference to the very general one which regards "the eighth" as one of the preceding seven heads—the seventh, as it is generally supposed—resuscitated and restored to the same, or still greater, power than that which as a former head he had possessed and exercised?

My reason for, at all events, suggesting a preference in this instance is, that if the seventh, or any other of the preceding heads were to be thus revived after he had ceased to exist, or to exercise power as a head, I cannot understand why he should be regarded and spoken of otherwise than simply as the seventh, or whatever other numerical head he might happen to be, revived—or why he should in any sense be spoken of as an eighth, when he is only one of the seven.

For instance, were the Emperor Napoleon III. to be revived from the dead, as some have expressed an expectation that he may be, and were he to be restored to his throne as Emperor of the French, he assuredly would not take his seat upon that throne as Napoleon IV. He would be Napoleon III. revived and restored.

In order to give some further reason for regarding the view which I have thus suggested as being possibly the correct one, it may be well to look about us for some seventh power connected with the Roman empire, which for some sufficient reason does not attain to the position of a head, and is therefore not symbolized by any of the seven heads seen upon the wild beast in the vision, and to look further for an eighth power which does attain to the position of a head, thus filling up the number of the seven symbolized heads—a power whose time compared with that of his predecessors is but brief—and in whose brief period of existence as a head, the vision of judgment upon the woman, as seen by the apostle, is to reach its climax and its close.

THIS SEVENTH KING,

or power, which, according to his view is not a head, Dr. More regards as having existed in the line of Christian emperors from Theodosius to the fall of the empire.

For separating such from the previous line of pagan emperors, and regarding it as the seventh power, while the pagan emperors are regarded as constituting a sixth, and for not giving to it a place among the seven symbolized heads, while such is given to the line of pagan emperors, two reasons have been assigned. First, that the seven heads are described (chapter 13:1) as having upon them, each and all, "the names of blasphemy;" whereas such, it is alleged, cannot be regarded as rightly belonging to a line of Christian emperors; second, that the line of emperors from Theodosius to Constantine were not Capitoline—did not reign at Rome, but at Constantinople. The Papacy rising into power upon the ruins of the imperial head is then regarded as the eighth and last power, and seventh and last head.

To neither of these last-mentioned views, however, can I bring myself to subscribe. I cannot, in the first place, see in either the change of the religion from pagan to Christian, or in the removal of the seat of power from Rome to Constantinople, sufficient reason for regarding the sixth head as having fallen, while the imperial power over the city and empire of Rome continued in an unbroken line of emperors still extant and unchanged. The fact that a few emperors were, toward the close of the empire, professedly Christians can scarcely be regarded, if we look upon them as belonging to the sixth imperial head, as sufficient to obliterate the name of blasphemy so deeply graven upon that head by the religion and the conduct of the long line of their pagan predecessors. Nor does it seem to me that the removal of the seat of government can properly be looked upon as having put an end to the sixth head, so long as the government itself continued to be imperial, and therefore unchanged in its character and constitution; and, still extending over the whole empire, to be, therefore, unaltered as to its sphere.

Again, to the Papacy as the seventh and last head, the objections seem to me to be still stronger. Yet such is the view of very many expositors. How can the Papacy be, as it undeniably is, identical with—part and parcel of—"the woman;" her head, her seat of thought and energy and action—and yet, at the same time, the very "beast that carries the woman"? Such, be it distinctly observed, is what the angel teaches (compare chapter 17:7, 8, with verse 11). How, again, can the Papacy be the beast, for the sake of giving power to which, the kings, symbolized by the ten horns, "hate the woman, and make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh, and burn her with fire"? (verses 16, 17). Are the church and the city of Rome to be destroyed by these kings for the purpose of giving power to the Papacy?

WERE THE PRAYERS FOR PRESIDENT GARFIELD A FAILURE?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, October 2, 1881.*

"I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me. And He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee."—II. Cor. 12 : 8, 9.

Paul's Prayer for Health—How Answered?—Then and Now—The World's Prayers for Garfield—Prompted by two Desires—I. The President's Welfare—Answered better by Death than Life—Life would have meant Physical Suffering—Political Embarrassment—His Glorious Escape from Persecution—II. Desire for National Welfare—Answered in Sanctification—In Resolute Suppression of Mormonism—Guiteau's True Mormon Spirit—In Increased Sanctity of the Home Circle—The People Needed Toning up—Divorce Statistics—Where are we Going?—Prayers to be Answered—Our Future a Cause for Anxiety—A Happier Man than Columbus—The Nation's Guardian Angels.

THERE was something the matter with Paul in the text. He spoke of something that irritated him, or annoyed him, or hurt him, or mortified him, under the figure of a "thorn in the flesh." Some think it was a crooked back. Others think it was a stuttering tongue. More persons think, and among them the learned Kitto and Dr. John Brown, the Scotch essayist, that it was diseased eyes, amounting almost to total blindness.

They think this because he almost always wrote by the hand of an amanuensis, once mentioning it as a rare occurrence that he had written a large letter with his own hand; and they think this also because he was always accompanied wherever he went, although he was much of the time a poor man and could not have paid attendants; and also because he seems to refer to his trouble with his eyes when, in describing the enthusiastic love of the Galatians he says: "ye would have plucked out your own eyes and have given them to me." In other words, "you love me so much you would have been willing to trade off your good eyes for my poor eyes."

But whatever may have been the trouble, Paul prayed to have it cured. I suppose he prayed hundreds of times on this matter, but he made three agonizing prayers. Did God answer those prayers? He did, by giving something better than Paul asked for. Not by straightening the back, or by unloosing the tongue, or by curing the disordered eyesight, but by giving him grace to turn into glorious advantage that which had been an irritating detriment. Instead of curing the physical misfortune until Paul became the greatest apostle of the Gentiles, the greatest and the grandest Christian of all the centuries.

"I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me. And He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee." So it was then—so it is now. In the six thousand years of the world's existence there have not been one hundred right-hearted prayers unanswered. Nor fifty, nor ten, nor five, nor has there been one. If there had in the six thousand years been just one right-hearted prayer unanswered, it would have impeached the character of God. If there be any truth well set forth in the Bible it is that God answers prayer. God gives what you ask for always, or something better; and there is no exception.

During the

of our President's suffering, all good people prayed for his recovery. The Sabbaths were full of supplication. Days were set forth for special fasting and prayer. There never was so much prayer offered on any one subject in any eleven weeks since the world by the wings of the Almighty was brooded out of chaos. And yet the body of President Garfield lies in the Lakeview Cemetery at Cleveland. "Your prayers were a dead failure," says the sceptic. "Your prayers were a dead failure," think a thousand men who do not just like to say so. "You wasted your breath. The laws of nature had their way. Don't hereafter mix theology and medicine."

But I will undertake to show you this morning that all the right-hearted prayers made in behalf of the President may be divided into two classes—those which have been answered, and those which will be answered. Every right-hearted prayer in that direction had two ideas:

and the best interests of this nation. Has the first half of your prolonged prayer of eleven weeks in behalf of the president's welfare been answered?

I. The autopsy declares if he had been continued in life, he would have been a paralytic—that he never again could have walked—that he would have been incompetent for the work of his high office. But suppose a miracle had been performed and he had come forth in entire health? Could he have met the expectations aroused in regard to him? Not if he had been an angel from heaven, with the power of a hundred Garfields. Could he in a prolonged administration in which thousands of questions would arise, have pleased everybody? Oh, no.

Suppose that, during that prolonged administration, a question had arisen as between the Democratic party and the Republican party, both of which parties were equally sympathetic and equally eulogistic and equally helpful in all those eleven weeks of sickness—he certainly would have had to decide against one of the parties. Then that party, in remembrance of its sympathy during the weeks of sickness, would have pronounced him an ingrate, and there would have been a vehemence against him that has never been witnessed within our memory. They would say: "here, this is the pay we get for all our sympathy for you, and all our kindness for you, and all our prayers for you;" and he would have been in an awful plight as between the two great parties.

Suppose a question during the three coming years had arisen as between monopoly and anti-monopoly, as it will arise, how could he have met those questions? On the one side, the leading anti-monopolists of the country, during all those eleven weeks of sickness, especially kind, especially sympathetic, especially helpful, especially eulogistic; while on the other hand, among the monopolists, was the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, that had given him free rail-train to Long Branch, and extended the railroad when it was not long enough; and among those monopolists many in New York and throughout the country who had subscribed their $500 and their $1000 and their $5000 to Mrs. Garfield, and if you think that she did not tell him all about it in his better moments it is because you have never been married: suppose he had been restored to health, how could he have met the expectations of monopolists and anti-monopolists?

Suppose a question of international right had arisen, as between England and the United States. In the memory of the fact that from the first day of his wounding, the Queen and the court and the mighty men and women of England had been bending over his suffering couch in sympathy—how could he have adjusted questions as between England and the United States? How could he have been impartial? How could he have acted at all?

Besides that, during his illness, he was put under obligation to a great multitude of people—some in one way and some in another way, and the hotels in Washington, and a new line of hotels encircling the city of Washington, would not have held the people who would come to get reward for their favors. "I gave you an invalid chair; give me a consulship." "I manufactured the cooling apparatus; give me a post-office." I subscribed $5000 to Mrs. Garfield; recognize my services." "I wrote the mightiest editorials of sympathy during your sickness; send me to Belgium." "I got the Washington malaria waiting on your case as a newspaper correspondent; send me to some place within reach of the air that blows off the Alps."

The kindnesses and sympathies of those eleven weeks would have surrounded his administration with embarrassments mountain high; and in his inability to reward his benefactors, and in adoption of an independent policy, he would aroused feelings different from those which exist; and instead of being the centre of the tion's admiration and the object almost of its atry, he would, during the three coming years, been more denounced and more caricatured more hated than any man that ever occupied Presidential chair. He will have escaped d the next three years enough calumny to have ered up these continents with vituperative papers from Baffin's Bay to Terra del Fuego Washington, and Adams, and Monroe, and J son, and Lincoln, could not escape, much could Garfield have escaped; for there were and more unreasonable expectations excited gard to him than in regard to any of his pred sors.

If, therefore, the first half of your prolo prayers of eleven weeks meant the Presid welfare, your prayers have been answered, pletely answered, grandly answered, glori answered, triumphantly answered, forever swered, and could have been answered in no way. His body never rested so well as now i cemetery of Ohio. His soul never rested so as now in the bosom of his God. Your pr have been answered. Quod erat demonstrand

II. But has the last half of your prolo prayer of eleven weeks been answered?—the of the prayer that pertained to

THE WELFARE OF THE NATION.

I remark, in the first place: The nation has been so sanctified under trial and trouble a this very moment. When Booth shot Lincol nation had been for four years drunk on wa massacre and blood, and that assassination se only another paragraph in a book of horrors. fore that time I never could endure to look u scene of suffering, and since that time I have for a long while been able to continue looking a scene of suffering, and yet I went down to Sh burg during the conflict and preached to fifty rals shattered and dying, and in a barn to a dred Confederates shattered and dying, and s how I got through the discourse. You say it especial grace. Ah! yes, but I think the v nation constantly standing in the presence of and bruises and wounds and death, got harde

But this last assassination comes at a ti peace, and the nation falls prostrate and sick the calamity. The nation was never so chaste never so gentle, never so sympathetic, never so shipful as now. Blasphemers have gone dow their knees before God and men who had not p since they knelt at the trundle bed in childh have formulated appropriate petition. While nation's heart is far from what it ought to be, a better nation to-day than it has ever been. that section of your prayer has been answered.

Another consideration: After what you kn our late Chief Magistrate, you must know tha paragraph in his inaugural which spoke again was the most earnest paragraph in it. That in tion is an insult to every home in America. J A. Garfield felt ordained of God, not only as ident of the United States, but as a husband a father, to annihilate that abomination. Within year, the lightning would have struck it. B enactment of Congress the President would proclaimed that that institution of Mormonis at war with our best interests as a governm and while the polygamist, considering the pr complications, might have remained in the session of his numerous wives, it would have understood by law that after that any one wh tempted to select more marital companionship is allowed in other States would go to prison be denied his vote. Just back of Salt Lake is the United States military encampment, guns that could rake that Sodom into ashes, in forenoon; and that regiment, aided by other ments, could have enfored the law.

You say President Buchanan failed to do work. I know he did. Great and good m many respects, he was never distinguished it energy. Besides that, he was a bachelor, it needed a father and a husband like Garfield, erstanding the value of a Christian home, to ihilate that abomination of Mormonism. But naps the time had not quite come. Perhaps it necessary that the indignation of this nation uld be aroused to a greater pitch against Mor- nism before the work should be thoroughly at- pted, and the death of Garfield under these cir- nstances ought to arouse the nation.

* A verbatim report, revised and approved by Dr. Talmage.

* Which was to be demonstrated.

Do you know that while all good people through- the world were praying for our President's re- ery, the Mormons were praying for his death? n Utah, in Wyoming, in Arizona, in New Mexi- praying for his death!—some of their papers erly ignoring the whole subject, or else slily con- tulatory at the prospect of our President's early ease. Why? Mormonism decreed long ago t its potent enemies should perish, if not in one y, then in another; and the whole work should done in the name of the Lord! Brigham ung declared in his church, in a sermon which ould show you, that he who destroys the life of anti-Mormon does God a service. Mountain eadow massacre, wherein hundreds of men, omen, children, and little babes had their throats t, and then were left unburied for the ravens d the wolves—that was all done in the name of e Lord! Dr. Robinson and Almand Babbitt d the Parishes all butchered by the Mormons, ey said, in the name of the Lord! The assas- is Hickman and Brigham Young, and that group men called "Destroying Angels," because their ily work is assassination—they did all their work the name of the Lord.

Now I will not say that Guiteau was a Mormon, or will I dare to say that he was not a paid emis- ry. He says he shot Garfield in the name of ord. Everything he has said and written on the bject implies that it was done by divine commis- on, and in the name of the Lord. I will not say at he was a Mormon, but he has all the Mormon eories. He was a member of the Oneida Com- unity, the chief doctrine of which is that it is ght to have a profusion of wives. He had the gliness of a Mormon, the licentiousness of a Mor- on, the cruelty of a Mormon, the murderous pirit of a Mormon, the infernalism of a Mormon. Why, he says he sat in the park opposite the Presi- ent's house, in the name of the Lord, and he went o the Baltimore dépôt on the second of July, and imed at the heart of our beloved chief magistrate, nd fired in the name of the Lord! I say there is n ugly sound in that cry when a man goes out to o the work of darkness in the name of the Lord.

I suppose that his crime originally started from is revenge at not getting a consulship; but I should not wonder if, in the great day when all se- ret things are revealed, it should be found that he was a paid agent of that old hag of hell which sits, making mouths at high heaven, between the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada. If the death of Garfield shall arouse the nation to more hatred of that institution of Mormonism, which was Garfield's especial disgust, he will not have died in vain, and another section of your prayer is answered.

THE WHITE HOUSE AS A CHRISTIAN HOME.

Again I remark: Your prayers have been answered in the sanctification of the home circle. Husband, wife, son, daughter, brother, sister were beautiful names before; but they never meant so much in this country as they do now. What an example we have had in the White House of a model Christian home. There have been Christian homes in the White House before this, but this by circumstances was made more conspicuous as a Christian home. Well, you see as a nation we need toning up on that subject. For the last twenty-five years the country has been filled with trash about free-lovism and elective affinity, and divorce made easy. There has nothing happened in your day or mine that has done so much for the homes of America as that beauiful and overwhelming example we have recently had in the White House.

Where are things going? I suppose New England is as good a part of the country as any other—perhaps better. In 1878, in the State of Maine, there were 478 divorces; in the State of Connecticut 401 divorces; in New Hampshire 241 divorces; in Rhode Island 196 divorces; in Massachusetts 600 divorces, making an aggregate of 2113 divorces in 1878 in New England. In Cook County, Illinois, last year, 830 divorce cases began. We need toning up on the subject of the family relation. You know that in some circles it gives a little piquancy to a man's character if he is said to be a little loose in his morals. Right in this time, when the nation needs so much instruction in the right direction on this important theme, we have this revelation of a Christian home circle. God grant that that influence may be potent for all the years that are to come. The influence already felt in every home of this congregation, in every home of America, proves that your prayers have been answered.

Again: I want you to understand, my friends, that, in addition to the prayers which have already attained a blessing, from your prayers and from the prayers of the nation during the last few months, there will be born to come, if American institutions stand so long. The astronomer tells us that worlds ages ago created have just reached us with their light, and so there are blessings which are a thousand years in flight.

God gathers up all these prayers. He gathers them from the north and from the south; He gathers them from this side of the sea and the other side of the sea, from this side of the Atlantic and from the other side of the Atlantic; He gathers them all up in a reservoir at the foot of the throne—a great suspended blessing, a flood made up of the tears of many generations, and then at His own good time, from that reservoir of divine remembrance the streams of blessing will pour down upon the nations, and their harvests will be richer, and their schools will be better, and their institutions will be more prospered, and the Christian religion will be more triumphant. I should not wonder if it took God many centuries fully to answer the three hundred million hearted prayers of two hemispheres. The sins of the nation cry to heaven for vengeance; but the prayers of the nation cry to heaven for mercy; and the latter are going to overbalance the former. Does not the Psalmist intimate that God takes the tears of one of His children and puts them in a bottle, and then am I far out of the way when I suppose that God gathers up the tears of nations in a reservoir?

I am very glad that God does not answer all the prayers in our time. I am not so anxious about our present condition as a nation as I am anxiously concerned about the future. You and I can get along very well during the few years of our allotted time on earth, even if we do not like American politics; but how about the generations following? There are forces of darkness struggling to get possession of this continent, and I want some great storehouse of prayer filled for that exigency. Only the first wheel, as it were, has begun to turn in our manufacturing capacity. We have gathered only the first sheaf of agricultural resources, we have picked up only the first lump of coal, or iron, or copper, or silver, or gold, of our American mining. What will be the condition of this country when the last arable acre is doing its very best, and when all our rivers are pulling their utmost at the factory bands, and when Nevada, and Colorado, and California, and Arizona shall have disgorged all their treasures, and from ocean to ocean the continent shall be fully peopled?

During the next twenty-five years there will be 100,000,000 people on this continent. During the next century, at the close of a century from now, there will be at least 300,000,000 people in the United States. What is to be the character of that population? You cannot shirk the responsibility, nor can I shirk it. Your prayers this morning and your prayers during those eleven weeks, and the prayers of all your past time, and your patriotic prayers for the future, and the prayers of the good of all ages, will help decide that question.

Columbus, two hours before midnight, said to Pedro Gutierrez, of the king's wardrobe, "Look, look! see the light on the shore; that must be a continent!" But gladder will be the man who two hours before the daybreak of national purification shall hail the morning of regenerated America. I tell you the signs are most encouraging. The prayers of God's people are going to hand over this continent. I am just as certain of it as that I stand here and you sit there. Have you noticed the rapidly increasing momentum? During the first fifty years of this century, in our country there were 3,000,000 converts added to the evangelical churches. There have been as many added to the evangelical churches in America during the last ten years. In other words, the last ten years have been equal to the first fifty years of this century. Clear the track for the Lord's chariot. The white horses that draw the chariot started on a slow walk. For the last few years they have been upon a gallop, they will soon be down to full run.

"Oh!" say you, "I can't see how my poor prayers are going to have any effect upon that grand result." Well, rivers might as well, when the mist rises and is drawn up and floats away into the heavens, say "that moisture will never be heard of again." God would say: 'Be patient;' and when the earth wanted rain then this despised mist would take the form of an angel of the shower and would float down through the air, and from the silver chalice of a cloud would dip the water and baptize all the valleys, while the mountains stood up as sponsor. So the Sun of righteousness exhales our prayers, and so they come back again in gracious distillation. Your prayers have been answered, your prayers will be answered. Quod erat demonstrandum.

It is something like this: I say God answers prayer, if not giving just what you want, giving SOMETHING GREATER.

It is as though a son should say: "Father, give me $5000," and the father should say: "I hear your request; I will do better than that; I will put that $5000 into an education, and then it will be worth to you ten times $5000." It is as though a wayward son had come home and found his mother dying, and he should kneel by the bedside and pray for her recovery, and God should say to that wayward young man, "I hear your prayer, but I will do better than what you ask for. I will, by your mother's death, give you reformation, and give you an eternal home with her in Heaven."

So I meet this question differently from the way it is usually met. I declare now, and it is beyond all controversion, God always gives what you ask for in a right spirit, or gives something better. In all theologies it is believed that every individual has a guardian angel sent forth to protect, to defend and to foster. The Jewish rabbins say that Adam's guardian angel was named Razaiel, and that Abraham's guardian angel was Zakiel, and that Isaac's guardian angel was Raphael, and that Jacob's guardian angel was Peniel.

If every individual has a guardian angel, shall not a Christian nation have

GUARDIAN ANGELS?

Who shall they be? Those who never knew us? Those who never fought in behalf of our institutions? Those who never suffered for our land? No, no. Descend, ye spirits of the martyr Presidents, and ye mighty men of the councils of the past, ye who defended our country on land and sea. Descend, ye who preached and prayed as well as ye who fought!

Mighty spirits of departed patriots, descend—come down out of the ineffable light into the shadows of earth, and lead the way. Washington and Everett, and Sumner and Garfield, and Lincoln and Burnside, and Lyon and Witherspoon, and Mason and Channing—descend, descend! Speak with lips once quieted. Strike with arms once palsied. Ride down into this fight in which earth and hell and Heaven are in battle array. Thou mighty God of our fathers and brothers who fell at Lexington and Yorktown, and South Mountain, and Gettysburgh, descend and strike back national evil, and bring national good, and prove thyself the same God who answered the prayers of Hezekiah, and of Elijah, and of Deborah, and of Joshua. Thine, O Lord, is the Kingdom!"

SYLPH SOMERS.

A Clue to the Lady's Identity—Inquiries at Ennis—Sylph in the Doctor's House—No Trace at Ennis—Sylph Adopted by the Doctor—Her Influence in the House—The Doctor Philosophizes.

AIDED by his sister, the doctor made a most careful search into all that had belonged to the dead one, to discover, some response to these pressing inquiries as to his identity, but to little effect. Her apparel gave the Christian name, Frances, and that alone; and her satchel and purse only contained a small sum of money and a few trifling articles. The most valuable find was a portion of a letter without an envelope, a thing which was not used in those days. The name of the sender of the letter was wanting, but on the other side of the sheet of paper on which the direction had been written, there still remained half the address. Dr. Gilbart read there the word "Somer" which he concluded, when complete, had been Somers, and also the word Ennis, which he knew was the name of the chief town of Clare County, Ireland.

Under the name, therefore, of Frances Somers, the deceased was laid in her grave in the Cathedral burying ground, and this done, the doctor lost no time in writing to a magistrate in Ennis whose name by some inquiry in the city he had found out. He informed him of the few particulars concerning the dead one which we also have related, of all the tokens of her identity, few and feeble, which he could find, and begged him to trace out if possible, the kindred of the child which the deceased lady had left, all unknown and unclaimed behind her.

Communication between England and Ireland was absurdly slow in those days. Sometimes from contrary winds, the mail packet, a sailing vessel (for steamers were then unthought of), took upward of a week to cross the Channel. The post, too, at this now antique age, was an unpunctual and snail-paced affair in the sister island, and especially in the far-off western county Clare, the roads were bad, the "Mail Coach" a lumbering machine, the distance great, and the region wild and unsettled.

Aware of all this, the Doctor did not look for a speedy reply to his letter; he conceded in his thoughts a liberal grant of time, but this was far exceeded by the reality. The limit he had set down in his expectation was overpassed by more than a fortnight, and yet no answer to his urgent letter had been received.

Meanwhile, the little girl Silp Somers settled herself down contentedly and cheerfully to make the antique house in the Rows her home. And more than this, she began to make her presence a pleasure and a need to Dr. Gilbart. Her infantile beauty and innocent childlike ways, gradually wound themselves with magic power around his heart, and aroused his admiration and delight. To have her near him of an evening, and to hear her pleasant prattle, was felt his best solace after the day's anxiety and toil. In fact, she was fast becoming a satisfying substitute for his own lost one, his snatched away idol, his darling Lillie.

He came, therefore, to dread the arrival of a missive that would sever the orphan child from his home. It would occasion the departure of a fascinating companion and a healing light; it would be something very like another death in the household, and the anticipation of this greatly disturbed him, and yet the delayed summons of surrender buoyed him up with hope.

At last there came a letter from the far off Irish town, and with a trembling hand the Doctor opened it. The magistrate to whom he had written, informed him that no one of the name of Somers resided either in Ennis or its neighborhood. Nor could his most active inquiry discover that any one expected from England a lady named Frances Somers, or knew of a child whose name had any correspondence with Silp——. "Thank Heaven!" exclaimed the Doctor, as he handed the magistrate's letter to his sister for perusal, "Thank Heaven, then, my way is clear, Dorothy; I will adopt this child, and you, while you remain here, will be, its good mother."

Mrs. Denzille's words were not so gratulatory and whole-hearted as her brother's. She shrank a little from the charge he sought to impose upon her. The child's beauty, gentle disposition, and affectionate ways, had, however, also won her warm interest, so with no very great reluctance she accepted the responsible post assigned her.

It was not long, therefore, until Silp Somers became a fully recognized and established member of the Doctor's household. The patter of tiny feet upon hall and stairway became once more a well-accustomed and grateful sound, and childish glee, of shout and laughter and song, again gladdened the dark old oak-panelled rooms of the house in the Rows.

A child in the house is an influence and a discipline. An American clergyman has declared it as his belief, "That no man or woman can be truly developed without the presence of children." At all events, the presence of Silp Somers in Dr. Gilbart's home had a very softening, soothing, and wholesome effect upon his character. It gave a purpose to his life, a pure sense of communion to his bereaved spirit, and a new centre upon which to fix the affections of his heart, as well as the observation and study of his intellect.

In his professional pursuits Doctor Gilbart had to come into contact with many curious and unlovely specimens of our race, and striking proofs of its depravity, with selfish and vicious men, and vain, exacting, and worthless women; some of them worn out and sick at heart from self-indulgence, and some of them devoured with ennui "creatures used up," and prematurely old, "Enough," said the Doctor, "to make one a misanthrope and a cynic."

After a hard and trying day's work in the city, the doctor's bodily powers weary, and his mind all fretted and depressed—his return home was a refuge and relief. Silp Somers not only alleviated and diverted his thoughts, but her words and ways, fresh with the innocence and originality of childhood, gave him also a new pleasure in life; and a worthier estimate of human nature he was learning from a little child.

The doctor prided himself upon being something of a philosopher. "How comes it to pass," he asked himself one day, "that there exists between childhood and adult human nature such a marked and startling contrast as that which I daily witness? I declare I could imagine that my fascinating little Silp and the great majority of the grown-up people that I meet with, belong to an altogether different species of the 'genus homo,' and I wonder where lies the explanation of this remarkable fact?"

After long and laborious meditation, the only solution of the problem possible to him seemed to be "That the adult specimens of the human race, the fashionable rakes and addle-headed simpletons so repugnant to him, and for whom he had—full of moral disgust—to prescribe each day, must owe their mental and moral obliquity, not to a defective natural constitution of mind and heart, but, solely to a false, superstitious, and wholly unscientific training: "They become spoiled," he said, "from the vicious teaching and discipline they are placed under and are forced to endure from their very childhood.

"Heaven forbid," he cried, "that my little pet Silp should be spoiled in this way, her beautiful young nature all distorted, put away, and crippled by ignorant methods, and the inculcation of hoary-headed falsehoods. No, it shall not be," he added, "that is, if I can help it."

He therefore resolved to take altogether into his own hands the education and development of the young human soul that had so happily, as he believed, been cast in his way. A beautiful gem, thrown, as it were, at his very feet by the great sea of time for shaping and polishing, according, in his view, to the most enlightened ideal. He would hire a governess, indeed, to aid him in the elementary parts of his task, but the chief instructor should be himself; and it was his firm determination to keep from his beloved and most interesting pupil, as he deemed her, all doubtful themes, and especially, all ideas upon the subject of religion. "here," he thought, "must be, without dou the chief and fertile source of adult human proc ity and folly."

Silp was of an ardent mind and lively appreh sion, and learning was more a pastime than a t to her. When, therefore, she had reached l teens, as they are called, she had made "round" of a good English education; and besi this had achieved no small acquaintance w Latin and French. Not only so, Dr. Gilbart, hi self enamored of philosophy and science, comm nicated to his pupil much of his own special kno edge, and in his effort to do this he met wit willing disciple. With avidity did the young g drink in the new-born wonders of the time, in m tal science, chemistry, and astronomy.

But, alas! in training the intellect Dr. Gilba forgot the heart, and above all the spiritual natu of his protégé. He illumined and enlarged h perception of the grand and beautiful in the a stract, but never told her of a God. He explain to her the wonders of the vital processes ever g ing on in nature within and around her, but sa nothing about the immortal life of the soul. H dealt with Silp, in fact, as a creature only of t earth; possessed indeed of a marvellous and i scrutable organization, but such, he argued, ha also the lily and the rose, yet they were destine to perish. So was likewise, he suspected, the h man being, that a fortunate chance, as he reckone it, had brought under his influence and power; a at all events, he blindly argued, "a future state existence is such an improbable eventuality tha it is not worth taking into account in the mora and mental cultivation which I ought to give m adopted one."

AN INTERESTING DIALOGUE.

Notes of a Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Ha Aitken, M.A.

"Nicodemus answered and said unto Him, Ho can these things be? Jesus answered and said unt him, Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest no these things?"—JOHN 3: 9, 10.

Christ's Talk with a Theologian—A Member o the Most Religious Sect—A Peculiarity o Christ's Manner—I. People who Need Great Plainness of Speech—People who are Better than Their Neighbors—Objections to Sudden Conversions, or to Conversions at all—II. A Blow Struck at False Confidences—Effects o the New Birth—The Happy Freedom of the New-Born—A Test—III. The Learned Pharisee's Astonishment—A Hard Saying—By what Power can the New Birth be Wrought?—Christ the Source of Inspiration.

THESE words form part of a conversation held by our blessed Lord with one called "Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews." Nicodemus was evidently not only a religious man, but he was what we should call a theologian—that is to say, he was a man who had made a study of religion, and was no doubt thoroughly acquainted with the letter of Scripture.

I have no doubt he was familiar with every part of the Old Testament, and I dare say could have quoted its utterances upon any point of doctrine. He would probably, as was common among his class in these days, know a great part of the law and the prophets by heart, and could have given the authoritative glosses or explanations then most in vogue with reference to obscure or doubtful passages.

More than this, he belonged to the most religious sect of the times, he "was a man of the Pharisees," a sect of men who, whatever their faults may have been, conscientiously endeavored to conform to the precepts and practices of legal religion—at least, so far as they understood them.

Such was the man who addressed our Lord in the complimentary language with which our dialogue commences: "Rabbi, we know that Thou art a Teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that Thou doest, except God be with him."

We may sometimes, perhaps, have wondered why our adorable Lord, who on other occasions felt His way so delicately into the confidence of those whom He sought to benefit, should have assumed this abrupt manner in dealing with such a religious and well-intentioned person; but a little experience in evangelizing removes this difficulty, and makes His conduct quite intelligible and easy of explanation.

I. We soon find that the people who most require great plainness of speech are precisely those who belong to what I may call

THE NICODEMUS CLASS.

When we are brought into contact with very gross sinners, we find that the very openness of their sin, as a rule, already condemns them. Such a man knows that he must undergo a great moral change if ever he is to be saved at all. As he is, he feels and knows that he is utterly unfit for the society of God or for Heaven. If there be such a thing as a new birth, he needs rather to be told of its possibility than of its necessity.

It is, however, otherwise with those very religious persons who have always been in the habit of going to church or chapel, who read their Bibles, attach themselves to religious parties, and do so many excellent things. Such religious persons are very apt to take comfort to themselves from the pleasing consideration that they are a good deal and that, therefore, they do not, at any rate, require such a radical, inward, and moral revolution, as is suggested to our minds by the figure of a new birth. Hence it is just upon such religious persons that this message requires to be pressed with all the severity and plainness of speech which characterize these utterances of our Lord on this occasion.

If such are to become recipients of the true spiritual life, they must first be convinced of their need of it, and for this purpose the utmost sternness and precision of language must, if needs be, be employed. They, too, need to be brought face to face with a necessity which they are slow to recognize and eager to escape from, because it humbles their religious pride. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see (much less enter) the kingdom of God."

And I must add that a certain almost flippant and resentful spirit is too often exhibited still by the class of persons whom Nicodemus represents. They will tell you that they have a lively horror of

they are doubtful of its possibility even in some cases; they emphatically deny the necessity of conversion, whether sudden or otherwise, at all.

As a matter of fact we must sorrowfully admit it—a very large proportion of the so-called religious people of our day know nothing of any inward and conscious change or moral revolution in their own experience which could with the slightest degree of truth be described as a new birth, if the figurative expression means what it seems to mean—and who yet are neither distressed nor uneasy because their religious experience would seem to be thus defective.

It would be well for such if they would lay aside the spirit of the caviller, and rather inquire, if such a benefit is to be had, how can it be obtained? Nicodemus, as I have said, carps at the words of Jesus, and this leads our blessed Lord to make a more complete and explicit statement of the great doctrine of regeneration. "Except," He says, "a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

II. But what immediately follows in our Lord's discourse is quite sufficient to strike to its foundation all

FALSE CONFIDENCES.

In replying to Nicodemus He points out that as the natural offspring partakes of the material nature of its parents, so the product of this new and spiritual birth is distinctly spiritual in its character—nay, is spirit, and proceeds to show that it will exhibit its character by corresponding phenomena, and by no other.

In other words, the effects of this great change will be actual and practical, and manifest themselves in a new and contrasted form of life and experience. "The wind," Christ goes on to say, "bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." You will usually hear people who refer to this passage deal with it as though the words ran, "The wind bloweth as it listeth,"—such is the nature of the operation of the Holy Ghost upon the human heart; and this, no doubt, is true. But it is not what our Lord says, nor is it what the argument of his conversation requires.

Our Lord's words are not such, but "so is every one that is born of the Spirit." Not the Spirit Himself, but every one that is born of the Spirit is likened to the wind. In the ordinary and forced interpretation, these words of our Lord seem to be wholly disconnected from the context around them, and to introduce a subject (the Divine sovereignty, as it is frequently called) which, however true, is altogether irrelevant to the matter in hand. But only permit the words to mean what they say, and how thoroughly do they accord with what has gone before, and how necessary they are to it!

We have just heard that what is born of the Spirit is spirit; we are naturally disposed to ask, What are the characteristics of this new life and how is its presence to be discerned? This verse gives the true and needed reply, and in that reply lies the contrast between legal and evangelical religion. "The wind bloweth where it listeth; there is about it a certain apparent spontaneity and superiority to all control—it is, or seems to be, the freest and most independent of all natural objects.

Doubtless it has laws of its own; but even yet, with all the advancement of scientific knowledge, they are far beyond our ken, and may be said to remain among the secrets of nature. "And so is every one that is born of the Spirit." He, too, becomes possessed of a certain Godlike spontaneity, a new and wondrous freedom from external control. He is no longer under law, because he is above law; he is no longer curbed and bridled by a law without, because he is possessed of a new and perfect law of liberty within. He now does right, because he wishes to do right, and not because he is compelled; he abstains from the wrong, because he hates what once he loved, not because he is afraid of the consequences. The new heart has been given, the home of new wishes, and in complying with these wishes he fulfils this new free life—"the wind bloweth as it listeth."

Now, if you believe that you were spiritually regenerated, here is a test by which to gauge yourself: "So is every one that is born of the Spirit." Christ makes no exceptions, and it will not do for us to make any. Are you, in your religious life and character, like the wind? Are you free indeed? Not such was the religion of Nicodemus, and not such is the religion, I fear, of too many nominal Christians, who, like Nicodemus, repudiate the necessity for any such mighty inward change.

III. Poor Nicodemus! This statement would seem fairly to have taken his breath away with ASTONISHMENT.

Like the wind! Was this to be the character of the new religion and of those that professed it? He found it almost impossible to present to his mind the bare idea of such a religious phenomenon. To such a statement all his religious training was opposed, and all his theological instincts and prejudices rose up in resentment against it. Well might he exclaim, "How can these things be?"

Yes, it was a hard saying to Nicodemus, and to men of his class still. Still the objection rises in the heart, if not to the lip, "How can a man be born again when he is old?" And, scarcely less than he do they find it difficult to understand how the effect of any religious experience that deserves the name can be said to make a man free as the wind; it seems to them so utterly inconsistent with all their preconceived notions.

Yet, had Nicodemus considered the matter more carefully for a few moments, he might well have come to the conclusion that, if such a change as the words of Jesus suggested could by any miraculous intervention have been effected, it must indeed be, after all, "a consummation devoutly to be wished." That a man should be born again, that such a revolution should take place in his moral nature as should put him in a position to begin as it were a new life, were a thing much to be desired, if only it could by any means be accomplished. The only question is, by what power can a change so stupendous be wrought?

Do we not, all of us, feel that it is the consciousness of bygone failure that "makes cowards of us all?" "The native hue of resolution is sicklied o'er by the pale cast of thought"—the dismal, depressing thought that, as we have repeatedly failed in the past, so we shall certainly fail again in the future. What is the use of our struggling and toiling to be better when we have found our toil so utterly in vain? Each fresh failure diminishes the strength of our wills, and increases the tyranny of habit; why should I succeed better now than in former days, when will was stronger and habit weaker? Thus the past paralyses the present—we cannot escape from the emasculating influence of its sad memories, or from the fatal inheritance of depraved characters and associations which it hands down to us.

If such a change could take place as would cut off this dread entail, and open a new epoch of moral and spiritual progress, who would not welcome the announcement of such a possibility as being indeed "glad tidings of great joy?" Whatever exceedingly self-complacent people might feel, who had never felt the plague of their own heart, what a joyous Gospel of hope this would appear to us who despise our own follies, and yet continue to perpetrate them—who hate our sins, and yet submit to their yoke!

If I only could be born again, the drunkard might well exclaim, if I could break away from the chains that I have forged, and breathe again the free air of liberty! If I could only be born again, the sensual libertine might well say, as he broods upon the overthrow of his manhood, and the degradation of his life, if I could be as I once was, a little, innocent child! If I only could be born again, the flippant and frivolous pleasure-seeker might say! But I have trained myself to trifle, and now it seems impossible to live; if indeed that only deserves the name of life which is real and earnest, I have cultivated levity till now it seems almost impossible to be serious, and life is slipping away unprized and unimproved. Or, once again, if I only could be born again, the idolater of Mammon might well cry, bound as he is by golden chains, and in danger of having all the humanity crushed out of him by the hideous Juggernaut that he worships. But what power in earth or Heaven can rid me of my beautiful though fatal fetters, and lift me out of my prison-house of gilded bondage?

So we might go on contemplating case after case in which such a message as Jesus gave to Nicodemus is evidently the message most needed, and we may say the only one that can suggest a hope. But enough—the question of Nicodemus has become the agonized cry of a world's desire. Tell us, O Thou mysterious Prophet of Galilee, Thou Teacher sent from God, great Interpreter of the secrets of Omnipotence, "How can these things be?"

The answer to the inquiry of Nicodemus is the only answer which Divine Wisdom gives in reply to man's eager quest to-day. The belief in the love of God who sent His Son to die for men—for the best and most moral, as well as for those who are counted the very pariahs and outcasts of society, "That whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life. "He is able to save unto the uttermost."

YES; IT IS IN CHRIST, and in Christ alone, where the hopeless may be filled with a new inspiration; where the enslaved may find a glorious enfranchisement; where the depraved may be enriched with the pulsations of a new and purer life; and where the hungry, weary heart may find an abiding rest. Come, then, to-day, I implore you, to Him who first came to you, and receive from His wounded hands the pardon, hope, and peace which His blood has purchased for you. Amen.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Full Attendance of the Senate is Expected next Monday, when it is supposed that the new Cabinet appointments will be sent in for confirmation. The election of a president pro tem., it is to be hoped, will be effected without a party struggle. Reports from Washington intimate that conferences between the party leaders have already been held, and that Senator David Davis's name has been suggested as one on which both parties might agree. It is, however, notorious that Senator Bayard of Delaware would be preferred by the Democrats. The sergeant-at-arms is to be re-nominated, and a selection made out of many candidates for the vacant clerkship. It is expected that all three offices will be filled before the newly elected senators from New York and Rhode Island are admitted.

Speculations as to the Cabinet Appointments President Arthur may make, have formed a prominent topic in political circles during the past week. Nothing, however, is as yet definitely known as to any appointment. It is known that all the Cabinet officers tendered their resignations in writing after the inauguration, on September 22d. This was done in order that President Arthur might be under no embarrassment in selecting a Cabinet. The President received the papers and said that he was unable at that moment to give proper consideration to the questions to which they gave rise, and therefore requested the Cabinet to remain, for the present, in charge of their various departments. It is stated on reliable authority, that Mr. Secretary Windom and Attorney-General MacVeagh both intimated to the President their wish that he will regard their resignations as a fact and not as a mere form, and that they will be glad to be relieved of their duties as soon as their successors can be appointed.

Mr. MacVeagh added that on public grounds he felt no difficulty in pursuing the course his feelings dictated. The only political work to which he attached any importance at this time was the work of administrative reform, including, of course, the exposure and the relentless pursuit of all plunderers of the public treasury. If President Arthur engages heartily and thoroughly in that good work, as he hoped and believed he would, then he was entitled to the credit of doing it with an attorney-general of his own selection, and not with one inherited from President Garfield.

The Attorney-general spoke very kindly of President Arthur, and said he was sure the country would judge him not only fairly but generously, and not by the selection of one person or another for his Cabinet, but by the general policy of his administration.

Proceedings have been Commenced in the courts against the officials implicated in the Star Route revelations. The case was opened on September 30th by the filing of an information by United States Attorney Corkhill, and special Assistant Attorney-General William A. Cook, who will prosecute. This is a somewhat unusual way of initiating a trial; but the grand jury had adjourned until October 3d, and the Statute of Limitations rendered prompt measures necessary. The information charges Thomas J. Brady, Second Assistant Postmaster-General; John L. French, chief clerk; William H. Turner, clerk in Contract Office, together with George L. McDonough, Samuel P. Brown, and certain other persons, with unlawfully, fraudulently, and corruptly conspiring to defraud the United States out of large sums of money, in causing and procuring unnecessary and improper and extravagant additional compensation to be paid by the United States for additional service in carrying the mails. The case relied upon for conviction is the route between Prescott, Arizona, and Santa Fe, New Mexico, a distance of 460 miles. It was originally contracted for in 1878 by McDonough, who undertook to carry the mails once a week over the route for $13,313 per annum. After the increase and expedition device had been applied, the contractor received $136,000 per annum, and the information alleges that on this route alone, since July, 1878, the conspirators have cheated the government out of $350,000.

The Massachusetts Republican Convention has defined its position on the subject of civil service reform. This part of the platform advocates "The maintenance of the constitutional prerogative of the President to make nominations on his sole responsibility, and of the constitutional prerogative of the Senate to confirm, or refuse to confirm, such nominations, free from executive dictation; the relief and exclusion of the members of the legislative branch from the business of selecting office-holders in the department of the administration; the prohibition of assessments upon the salary of office-holders for party purposes; appointments to clerkship to depend, in the first instance, upon successfully passing a proper examination open to all applicants without distinction of party; and, secondly, upon satisfactory service during a period of probation; tenure of office during good behavior or for a reasonable fixed term, with promotion for meritorious performance of duty, and no removals except for cause."

The Lessons of President Garfield's Illness and death have been enunciated by many eminent men; but none have done this more forcibly or more eloquently than the poet, Mr. J. G. Whittier, who thus writes of the sad event: "I share the great sorrow which overshadows the land, I fully appreciate the irretrievable loss. But it seems to me that the occasion is one for thankfulness as well as grief. Through all the stages of the solemn tragedy which has just closed with the death of our noblest and best, I have felt that the Divine Providence was overruling the mighty affliction—that the patient sufferer at Washington was drawing with cords of sympathy all sections and parties nearer to each other. And, now, when South and North, Democrat and Republican, Radical and Conservative, lift their voices in one unbroken accord of lamentation; when I see how, in spite of the greed of gain, the lust of office, the strifes and meanness of party politics, the great heart of the nation proves sound and loyal, I feel a new hope for the republic, I have a firmer faith in its stability. It is said that no man liveth and no man dieth to himself; and the pure and noble life of Garfield and his slow, long martyrdom, so bravely borne in the view of all, are, I believe, bearing for us, as a people, 'the peaceable fruits of righteousness.' We are stronger, wiser, better for them."

Still Another Defalcation has Startled Commercial circles in New York. Mr. George W. Hunt, who has been for twenty-five years paying teller in the Importers' and Traders' National Bank, is accused of misappropriating seventeen thousand dollars, the property of the bank. The accused teller was highly respected and could, had he desired it, have retired on a pension equal to his salary. He did not live extravagantly, did not speculate, and was generally regarded as a most trustworthy man. It is believed that family troubles led him to the violation of trust. Considerable uneasiness has been caused by the large number of defalcations recently discovered. It has been noticed that the panics which in past years have caused so much misery were in every case preceded by a period similarly characterized by extensive defalcation on the part of trusted officials.

The Fund Subscribed for the Benefit of Mrs. Garfield and her family amounted, on Saturday, October 1st, to $334,428. This magnificent provision is a substantial expression of national sympathy with the bereaved family. Besides this sum, General Garfield had effected some considerable life insurance, the proceeds of which have in one case already been paid; so that there is no fear of the bereaved family undergoing the poverty or hardship which in so many other cases falls on a widow and her children when the head of the family is stricken down.

The Committee Appointed to Collect Contributions for the benefit of the sufferers by the Michigan forest fires acknowledged on Saturday, October 1st, the sum of $2977.28. This makes the total received to date for the poor creatures whose sufferings from lack of clothing and proper nourishment are extreme, $85,096. Many of them are not only stripped of everything in the world they possessed, but having lost their husbands and sons have no one to support them. Some, too, are in delicate health, which has developed through the exposure they have undergone into acute diseases. Sore need of funds exists for their support, and it is satisfactory to notice that the principal business firms of the city are arranging to sell the mourning drapery, with which their stores and offices are now covered, for the benefit of the Michigan fund.

A Significant Coincidence was Observed in the ceremony of administering the oath of office to President Arthur at Washington, on September 22d. The open Bible was presented to the new President, that he might kiss it. As he did so, it was noticed that his lips touched Psalm 32: 1, 2: "In Thee, O Lord, do I put my trust; let me never be ashamed; deliver me in Thy righteousness. Bow down Thine ear to me; deliver me speedily; be Thou my strong rock for an house of defence to save me." When we remember how difficult and delicate is the position to which the President is called in the providence of God, the passage is singularly appropriate.

Twenty-Four Years of Daily Prayer. On Friday, September 23d, anniversary services in connection with the Fulton Street prayer meeting were held. Many ministers and friends were present and delivered suitable addresses. One of the most interesting was that of the Rev. John J. Browner, who related his own experience of the benefits of the world-renowned meeting. He said that in the year 1857, when under deep conviction of sin, he attended the service one noon and then went home to spend the night in prayer. Next morning it pleased God to reveal Jesus to him as a Saviour and then he attended the noon meeting again and there for the first time spoke of his new-found joy, and confessed the Lord Jesus.

The Late President's Portrait was Sent to Queen Victoria on Thursday last, in compliance with Her Majesty's request. It is of large size, is silver-tinted and elegantly framed. It is considered by Mrs. Garfield the best photograph ever taken of her husband.

Dr. Deems' Sermon, Which was Announced to appear in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is unavoidably held over until next week.

Remarkable Natural Phenomenon was ssed at Elmira, N. Y., on Sunday, September At half-past four o'clock in the afternoon, ut a moment's warning, a terrible hurricane k the city. Two minutes later it had passed, ig as evidence of its visit overthrown buildings, ted trees and immense piles of bricks and de- f buildings scattered on the streets. Entire with heavy timbers were carried away hun- of feet. The Rathbun House was unroofed, pire of the Hedding Methodist Church was across the street into a yard, about two tons ck were deposited in the organ of the First yterian Church, and holes were blown gh the walls of several brick buildings, and ick was scattered in all directions. Immense elm, and maple trees were snapped at the like pipe-stems. The spire of a negro church lown upon a house adjoining and crushed it, njured no one. The roof of the palace car was blown over the freight office, a distance veral hundred feet. It is believed that no were lost. Many of the citizens declare that the tornado came they distinctly felt a shock thquake. After the storm there was a per- alm, and rain fell heavily. Those who wit- d the strange scene say that the suddenness visitation and the extent of havoc worked short a time render it wholly unprecedented ir experience.

Characteristic Anecdote of the Late Presi- is related by the correspondent of a New journal. It is one of many similar ones have been published since his death, and s that his kindly heart and his recollection of wn early hardships exercised a happy influ- over his life. A young ensign of the navy, in had been ordered to join at once the flag- f the South Atlantic Squadron, then in Japan- aters—an assignment very much sought after ung officers, as very pleasant, though very sive. The young ensign had just com- d and desired to complete, a home for his rents, of whom he was the mainstay, and nxious, therefore, to be assigned to a less ex- e station. He therefore applied for an ex- e, but his application was refused. In this ess juncture a friend suggested General Gar- who did not represent the ensign's district, ad he the remotest claim on him. He went, ver, to his residence that night. The General d attentively, and said: "Yes, if I can pos- find time to-morrow I will go personally and hat I can do." When General Garfield ap- d before the Commodore next morning, and d to "my young friend's reasonable plea," at once granted.

Interesting Ceremony was Performed at e, N. J., on September 29th, when Rev. el Hutchings and his wife celebrated their s wedding. Among the guests present was Leonard W. Bacon, who married the couple century ago. The Bible used at the golden ng was a rare antique relic. It was print- 1605, and was brought to this country in 1634 ev. John Lathrop, who before he emigrated mprisoned in the Tower of London for con- e' sake. Mrs. Hutchings is a descendant of rand old Puritan. He was also an ancestor athrop Motley, the eminent historian, who o named after him.

Brave Little Girl Named Nellie Cross Sac- her life at Bloomfield, N. J., on September in saving that of her young brother. The hildren were crossing a long trestle railroad e on their way home. When they had walked distance over the ties they saw a train ap- hing them. There is but one track over the e, and there was no room for the little ones to ut of the way. With a quick instinct Nellie hat their only safety lay in throwing them- into the waters of the creek. She gently l her brother to the edge of the bridge, then ed him carefully as far as her hands would , and allowed him to drop into the shallow n. Her next movement would have been to down herself, but before she had time to the leap the train struck her and hurled her on the track. The wheels crushed an arm and a leg. She bore her sufferings patiently, but it was found impossible to save her life. Her mind wandered at intervals, and she was found to be going over the incidents of that dreadful moment when she saw the train approaching, and she was again persuading her brother to drop into the water. Her concern was all for him, not for herself. It is one of those characteristic incidents which show the self-sacrificing devotion that often fills a woman's heart. Innumerable instances are on record of women having given their hearts to the Saviour, thus following His example and in different ways giving up their lives for the benefit of those they love.

Over Two Thousand Mormon Converts have been brought to this country during a very brief period this season. Yet reports from Utah show how bitterly cruel is the system in operation. A recent observer describing a spectacle he witnessed during his last visit, speaks of a beautiful girl, lately arrived, being lifted by main force into the wagon of an old Mormon, to whom she had been "sealed." He had already one wife and a large family, and the girl struggled against her lot and appealed to the bystanders for help. None was given her, and she was carried off by the polygamist to his home, resisting all the way. The deceit practised on the ignorant foreign converts is outrageous, and once here, the United States Government does not protect them even from murder. A contemporary, quoting Judge Spear, an old resident of Utah, says that rebellion is slumbering in Utah, awaiting its opportunity; that every year the church is growing richer and more powerful, and that every foot of agricultural land in adjoining territories is secured by Mormons. "In ten years," he says, "the United States will have several Utahs to deal with."

An Indignant Judge Administered a Crush- ing rebuke to a prisoner at Little Rock, Ark., on Tuesday, September 20th, who was convicted of uttering disrespectful and profane remarks about the late President. The judge said: "You are the most depraved man that I have ever seen. I don't know how to express the contempt which the community feels for you. Such a nature does not deserve compassion. No one can sympathize with you. In full possession of your senses, strictly sober, you have uttered sentiments that shock the sensibility of this city. I fine you $25, the full extent of the law; I wish that I could fine you $1000. You cannot pay your fine, you say. Then go to the rock-pile and stay there: you are too grovelling to live with free men." The prisoner's conduct was revolting enough; but we cannot wonder that there are men so lost to right feeling as to thus shock the sensibility of the community, when we know by painful experience that it is impossible to ride in a car, or be in any public place, without hearing the holiest name used in tones of levity and profane ejaculation.

A Lover's Letter, Delivered Five Years After it was mailed, has unravelled a mystery which perplexed two anxious hearts. The young lady, who lived near Macon, Ga., in 1876, had reason to complain of some misconduct on the part of her lover, and wrote him in explicit terms on the subject. She received no answer and concluded that her letter had offended him. But the young man had written an explanation, but as he received no acknowledgment of it he supposed the young lady was too deeply hurt to accept it. Five years of silence between the parties have passed since, but a few days ago the lady received her lover's exculpatory letter, accompanied by a note from the postmaster, saying that a new letter box had been put up, and in destroying the old one the letter had been found behind a board where it had lain hidden for five years. Thus both parties have all these years been thinking bitter things of each other without just cause. People are far too ready to judge each other harshly; many estrangements in the world and in the church have resulted from a misunderstanding and a lack of knowledge of those we judge. In considering the conduct of others, and especially in pondering on God's providential dealings it is always wise to bear in mind that in the future we may understand what is now to us inexplicable (1 Cor. 13: 12).

HOLINESS THE LAW OF GOD'S HOUSE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"This is the law of the house; Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy. Behold, this is the law of the house."—EZEKIEL 43: 12.

I SHALL not enter into the immediate meaning of Ezekiel's vision. I believe that the house of which Ezekiel speaks is typical of the church of the living God. In it I see not so much the visible church as that spiritual, mystical church of Jesus Christ which is the one place of His abode. It is found in a state of grace on earth, and in full glory in heaven. Below, it is the holy church militant, above, it is the holy church triumphant.

The church is the only thing upon earth which can properly be called the house of God, for He dwelleth not in temples made with hands, that is to say of this building. The finest architecture could never constitute a proper shrine for Deity. Look to yon blue heavens, gaze upon the spangled vault of night, and view the ever-flashing, wide, and open sea, and tell me if any handiwork of man can rival the temple of nature. Peer into boundless space and see what a temple is already builded; within what walls would you hope to house the infinite Jehovah?

He has deigned, however, to choose Zion, and to desire it for his habitation. The saints are builded together as a spiritual house, a habitation of God through the Spirit. He resides among His people, according to His promise, "I will dwell in them and walk in them." Hence the church is the home of the Great Father, where he dwells in the midst of His family, and takes His rest.

Now, brothers and sisters, if you and I have had the privilege to be admitted into God's house, and to be made a part of His family, it is exceedingly necessary that we should know the law of the house. This is desirable at our entrance, and equally necessary as long as we remain in the house of the Lord. Paul wrote to Timothy with this design "that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God." To this end Ezekiel was sent of God to those who desired the favor of God. He was to show them the form of the house and the goings out thereof and the comings in thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and write it in their sight, that they might keep all the ordinances thereof, and do them.

God's house is not lawless. It is the abode of liberty, but not of license. They that dwell in God's house are in His immediate presence, and our God is a consuming fire. He had need be holy who dwells with the thrice holy God." The Lord will be sanctified in them that come near to Him, and if any enter the house to misbehave themselves, they will find that judgment begins at the house of God. How terrible are those words: "If any man defile the temple of God, him will God destroy."

Come we, then, with great attention to look at our text, which will inform us as to the law of the house. Let us first try to expound the law of the house; secondly, let us examine ourselves as to whether we have observed this law of the house; thirdly, let us see the bearings of this law; and fourthly, let us take orders for having this law of the house obeyed.

I. First, let us expound

THE LAW OF THE HOUSE.

Note the text carefully. It begins and ends with the same words: "This is the law of the house; upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy. Behold, this is the law of the house." These words make a frame for the statute; or a sort of hand on each side pointing to it. "This is the law of the house": why are the words mentioned twice? Is it because we are such wayward scholars that we need to be told everything twice at the least? Is it because we are so blind and dull that unless we have a thing repeated we are not likely to notice it, or noticing it are sure to forget it?

Or is it because this is the law of the house at the beginning of life, and this is the law of the house at the end of it? This is the law of the house for the young convert, and this is the law of the house for the most venerable saint? At any rate, the Alpha and Omega of Christian conduct is contained in the law of the house. You can go no higher than obedience to that law: indeed, you may say of it, "It is high, I cannot attain unto it." Go as far as you may, this still remains to the most advanced among us the law of the house, for the Lord's commandment is exceedingly broad.

And what is this law of the house? Why, that everything about it is holy. All things in the church must be pure, clean, right, gracious, commendable, Godlike. Everything that has to do with the church of God must be holy: here are the words: "Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit round about shall be most holy." Observe that all must be holy; nay, observe again, it must be most holy. In the old temple there was only one little chamber in the centre that was most holy; this was called the holy of holies, or the holiness of holiness; but now in the church of God every chamber, hall, and court is to be most holy.

Observe that this law of the house is not only intense, but it is for we read, "Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy." The outer courts, the courts of the Gentiles, the walls, the promenades outside the walls, the slopes of the hill, every part that had to do with the mountain upon which the temple stood, was to be most holy. From which I gather that in the church of God it is not merely her ministers that are to be most holy, but her common members; not her sacraments only, but her ordinary meals; not her Sabbaths only, but her work-days; not her worship only, but her daily labor. All that which surrounds our consecrated life is to be consecrated too.

We notice, once again, that this holiness was to be conspicuous. The church is not as a house sequestered in a valley, or hidden away in a wood, but it is as the temple, which was set upon the top of a mountain, where it could be seen from afar. The whole of that mountain was holy. Conspicuous holiness ought to be the mark of the church of God. We should be a peculiar people, distinguished by this as a race dwelling alone, that cannot be numbered among the nations. We ought to be noted, not for talent, not for wealth, not for loud professions, but for holiness. Somehow or other true holiness is sure to be spied out and remarked upon. Like the violet, it tries to hide itself, but it is betrayed by its perfume. Like the star, it twinkles with modesty, but it is discovered by its light. Grace cannot be put under a bushel. It would fain be sheltered from its enemies by its obscurity, but the holy city evermore stands on a hill, and it cannot be hid. Would God that whenever people speak of the church to which we belong they may acknowledge its holiness! Would God that whenever they speak of you or me they may have no evil thing to say of us unless they lie.

WHAT IS HOLINESS?

I know what it is, and yet I cannot in a few words define it. I will bring out its meaning by degrees, but I shall not do better than the poor Irish lad who had been converted to the faith. When he was asked by the missionary, "Patrick, what is holiness?" "Sir," said he, "it is having a clane inside." Just so. Morality is a clean outside, but holiness is being clean within. Morality is a dead body washed and laid in clean white linen: holiness is the living form in perfect purity. To be just to man is morality, to be hallowed unto God is holiness.

The church of God must not be reputedly good, but really pure; she must not have a name for virtue, but her heart must be right before God—she must have a clean inside. Our lives must be such that observers may peep within doors and may see nothing for which to blame us. Our moral cleanliness must not be like that of a bad housewife, who sweeps the dirt under the mats, and puts away rags and rottenness in the corner cupboards. God desireth truth in the inward parts, and in the hidden part He would make us to know wisdom.

We might instructively divide holiness into four things, and the first would be its negative side, separation from the world. There may be morality, but there can be no holiness in a worldling. The man who is as other men are, having experienced no change of nature, and knowing no change of life, is not yet acquainted with scriptural holiness. The word to every true saint is, "Come ye out from among them. Be ye separate: touch not the unclean thing." If we are conformed to the world we cannot be holy. Jesus said of all His saints, "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." We are redeemed from among men that we may be like our Redeemer, "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners."

We are not to be separate as to place, avoiding men with monkish fanaticism, for nobody mixed more with sinners than did our Lord. "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them" is the old reproach, but yet our Lord was not one of them, as everybody could see: nothing could be more clear than the difference between the lost sheep and the Shepherd who came among them seeking out His own. Every action, every word, every movement beokened that He was another man from the sinners whom He sought to bless. So must it be with us. As the lily among thorns, so must we be among the mass of men. There is no holiness without separateness from the world.

Holiness next consists very largely in consecration. The holy things of the sanctuary were holy because they were dedicated to God. No one drank out of the sacred vessels except God's servants the priests; no victims were killed by the sacrificial knife, or laid upon the altar except such as were consecrated to Jehovah, for the altar was holy, and the fire thereof was holy. So must it be with us if we are to be holy: we must belong to Jehovah, we must be consecrated to Him, and be used for His own purposes. Not nominally only, but really, and as a matter of fact, we must live for God, and labor for God. That is our reason for existence, and if we answer not this end, we have no excuse for living, we are blots upon the face of nature, waste places, and barren trees which cumber the ground. Only so far as we are bringing glory to God are we answering the end and design of our creation. Oh to make a dedication of ourselves to God without reserve, and then to stand to it forever: this is

THE WAY OF HOLINESS.

But this does not complete the idea of holiness unless you add to it conformity to the will and character of God. If we are God's servants we must follow God's commands: we must be ready to do as our Master bids us because He is the Lord, and must be obeyed. We must make the Lord Jesus our example, and as Ezekiel says, "we must measure the pattern." It must be our meat and drink to do the will of Him that sent us. Our rule is not our judgment, much less our fancy, but the word of God is our statute-book. We are to obey God that we may grow like God. The question to be asked is, What would the Lord have me do? or, What would Christ Himself have done under the circumstances? Not, what is my wish, but what is God's law about this; not what will please me, but what will please Him. Do understand, then, that with regard to the whole range of the church, however wide her action, conformity to the character of God is the law of the house. Likeness to Christ must be seen in every single member, in every act of every member, and in the whole body, and in all its corporate acts. This is the law of the house.

I must add, however, to make up the idea of holiness, that there must be a close communion between the soul and God; for if a man could be, which is not possible, conformed to the likeness God, and consecrated to God, yet if he never h any communication with God the idea of holin would not be complete. The temple becomes h because God dwells in it. He came into the m holy place in a most especial manner, and this counted for its being the holy of holies; even special communion with the Lord creates spe holiness. God's presence demands and crea holiness. And so, brothers and sisters, if would be holy we must dwell in God, and must dwell in us. We cannot be holy at a tance from God. This is the law of the house.

II. Now, secondly, I want your help while I s let us

EXAMINE OURSELVES BY THIS LAW.

Let each man question himself as to whethe has carefully observed the law of the house.

Brethren, the Church of God is holy. I founded by a holy God upon holy principles for holy purposes. She has been redeemed holy Saviour, with a holy sacrifice, and dedic to holy service. Her great glory is the Holy Sp whose influences and operations are all holy. law-book is the holy Bible, her armory is the covenant, her comfort is holy prayer. Her co cations are holy assemblies; her citizens are men and holy women; she exists for holy e and follows after holy examples. Dear hearer you then as part of her "holiness to the Lor Ask yourself questions, founded on what I already said. Do I so live as to be separated? there in my business a difference between me those with whom I trade? Are my thou different? Does the current of my desire run different direction? Am I at home with the godly, or does their sin vex me? Am I or them, or am I as a speckled bird among th Search, brethren, search, and see whether ye holy in that sense or no.

Next, let each one ask, Am I consecra Am I living to God with my body, with my with my spirit? Am I using my substance talents, my time, my voice, my thoughts for G glory. What am I living for? Am I maki pretence to live to God, and am I after all r living to self? Am I like Ananias and Sapp pretending to give all, and yet keeping back a of the price? The preacher would search own heart, and he begs you all to search yours

Next ask the question, Am I living in confor to the mind of the holy God? Am I livin Christ would have lived in my place? Do I master, as a servant, as a husband, as a wif as a child, act as God Himself would have m so that He could say to me, "Well done, good and faithful servant." He is a jealous G am I obeying Him with care? If I am not v ing in obedience to God I am behaving disord I am breaking the law of the house, and that h the house of the living God. Ought we n take heed lest we insult the King in His palace, and perish from the way when His wra kindled but a little?

Then, again, do I live in communion with G I cannot be holy and yet have a wall of divisio tween me and God. Is there a great gulf of ration between me and the Lord? then I stranger to holiness. I must have fellowship Him, or else I am living in a manner which is ful, dangerous, grievous, injurious. Brother ter, let me put this pressing question, Do you with God? Do you abide in fellowship with Je I know there are some who would rather not an answer to that question. I have met wit lievers who have said, "If you asked me wh I was drunken or dishonest, I should say 'N once. If you asked me whether I have bee right and moral, I could say 'Yes,' most ce ly. But when you say, 'Are you walking in munion with the Lord? are you enjoying ha fellowship with God?' I am not prepared to you an answer, for I am weak upon this point

Are there not some professors among you do not see the face of God by the month toge and seldom enjoy the presence of God at Their nearness to God is a thing of rare occas and not of every-day consciousness. At a mee when religious excitement stirs them, they little warmed up, but their general temperature suits the North Pole rather than the Equator. But oh, dear friends, this will not do. We want you to dwell near to God always; to wake up in the morning with His light saluting the eyes of your soul; and to be with him while you are engaged in domestic concerns or out in the busy world. We want you often to have a secret word with the Well-beloved during the day, and to go to bed at night feeling how sweet it is to fall asleep upon the Saviour's bosom.

III. Now, thirdly, what are

of the house? Those bearings of the law to which I now refer are these: If the Church of God shall be most holy, it will have as the result of it the greatest possible degree of the smile and favor of God. A holy church has God in the midst of her. The consequence of God's presence is a holy liveliness in all her members, for where God comes near to man lethargy and death soon fly away. Where the sacred presence abides sickness of soul disappears.

Where there is holiness God comes, and there is sure to be love, for love is of the very essence of holiness. The fruit of the Spirit is love both to God and man. That love begets union of heart, brotherly kindness, sympathy, and affection, and these bring peace and happiness. Among the truly holy there are no divisions, no heresies, no separation into parties, but all one in Christ. Whence come wars and fightings? Not from holiness, but from unconquered lusts. When we shall be perfect as our heavenly Father is perfect, we shall love as He loves.

This, of course, leads to success in all the church's efforts, and a consequent increase. Her prayers are intense, and they bring down a blessing, for they are holy and acceptable unto God by Jesus Christ: her labors are abundant, and they secure an abundant harvest, for God will not forget her labor of love.

A holy church, my brethren, may we see it! A church most holy in all her solemn services shall be "fair as the sun, clear as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners." The nations among whom she dwells shall hear the fame thereof; they shall come from afar, and ask to see her prince, and they shall be astonished at His glory. The sons of the aliens shall come bending to her feet. Her converts shall be like flocks of doves, she shall herself wonder whence they came. There shall be no languor, no defeat, no disappointment, no doubt of eternal verities, and no suspicions of infinite love. In the power of the Holy Spirit she shall be bravely confident, gloriously self-sacrificing, and so shall she go from victory to victory.

On the other hand, imagine

A CHURCH WITHOUT HOLINESS.

What will come of it? Without holiness no man shall see the Lord; and if the church cannot even see her Lord, what is her condition? Go to Zion, and see what happens to God's house when once defiled. Mark how the holy and beautiful house was desolate and burnt with fire. Remember how God loathed Zion and bade her enemies cast her down stone from stone, and sow with salt the very site on which she stood. Was there ever destruction like to that which fell upon Jerusalem? Let us receive among our brotherhood unholy men and women, and let us tolerate and indulge them, and we shall soon see the anger of the Lord wax hot. Let us ourselves give way to laxity of principle and practice, let us lose our consecration and our communion, and what will soon be the effect?

Probably first will come heart-burning, envy, and strife; next, divisions, schisms, false doctrines, rivalries, contentions; or possibly the evil may take the form of lethargy, inactivity, worldliness, want of love to Christ and souls; by and by there will be diminished gatherings at the meetings for prayer, a cessation of all earnest pleading and consecrated living; then a falling-off of congregations; then a want of power in the ministry—a defect in the doctrine, perhaps, or else in the earnestness of the speaker; and all the while no conversions and no visits from the Lord.

Shall it be, in years to come, that men will pass by the Tabernacle and ask, "What is that huge house?" and the reply will be, It was built by an earnest, godly company in former years; but they are dead, and things are changed. What is it now? There is a fine organ and a polished preacher, but the multitudes have departed, and the few who still keep together are of the cold, respectable order, who have no life or zeal. Then will this house be a proverb, a byword and a hissing throughout the whole earth. How often am I jealous about this with a burning jealousy; my heart breaks when I hear of some of you that you live unholy lives. There are some, I fear, among you who so walk as to dishonor the cross of Christ; I mean not such as we can lay our finger on and say, "This man is a drunkard, or unchaste, or dishonest," else, as you well know, you would not long be spared—no, not a moment longer than was needful for the proof of your wrong and of your impenitence in it; but I mean such as cannot be thus dealt with, because their sins are not open—the tares that grow up in the wheat, the actions not yet discovered—because we cannot cast the lot so as to light upon this man or that, and say, "It is he."

I tremble lest there should be among us some, utterly unknown to us, and undiscoverable by the most vigilant eye, whose sin, nevertheless, like a leprosy, should eat into the house, and make it unfit for the habitation of God. Oh that we may never be so fallen that God Himself shall say, "Let them alone." It was an awful moment when, in the holy place at Jerusalem, there was heard the moving of wings and a voice which said, "Let us go hence." Then the glory will have departed. Woe, woe, woe! Let the curtain drop with a shower of tears upon it. God grant it never may be so!

IV. So now, lastly, dear brethren, let us take order to

of the house. I believe that Jesus is always working in His own way for the purity of every true church. "His fan is in his hand"—see it moving continually—"and He will throughly purge His floor." God's melting fire is not in the world, where the dross contains no gold, but "His fire is in Zion, and His furnace in Jerusalem." "The Lord will judge His people." The Lord tries professors and their professions. I believe that there is a judgment going on over church members that some are little aware of. Paul speaks of a church in his day in this manner; he notes their inconsistencies, and adds, "For this cause some are sickly among you, and many sleep."

We may expect our Master to come among us every now and then with a scourge of small cords, and to smite right and left to purify the temple of God lest it should become a den of thieves. He is a jealous God, and He will not suffer defilement among His own people. Have you never seen great Christian communities at a certain phase of their existence come into troubled waters and break up like wrecks? There must have been a secret reason; probably the one assigned at the time was by no means the true one. Want of holiness led to want of love, and unloving spirits soon found a pretext for dispute. Those who should have met this with love, and quenched it by gentle wisdom, acted in a harsh spirit, being themselves deficient in grace, and so flint met steel, and sparks abounded; then came fire; then came general conflagration. The open mischief was an effect rather than a cause, and it may be hoped was even part of the cure.

Now, cannot we give earnest heed that this law is regarded among us? "Yes," say you, "take care that you who are pastors, elders, and deacons are watchful and faithful. Guard well the door of the church, and see to it that you do not admit the ungodly: be vigilant also in discipline, so that when any are manifestly unholy they are put away." Brethren, this is our desire and labor; but, after all, what can we do? With all our diligence what can a small band of officers accomplish in a great church which is numbered by thousands? Brothers and sisters, this must be taken up by you all. Let every man bear his own burden. I would have every man sweep in the front of his own door. I pray that each person who belongs to this church may be jealous for its purity, and watch both over himself and his brethren, lest any form of sin should be a root of bitterness to trouble us, and thereby many should be defiled.

Let us set to this work at once. Here is for us: let us repent of past failures in holiness. We shall never overcome sin till we are conscious of it and ashamed of it. Hence the Lord said to the prophet, "Thou son of man, show the house to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities; and let them measure the pattern. And if they be ashamed of all that they have done, shew them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof." The first step toward purity is penitence. Let us bow our heads and lament before the Lord the sins of our holy things, our personal trespasses, our transgressions against love, our offences against the law of the house.

Having owned our error, let us next make the law of God's house our earnest study that we may avoid offences in the future. You will hardly keep the law if you do not know it. Search the sacred word day and night. Let the inspired page be your standard. Never mind what your minister tells you, observe what the Spirit of God tells you. Get to your Bibles, search them, and there see how you ought to behave in the house of God. Be much upon your knees asking the Lord to teach you His mind and will, and specially beseech Him to write His law upon your hearts, for you will never keep it in your life till it is written there.

When you have studied the law of the house, then next be intensely real in your endeavor to observe it. How much of the religion of the present day is a sham.

MEN TALK OF BEING HOLY:

do they know what they mean? We speak of consecration, and yet live as if we were mere worldings hunting for wealth, or fame, or pleasure. Some sing of giving all to God, and yet their contributions are miserably small. Some say they are living wholly for God, but if they had lived wholly for themselves it would not have made any particular difference in what they have done. Oh, let us be real. Do not let us preach what we do not believe, nor profess to be believers in a creed which is not true to our own souls.

Then let us cry for a sincere and growing faith in God concerning this matter of holiness. Let us believe in Jesus, that by His Holy Spirit He can make us holy. Do not let us believe that any sin is inevitable; rather let us feel bound to overcome it. Let us not trust in our own strugglings and strivings, but let us as much trust Christ to work in us sanctification as to work for us justification. Let faith deal with the water as well as with the blood, for they both flowed from the same fountain in the Saviour's riven side.

And then, lastly, let us pray to be set on fire with an intense zeal for God. I do not believe that there is such a thing as cold holiness in the world. You and I are never the Lord's while we are cold-hearted. We must be on fire if we are to be sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. Get rid of zeal from the church, and you have removed one of the most purifying elements, for God intends to purge Jerusalem by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning. Oh, to be baptized into the Holy Ghost and into fire. Refining fire go through and through our souls till all that defileth shall be utterly consumed, and we shall be as ingots of pure gold, wholly the Lord's.

Thus have we rehearsed in your ears the law of the house. May the Holy Spirit enable you to keep it unto the end.

Squire Gifford's Visit to Egerton Manor.

A Talk on a Ship's Deck.

THE HEIR OF EGERTON MANOR.

MANY a party of young men spending an English summer day in sculling on the Avon, have rested on their oars for a few minutes to enjoy the beauty of a scene that bursts upon the visitor at a bend in the river. A minute or two before, and nothing is visible but a row of tall poplars with a background of beeches and ancient oaks; but a few strokes of the oars and there appears a fine old manor-house, one side of which is almost covered with ivy. A beautiful velvety lawn slopes down to the river's edge, and the horns of deer are seen here and there glancing under the trees. This is Egerton Manor.

The Egertons were a proud race. They boasted of a longer lineage than any duke who sits in the hereditary chamber. The old manor-house with the park around it had been handed down through the centuries from father to son, and on the walls of the famous picture gallery the same cast of features could be detected in each face of the representatives of generation after generation.

Visitors call the mansion a romantic looking place, and say it looks as if it had an interesting history. They are right. Many stories are connected with that venerable pile, but the most pathetic of all, is not told by the old retainer who shows the place. "The family is not here," he is accustomed to say; "no, sir, they are in furrin parts." "Which rooms do they live in when they are at home?" "They lived in the south wing, but that is not shown to visitors." He might add if he would, that one of the rooms in that south wing is kept locked, the blinds closely drawn, and no foot has entered it for five years. That is the room the heir of the property used to occupy. But the old man is reticent, and prefers to talk about the pictures and ancient tapestry, and the story of the locked room is not told to the visitor.

The fact is, the heir of Egerton Manor is a convict, and his aged father a broken-hearted man. One night—it was New Year's eve—a family party was gathered in the great hall. There were many bright and merry faces there, but a look of expectancy was more or less on all. Two arrivals were still awaited—one that of Squire Gifford, an old and intimate friend of the family, and the other that of the heir, Reginald Egerton, then an undergraduate at Oxford. The clock on the stables had just struck the hour, five o'clock, when a carriage driven by a coachman in livery rolled up to the gates of the manor-house, and Squire Gifford's voice was heard calling for the head of the house. The two aged men were soon closeted together, and from that interview Mr. Egerton came out with a bowed head which he has never raised since.

The news Squire Gifford brought was soon told. As he entered the carriage drive, a man hurriedly called to him, told him that Reginald Egerton had been that day arrested for forgery, and begged him to break the news gently to the aged father. Card parties in the rooms of his fellow-graduates had given him a taste for play. He had at every opportunity "run up to London," where at a noted club, of which he was a member, he played all night for high stakes. On one of his excursions, excited by wine and maddened by what he termed ill-luck, he doubled the stakes, lost, and gave his note for the debt. As he left the club and wandered along the broad thoroughfare of Pall Mall he considered his position. His debt was "a debt of honor." He had no means to pay, and he would be a disgraced man if he did not pay it. Then the thought occurred to him that he might raise money on a bill; he could indorse it with the name of a wealthy acquaintance, and before it became due he might have the means to liquidate it. It was done, but the forgery was discovered; he was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced, and his aged father with his daughters went to a remote village in the Tyrol, there to hide from all who knew the sad story. Only at long intervals did the venerable man return to his home, and then only for a brief stay on urgent business, but the young man's room was never opened.

After three years, news came that the prodigal was a changed man. He wrote his father asking forgiveness. Through the blessing of God on the efforts of the prison chaplain he had been led to Jesus, and at the cross had found peace and pardon. Tears filled the old man's eyes as he read the letter, for he too had been driven by his sorrow to the same Source of comfort, and he humbly thanked God for his son's penitence. Never will the family return to their beloved home, but in their exile they have the consolation that although men are unforgiving, the Saviour whom they love and serve is the Friend of sinners, and His blood cleanses from all sin.

"I'M GOING BY THE BOOK."

TWO men were on the deck of a steamship then on the stocks in one of the ship-building yards on the Clyde. One of them was a stalwart, active man in middle life, known in the yard as "honest Sandy." As he rested for a moment, the saw still in his hands, and drew himself up to his full height, he looked a fine specimen of his race. The other man had a short, sturdy frame, and was noted for his sceptical disposition. He was a good workman, but was not much liked, owing to his habit of raising an argument whenever he had opportunity. He was called "left-handed Tom," in allusion to his peculiarity of always using his left hand for purposes for which other people use their right.

"Well, Sandy," said Tom, in an interval of the sawing, "I have been anxious to have a conversation with you. I am told you are one of those people who say they know they are saved. Is that true?"

"Yes," said Sandy, "quite true; thank God, I know I'm saved. In fact, there is nothing I'm more sure of than that I'm saved."

"Well, now," said Tom, "that is something I cannot see through, how any man can say that he is saved as long as he is in this world. I think it is rather presumptuous for any one to say so."

"Well, there is a reality in being saved, in being a child of God, and in knowing it. What is the breadth of this waterway?" Tom, astonished at the apparently sudden change in the conversation, said, "Why, fourteen inches all round, to be sure; what makes you ask that when you know?" "But are you quite sure that it is to be fourteen inches?" said Sandy. "Certainly." "But what makes you so sure?" asked Sandy. "Why, I'm going by the book," said Tom, and as he said so he pulled a small memorandum-book out of his pocket, in which were marked the sizes and position of the various things on the deck. "I'm sure it is fourteen inches, for it is here in the book, and I got the book from headquarters. I got it in the drawing office."

"Oh, I see," said Sandy. "Now, look here; that is just exactly how I know I'm saved. I'm just going by the Book. It came from headquarters—it came from God, it is God's Word. I found in here that I was a lost, condemned sinner, worthy of nothing but the lake of fire; but I also found that 'God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life' (John 3:16). I took God at His word, and I'm saved; and you too may be saved if you will, simply as you are, a lost, condemned sinner, believe in Jesus—that is, trust Him as your Saviour, and you are saved; and then you can say without presumption, 'I know I'm saved, for I'm going by the Book.'" Here the conversation ended, and for once left-handed Tom did not have the last word in an argument. He silently resumed his work, conscious that honest Sandy had a logical ground for his statement as to his position as a saved man.

Travelling by Wheelbarrow in China.

CHINESE CONVEYANCES.

AMONG the hardships encountered by the devoted men and women who leave their native country to proclaim the Gospel of the Cross in heathen lands, must be reckoned the difficulties of locomotion. Even in China it is not easy to travel from one place to another. In a work entitled "Journeys in North China," the author, Rev. Dr. Williamson, describes some of the means of transport employed in that country. It appears from his narrative that the modes of conveyance used by the Chinese in different parts of the country vary very much. In the south of Kiang-su and the north of Cheh-kiang boats are everywhere available for long journeys, as rivers and canals are numerous.

In the south of Cheh-kiang, among the hills, goods are carried by porters, passengers travel by sedan-chairs, and asses or mules are rarely, if ever, seen. Horses are only used by officials and soldiers. In Shanghai wheelbarrows are much used both for the conveyance of goods and passengers; and north of the Yang tsi-kiang asses, mules, wheelbarrows, and carts of various descriptions abound.

The larger wheelbarrows have often one or two men pulling them, or an ass, mule, pony, or ox harnessed on in front, while the coolie behind does a full share of the heavy work, making often a journey of thirty miles a day in fine weather. Our accompanying picture shows one of these wheelbarrows, on which a sail is used to assist the humble toilers when the wind is fair.

Dr. Williamson says: "We met many of their extraordinary wheelbarrows, moving along on dry ground with a sail set, each barrow having a great wheel in the centre, finely balanced. Those we saw were laden heavily, and had a large sheet of cloth set on a frame-work in front; many of these were so rigged as to be raised or reefed at pleasure, the ropes or braces being attached to a hook close to the driver. We have never seen these wheelbarrows without pity. The strain to the men who manage them is very great; indeed, we have never before witnessed human beings under such heavy labor."

On one occasion he hired three of them, of which he says: "We found them very tiresome, for though one man dragged in front, and another pushed behind, we only went at the rate of a mile and a half an hour. As we got to the level country we were fortunate enough to have a breeze at our backs, which accelerated our pace to about two miles and a half an hour."

The carts are little better, for the roads are often very bad, and even in fine weather you do not ride far before you begin to wish the people would "mend their ways." The ruts are exceedingly deep, so that sometimes the axles scrape along the ground. Deep holes are numerous, which remind one of "the very miry slough" which is spoken of in "The Pilgrim's Progress," and in these the carts often get stuck as fast as Bunyan's Pilgrim in the Slough of Despond. Help comes, it is true, but it is very often in the shape of the long whips and thick sticks of fellow-travellers; and after a sufficient amount of shouting and beating the unfortunate animals manage to drag the cart out of the hole.

We are all ready to honor brave generals who fight the battles of their country, but we are apt to underrate the labors of these soldiers of the Prince of Peace, who voluntarily undergo privation, hardship, and danger, that they may spread the knowledge of Jesus in the dark places of the earth.

REMARKABLE FAITH-CURE.

AT the annual summer meeting at Old Orchard Beach, under Dr. Cullis, of Boston, which began on July 29th, 1881, Caroline Talbot, the Quaker preacher, said: "If I should sit here any longer and not tell what the Lord has done for me to-day, I feel that the stones would cry out against me. For the last twenty-five years I have never known a day without pain of some kind, but this has not interfered with my public work for the Master.

"About six years ago I went to Europe on evangelistic work, but was seized with inflammatory rheumatism just as I landed at Cork, and for ten days my life was despaired of. When I recovered, my physicians detected the most unmistakable signs of heart disease, and I found myself unable to endure any physical exertion whatever. All the doctors agreed that the mitral valve was seriously affected, and candidly told me that I could never be any better. Although very weak in body, yet my faith was strong, and I continued to work in public, but in all these six years I have never walked one hundred yards. Twice only I ventured to walk across a street and churchyard, but fainted away and was resuscitated with great difficulty. My many friends in Baltimore will remember how I was obliged to ride at all times, and many know also that I required help and frequent rests in going up the church aisle.

"A severe attack of pneumonia two or three years ago complicated my trouble still more, but still I worked hard for the Lord, and spoke upward of one thousand times in various parts of the country. Latterly, however, I have been confined at home in Ohio, and struggled on to New York in July, much against the wishes of my friends. While in New York the wonderful answers to the prayers of Dr. Cullis were related to me, and I was urged to make the trip to Old Orchard, and although it seemed almost idiotic to attempt the journey in my weak condition, yet I finally consented, feeling that if I could see him and claim the promise of God, perhaps I might be sealed for God's glory. I reached Old Orchard on Wednesday evening very unwell, and tossed about all night in a high fever, and when morning came I was so weak that four attempts to rise proved futile. During the whole of the six years I had been unable to comb my hair without frequent stops, as the act of lifting the arms affected my heart, and for most of that time I have been compelled to lie in one position in bed, and could turn over only by raising myself and moving with slowness and care.

"On Thursday Dr. Cullis called to see me, and asked what I thought of this healing in answer to prayer. I replied that I believed it was entirely possible, and expressed my willingness to trust God for my recovery. The doctor then prayed with me according to the promise in James 5:14, 15, and soon after left to attend the opening meeting. Shortly after his departure I arose without difficulty, dressed myself, combing my hair without a single rest, and in the afternoon actually walked to the meeting, a distance many times greater than any which my utmost strength had sufficed to cover for six years before."

The second day this lady appeared at the early morning meeting before breakfast, and praised God for a sound sleep and for wonderfully increased strength, and at noon that day the change in her complexion was so striking as to call forth many comments from her friends. She continued to attend the meeting for a week, preached one morning with great simplicity and power, spoke frequently of her healing, testified to her ability to lie as she pleased at night and to turn whenever she desired, and through it all gave the glory to Jesus, and expressed her strong determination to devote every particle of her renewed strength to her Master. No one will soon forget the tones of triumphant faith in which she exclaimed, "I bless the Lord I am well," nor the great feeling with which she thanked God for the new anointing of the Holy Ghost in her soul.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

Phebe Marlowe.

THE church clock struck nine as Phebe turned into Whitefriars Road, the street where the old bank of Riversborough stood. The houses on each side of the broad and quiet street were handsome, old-fashioned dwelling-places, not one of which had as yet been turned into a shop. The most eminent lawyers and doctors lived in it; and there were more than one frontage which displayed a hatchment, left to grow faded and discolored long after the year of mourning was ended. Here, too, was the judge's residence, set apart for his occupation during the assizes. But the old bank was the most handsome and most ancient of all those urban mansions. It had originally stood alone on the brow of the hill overlooking the river and the Whitefriars Abbey. Toward the street, when Roland Sefton's forefathers had realized a fortune by banking, now a hundred years ago, there had been a new frontage built to it, with the massive red-brick workmanship and tall narrow windows of the eighteenth century. But on the river side it was still an old Elizabethan mansion, with gabled roofs standing boldly up against the sky; and low broad casements, latticed and filled with lozenge-shaped panes; and half-timber walls, with black beams fashioned into many forms; and with one story jutting out beyond that below, until the attic window under the gable seemed to hang in mid-air, without visible support, over the garden sloping down a steep bank to the river side.

Phebe Marlowe, in her coarse dark blue merino dress, and with her market-basket of golden blossoms on her arm, walked with a quick step along the quiet street, having left her pony at a stable near the entrance to the town. There were few persons about; but those whom she met she looked at with a pleasant, shy, slight smile on her face, as if she almost claimed acquaintance with them, and was ready, even wishful, to bid them good morning on a day so fine and bright. Two or three responded to this inarticulate greeting, and then her lips parted gladly, and her voice, clear though low, answered them with a sweet good-humor that had something at once peculiar and pathetic in it. She passed under a broad archway at one side of the bank offices, leading to the house entrance, and to the sloping garden beyond. A private door into the bank was ajar, and a dark, sombre face was peering out of it into the semi-darkness. Phebe's feet paused for an instant.

"Good morning, Mr. Acton," she said, with a little rustic curtsey. But he drew back quickly; and she heard him draw the bolt inside the door, as if he had neither seen nor heard her. Yet the face, with its eager and scared expression, had been too quickly seen by her, and too vividly impressed upon her keen perception; and she went on, chilled a little, as if some cloud had come over the clear brightness of the morning.

Phebe was so much at home in the house, that when she found the housemaid on her knees cleaning the hall floor, she passed on unceremoniously to the dining-room, where she felt sure of finding some of the family. It was a spacious room, with a low ceiling where black beams crossed and re-crossed each other; with wainscoted walls, and a carved chimney-piece of almost black oak. A sombre place in gloomy weather, yet so decorated with old china vases, and great brass salvers, and silver cups and tankards catching every ray of light, that the whole room glistened in this bright May-day. In the broad-cushioned seat formed by the sill of the oriel window, which was almost as large as a room itself, there sat the elder Mrs. Sefton, Roland Sefton's foreign mother, with his two children standing before her. They had their hands clasped behind them, and their faces were turned toward her's with the grave earnestness children's faces often wear. She was giving them their daily Bible lesson, and she held up her small brown hand as a signal to Phebe to keep silence, and to wait a moment until the lesson was ended.

"And so," she said, "those who know the will of God, and do not keep it, will be beaten with many stripes. Remember that, my little Felix."

"I shall always try to do it," answered the boy solemnly. "I'm nine years old to-day; and when I'm a man I'm going to be a pastor, like your father, grandmamma: my great-grandfather, you know, in the Jura. Tell us how he used to go about the snow mountains seeing his poor people, and how he met with wolves sometimes, and was never frightened."

"Ah! my little children," she answered, "you have had a good father, and a good grandfather, and a good great-grandfather. How very good you ought to be."

"We will," cried both the children, clinging round her as she rose from her chair; until they caught sight of Phebe standing in the doorway. Then with cries of delight they flew to her, and threw themselves upon her with almost rough caresses, as if they knew she could well bear it. She received them with merry laughter, and knelt down that their arms might be thrown more easily round her neck.

"See," she said, "I was up so early, while you were all in bed, finding May-roses for you, with the May-dew on them. And if your father and mother will let us go, I'll take you up the river to the osier island; or you shall ride my Ruby, and we'll go off a long, long way into the country, us three, and have dinner in a new place, where you have never been. Because it's Felix's birthday."

She was still kneeling on the floor, with the children about her, when the door opened, and the same troubled and haggard face which had peered out upon her under the archway, looked into the room with restless and bloodshot eyes. Phebe felt a sudden chill again, and rising to her feet, put the children behind her, as if she feared some danger for them.

"Where is Mr. Sefton?" he asked, in a deep, hoarse voice, "Is he at home, Madame?"

Ever since the elder Mr. Sefton had brought his young foreign wife home, now more than thirty years ago, the people of Riversborough had called her Madame, giving to her no other title or surname. It had always seemed to set her apart, and at a distance, as a foreigner; and so quiet had she been, so homely and domesticated, that she had remained a stranger, keeping her old habits of life and thought, and often yearning for the old pastor's home among the Jura Mountains.

"But yes," she answered, "my son is late this morning; but all the world is early, I think. It is not much beyond nine o'clock, Mr. Acton. The bank is not open yet."

"No, no," he answered, hurriedly, while his eyes wandered restlessly about the room; "he is not ill, Madame?"

"I hope so not," she replied, with some vague uneasiness stirring in her heart.

"Nor dead?" he muttered.

"Dead!" exclaimed both Madame and Phebe in one breath, "dead!"

"All men die," he went on, "and it is a pleasant thing to lie down quietly in one's own grave, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. He could rest soundly in the grave."

"I will go and see," cried Madame, catching Phebe by the arm.

"Pray God you may find him dead," he answered with a low, miserable laugh, ending in a sob.

He was mad; neither Madame nor Phebe had a doubt of it. They put the children before them, and bade them run away to the nursery, while they followed up the broad old staircase. Madame went into her son's bed-room; but in a few seconds she returned to Phebe with an anxious face.

"He is not there," she said, "nor Felicita. She is in her own sitting-room, where she likes not to be followed. It is her sacred place, and I go there never, Phebe."

"But she knows where Mr. Sefton is," answered Phebe, "and we must ask her. We cannot leave poor Mr. Acton alone. If nobody else dares disturb her, I will."

"She will not be vexed with you," said Madame Sefton. "Knock at this door, Phebe; knock till she answers. I am miserable about my son."

Several times Phebe knocked, more loudly each time, until at last a low voice, sounding far away, bade them go in. Very quietly, as if indeed they were stepping into some holy place barefooted, they crossed the threshold.

The room was a small one, with a dim, many-colored light pervading it; for the upper part of the mullioned casement was filled with painted glass, and even the panes of the lower part were of faintly tinted green. Like all the rest of the old house the walls were wainscoted, but here there was no piece of china or silver to sparkle; the only glitter was that of the gilding on the handsomely bound books arranged in two bookcases. In this green gloom sat Felicita Sefton, leaning back in her chair, with her head resting languidly on the cushions, and her dark eyes turned dimly and dreamily toward the quietly opening door.

"Phebe Marlowe!" she said, her eyes brightening a little, as the fresh, sweet face of the young country girl met her gaze. Phebe stepped softly forward into the dim room, and laid the finest of the golden flowers she had gathered that morning upon Felicita's lap. It brought a gleam of spring sunshine into the gloom which caught Felicita's eye, and she uttered a low cry of delight as she took it up in her small, delicate hand. Phebe stooped down shyly and kissed the small hand, her face all aglow with smiles and blushes.

"Felicita," said Madame, her voice faltering a little, "where is my son this morning?"

"Roland!" she repeated absently; "Roland? Didn't he say last night he was going to London?"

"To London!" exclaimed his mother.

"Yes," she answered, "he bade me good-bye last night; I remember now. He said he would not disturb me again; he was going by the mail train. He was sorry to be away on poor little Felix's birthday. I recollect quite distinctly now."

"He said not one word to me," said Madame. "It is strange."

"Very strange," asserted Felicita, languidly, as if she were wandering away again into the reverie they had broken in upon.

"Did he say when he would be back?" asked his mother.

"In a few days, of course," she answered.

"But he has not told Acton," resumed Madame.

"Who did you say?" inquired Felicita.

"The head clerk, the manager when Roland is away," she said. "He has not said anything to him."

"Very strange," said Felicita again. It was plainly irksome to her to be disturbed by questions like these, and she was withdrawing herself into the remote and unapproachable distance where no one could follow her. Her finely-chiselled features and colorless skin gave her a singular resemblance to marble; and they might almost as well have addressed themselves to a marble image.

"Come," said Madame, "we must see Acton again."

They found him in the bank parlor, where Roland was usually to be met with at this hour. There was an unspoken hope in their hearts that he would be there, and so deliver them from the undefined trouble and terror they were suffering. But only Acton was there, seated at Roland's desk, and turning over the papers in it with a rapid and reckless hand. His face was hidden behind the great flap of the desk, and though he glanced over it for an instant as the door opened, he concealed himself again, as if feigning unconsciousness of any one's presence.

"My son is gone to London," said Madame, keeping at a safe distance from him, with the door open behind her and Phebe to secure a speedy retreat. The flap of the desk fell with a loud crash, and Acton flung his arms above his head with a gesture of despair.

"I knew it," he exclaimed. "Oh, my dear young master! God grant he may get away safe. All is lost!"

"What do you mean?" cried Madame, forgetting one terror in another, and catching him by the arm; "what is lost?"

"He is gone!" he answered, "and it was more fault than his—mine and Mrs. Sefton's. natever wrong he has done it was for her. Remember that, Madame, and you, Phebe Marlowe. anything happens remember it's my fault more n his, and Mrs. Sefton's fault more than mine."

'Tell me what you mean?" urged Madame athlessly.

'You'll know when Mr. Sefton returns, Made," he answered with a sudden return to his ally calm tone and manner, which was as start- as his former vehemence had been; "he'll exin all when he comes home. We must open bank now; it is striking ten."

He locked the desk and passed out of the comably-furnished parlor into the office beyond, ving them nothing to do but to return into the ise with their curiosity unsatisfied, and the ther's vague trouble unsoothed.

'Phebe, Phebe!" cried Felix, as they slowly ntered the pleasant home, "my mother says may go up the river to the osier island; and Phebe, she will go with us her own self!"

He had run down the broad staircase to meet m, almost breathless with delight, and with eyes ing with almost serious rapture. He clasped be's arm, and leaning toward her, whispered her ear:

She took me in her arms, and said, 'I love , Felix,' and then she kissed me as if she meant Phebe. It was better than all my birthday sents put together. My father said to me one he adored her; and I adore her. She is my her, you know—the mother of me, Felix; and down on the floor and kiss her feet every day, she does not know it. When she looks at me eyes seem to go through me; but, oh, she s not look at me often."

She is so different; not like most people," wered Phebe with her arms round the boy.

THE BURNT OFFERING.

. Lesson for Oct. 16, Lev. 1 : 17. Golden Text, Heb. 9 : 28. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

.S soon as the Tabernacle was completed and icated, God began to reveal His will about the rifices which He would be pleased to accept from people. From the time of Abel, sacrifices had n offered, but there seems to have been no distion in them, nothing to mark whether they e offered and accepted as an atonement for sin, whether as a free-will service to a god already nciled. But now that God had vouchsafed to ll visibly among His people, their responsibility increased, and He would teach them to offer rational worship. In the burnt offering we clearly that God can accept nothing which is perfect; it might be of the herd, of the ks or of fowls, but it must be without blemand the offerer must bring it "of his own ntary will," as a privilege, and not a thing cted. He must also lay his hand upon head of it, to signify that he identified self with it, "and it shall be accepted for him, make atonement for him." He who laid his d upon the head of the sin offering identified self with it, as though to say, "I am a cursed g, my only desert is to be thus slain and thus ied without the camp, where the ashes are red out as one cut off. I belong to death, and uration, and ashes, because of sin." But by blood of the sin offering "the priest shall make tonement for his sin that he hath committed, it shall be forgiven him" (Lev. 4 : 35); then an bring his burnt offering, and by identifying self with Christ as the burnt offering, those nbers, condemned because of sin to be burned out the camp, may be consumed upon the altar, ed to God for service, and may become "an ing and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling r" (Eph. 5 : 2); his whole being, the inward the outward man, may be all His, for the le of the burnt offering was consumed upon altar.

ut let us consider a moment what this involves. only perfect antitype of the burnt offering was Lord Jesus Himself. His whole life was one tion—He was always upon the altar. He entered into the world saying, "Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared me. . . . Lo, I come to do Thy will" (Heb. 10 : 5-9). In His childhood, and when about to enter upon His life as a mechanic, He said, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business" (Luke 2 : 49). Later on, in the time of His ministry, He said to His disciples, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me, and to finish His work" (John 4 : 34). His every breath was sacrifice, His every word and deed, His eating and drinking and sleeping, all were in the true spirit of sacrifice—all for God and for sinners, nothing, not even a thought, for Himself.

As identified with Him, as dwelling in God and God in us, it can be true that "as He is, so are we in this world;" all we are, all we have in body, soul, and possessions, laid upon the altar. In the burnt offering nothing was kept in reserve. The inwards and the legs must be washed in water, to signify that the heart of the offerer must be clean toward God, and his walk pure before men. "The king's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold" (Ps. 45 : 13). God must possess that which is within, and be glorified in that which is without. The whole of the victim could be burned before the Lord, nothing was cast out, all sanctified. But the burning signifies being used, spent for God; the world seeing only destruction, expecting only ashes, but the Lord smelling a sweet savor and being satisfied. And such is the life of a true living sacrifice; in the eyes of the world, wasted, useless, equal to ashes, but doing true service to God and bringing joy to Him. Oh, how the world despises a man of mental power who becomes as a little child in faith and simplicity when he becomes a follower of Christ, and who uses his gifts and talents in subservience to God and to His interests! The world sees only self-interest renounced, ambition disregarded, and cannot understand it because it ignores the claims of God.

Again, we learn that the fire which kindled the burnt offering must never be allowed to go out. It is expressly said, "This is the law of the burnt offering: it is the burnt offering, because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning, and the fire of the altar shall be burning in it. . . . The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar: it shall never go out" (Lev. 6 : 9, 13). This is without doubt the type of the Holy Spirit; He it is who consumes the living sacrifice, converting it into fire and heat which rise heavenward, and ashes which fall downward to the earth. For it is the Holy Spirit in His purification by fire, who separates the precious from the vile, the gold from the dross in us.

"The fire of the altar shall be burning in it." He goes through our whole being when we are really upon the altar, and a work of purification goes on deeper, holier, more intense than can be conceived of, before our whole being was delivered over to God, and the question not only of sin but of self also was unalterably settled. Oh, it is then that the human and divine begin their deadly warfare in a will already renounced, in a body already subject to the altar fire. Many know nothing of this experience, because the ground of conflict with them is still either that of sin or of self, and while it is so they are not yet upon the altar at all. In another and perhaps the more general sense, the continual burning of the fire is in token of the unchanging acceptance with God which we have through the righteousness of Christ.

God speaks of the burnt offering as His offering. He said to Moses, "My offering, and My bread for My sacrifices made by fire, for a sweet savor unto Me, shall ye observe to offer unto Me in their due season" (Num. 28 : 2). Every day the burnt offering must be offered morning and evening, at the exact hours when afterward Jesus was placed upon the cross and expired (Mark 15 : 25-34).

"It is a continual burnt offering, which was ordained in Mount Sinai for a sweet savor, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord" (Num. 28 : 6.) Jesus is the continual burnt offering once offered when He offered Himself, but our faith claims Him morning and evening and all day long, and in Him we may be unto our God a daily continual burnt offering.

The burnt offering was the most usual means of approaching God, whereas the sin offering was specified as being for "the priest that is anointed," "for the whole congregation of Israel," for "a ruler," or for "one of the common people" (Lev. 4 : 3, 13, 22, 27), "to make atonement for their sin that it may be forgiven;" and the same is the case with the trespass offering (Lev. 5). We find that in the burnt offering sin is not even mentioned, for it is the offering of the clean, and not of the unclean. It has three grades—it may be of the herd, the highest grade; of the flock, which is inferior, or of fowls, but it must be the offering of a life, and the blood must be poured out; nothing less than an entire life is a becoming gift to Him who created and redeemed us; and the life—our condemned, forfeited life, the life which is in the blood—must be poured out that it may be superseded by a better, a divine life.

When Gideon offered his burnt offering in the dead of night, on the ruins of the Baal worship which he had destroyed, he placed his life in unquestioning devotion at the disposal of his God. When Manoah offered his burnt offering, it was in token that he and his wife were ready to obey the angel, that they gave themselves up to do the will of God (Jud. 6 : 25, 26; 13 : 16-19); identified with their offering, they offered themselves. How much more as identified with Christ, as "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones," are we privileged to present ourselves a living sacrifice to God"! Under the old law the offering was in the place of the offerer; under grace Jesus, who first offered Himself, now offers us. "Through the eternal Spirit [He] offered Himself without spot to God," and "you . . . hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblamable and unreprovable in His sight (Heb. 9 : 14; Col. 1 : 21, 22). Under the law God graciously accepted the portion of their possessions which His people gave Him of their own voluntary will, and it was a great privilege to be permitted to give Him anything. But under grace neither tithes nor first-fruits nor voluntary gifts become us; nothing less than the whole man is worthy of Him to whom we yield the gift; nothing short of our whole being is a "reasonable service," since Jesus gave Himself wholly for us.

Lest we should be deceived on this matter, the apostle Paul writes very literally, "Be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." Naturally we are all like sheep, running one after the other. If an absurd fashion arises, and people make themselves like walking tents, yet most people do the same, for no other reason than that everybody does it; if another fashion arises, and people tie their limbs round so that every step sways the unhappy lower flounce first against one ankle, then the other, and a firm or graceful step is impossible in this trussed condition, yet most people do the same; and God says, "Be not conformed to this world." People are more ready to become living sacrifices to fashion than to God—living sacrifices to business, avarice, pleasure, ambition, anything but God. But there stand the words of God, His solemn, unrepealed commands to His people, "Be not conformed to this world." That is, if everybody follows the fashion, don't you; if everybody talks lightly, don't you; if everybody reads novels, don't you; if everybody seeks his own, don't you; if everybody goes to theatres, don't you go. God calls us to be transformed; as the victim is reduced to ashes on the altar, strength, vitality, proportion, beauty, all disappears except a little heap of unsightly ashes; but God has smelled a sweet savor; the holy fire has burned therein, so give yourself over to be transformed, that in the ashes of your own will, your own plans, desires, purposes, "ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Expressions of Sympathy and Condolence with America in connection with the death of President Garfield continue to appear in English journals, many of which appeared in mourning on the day of the funeral. The Pall Mall Gazette, an influential evening journal, says: "For a hundred years England has had to pay the penalty of the folly of her obstinate monarch, but at last it appears that the expiation is complete, and in sentiment the old country and the new are united by ties as deep, as tender, and as strong as if the tea had never been thrown into Boston harbor, and the echoes of the Concord fight had never reverberated round the world."

A Lesson for Crowned Monarchs, is Drawn by the Echo, an English journal, from the universal sympathy evoked by the late President's death. That paper says "The sovereigns of Europe would do well to reflect upon this cosmopolitan sorrow. Were every one of them swept away to-morrow the peoples would not be half so deeply touched. European sovereigns and statesmen still maintain their control over the bodies and possessions of those whose lives and treasure are lavished in dynastic aggrandizement, but they have lost the hearts of the people. In the hour of her sorrow the great cosmopolitan Republic commands far more sympathy beyond its border than the proudest historic monarch of Continenal Eutrope could command over his subjects."

The Difficulty Between the Boers of the Transvaal and the British Government is not finally solved. The arrangement made by the military authorities required the ratification of the Boer Legislature. The members of that body are, however, indisposed to accept the terms offered and are endeavoring to obtain further concessions. The triumvirate now in power has made an effort to overcome the opposition, as it is well understood that Great Britain will not agree to more favorable terms. The British press, even that portion which uniformly supports the government, manifests great indignation at the conduct of the Boers, and urges the government to stand firm. If the Boers finally refuse to ratify the treaty there is danger of the war being renewed.

The State of Affairs in Ireland Forms the subject of an article in the current number of the Nineteenth Century, by the Earl of Derby, who was formerly Foreign Secretary of Great Britain. He is a sagacious statesman, and as his article proves, rightly estimates the state of feeling in Ireland. He believes that "the land question, as it regards Irish opinion, is unsettled, nor is it likely to be settled, and if it were settled its disappearance from the list of controverted topics would only bring on in a direct instead of an indirect form the claim which really underlies it—namely, the demand for an Irish Parliament." Lord Derby says: "To speak of the Land League as the work of a few demagogues anxious only to draw subscriptions from American sympathizers is childish. The government has satisfied every reasonable man in England and Scotland that the utmost limits of just concession to the Irish demands have been reached, but we must not overrate the effect of what we have done. We must not indulge in the pleasant dream of a contented, loyal people. We are at the beginning of the struggle, not at the end."

The Process Proposed by the Irish Land League for testing the value of the Land Act has been described by Mr. Parnell, who explained the nature of the test cases which it is proposed to bring before the Land Court. These, he said, are of three kinds, viz., Holdings which cannot be described as rack-rented, holdings wherein the tenant made improvements long ago, and holdings where recent improvements have been made. He advised the farmers to abide by the guidance of the League until these cases are tested. He proposed presenting the test-cases to the court in the order named.

The Land League has decided to appoint two tenants in each neighborhood to assess "fair rents," having regard to the necessity of leaving the tenants means for an improved mode of living. The amount thus fixed is to be registered by the local branch of the League, and no greater rent is to be paid. If this plan is universally adopted, it must pave the way for general dissatisfaction with the decisions of the commission. Forty landed proprietors and land agents of County Carlow have passed resolutions declaring their intention to give effect to the Land bill in a spirit friendly to tenants, and asking their co-operation in re-establishing confidence and good feeling. Meanwhile outrages continue. The London correspondent of a New York journal writes that there is no evidence of the Land Bill being likely to diminish the outrages. He gives many instances of lawless acts recently committed. Among others he mentions that of a farmer, an old man in the County of Kildare, who has just died from fright. In the middle of the night the door of his farm house was broken into with a sledge-hammer, borrowed for the occasion from a neighboring forge. Some men dragged him out of bed, threw lime into his eyes and blinded him, while others robbed the house. The doctor who made the post-mortem examination said that the old man's eyes had been entirely eaten away by the lime.

The Effort to Break the Cotton Corner in Liverpool signally failed. The burden fell upon the operatives, who were deprived of their weekly wages, and considerable distress was caused by the stoppage of the mills. The manufacturers are again at work, and the speculators are reaping a golden harvest; but combinations are being made to prevent a repetition of the operation.

Apprehensions of a General Mahommedan rising increase. A newspaper correspondent telegraphs from Cairo as follows: "All who have had long experience in the East are firmly convinced that the recent disturbances in Egypt were but a prelude to much graver events. No one can mix with the people here without noticing their intense hatred of Europeans, especially those in the employ of the Egyptian Government. The gravity of the situation is not properly understood in Europe, and probably will not be till some terrible outbreak has occurred. The order with which the Egyptian insurrection was conducted is proof of the absolute power Araby Bey has over his followers. A Panislamist journal lately described Araby Bey as the second prophet, destined to deliver Islam from her troubles.

The Trials of Nihilists in Russia are to be resumed this week. An indictment against four members of the order belonging to the so called Black Division, or the section seeking to effect its aims by fomenting a popular revolution, who have been in prison eighteen months, has been completed at St. Petersburg. The trial will be held with closed doors, only governmental journalists being admitted. The accused are Marie Krilova, a gentlewoman and a native of Smolensk, who, according to the indictment, was implicated in Karakasoff's attempt to assassinate the late Czar in 1866, and who was a friend of Vera Sassulitch and Piankoff, a merchant's son. The other two prisoners are Prikhodko, described as a gentleman, and Prepletchkoff, the son of an officer, of whom little is known. The immediate charge against all the prisoners is the secret printing of a revolutionary paper.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley, the Distinguished Explorer of the Dark Continent, and the discoverer of Livingstone, has been seriously ill, but is now reported as completely recovered. Mr. Marston, a member of a well-known publishing firm, writes to the London Times that he received on Sept. 16 a letter from Mr. Stanley, dated Tongo River, July 4th, in which the writer says he was seriously sick all through the month of May, so seriously that, on the fifteenth day of his illness, he gave, as he thought, his last orders to his European companions; but the crisis passed and he is now strong and hearty.

Signor Campobello, the Distinguished Convert from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism, whose abjuration was mentioned in a previous number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is described by Rev. L. M. Vernon, a Protestant minister in Italy. He says: "Signor Campobello is a man of about forty-seven years of age, of vigorous health, of high culture, of an excellent social pos tion, and, I believe, soundly converted to God, ar is full of zeal to go forth in the work of preachin the Gospel to his fellow-countrymen of Rome. Fo three years I have had a direct personal acquain ance and relation with this Canon of St. Peter's he having been accustomed to come to my hou usually every two or three weeks at nine o'cloc in citizen's evening dress, to spend two or thr hours in conversation touching the matters of o holy religion. Some months ago a full decisio was taken to make this step, and the Count s about the measures necessary to complete it rapidly as possible, but in order to shut every do against difficulties and prepare his exit in such manner as that he would not be open to injurio attack, the matter has been delayed until the pre ent. The church of St. Peter's is administered, to its revenues and its services, by a chapter co posed of thirty canons, presided over by a car nal. Count Campobello is one of these thir men. I have great faith that, by the blessing God, he will prove an instrument of much usefu ness to the cause of God in Italy.'

This party a cepts more of the Bible than the Bramo Som which was founded by the well known Bab Keshub Chunder Sen; but it has also taken with Spiritualism, as will appear from the follo ing account of a grotesque performance in imi tion of Christian baptism:

"There was no sprinkling of water in a chur or chapel. Not even the old prescribed formu 'I baptize thee,' etc., was uttered. Yet the ce mony was most scriptural and authoritative. This account is taken from an English pa published in the interests of the New Disper tion. English is rapidly becoming the comm language of the educated Hindoos in most part India.

EMINENT METHODISTS who Attended the Recent ŒCUMENICAL CONFERENCE.

SIX EMINENT WESLEYANS.

Delegates to the Methodist Œcumenical Conference of 1881.

I. The Rev. Marmaduke C. Osborn, Secretary of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society—II. Mr. William McArthur, M. P., Lord Mayor of London—III. The Rev. Gervase Smith, Ex-President of the Wesleyan Conference—IV. The Rev. James Stacey, D.D., President of the Methodist New Connection—V. The Rev. W. B. Pope, D.D., Principal of Didsbury College—VI. The Rev. Samuel Antliff, D.D., Ex-Secretary of the Primitive Methodist Missionary Society.

THE Methodist Œcumenical Conference, which sat in London fourteen days, from the 7th to the 20th of September, did not attract as much general attention as it would have done in this country. Nevertheless, it received more notice in the daily papers, and excited more public interest than any religious conference ever did in England which had not important political issues before it. The extraordinary spirit of business which John Wesley's genius infused into the Methodist organization appears to have attracted the attention of the people of London as a novel feature in ministerial assemblies, and the Times observed in a leading article that the absence of unnecessary disputation (squabbling was the word that great paper did not disdain to use), distinguished the Œcumenical Conference from other church councils of the same character. One undoubted advantage of the Conference was that it brought the leading men and the work of the vast Methodist communities in all parts of the world prominently and impressively before the other Christian denominations in the great metropolis.

We publish in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD portraits and biographical notices of six English members of the conference. Our readers will at once miss the name of the distinguished Rev. William Arthur, author of "The Tongue of Fire," who has twice visited these shores, among the six. But in view of the fact that Mr. Arthur is perhaps the best known and best beloved in America of the whole Wesleyan body, we have determined to reserve him for a full frontispiece portrait and a lengthened biographical narrative. It may be proper to remind our readers that Bishop Simpson, one of our own divines, who preached a masterly sermon at the opening of the Conference, appeared in these pages on the 13th of May, 1880.

THE REV. MARMADUKE C. OSBORN.

Mr. Osborn is one of the foremost men of the Wesleyan Methodist denomination in England. He has been exceedingly popular for many years both as a preacher and a lecturer, and possessing, moreover, a large measure of administrative ability, he has been of signal service to his church.

He was born in 1827, and is now in the fifty-fourth year of his age. It was his privilege to have godly parents, and to be brought up in "the nurture and admonition of the Lord." At a very early age he recognized Christ calling him to seek His face, and boyhood's days had scarcely passed before he determined to respond to the call. He says: "When I was little more than a child, I had a notion that I should preach the Gospel, and I could never shake off the impression."

His theological education was obtained at Richmond College, under the Rev. Thomas Jackson and the Rev. John Farrar, between whom and the young student a loving attachment grew up, which time only serves to deepen. His first appointment after his ordination, in 1850, was to the University city of Cambridge, where he made full proof of his ministry; and from Cambridge he was successively appointed to Bradford, York, Liverpool, Bristol, and City Road (London), in each of which circuits he remained the full term of three years—a striking testimony to uniform good feeling between pastor and people.

On the platform and in the pulpit he speedily made his mark, and his ministrations were largely in request throughout the whole Wesleyan connection, till he came to be elected to the important and responsible position of Missionary Secretary. There Mr. Osborn has found a congenial scope for his best sympathies, and, according to the general verdict, has exhibited singular aptitude for the various details of the vast enterprise.

A few years ago, the high estimate entertained of him in the Wesleyan denomination was displayed in his appointment to visit, superintend, and report on the Wesleyan missions in the West Indies. In an address on "Missions and Missionaries," which he gave before the Young Men's Christian Association, in Exeter Hall, were these fitly spoken and powerful words, inspired by what he had seen and felt on that tour of duty: "Oh, that the Master would lay His hand upon some of you young men, and prompt you to consecrate yourselves upon His altar!

"The flower of England's aristocracy join the army and navy, and go on hard and perilous service to all parts of the world; but how often, when the King of kings requires men for the highest, holiest, and most honorable employment, in which an angel might covet to engage, He finds His servants tardy and reluctant. These things ought not to be. In the spirit of cheerful sacrifice and obedient love, say to-night, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?'"

Mr. Osborn is the right man in the right place for his present important department of Wesleyan connectional service. This is to assert a great deal; but his gifts, both oratorical and administrative, are indeed of a high order. Missionary effort requires not only quenchless zeal, but much of tact, skill, and knowledge of human nature. Mr. Osborn possesses this knowledge in a marked degree, and in prosecuting his work in the office he now fills and adorns, he has ever sought to carry out Christ's primal idea of missions, in a truly apostolic manner. His address on September 8th at the Œcumenical Conference, on the history and results of Methodism, was worthy of the speaker's reputation and of the important occasion.

WILLIAM M'ARTHUR, ESQ., M.P.

The Lord Mayor of London has shown conspicuous cordiality to the delegates to the Conference, and that is especially noteworthy because of the exalted social position which a man of his official rank holds in England, and also because some other Lord Mayors have used their influence to promote the spirit of the world and to encourage sentiments inimical to religion. It is well known by this time that the delegates were invited to a magnificent reception at the Mansion House, and received by the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, the former in his insignia and robes of office, which means nothing less than that a considerable number of people of rank and fashion were brought into contact with the representatives of the Methodist denomination, and were constrained to acknowledge their mental and moral worth. On that occasion the Lord Mayor conducted worship with his guests, lining out a hymn in the English fashion, and made an address which is said to have had all the ring of a camp-meeting in it.

Mr. McArthur is a descendant of an old family in Argyleshire, Scotland, but his early life was passed in the north of Ireland, where his father was an able and respected Wesleyan minister. From his boyhood he exhibited a marked aptitude for commercial business, possessing great industry, methodical habits, and unusual tact in dealing with men. He made his first successful start in life about the year 1835, in the important town of Londonderry, and after some years his interests were substantially advanced through the establishment, by his brother Alexander, of mercantile houses in Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, and Auckland about the critical period of the gold discovery in 1851.

In 1857 Mr. McArthur's business had become so prosperous that he removed to London, where he has remained ever since, increasing in influence and popularity, and receiving one token after another of the esteem of his fellow-citizens, till last year he was elected to the highest municipal and civic position in the city.

His political career began in 1865 with an unsuccessful attempt to enter Parliament. Three years later, at the general election of 1868, he was elected by a large majority as the Liberal member for Lambeth, and having been again elected in 1874 and 1880, he still continues its representative. He takes an especial interest in the welfare of the working classes, and enjoys the confidence of a large proportion of his constituents. He has been for years a supporter of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Permissive Bill; but he is perhaps mainly known as a member of Parliament in connection with the passing of a bill for the emancipation of the metropolitan bridges from toll in perpetuity.

His name is also specially and honorably remembered in connection with the annexation of the Feejee Islands to the British Crown in 1874, by which the pernicious practice of kidnapping, which prevailed all over the South Seas, and had its centre in Feejee, was effectually suppressed. He worked for that end in conjunction with his brother Alexander, M.P. for Leicester, and through the committee of the Aborigines Protection Society, of which he and his brother are active and valued members.

Mr. McArthur served the office of Sheriff of London and Middlesex in 1867, having been unanimously elected; and his election to the body of aldermen, from which the Lord Mayor is annually chosen, took place in 1872. In 1878 he paid a lengthened visit to the Australian colonies, with which he was connected not less by commercial relations than by political sympathy, and everywhere met a reception of the most flattering character.

THE REV. GERVASE SMITH.

This distinguished minister of the Gospel, who has for years past enjoyed the reputation of being the most eloquent preacher in the Wesleyan denomination next to the lately deceased Dr. Punshon, was born at Langley, Derbyshire, in 1821, and is now sixty years of age. His early education was received at well-known schools at Heanor and Mackworth, and after his conversion to Christ he became a student of Wesley College, Sheffield, and passed through its curriculum in a highly creditable manner.

From first to last the enterprising town of Sheffield appears to have been linked with Mr. Smith's public career as a minister of the Wesleyan denomination, for it was in the West Circuit of that town that he originally undertook the work of a lay-preacher, and proceeded to qualify himself for the regular work of the itinerancy by becoming enrolled as a student of the college at Didsbury.

Having terminated his academical course with distinction, and displaying, even at that early period, some remarkable evidences of his power and effectiveness as a preacher, he was appointed to the circuit at Blackburn, and afterward to the important churches at Glossop, Wakefield, York, Huddersfield, Bristol, Manchester, and Highbury. Wherever he was stationed his loving, genial nature, and the conscientiousness with which he discharged his functions as a pastor, won for him hosts of warm-hearted friends. But, best of all, his preaching of "Christ and Him crucified" was accompanied by the conversion of many who were "without God and without hope in the world," and by the strengthening of professing Christians for active work.

In 1870 Mr. Smith was appointed Secretary of the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund, and in the same year he visited the United States and Canada, where his abilities were fully utilized by various churches; for Methodism is almost indigenous here, and ministers of different views mingle with less exclusiveness than they show in the conservative mother country.

In the year 1875 the Rev. Gervase Smith was elevated to the dignity of President of the English Wesleyan "Conference," which does not mean the local meeting which the term signifies among the Episcopal Methodists, but is the supreme Wesleyan assembly. Preparatorily to the duties of that high office, he had fulfilled the functions of Conference Secretary for two years, the second year having as his senior associate the late Dr. Morley Punshon, who had formerly been his schoolfellow.

Besides being a preacher much sought after, owing to the combination of profound thought with astonishing simplicity of language which characterizes his pulpit efforts, Mr. Smith is the author of several excellent volumes, among which we will name "Chequered Scenes," "Memorials of Samuel Oliver," "Melchisedek," "Early Sunset," "Christianity, a System of Power," "Sleeping in Jesus," and "The Life of Mr. William Bourne."

In his presidential address at Sheffield, in 1875, Mr. Smith said: "I feel I am not made of the material of which presidents are made. I have had no training for a post like this. I was born in an obscure hamlet in Derbyshire, and my early childhood was spent amid village scenes and associations in that hilly country. A sturdy and rude independence took possession of me in early life, and it has grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength.

"I have never used the language of courtiers, and never sought the favor of man, whether minister or layman. I take these badges of office from the hands of my predecessor, the Rev. Dr. Punshon, my lifelong and undying friend, to whom my soul is linked in bonds which neither time nor eternity can sever. I do not envy his distinguished abilities; but the grace which sustained him will sustain any man who occupies this office, and I do desire the Holy Spirit may be given me in large measure.

"Thirty years ago I came to Sheffield as a student; twenty-five years ago I gained a victory over temptation in yonder pew there, the influence of which is felt by me at this hour. I preached my trial sermon in the pulpit behind me, and in a room hard by I stood as a candidate for the ministry. Fathers and brethren, whatever we may do during my year of office, let us look for a more copious outpouring of divine influence.

"'Lo, the promise of a shower
Drops already from above,
And the Lord will shortly pour
All the fulness of his love.'"

THE REV. JAMES STACEY, D.D.

Dr. Stacey, who introduces to us another body of Wesleyans which detached itself from the older society in 1797, was born in 1819, and is now sixty-two years of age. His career is, in many points, instructive and suggestive. His parents lived in Sheffield, and were poor in worldly wealth, but highly respected for their sterling integrity.

At the age of nine, the little fellow was set to work in a cutler's warehouse. There his uniform good conduct excited the attention of his employers, who offered to take him from work and educate him for a responsible position in their own establishment. This offer his father declined, judging that to be a skilled workman and master of a trade was preferable to being an ordinary clerk, who would have to keep up appearance in a dependent capacity, and with limited resources, and who might never earn more than three or four pounds a week.

When twelve years old, the youth went to the knife works of the celebrated Messrs. Rogers, with whom his father was engaged. An eager desire for mental improvement then took possession of him, but, better still, about that time he was converted to Christ and united with the Methodist New Connection.

His was a case, if one such ever was, of the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties; but with health and energy and zeal much may be accomplished; and in addition to zeal after ordinary knowledge, young Stacey was possessed of an intense thirst for knowledge of divine things. He received a few pence weekly for himself, and the first book he ever had was purchased with his own money.

The only regular instruction he received was at a Sunday-school, and in one day-school, which he attended for a short time. Notwithstanding, by degrees he not only attained a fair proficiency in English, but aspired to a knowledge of the classical languages. He would study his book while walking the streets to and from his work.

Soon the youthful student became a local preacher; afterward taste and conviction led him to contemplate the regular ministry. With a view to further preparation for that important office, he entered into arrangements for permanent study with a minister of the New Connection, the Rev. T. Allin, a man of superior education and ability, who had been quick to discern the talents and earnestness of his young friend, and to render him considerate encouragement.

In 1839 he was appointed minister at Halifax, and he soon rose to eminence as an instructive and popular preacher. In 1856 his health failed for a time, but upon his recovery he was appointed Missionary Secretary, a post which he creditably filled for many years. In 1860 his brethren signalized their sense of his excellence by calling him to be the President of their "Conference," a position to which he has been re-elected this year. In 1863 he was appointed Principal and Tutor of the Theological Institution, Ranmoor, Sheffield, a post for which his own early struggles after knowledge and his well known lofty sympathies, not less than his various attainments, eminently marked him out and qualified him. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the Wesleyan University, Ohio, about ten years ago.

Besides sermons and memoirs, including the interesting biography of Mr. Ridgway, of the Staffordshire Potteries, Dr. Stacey has given to the world an important treatise on "The Christian Sacraments."

THE REV. W. B. POPE, D.D.

Dr. Pope is one of the most notable men of the Wesleyan denomination, and occupies the honorable distinction of being its "systematic" theological writer. He is the first who has, with professional method, expressed its theology in scientific form and reduced it to a system. And it is evident that his bulky "Compendium of Christian Theology" is rapidly exerting a great and beneficial influence on the Wesleyan Church. The available particulars of his career, however, are exceedingly few. He is said to have been born in Nova Scotia in 1822.

He was early associated by family connection with the Wesleyans, and went to England; and subsequently, on his acceptance for the work of the ministry, was admitted to the Wesleyan Theological Institution at Didsbury, South Lancashire, where for some sessions he had the tuition of the late Rev. Dr. Hannah. In editing some lectures by Dr. Hannah, Dr. Pope has taken occasion to pay an interesting and affectionate tribute to the memory of that venerable and excellent man.

His course at the institution was marked by diligent study and careful reading, and he was soon regarded, both by tutors and fellow-students, as a superior man likely to do good work in the world. Later on in life he resided for a time in London, in the same house with Dr. Hannah, between whom and himself a warm friendship always subsisted.

In 1841 he was appointed to Kingsbridge, Devon, as his first circuit, and subsequently continued his ministry in Liskeard and Jersey, and at last, in 1852, in the City Road circuit, London. In 1855 he was stationed at Hull, and in 1858 removed to Manchester. In 1861 he was stationed at Leeds, and in 1864 at Southport. He soon attracted notice as a preacher, particularly among the more intellectual class of hearers and in prosperous congregations. That, no doubt, was due not only to his acquired attainments, but largely to the natural bent or habit of his mind. Not that Dr. Pope is merely a rhetorician, simply aiming to afford intellectual gratification; on the contrary, he uses no ostentation or parade of words. He can aim at the heart, simply, directly, tenderly, in language nervous and chaste; and one of his best printed sermons was addressed, during his residence at Leeds, to little Sunday-school children.

On the retirement of Dr. Hannah in 1867, Dr. Pope was unanimously elected to succeed him as Theological Tutor of the Northern Branch of the Theological Institution. This high appointment indicates the great esteem in which he was held. About seventy students are now placed under his care, preparing for the ministry.

Besides the ordinary routine of teaching his classes, Dr. Pope has contributed to Wesleyan literature several important works. He is a good German scholar, and has translated various volumes from the German language, among which may be specially mentioned those of Stier on "The Words of the Lord Jesus," and Ebrard on "The Gospels," in T. & T. Clark's Foreign Theological Library. He is also editor of The London Quarterly.

In 1876 he accompanied Dr. Rigg on a deputation to the United States, where both ministers were cordially welcomed. In recognition of his scholarly attainments, the University of Edinburgh has conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity, an honor most appropriately bestowed. In 1877 his brethren made him the recipient of the highest proof of their appreciation which they could show, by appointing him to the presidential chair of the Annual Conference.

THE REV. SAMUEL ANTLIFF, D.D.

The Rev. Samuel Antliff, a Primitive Methodist, was born at the village of Caunton, Nottinghamshire, in July, 1823, and is therefore fifty-eight years of age. The family to which he belonged was a large one, and there are nine members of it besides himself yet living; the eldest being the able and beloved principal of the Primitive Methodist Theological Institute at Sunderland, and the youngest a local preacher.

He was converted as a youth by listening to a conversation between his father and another man as they were walking along a country road. He gave himself to Christ, and availed himself of every opportunity to maintain and deepen his spiritual life. Though he had to work at that period from six in the morning till six at night, he commonly rose much earlier than six for prayer and study, adopting various expedients to drive away the drowsiness naturally induced by long, fatiguing labor. He also employed the time after his day's work was done in trying to get boys of his own age converted.

While he was thus engaged, and the conviction was daily growing in his mind that God intended him to become a preacher of the Gospel, he made the acquaintance of William Cutts, whom he induced to become a Primitive Methodist, and whose name as a faithful minister will ever abide most fragrant in the denomination. He became the leader of a praying band, and with his associates fasted and prayed, once continuing in prayer all night, and witnessing a glorious revival as the result.

Samuel Antliff's first attempt at preaching was made behind a chair-back at a village called Ossington in 1840. Twelve months afterward he was appointed a home missionary in the Chesterfield circuit, though not yet eighteen years of age. After fourteen months of successful work there, he removed to Winster, in the Peak of Derbyshire, a laborious station, being thirty miles wide and very hilly throughout. Nottingham, East Bridgford, Newark, Leicester, Lutterworth, Hinckley, and Rotherham in turn became his field of work, and many sinners were led to Christ.

Excessive labor then impaired his health, but God raised him up again, and four years were spent at Mansfield, where his work was crowned with great prosperity. Five years of usefulness were spent at Nottingham, and six years at Derby, after which he returned again to Nottingham. At that period the death of the Rev. T. Jobling, General Secretary of the Primitive Methodist Missionary Society, took place, and Mr. Antliff was called to assume his office. That circumstance brought him to the metropolis.

In May, 1871, Mr. Antliff paid an official visit to the Primitive Methodist Churches in Canada, and at the Canadian Conference of the same year he was unanimously elected President. In the course of his tour of inspection he visited the Muskoka mission, where an Indian and his wife waited to shake hands with him at the close of the service. They were both members of the Primitive Methodist Church; the wife, as her husband related, was the granddaughter of a great war chief of the Mohawk tribe, who once visited Great Britain.

In 1874 and 1875 Mr. Antliff was the Conferential Deputation to Canada and Australasia, and in his tour round the world he rendered valuable services to the churches of the denomination. In 1876 his distinguished ability and eminent services met fitting recognition by his receiving the degree of D.D. From the Conference of 1877 to 1881 he was Deputy Treasurer and Financial Secretary to the General Missionary Society. That position he resigned at the last Conference, and was appointed, at his own choice, to the superintendency of the Derby Second Circuit, where amid many of his old and strongly attached friends it is hoped he will be cheered with great success in his ministry.

THE PLAGUE OF FLIES.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"There came a grievous swarm of flies into the house of Pharaoh, and into his servants' houses, and into all the land of Egypt: and the land was corrupted by reason of the swarm of flies."—EXODUS 8 · 24.

PHARAOH would not let the people go. For a long time he had his hard heel on their necks. He could not bear to listen. The hardest arm to break is the arm of oppression. For when it holds arbitrary power for a long while it is almost impossible to surrender it.

It is only by the stroke of an insurrection, or the stroke of the arm of God, that such power is destroyed. Misfortunes of all kinds came upon the land; disaster after disaster, plague after plague; all the water turned into blood, the cattle slain on the pasture-field, hailstorms pelting the mountains and the valleys; darkness whelming the earth at noonday, and the destroying angel going through by night striking dead the first-born in every household of the Egyptians. With the story of these great plagues we are all familiar, and we are accustomed to discourse upon them.

I. But I propose to speak to-night more especially about

THE PLAGUE OF FLIES.

Each one of these creatures, so insignificant, hardly worth attention, but coming in swarm after swarm they were an overwhelming national affliction. In all ages of the world plagues are brought. Sometimes the destroying angel through a pestilence smites not only the first-born, but the last-born, and there are mourning and desolation all through the land. But oftener it is the plague of flies; little insectile annoyances, buzzing around one's life. This one does not amount to much, nor that one amount to anything; but coming together in swarms round about our souls, pestilence, pestilence, bothering and bothering, and making our life on earth a plague.

When some great behemoth of trouble assails us we become chivalric and we assault it; we mount the high-mettled steed of our courage, and we ride after it in a cavalry charge; and if God is with us we come out of the conflict better than when we went in. But, oh, these insectile annoyances of life; these foes too small to shoot, these things that have no avoirdupois weight, the locusts, the gnats, the midgets, the flies! Ah! it is the small exasperations and the small depletions, and the small annoyances and irritations of life that rob us of our strength, and destroy our souls.

1. It is often the case that these annoyances come to people through a sensitive nervous organization. When one is stricken down by typhoid fever, or his bones are broken, he gets plenty of sympathy; anybody can understand that. But who pities anybody for being nervous? The falling of a foot or arm, the clearing of the throat, a discord in music, an inharmony between the color of a shawl and the color of a glove, the wind blowing from the east, may open the door to let in a whole swarm of vexations, a whole swarm of flies. Sometimes a strain, like that of Leighton, the philosopher, who, when he was told by his doctor that unless he stopped work while physically diseased he would die, responded, "Doctor, whether I live or die the wheel must keep going round."

Such persons suffer from bleeding sensitiveness. Flies like to light on anything raw. It is that destroy such persons. They could brace themselves against such ills; they could by the strength of Christ conquer them. But these annoyances of a sensitive nervous organization are almost unbearable.

2. Again, the small annoyances of life come to us through friends who are accustomed to say and do disagreeable things. With some persons you cannot be half an hour but you are lifted, purified, strengthened, comforted and better fitted for the duties and strggles of life. With some Christian people I cannot be in communion a half hour without feeling stronger for the work of Christ, stronger for the discharge of my duty, and have stronger hope for the world which is to come. And while with other people you cannot be five minutes without being irritated; they have a faculty of gathering up disagreeable things they know about you, they gather up all the yarn that gossips spin, and peddle it; they gather up all the criticisms about your person, about your family, about your business, and make your ears a funnel into which they pour it.

They tell you something exasperating, and they laugh heartily as they tell you, as a good joke, and they laugh, and you laugh too—outside. I think that class of persons was well sketched in the Book of Ruth. You remember that Naomi went off from her native land. She went off in great physical health, great financial prosperity, great domestic felicity, but down in the strange land she lost her husband, she lost her sons, she lost her prosperity, she lost all; now she is coming back to her native land. The people, the Bible says, went out to greet her, and instead of giving her any intelligent, common-sense sympathy, what did they do? They said, Is this Naomi?

But that is not the right emphasis to give it, that is the way it is ordinarily read in the Book of Ruth. Is this Naomi? That was not the way at all. They threw up their hands as they exclaimed, "Why, is this Naomi? How you have changed. You look so sick, so miserable, so wretched. Can this be Naomi?" Ah, a faithful portrait given in the Bible of these people who always love to say disagreeable things. Such people glean and bind in the great harvest-fields of disagreeableness.

When Stanley came back from that wonderful expedition, the finding of Dr. Livingstone, in Africa, and he came before the Geographical Society in London, the mighty men of state heard his story of discovery, and were thrilled with it. But there were critics in the crowd, who asked him most insulting and irritating questions about mountains, about Livingstone, about Africa, and about everything, until Stanley folded his arms and refused to answer. A giant buzzed and buzzed by a swarm of flies.

But, my friends, these people who go about with disagreeable things to say, and disagreeable things to do, they are the gnats, they are the midgets, they are the flies.

LOOK OUT FOR THEM.

Have nothing to do with them. Do not let them prey upon your association, they will spoil your faith in God. They will destroy your physical health. They will destroy your hope of heaven.

3. Again, I have to remark that the little annoyances of life sometimes come through physical disorders which do not entirely prostrate the system, but give out great botheration amid the duties, and the trials, and the occupations of life. Perhaps it is some sick headache. You appointed a day for sociality and mirth, the clock strikes the hour, and you cannot make your appearance. Or it is between the ear and the forehead, a neuralgic thrust, just at the moment when you want your mind clearest, and your judgment coolest. Some little physical disorder which does not amount to a great deal, in the estimation of others; something they do not get in sympathy with at all, something they don't understand. But these little physical irritations, and physical distractions, they are the plague of flies.

4. Sometimes the small annoyances of life come through domestic irritation. The parlor and the kitchen are not always in harmony. The great question of to-day is about domestic service. It may be the arrogance and the unreasonableness of the employer, but sometimes there perhaps fly out winged annoyances from the culinary department. That housekeeper who has no faith in God will have her equilibrium overthrown. I think it was for that that Martha had a nervous system, a physical disorder, an unstrung mind, when she rushed into the parlor where Christ was, and asked Him to scold Mary. And while there are women who have not met with great misfortunes in life, there are thousands of them going down under these domestic irritations, the plague of flies.

5. So I remark again, there are a great many business men being destroyed by the little annoyances of business life. For the panic of 1857, for that of September 24th, 1869, they were ready and defiant; other men went down; they stood. Other men were discouraged; they rose above the storm. Yet those very men are now being depleted by business annoyances, a clerk's ill-manners, a blot of ink on the bill of lading, a secret of the store whispered in the street, a dishonorable rivalry, a sale of goods to one unworthy to buy the goods, making a bad debt contrary to your own judgment, to please somebody else. It is not panics that destroy merchants. Panics come only once in ten or twenty years. But it is the little annoyances of business life that are pushing so many of our best merchants into nervous dyspepsia, and paralysis, and the grave.

II. Now, my friends,

of all these annoyances? Can it be possible that they have any practical use for our souls? I suppose they have. Naturalists tell us that one wasp will have a family of 20,000 wasps, and it is a fact that one annoyance will breed a million. Can it be that the annoyances of this life are to have any practical effect upon our souls? I suppose, among other reasons, they are given to us to show us that this is not the best world to stay in. We all know very well that the summer that has no flies is a sickly summer. If there be a great many flies during the summer it is a healthy summer. I do not suppose it is any sign of spiritual diseases or spiritual sicknesses if we have a great many annoyances of life buzzing around us.

Besides that, I suppose these little annoyances of life were given to culture our patience. In a gymnasium you have noticed the parallel bars, upright bars, and the holes in which pegs are to be placed. A gymnast will take one of these pegs in one hand, and with the other hand he will thrust another peg into one of the holes of the opposite bar, and inch by inch he will rise to the ceiling. And I suppose this is a sort of in which our souls are placed, and every worry is a peg, and really by these little worries we climb higher and higher until we reach heaven.

We all admire patience, but patience is not the child of fair weather; it is the child of the storm. If you had everything you wanted, no annoyances, what would you want of patience? Oh, says some one, if my circumstances were as comfortable as my neighbor's, oh, then I should have patience too. As though a man should say, I cannot swim because of this water. I can't shoot off this gun because of these caps. When you stand up to your chin that is the time to swim toward the great headlights of Christian attainment; and when you are charged to the muzzle with repulsive annoyances that is the time to pull the trigger.

I have a theory about trouble. It takes just so much trouble to prepare a man for heaven. Now the question is, whether you will take trouble in the bulk, or whether you will take it granulated and pulverized; whether you will take it in small annoyances, or whether you will take it in some stroke of calamity. Here is one who has his trouble in bulk; it is in a broken back, extinguished eyesight, or some awful calamity. Another man takes his trouble and trials piecemeal. Which way would you rather have your troubles, in some great overwhelming calamity, or in little annoyances? Oh, you say, I prefer to take mine piecemeal; better five aching teeth than one broken jaw; better ten fly-blisters than one amputation; better twenty squalls than one cyclone; better a thousand annoyances than one crushing avalanche of calamity.

There is some difference as between allopathy nd homœopathy; but in this matter of trouble etter take it in

ttle pellets of annoyances, rather than in some nock-down dose of disaster. Suppose you own bank; would you rather have your customers ome in with small checks for five, ten, or twenty ollars each, or have two each with a check for ten housand dollars? The ten thousand dollar checks ome in, and you will cough, and look at the floor, nd at the ceiling before you look at the face. Now, ould you not rather have the drafts on your soul little drafts or annoyances rather than in some verwhelming demand on your courage and your race? Give me ten thousand little annoyances ather than one great struggle.

There is a tradition that there was a certain village invaded, a fine village invaded with rats, and ney destroyed the property, and they were about destroy the lives of the people, when an old pier struck up a beautiful tune, and the rats gathred around him, and he led them down to the rink of a river, and then blew a long, loud blast, nd they were all drowned in the river. That, of ourse, was a tradition, a fable; but I wish I could lay some sweet tune of the Gospel, on the flute of od's grace that would draw forth all the nibbling nd burrowing annoyances of your life, and that I ould play them down to the river and play them nto the depths forever.

There must be some reason why you have these nnoyances in life. I suppose in that way God is reparing us for the next world. How many ouches do you suppose Mr. Church gave before e had completed those wonderful pictures of Copaxi, or the Heart of the Andes? Well, I guess fty thousand. I hear the canvas say, "Why do ou keep me trembling with little touches day after ay, week after week, and month after month? Vhy don't you put the picture on with one dash?"

Oh," says Mr. Church, "I know how to paint a icture; it will take fifty thousand of these strokes make what I want." And I suppose God is ainting the picture of your life with these ten housand annoyances; and after a while the picure will be hung in the galleries of heaven, a picure for angels to look at. God knows how to aint a picture. Don't criticise Him.

If I had my way with you, I would give you all arthly prosperity. You should each have a garden nd a river flowing through it. Geraniums and hrubs on either bank, the grass and flowers as eautiful as though the rainbow had fallen. You ould each have a splendid mansion, the bed covred by a canopy dipped in the setting sun. hrough the halls of that great mansion there ould be a long line of statues and statuettes. ou should each have your pick of horses, and the ery best equipage you could find. Then I would ave you live a hundred and fifty years, not an che or pain during all the time.

You say, Would you give that to each of us? es, to each. Give that to enemies as well as iends? Yes. The only difference I would make, would put a little more gilt on the wall of the nemy, and give a little better embroidery to the lipper. Well, you say, why don't God give us ll these things? Ah, now I bethink myself.

IT WOULD NOT BE WISE.

t would make sluggards and fools of us all if we ad our own way. A householder does not put is best pictures in the vestibule. God intends his world merely to be the vestibule of heaven. f we had everything just as we want it in this orld, and all kindly and blissful surroundings, we ould never aspire for heaven.

Why is it the aged man so easily leaves the orld when it is time for him to go? It is not nerely because he expects a better world, but it is ecause he thinks that seventy-five years of annoyances are enough. He wants to get rid of the lague of flies. But, my friends, God intends a reat spiritual advantage from all these annoyances. hey are not going to destroy you. I think, lookg back upon life, you will really find that great lessing and great advantage have come from ese annoyances; that God sanctified them to our soul.

Polycarp was condemned to be burnt to death. The stake was planted. He was fastened to it. The faggots were placed around him, the fires kindled, but history tells us that the flames bent outward like the canvas of a ship in a stout breeze, so that the flames, instead of destroying Polycarp, were only a wall between him and his enemies. They had actually to destroy him with the poniard; the flames would not touch him. Well, my hearer, I want you to understand that by God's grace the flames of trial, instead of consuming your soul, are only going to be a wall of defense, and a canopy of blessing. God is going to fulfil to you the blessing and the promise as He did to Polycarp. "When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned" (Isa. 43:2). Now you do not understand; you shall know hereafter. In heaven you will bless God even for the plague of flies.

"NOT A DROP MORE, DANIEL."

A Temperance Story.

DANIEL AKIN had become a confirmed drunkard. So fully had he come under the dominion of the bottle, that he was perfectly miserable when he could not obtain the means of gratifying his thirst. He had neglected his family till his wife's father had taken her and the children under the paternal roof. He had spent all his substance in drink, and was kept from the poorhouse only by performing menial services for his food, and by the kindness of Thomas Edgerton, a member of the Society of Friends, who had known him from his youth, and who had a strong hope that, in time, he would see his folly, and turn again into the right path.

Hoskins, the leading liquor-seller of the place, had let him have drink so long as his money lasted, but would trust him no longer. He was lounging about the public-house one bright moonlight evening, pleading with the keeper to trust him for a drink. His reply was sharp and unfeeling: "Not a drop more, Daniel!"

He remained a while longer, and then left. As the cool air of the evening fell upon him, he, all at once, gave utterance to his feelings in the following strain: "'Not a drop more, Daniel.' Am I drunk, or am I sober? I am sober. 'Not a drop more, Daniel.' Did Hoskins think a drop would hurt me? No; but my money was gone. He has got all—got everything I had—even the Bible my mother gave me! He has got the boots which my wife, with her own earnings, bought for Jennie. 'Not a drop more, Daniel.' Daniel, what say you to that? I say so, too. I once had good clothes, but now I have nothing but rags. 'Not a drop more, Daniel,' till I have clothes again as good as when Mary and I were married. I once had a good watch, but that, too, is gone. 'Not a drop more, Daniel,' till I have another as good as the one I pawned to Hoskins for drink.

By this time he had reached the place where he formerly resided, and leaning up against the fence, he mused a long time in silence. He viewed the desolate place by the light of the moon, and his eyes ranged over the house and farm, once his own. He then said to himself, "Once I owned this house and farm. Here I was born. Here my father and mother died. I was the pride of their hearts; but I brought down their gray hairs with sorrow to the grave! Here I began my married life; and all that heart could wish was mine. Here Mary and I took comfort together, till Hoskins opened his shop; and now he calls it his. 'Not a drop more, Daniel,' till this house is mine again. 'Not a drop more, Daniel,' till these broad acres are again in my possession, and the wife and children that are living are in yonder rooms, and we are a happy family once more. 'Not a drop more, Daniel.' Help me, my God, till all these things are accomplished; I thank you, Hoskins, for these words. I shall not forget."

He had become so much occupied with his thoughts, and spoken in a tone so loud, that he had not noticed the wagon, which by this time had reached the road, in which was seated the kind-hearted quaker before mentioned. He stopped his horse, and heard distinctly the language Daniel used. As he closed his soliloquy he turned and saw Thomas Edgerton, who said, "Daniel, does thee mean to keep thy vow?" "Yes, friend Edgerton, I do." "Thee has promised a great many times thee'd drink no more. What makes thee think thee will keep thy vow this time?" "I know, friend Edgerton, I have often vowed I would drink no more; but now I feel different from what I have felt before; my heart is almost broken, and I feel my weakness, and I believe GOD will help me this time." "God grant that it may be so! Daniel, get in and take a seat. Thee must be hungry; go home with me."

On the way the Quaker drew out of him all that has been written, and he advised him to go to California. He told him to go to New York, and work his way round the Cape. He decided to do so. The Quaker kindly promised to furnish him with a sum of money and suitable clothing.

Daniel had been gone some three years, during which time he kept up a correspondence with the Quaker, and sent him several handsome remittances of money, which enabled him to repurchase the farm from the publican, to stock it with young cattle, and sheep. The fences were put in repair, and everything but the house wore a tidy appearance. A remittance came which paid for all the stock, and left an overplus with which to repair the house. Carpenters were busy, and villagers who happened to pass that way found that extensive repairs were going on; still no one presumed to question the Quaker with respect to his plans. These repairs completed, furniture found its way into the house. A yoke of oxen was seen on the farm. The villagers were astonished to see the Quaker driving an elegant horse and riding in a new gig. He received this short note one day:

"I have arrived all safe and sound. Please go and get Mary and the children."

Friend Edgerton rode over to the next town and called on Mary's father, and invited her and the children to go home with him and make a visit. The invitation was accepted, and they returned with the Quaker to his house.

One morning he went down to the station and fetched Daniel, and left him at his own house, where he had previously conveyed some provisions, and where he was to pass the night.

Next morning friend Edgerton said to Mary: "Mary, I suppose thee has heard I have bought thy old place? I have got it fitted up, and thee and the children shall ride over after breakfast and see it. I think thee will like it."

They rode over, and Mary was surprised to see the changes that had taken place. They looked over the lower rooms first; and over the mantelpiece in the sitting room was a frame, and under the glass, in large gold letters, were these words:

"NOT A DROP MORE, DANIEL!"

Mary, on reading these words, said, "O, friend Edgerton, if Daniel could have said these words, and stuck to them, this beautiful place might still have been his." "Then thee don't know where Daniel is?" asked the Quaker. "No; I have not heard anything from him for more than three years." "Thee would like to see him, would thee not?" "Oh, yes! indeed I should." "Let us walk upstairs."

As they went up the front stairs, Daniel slipped down the back ones, and took his stand in the front room. When they returned, Mrs. Akin noticed a stalwart man standing in the room with his back to the door, and started back for an instant. The Quaker said, "It is a friend, Mary."

Daniel turned round; but in the man with the heavy beard and mustache Mary did not recognize her husband. Daniel advanced to the spot where Mary was standing, and, in a voice tremulous with emotion, exclaimed, "Don't you know me, Mary?"

We leave the reader to imagine what the meeting was. Friend Edgerton said he must go and see Amy, and, addressing himself to Mary, said, "Mary, this house and farm are thine. Daniel has got the papers, and will give them to thee."

Daniel and his wife fell on their knees before the Lord. Their prayers were mingled with many tears, but in after years were abundantly answered.

Several years have passed away since the above events occurred, and Daniel Akin, now an earnest Christian man, sticks to his motto:

"NOT A DROP MORE, DANIEL!"

SYLPH SOMERS.

Sylph's Unhappiness — Yearning for Higher Knowledge—Dr. Gilbart's Deficient Training—Alarmed as to Sylph's Health—Suspects a Clandestine Attachment—His Watch Over Her—Sylph Hears John Wesley Preach.

As Sylph Somers advanced in years she increased in personal attractiveness. Her hair fell in wavy golden and glossy masses upon a neck fair as a lily, and graceful as the swan's, while her eyes "of loveliest blue" (to use Coleridge's description of the Alpine gentian flower) seemed to have at once the mysterious depth of the sea and the luminous tenderness of the azure heaven. Her form, too, developed into a classic grace and mould, so that Dr. Gilbart, from a sense of æsthetic fitness, changed her name from Silp to Sylph; and truly with the airy elegance and ideal beauty of a sylph did she move in fairy gesture hither and thither in the doctor's dwelling, flinging the halo of a bright enchantment around her.

She became, as time went on, the pride of her adopted father's heart and the gladness of his sight, the embodiment to his imagination of ideal perfection and loveliness, such as won his cordial admiration.

But the young girl, though an ever-radiating source of wonder and delight to those around her, was not herself happy; an undefined and immeasurable longing sprang up within her heart which at times painfully oppressed her—nothing seemed to fill up the compass of her being. The universe itself, as she was taught to know it, cold, material, unconscious, and unloving, notwithstanding its infinite extent, and boundless magnificence, was too mean, she felt, for the adoration which her spirit was qualified to give, and in its sternness and pitilessness, was all unworthy of the love and homage of her heart.

Stealing out upon some clear star-lit night, Sylph would stand upon a favorite height of the old city wall, and from that vantage ground would, perhaps, first look upon the wide-reaching Cheshire plain, in its gauzy robe of silvery light, spread out in magic beauty before her, and then peering onward she would gaze into the far-off distance behind it, and catch a hazy and mysterious vision of the Welsh hills, towering, from their very indistinctness, into awful grandeur.

But her eye, in its field of survey, could not rest there. Upward it would rise to the throbbing stars "whitening the night," "a throng of splendors;" even beyond this her vision would soar—not of the bodily eye, but the vision of the mind, from her astronomical knowledge—and her imagination would wing its way to innumerable suns of distant systems, lying in perspective close together as star dust, or, as "diamond points of light," uncountable, forming, as Dante sings, "an intoxicating dazzlement of glory."

Her spirit would soar higher and farther away still, as though in search of an object indefinitely apprehended, but greater, better, far more glorious even than all this, which must surely somewhere exist behind all the visible creation, a living ideal, an infinite moral perfection that could unchallengeably claim that worship and rapt devotion of which she felt herself capable. It was the cry of her soul for God!

But alas, she had never heard, even in formulated phrase, of such an existence; and, unaided from without her spirit could not embody such a being, in distinct and definite conception. Her yearning soul and instinctive aspiration went out blindly after the Creator of all these wondrous glories which she beheld, God, if haply she might find Him. But the finite, left to its own unbefriended struggles, could not lay hold upon the infinite, and her laboring thought would fall back upon itself baffled, exhausted, and darkened with despair.

This often seemed to Sylph an unsolvable riddle. In the lower creation she saw that every desire was met and instinct satisfied; that fish and sea, bird and air, beast and field, were adapted and fully complemental to each other. But she was conscious of a yearning to which all nature, visible and invisible, could give no satisfying answer; a hungering of heart and a longing of the spirit, which the material universe could not meet—rather, which the unliving magnificence she gazed upon, served to crush and agonize, and not to content. This want of correspondence, which she was conscious of, between the inner needs of man and his outer circumstances, this voice within which met with no response without, seemed such a horrible discord and almost criminal defect in the system of nature, that she felt roused at times to burning indignation, and again to tears of bitter and inconsolable grief.

Nor did she, while returning home through the ancient city, find much relief. The quaint streets and antique buildings spoke of generations past and gone, and of cunning hands and busy brains long since mouldered into dust. Was then the human being, as the doctor seemed to think, a passing phenomenon? Was conscious life but a momentary dream, and man but as the falling leaf and shooting meteor?

Life, and love, and thought that wandered into eternity, were an untold treasure, she felt; but after a mere hour's exercise were they to be quenched in utter night? The world's history, too, in its strange and manifold developments, was full of an absorbing interest to her observing mind; but while the wondrous dream was ever to go on, was she to be the witness of it only for a fleeting moment?—the power by which she gazed upon it being doomed to extinction in the catastrophe of death.

Her young heart shuddered at these reflections; a funereal pall seemed to hang over all things. Earth was but a mocking phantasm, and this life, ever haunted by death, a grotesque carnival of horrors. She strove to cast off these thoughts, which as a dreadful nightmare, weighed upon her spirit, but every attempt was ineffectual, and she was fast sinking down to a settled melancholy. She was feeling the terrible blackness of the unillumined night, of which the Christian poet sings:

> "'Tis midnight with my soul till He,
> Bright morning star, bid darkness flee."

Doctor Gilbart was not slow to observe sure signs of sadness gathering over his adopted daughter, as manifested by her countenance; and more than once he caught her absorbed in gloomy reverie, or bathed in tears; and it awoke within him great uneasiness. "Was Sylph sinking into feeble health?" he asked himself; "her delicate organization unable to bear the strain of life? And was he about to lose another of those loved objects, which had made his mortal existence endurable?" In his anxiety he closely questioned her one day in his study, when, in giving her instruction, they were together. "Sylph, dear," he said, "I don't think you have had your usual brightness of late. Is there anything the matter with you? Come over here, my pet, until I have a doctor's look at you." And, at his request, with a sad smile, Sylph approached him.

His examination, skilful and close, could detect, however, no bodily ailment, and he felt perplexed and still more troubled. Could the fair young girl, unknown to him, have formed some powerful and unrequited attachment; or, as was more likely from her great beauty, had she surrendered herself to a consuming passion for some one, whose suit Sylph had kept hidden from him, because she knew it was one he would not approve?

Something of this kind he greatly feared must have happened; and while he jealously guarded his suspicion from Sylph, he resolved to keep a strict watch upon her movements. Not that the doctor would blame Sylph for falling into love; no, for he knew that to do so was almost a settled law of a girl's nature; but he would guard her from the evil designs of an unworthy lover.

A close surveillance, however, resulted in no such discovery as the doctor fully expected to make. Sylph often left the house and sauntered round the city walls; and at times even crossed the old bridge which spanned the Dee; and wandered out into the rich country beyond, moving at her own sweet will; but it was to fulfil no assignation. She was ever found alone, either examining some natural object, or in solemn mood, slowly pacing along, unobservant of all around her. Her deep melancholy, however, continued; and that pale cast of thought, which though it served, as the doctor saw, to enhance and heighten her beauty, yet increased his uneasiness.

Ah! Sylph was suffering from a malady known at some time to all noble souls, and springing from their nobleness—from the yearning of a deep spiritual nature for communion with its adapted object. She fainted and failed under > "The tremor of an inexpressive thought, > Too self-amazed to shape itself aloud."

and that inexpressive thought (unexpressed in her case because never put before her in definite language) was God; who, even to those who know Him not, never ceases to be the great want of the soul.

One day, as Sylph was returning from her stroll along the city wall, she observed a crowd at the end of a street not far from the doctor's dwelling; and a hoary-headed man raised above the crowd, she could notice, was energetically speaking. As she drew nearer, his venerable look, his scrupulous neatness of apparel, his refinement of feature, his intense earnestness, forcibly arrested her. Who was he? What was his aim in addressing the people? And what was he saying? These were questions which arose in her mind, and to which she greatly wished for an answer. She did not, however, relish the idea of stopping in the crowd to satisfy her curiosity; and yet she felt a powerful impulse to do so.

When she came quite close to the throng, which was a large one, she could see that every one present—men and women, young and old—were as interested in the silver-tongued and silver-haired stranger as she was herself. Every eye was fixed upon him, and every ear, it was evident, was intently awake to hear his words. This was an unusual aspect for a Chester crowd, generally loud, rude, and rough, as Sylph well knew; and it led her to cast aside all hesitation, and to determine to pause, at least for a little, as near the hoary-headed speaker as she could get, and listen for a while to gather the import of his fervid address.

Scarcely had she made this resolve when, to her great satisfaction, her eye fell upon her old nurse, standing in the crowd, absorbed and breathless as any one around her. Sylph pressed toward her, the people respectfully making way, for she was well known in the city; and it was not long until she caught hold of Phœbe's cloak; who, turning as she felt the gentle pull, was both gratified and amazed to see her "young lady" beside her.

Sylph soon learned from Phœbe that the venerable man who was addressing the rapt multitude was no other than John Wesley; at this period, he had reached the patriarchal age of eighty-four; and in his wonderful graphic journal thus briefly records his visit on this day to Chester. "Wednesday, 3d, I went to Chester, and preached on Heb. 3: 12." This was, however, his text in the Wesleyan chapel in the evening. On the occasion before us, when preaching earlier in the day to the congregation in the open air, his subject was taken from one of the Gospels.

A man eighty-four years of age, preaching with power to a large crowd in the open air. What a marvellous feat! we of this degenerate age are moved to exclaim. It truly was an extraordinary feat; and the man who performed it thus speaks of the unabated vigor by means of which he accomplished it. "How is it that I find just the same strength as I did thirty years ago? That my sight is considerably better now, and my nerves firmer than they were then? That I have none of the infirmities of old age, and have lost several I had in youth?"

"The grand cause is the good pleasure of God," he adds, "'who doeth whatsoever pleaseth Him;' and the means have been early rising, frequent preaching and travelling, mostly on horseback, never less than four thousand miles in a year."

Sylph marked his countenance, kindled up with a strange intelligence and sacred joy, and heard his clear and thrilling voice pouring forth words of momentous meaning; and in a tone of sincerity and earnestness, which left no room to doubt that

What was spoken outwardly was the utterance of an assured faith and an immovable conviction.

In that hour the soul of Sylph was taken captive. She came to the knowledge of that truth of truths for which her deepest nature long had craved, and after which her heart had gasped and strained, drawn, as it were, by cords which came from out eternity.

Who could describe her wonder and exceeding joy as she heard for the first time the name of God, and the announcement of His character; of the Infinite Light and Infinite Love; who, as Wesley told her, has given to men the highest possible demonstration of the inner essence of love, which is self-sacrifice, in the gift of His Son to die as the Redeemer of the world.

Not only did Wesley speak to the spell-bound multitude before him of the infinite love and perfection of God, but also of his own personal experience and history. "He has accepted me, pardoned and renewed me," cried the Christian patriarch, "and has made me an heir of His eternal glory. O ye, my fellow men, beloved for the Lord's sake, I am as assured of this as that yonder sun," and he pointed to it, "is now shining in the heavens. Yea, I have a higher demonstration of the truth of what I have declared to you, than I have for that fact in the external universe; I have for it the witness of my own soul, in the peace and joy which I know. And, brethren, the outward eye may be deceived, but the inner consciousness never!"

And then his eyes suffused with tears and his voice quivering from emotion, he closed his address with the following words, taken from one of his own hymns:

"Oh! that the world might taste and see
The riches of His grace;
The arms of love that compass me
Would all mankind embrace."

As soon as these words were spoken, Sylph withdrew herself, hastening away to avoid the presence of the dispersing multitude; but her heart was full, having tasted of that love which knows no depth, nor height, nor limit; and of that holy joy which "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived."

THE SEVEN HEADS UPON THE WILD BEAST OF REV. 17.

THE relationship between the wild beast, the woman, and the ten kings, and their actings toward each other throughout this vision of judgment, seem altogether to preclude the possibility of the seventh head symbolizing the Papacy. If Dean Alford's reading of verse 16, which he gives as that of all the ancient MSS., be correct, it decides the question. "And the ten horns which thou sawest, and the beast, these shall hate the whore," etc. The Papacy assuredly cannot hate the Church of Rome.

The view which—assuming the exposition of the angel's words, as I have given it, to be correct—I wish to suggest, is this: that the sixth head being manifestly the imperial power, the seventh power, which is but which intervenes as a ruling power between the sixth and seventh heads, is the Papacy. It has undeniably followed after the sixth head, and has exercised unquestionable sway over both the city and the empire of Rome. My reasons for, nevertheless, not regarding it as the seventh head I have already given; in addition to which it should be observed that the power of the Papacy differs essentially from that of the preceding heads. They were all primarily and essentially secular powers. Any ecclesiastical or spiritual power which they possessed grew out of, and was altogether dependent upon, their sovereign secular authority. Whereas the Papacy is primarily and essentially an ecclesiastical or spiritual power; its secular authority altogether springs from and grows out of its ecclesiastical.

It is ecclesiastically as head of a church of which the sovereigns and peoples are the members, that the Papacy has exercised power over the Roman empire. Its actual sovereign secular power, as distinguished from its ecclesiastical, has been all along confined to the very inconsiderable territory—a fractional portion of the entire empire—which has, until recently, acknowledged the Pope as its king. Further, it is expressly predicted of the seventh head (verse 10), that it is only to continue "a short space," whereas the Papacy has continued for twelve hundred and sixty years.

May not these very reasons, however, be assigned for giving to the Papacy an intervening place as a ruling power between the sixth and seventh heads, thus constituting the last head, whoever he may be, an "eighth who is of the seven"? If so, are we to regard this "eighth" as having as yet arisen, or as altogether in the future? Here I feel that it behoves us to tread softly, and, without any attempt at assertion, only to endeavor to suggest.

The Papacy as a sovereign ruling power over the kingdoms of the Roman empire exists no longer. When it virtually ceased to exist as such it is not easy to determine. It would as such seem virtually to have received its death-blow in the events of the French Revolution, and in the spirit of democracy and insubmission to anything like absolute authority which then became diffused among the nations. The first Napoleon, the child of the revolution, dethroned the Pope; was crowned as king of Italy; assumed the sovereignty of the entire Roman empire under the title of "Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine;" annexed the Papal States to the French empire; constituting Rome the second city of the empire; and caused his infant son to be styled King of Rome!

Thus was the secular power set altogether above the long dominant ecclesiastical power of the Papacy; and although the Pope was subsequently restored to Rome, and to his temporal sovereignty over the Papal States, his power as supreme ruler over the kingdoms of the Roman empire has never been fully acknowledged or submitted to since then. That power, as well as his temporal sovereignty, is now altogether extinct. Most jealously do the nations and sovereigns of Europe watch for and counteract any attempt upon the part of the Papacy to exercise any power that is not strictly and solely ecclesiastical; or to exercise ecclesiastical power in any way that may infringe upon, or interfere with, secular prerogative.

We are, therefore, assuredly warranted in asking the question, Has "the eighth, who is of the seven," as yet arisen? or are we to regard his rise as an altogether future event? My own opinion—one in which I am much strengthened by the knowledge that it is held by many earnest students and expositors of the sure word of prophecy—is that he has arisen, and is to be found in

—in that peculiar and portentous phase of democratico-monarchical power which originated in the first Napoleon, and which has formed the characteristic feature of his dynasty. My reasons for this opinion, among others into which it is not needful that I should enter at present, are as follows:

The eighth king, or power, has this peculiar feature ascribed to him, that he "was, is not, and yet is" (or "shall come again"). (Thus Alford, who affirms, "so all the ancient MSS.") Appearance, disappearance, reappearance, are emphatically characteristic of this last head. How this predicted feature seems to have a marked fulfilment in the Napoleon dynasty I surely need not stop to prove. Again, this "eighth, who is of the seven," is represented as carrying or supporting "the woman," or city and ecclesiastical system of Rome, at a time when, after having been in power as "the beast that was," and having lost that power, he, as "the beast that is not," has not yet regained, or has only partially regained it. This seems very evident when we compare verse 8—"The beast that thou sawest" in the act of carrying the woman (verse 3), "was, and is not, and shall ascend," etc., his ascent being yet future, and subsequent to his carriage of the woman—with verses 10–17, in which the ten kings who exercise their power contemporaneously with the beast, are also described as "not having received any kingdom as yet."

Neither they, nor the beast who reigns contemporaneously with them, are in the full possession or exercise of their power at the time at which, previous to her judgment, he carries the woman. Now this part of the prediction seems also to have received a striking fulfilment in the support given to the Papal system at Rome for more than twenty years by the third Napoleon, and this while he was Emperor of the French, but possessed or exercised no power as a head or ruler over the entire Roman empire. If the beast "was" under the first Napoleon when he dethroned the Pope, and exercised his despotic sway over the greater portion of Europe, it evidently "was not" under the third Napoleon, who, nevertheless, so completely carried the woman that immediately upon his downfall, and as its necessary consequence, the temporal power of the Papacy has fallen, and the Pope has ceased to rule at Rome.

Once more, the last or seventh head of the beast is specially represented in Revelation 13 as "having a deadly wound which is healed"—a wound "by a sword," and yet "living." As to how far this prediction may or may not be yet literally fulfilled in the person of the last individual who shall exercise the full power of this last head, it would seem to be altogether premature and needless to speculate. But, should the Napoleon dynasty again become ascendant, it will, beyond question, bear upon it the mark of one, or more than one "deadly," and yet "healed wound."

For such reasons I am, at all events, strongly disposed to regard the following as the completed list of the eight sovereignties, and seven heads of the fourth or Roman empire:

First head, kings; second head, consuls; third head, tribunes; fourth head, decemvirs; fifth head, dictators; sixth head, emperors; seventh sovereignty, popes; eighth sovereignty, and seventh head, Napoleons.

Should this be so, it is assuredly a solemn, startling thought, how near is the programme of Second Advent prophecy to its conclusion—how little, comparatively, remains to be accomplished ere it reaches its final close. Only that "the eighth who is of the seven," and who "was and is not," should reappear, and should work out the brief, though pregnant remainder of his appalling destiny, and fulfil the small portion that yet awaits him of the "short space" for which he is "to continue."

May not some further confirmation of the views which I have thus endeavored to put forward be derived from the fact that the woman being no longer carried by the beast, the divided kingdoms of the empire are already beginning to fulfil Revelation 17:16: "These shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire"?

A Young Buddhist Priest, in China, having embraced Christianity, gave up his temple, his land, and his visible means of support, because he saw he could not conscientiously keep on in the old way. He did this spontaneously and joyfully, and has never felt or imagined himself as at all a martyr. This was a year ago. Since then he has supported himself by weaving cloth in the winter, and by hoeing corn in summer, at five cents per day. His old heathen teacher tried to persuade him to change his mind, but signally failed. This old teacher is rich, has a great many temples under his care, with rich "livings" to give. In July he came a long distance to renew his offers, volunteered to give the young man a large temple to keep, with land attached, and a large sum in ready money as a bonus, as much as a man would earn in a year of ordinary work, the only condition being a renunciation of this foreign folly. The young priest resolutely declined the offer. "No," he said, "not if you would give me fifty times as much. Yellow gold is not precious. Peace and happiness have no price." This was final. The young man resumed his hoe, and the old one went about among his temples.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Extra Session of the Senate was Opened on Monday, October 10th. Senator Harris, the Democratic senator from Tennessee at the request of members on both sides, called the Senate to order. After the President's proclamation had been read, Senator Pendleton, of Ohio, moved that Senator Bayard, of Delaware, be chosen president pro tem. Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, presented the credentials of the senators-elect from New York, and Rhode Island, and moved that the oath of office be administered to them by Senator Anthony, the senior senator. This motion was defeated by 36 to 34. Senator David Davis, of Illinois, voted with the Republicans, Senator Mahone did not vote, and there was one pair. Mr. Edmunds then moved an amendment, providing that Mr. Bayard should be elected for one day only, which was also defeated. Another amendment providing for the substitution of Senator Anthony's name for that of Mr. Bayard shared the same fate. The original resolution was then put and carried by a vote of 34 to 32, thus constituting Senator Bayard president pro tem. After this the Senate adjourned.

The New York State Republican Convention assembled on Wednesday, October 5th. An unusual interest was attached to this year's proceedings of that body, owing to the recent protracted contest for the senatorships. Although the petitions sent to the Albany Legislature, and the individual expressions of opinion sent to State Senators and Assemblymen during the progress of the contest, afforded some indication of the state of public opinion, the nomination of delegates to the convention was anticipated as the first direct expression of the will of the people on the subject. It is probable that the leaders of both sections of the party did their utmost to secure a victory, so that the constitution of the convention is regarded as an unmistakable evidence of popular feeling. The verdict so given, was decisively in favor of the Administration wing of the party. The first test vote was on the question of the appointment of a temporary chairman. For this position the Stalwarts nominated Congressman Hiscock, of Onondaga, and the Administration delegates, Warren Miller, the newly elected United States Senator. A vote was taken, when it was found that of the 488 delegates, 298 voted for Miller, and 190 for Hiscock. That result was accepted by the Stalwarts as decisive, and no further attempt was made to obtain control of the convention. Mr. Chauncey M. Depew was elected permanent chairman. The representation of the first district of Oneida was contested, the two delegations being headed respectively by ex-Senator Conkling and his old opponent, Mr. S. S. Lowery. The committee ruled by a vote of 12 to 4 that the Lowery delegation was entitled to seats. The convention pledged its support to President Arthur, eulogized Governor Cornell, and deplored the death of the late President.

The Massachusetts State Democratic Convention has nominated the Hon. Charles P. Thompson, of Gloucester, for Governor, and the Hon. James H. Carleton, of Haverhill, for Lieutenant Governor. Among other planks of the platform adopted, was one referring in the following terms to the tariff: "We do strongly assert the importance of an intelligently bold revision of the tariff laws. We urge that the burden by taxation on the producing classes by the present tariff is a grievance that ought to give place to lighter duties more justly distributed." On the subject of prohibition the convention said: "We favor the regulation of the conduct of the liquor traffic by efficient laws enforced with vigor."

The Reduction in the Public Debt During the month of September is announced to have been over $13,000,000. The Government receipts during the month reached $33,000,000. The receipts for the quarter of the fiscal year just closed are $9,000,000 more than those of the corresponding quarter last year. Considerable pressure has been applied to Secretary Windom to induce him to apply still further the Government accumulations to relieve the present stringency in the money markets. It is understood that he would be willing to comply if he were satisfied that by doing so he would not aid speculators rather than respectable business men. The operations of the speculating rings who are getting up corners in grain and produce have seriously disturbed the markets during the past two weeks, and they show that the mania for speculation is becoming dangerous and reckless in the extreme.

The Preparations for Celebrating the Centenary of the decisive struggle of the Revolutionary War are now completed, and Yorktown, Va., will, during the next few days, present a brilliant appearance. On the spot where the noble patriots and their gallant French allies won their final triumph a hundred years ago, and the British General Cornwallis surrendered with his army, a monument will be erected, the corner-stone of which will be laid on Tuesday, the 18th, by the Masonic order. On the 19th Mr. Winthrop will deliver an oration, Mr. Hayne's ode and Mr. Hope's psalm will be given, preceded by President Arthur's address; on the 20th a grand review of the troops will take place on Temple Farm, in the rear of the line of the first parallel of 1781, under Major-General Hancock's command, and on the 21st there will be a naval review at Hampton Roads. There will also be fireworks, salutes, receptions, etc.

The International Cotton Exposition at Atlanta, Ga., was formally opened on Wednesday, October 5th. The interest and enthusiasm manifested may be accepted as harbingers of success. An immense concourse of citizens assembled to witness the inaugural ceremonies. The vast assemblage was called to order by Governor Colquitt. Prayer was then offered by the Rt. Rev. Robert W. B. Elliott, Bishop of Texas, who prayed that the death of President Garfield might have a good effect in drawing the people of the whole country closer together. The buildings and grounds were then presented by the Director-General, A. J. Kimball, to the Exposition Association. The acceptance of the buildings and grounds by Governor Colquitt followed. Governor Colquitt said he doubted whether the energy bestowed on the work had ever been exceeded. It looked more like enchantment than the application of hard work. The work had been quickly done, and well done; but the chief pride of those who had the work in charge would have been lost if they had been unsuccessful in enlisting the interest of the people of the whole country. They were prompted by a higher motive than a mere material demonstration; a nobler and more beneficent impulse prompted them, "the desire to draw all the people of all the sections of this vast country nearer and more firmly together in their heart relations." That desire is heartily echoed by all sections of the country.

An Attempt to Stamp Out the Shameful Custom of hazing is being made at the Annapolis Naval Academy by Rear Admiral C. R. P. Rodgers. For some time past, the levity of the third-class students and the distressed, harassed looks of the new class men have given rise to the suspicion that hazing was going on. One evening last week it was discovered that some cruel and indecent trick of this kind was in progress, but the authorities were unable to detect the perpetrators. The members of the class in which the delinquents are known to be, refused to disclose the names of the offenders, and the Admiral in consequence of their contumacy punished the whole class. Under General Grant's administration a few severe examples sufficed to put a stop to the disgraceful practice, but under Mr. Hayes a more lax system was inaugurated, and hazing has been worse than ever. It will give general satisfaction if the mean cowards at Annapolis are severely punished.

The Assassin Guiteau has Published his autobiography through the medium of a metropolitan newspaper. It is full of repetitions and minute details, and its reading is a severe tax on the patience. It establishes two facts. The first, that the murderer is perfectly sane. The second, that in spite of his assertions to the contrary, his motive was not political, but was due to his inordinate vanity. In one place Guiteau says that during the week preceding the assassination, "I read the papers carefully I thought it all over in detail. I thought just what people would talk, and thought what a tremendous excitement it would create, and I kept thinking about it all the week. I then prepared myself. I sent to Boston for a copy of my book, 'The Truth,' and I spent a week in preparing that, and I greatly improved it. I knew that it would probably have a large sale on account of the notoriety that the act of removing the President would give me, and I wished the book to go out to the public in proper shape."

A curious passage, illustrating the power Satan has had to blind the eyes of men ever since the day that he talked with Eve in the garden, is the following: "My motive was purely political and patriotic, and I acted under Divine pressure. It was the same kind of pressure that led Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac. The President's nomination was an act of God; his election was an act of God; his removal is an act of God." A moment's reflection would have shown him that he, a common thief, an adulterer, and a forger, was not likely to be selected by God as an instrument for any purpose whatsoever.

Seventy Years' Imprisonment was the Sentence pronounced on the three Iron Mountain train robbers on October 7th, by the judge of the Hemstead Circuit Court, Ark. The prisoners pleaded guilty, and they were sentenced in cumulative penalties of fourteen years for each act of robbery, making in all seventy years for each prisoner. It is possible that the men may have some hope of being released by the clemency of the Executive after serving a part of their sentence. If they have no such hope, how dark and miserable must be their lot! To live out all their days in the penitentiary is a prospect to strike despair into any heart. It is a condition which, gloomy as it is, only faintly typefies the condition of the lost soul, for which, having rejected Jesus in this life, there remains no hope of deliverance through the countless ages of eternity.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Published in this number, is one of his evening sermons, which we give because Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday.

Worse than the Michigan Fires, was the Es- mate formed of the deplorable results of the uor traffic, by a speaker at a public meeting last ek in New York. He had just come from the vastated State, and described in thrilling words e havoc and ruin wrought by the forest fires. t sad as were the effects of the fire, he stated it his deliberate opinion that the curse of strong ink was doing a worse work, because its devasions were perpetual. The man knew whereof spoke, for he had been a victim. Through the essing of God on the efforts of a noble Christian man, he had been not only emancipated from very to his evil habit, but led to the Saviour. rty other degraded men have also been rescued the same devoted Christian lady.

The Quaint English of a Chinaman's Tribute the memory of President Garfield shows that he d formed a right estimate of the dead statesman well as of the sentiments of the American peoe. Yee Lee, having heard of the national beavement, procured a portrait of the late President d hung it up outside his laundry in Ludlow reet, having previously constructed a crape border r it. Underneath the portrait is the following scription, composed and written by Yee Lee himlf: "The enemy shoot him and dead he were nice man. The American people very sorry and in on him. Now every house hang up the black ing funeral for him. Good man the people obey m the name very fame forever. Bad man will burn of fire."

The Curious Perpetuation of an Error in anscription by the United States Land Office has ly recently been detected. According to that thority, the area of Louisiana is 41,346 square iles. An examination of the State by parishes ows a considerable excess in land over that reorted by the Land Office. There are 1242 comete townships in the State, amounting to 44,712 uare miles, besides fractions of others, showing excess of 3500 square miles on the lowest calulation. Professor Hilgard, of the Census Bureau, says that he has gone over the figures carefully with the geographer of the bureau, Mr. Gannert, and both are convinced that the Land Office report is wrong. They imagine that the first United States survey found 44,346 square miles; that the second "4" was transcribed as a "1," and that the error has been carried down from year to year, and from book to book, until the erroneous figures have found their way into all the standard authorities. Although there has probably been no disastrous consequences from this error, it is an illustration of how large a number of mistakes may be made when the original standard authority is misleading. In appealing to the Word of God as revealed in the Bible, the Christian knows that he runs no such risk, for "the law of the Lord is perfect" (Psa. 19 : 7).

Dr. Plumer's Servant Puzzled.—The Fol- lowing incident is related in a little book entitled "God glorified in the Fire," recently published by the American Tract Society. During the last painful illness of the late Dr. Plumer, a friend called to inquire after him, and the patient sufferer said, "This has been a day of wonderful mercies." A servant standing by said, "After all that pain, I don't see how he can talk about mercies; I should talk of pain, but he talks of mercies." The Christian's cheerfulness was a mystery to the attendant; but it was explained a day or two afterward, when another friend put the question, "Do you suffer much, doctor?" "Not nearly as much as my Saviour did," was the characteristic reply. "I am sorry to see you suffer so, doctor," said another. "One who loves me better than you do put me here," said the dying man. There was the solution. The sufferer in his pain remembered the love and the suffering of his Lord.

A Cree Indian's Testimony.—In a Wild Dis- trict of the North-West there is a missionary station called Asisippi. In May last, when the Bishop visited the locality to confirm a number of Indians, one of them, named Jacob Susukurunos, addressed him thus: "I am thankful for what I see to-day. I have been not only a heathen, but a conjuror or medicine-man. God has seen fit to change my mind, and I am now a Christian. The change must have come from God—it could not have come from myself. God showed me that I was in the power of the evil one, and that I could only escape by coming to Jesus. I heard in church yesterday that heathen superstitions are crumbling away, and that Christianity is growing and spreading. I believe that this is true. I remember that in my heathen days I once camped with my wife and child on the very spot where the church is now built. It was evening, and I was sitting just where the church door now is. I felt very lonely—just like a beast, I little thought then that, in the very place where I sat, the church would be built, and that my wife would be the first buried there. She was then, like myself, a poor heathen, but before she died she was brought to Jesus.

An Aged Pauper's Needlebook has been found to contain means of supplying her wants in her declining years. The Youth's Companion states that a few weeks ago a lady visited an Aged Women's Home at Philadelphia. She talked with one of the inmates who was repairing a needle book which had belonged to her mother. The lady picked up the cover and noticed that it was made of several thicknesses of paper, apparently an old letter many times folded. Looking closely at it the lady saw it was not a letter, but a memorandum referring to the purchase of some land. When the cover was unstitched and the memorandum opened, it was found to be the record, drawn up seventy-five years ago, of the purchase of a quarter of an acre of ground by the pauper's father. Inquiries were made and the land identified. Coal has been discovered on the ground since the pauper's father purchased it, and the old woman had the gratification of receiving for her quarter acre, the title of which was so strangely found, a cheque for six hundred dollars, a sum that in her circumstances and at her time of life is very welcome. Such discoveries are rare enough, but instances are by no means rare of people finding in the Bible they have neglected all their lives, the title to an everlasting mansion in the skies (John 14 : 2).

IS IT NOTHING TO YOU?

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Delivered on Sunday, Sept. 11, 1881.

[When the Tabernacle was thrown open to all comers, the regular hearers vacating their seats for the occasion.]

"Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger."—LAMENTATIONS I : 12.

SYMPATHY with suffering ones is never content to act her part alone. The man who is sorrowful for another is sure to invite others to join him in his sympathy. It seems to him so sad a thing that he would have all men weep over it with himself. It is so great a grief that he would hang the heavens with blackness and drape the world in sackcloth. Hence Jeremiah, when he saw the sorrows of Jerusalem, complained of all who dared to pass her by without a lamentation. He beheld that ancient and glorious city besieged by her adversaries, invaded by their fierce armies, and given over to plunder, to murder, to fire and desolation. Do you wonder that he wept, and called upon others to weep with him? He pictured Jerusalem as sitting by the wayside like a maiden who has been sore wounded and is in bitter grief, and crying out in her loveliness and anguish, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow."

In all the annals of history there never was sorrow equal to the fate of Jerusalem. Many cities have been destroyed, but none have fallen amid such a tempest of terrors. They have been devoured with famine, wasted with pestilence, or broken down by war; but as for thee, O Jerusalem, all these evils met upon thee, as when the vultures hastened from afar, and meet upon the slain! Beautiful for situation, yet terrible for desolation! Joy of the whole earth, and yet the queen of sorrow! How terrible was thy lot, and how grievous was thy fault! Well did the prophet in the foresight of thy tremendous doom cry to all the nations, "Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me."

We apply to Jesus and His sufferings to-night the words which the prophet wrote in reference to Judea and her national sorrow. We hear the Son of God saying in His death pangs to all this vast assembly, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow."

And this is my first head to-night—the sufferings of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, are unparalleled. When we have dwelt enough upon this, we will proceed to note, secondly, that they have a deep interest to many; and we will conclude, thirdly, by inquiring whether they have not some interest for you? Oh that God the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to bear witness to the Lord Jesus, would now bear His testimony in all your hearts, for His mercy's sake.

I. First, then,

THE SUFFERINGS OF THE SON OF GOD

upon the cross were altogether unparalleled.

I tell no idle tale to-night. I draw no picture of romance, but the sorrows which we now relate are matters of fact. Jesus, the eternal Son of God, came down in boundless pity among the sons of men, and took upon Himself our human nature. Quitting the infinite honors of the skies He came to the lowliness of the manger, and the labor of the carpenter's shop; and here He abode, suffering as veritable man all the sorrows and infirmities of our mortality. In our nature He lived some thirty years or more, enduring much of poverty and labor, and at the end thereof He died, not amid the applause of all mankind, as He deserved, but nailed to a cross, like a felon or a slave, a spectacle of scorn and infamy, the despised and rejected of men.

The sufferings of this divine One were unparalleled, first, because of the dignity of His person, which gave such point to the insult which He endured. Kings have died; philosophers have died; philanthropists have died; but never such a one as this, for He that bled on Calvary was king, and priest, and prophet, a right royal man—and more—the Son of the Highest. God that made the heavens and earth was in personal union with that man who died upon the cross of Calvary.

A dethroned monarch is always the object of compassion, and a once famous general sitting at the city gate and begging for a penny of every traveller that passes by, has been in all ages spoken of as a person to be deeply pitied. But what shall I say of Him who stood as the centre of angelic hosts, the Prince of the kings of the earth? They nailed Him to the cross, and then stood there and said, "If He be the Christ, let Him come down."

There was also this strange point about our Redeemer's suffering, namely, the perfect innocence of His character. Many a man has died innocent of that which was laid to his charge, but no man has been perfectly innocent of every kind of fault. In this man there was never taint of evil. He was born without tendency to sin, for the natural corruption of our nature was not in Him; and He lived never doing wrong to man, or woman, or child, and never by omission or by commission violating the divine will of the Most High. He was absolutely perfect, so that He could say, when Satan came to assail Him, "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." Now, herein is a sorrow never to be forgotten—that He must bleed and die, and, moreover, that He must so suffer as to be connected with sin.

There was one tried for murder years ago, and some thought it an argument for his innocence that he stood in the dock calm and composed. But others said, "Not so: innocent men are the very persons who shudder most at having such a crime laid to their charge, and he who could bear the charge without emotion is most probably the man who has committed the crime." Truth lies in that observation. For the innocent Christ to be made sin for us, and for the wrath of God to roll over Him instead of us, must have caused within His spirit a depth of anguish which the tenderest heart cannot fathom. Behold, and see if there was ever sorrow like unto His sorrow. Was there ever dignity that suffered such indignity, or innocence that came into contact with such a mass of sin, and suffered for it all?

But this is not all, nor half. There was another wonder about the sufferings of Christ, namely, that in his case there was such

A CONJUNCTION OF GRIEFS.

Have you never noticed that, when you have one trouble, as a rule some other one is absent? As to the Saviour, it seemed as if every form of grief was let loose against Him on that dark, that dreadful night. All the winds of woe escaped from their cave at that dread hour. He was heavy within Himself, deserted by His friends who ought to have defended Him, betrayed by His bosom companion, slandered by false witnesses, hunted down by false-hearted men. He had no one to speak for Him, and He was unable for a certain reason to speak for Himself.

Hell from beneath was stirred against Him: Satan bade his legions aim all their arrows against His heart. Heaven veiled its sun and left the sufferer in a chill darkness. God did hide His face and make Him cry, "Why hast thou forsaken me!" Earth's inhabitants seemed leagued to cast Him out. There is not, to my knowledge, a mitigating circumstance in the woes of Christ. It is bitter, bitter, bitter; and if there be a mixture, it is wormwood mingled with gall. But bitter all, tempestuous all, terrific all.

Oh that these lips had language, and could speak aright upon such a theme as this! But I ask you to notice next that there is in our Saviour's sorrow this singular point which is not found anywhere else, namely, that all His sorrow was voluntarily undertaken, and voluntarily continued in. When a man feels that it must be, he girds himself to bear the will of destiny; but concerning Christ, He was under no compulsion from any force which He could not Himself control. This perfect freedom involved Him in a double labor; He had not only to suffer, but to will to suffer even to the end.

He had therefore to put a divine restraint upon Himself, and to bear on, when His human nature might have suggested that He should bear no more. It did suggest it, so far as it could do so, without a faulty shrinking. "If it be possible," said he, "let this cup pass from me;" but His holy soul came to the rescue of His resolution, for He added, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." It is not in our power thus to yield ourselves to sorrow. If we gave up ourselves once to the hands of pain or death it would be but one act, and we should then be out of our own power; but our Lord always had Himself in His own hand, and hence He made a continuous offering of Himself by a distinct act of His will until He expired. Let us give Him our deepest love in return for so special a sacrifice.

And this makes it more singular still—that those for whom He died thus voluntarily were His enemies. Oh, tell it, tell it all the world over, that Jesus laid down His life for those who hated Him, for those who loved the wages of unrighteousness. Tell it in hell, tell it in earth, tell it in heaven! and let the three worlds overflow with wonder at this miracle of love. Let the whole universe hear it—Jesus died for His enemies. His last breath said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." He died for those who did not love Him, but thirsted for His blood. He died for those who could not see His beauties—who never will see His beauties unless He work a miracle upon them. He died for you and for me. But oh, how shamefully have the best rewarded Him with chill, penurious love! How shamefully are some here present rewarding Him at this moment, by living in entire neglect of Him—living as if they had nothing to do with the death of Christ at all. For such did He die, and therefore His death is altogether unparalleled.

Once more to crown

THIS EDIFICE OF WONDER.

There was this about Christ's sorrow, which was never in any other sorrow under heaven, namely, that it was expiatory. Christ was dying and suffering in the stead of others, and by that dying and suffering He was putting away the sin of others. This is the substance of the revelation of God, that Jesus Christ has appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself, and there is virtue in His blood to cleanse from all sin. I hear certain philosophical divines denying this atonement, but I beseech you give no heed to them; they would rob you of your only hope of heaven. Mark you this—there is nothing left of Christianity when atonement is gone. "The blood is the life thereof," and if you remove its life the Gospel will die.

What see you where this atoning sacrifice is left out of the preaching? Why, very soon empty places of worship, for the people soon find that there is nothing there for them, and they will not go where they are mocked with husks. To deny the great doctrine of atonement by the blood of Jesus Christ is to hamstring the Gospel, and to cut the throat of Christianity. Look at this house tonight, this spectacle, this gathered throng! Into what corner could another hearer be thrust? One would think from the vehement eagerness to enter that we gave some gorgeous entertainment. Come here any night in all the year, or any morning if you like, and still it is the same. Well, why come the people? To see a man in fine raiment? We wear no millinery. To listen to sweet strains of music and the swell of organs? We have none of it. What come they for? To hear an orator? Far from it. I have never aimed at oratory, or desired to exhibit it. I have preached Christ out of my very soul, and lifted Him up as the Saviour of men, and therefore the people throng the house, and they always will while Christ is fully preached in language which they can understand.

II. The sufferings of Jesus have had for many. Oh that I could set Him forth before you. There He is! Look ye upon Him! Did I hear one ask, What good has this sorrow ever brought to any one? Has anybody derived benefit from it? Let me tell you. Multitudes have found in the sufferings of Christ the cure for their despair. Read the biographies of converted men, and you shall find cases upon cases where they had been ready to commit suicide, but the sight of a crucified Saviour encouraged them to hope, and gave them rest. Nay, you need not read books: speak to any godly man of your acquaintance, and he will tell you that the wounds of Jesus were and are the fountains of his hope. Many of you could speak for yourselves, and say that nothing could have brought you back from despair on account of sin but a sight of Christ.

In others the sorrows of the cross have wrought a complete transformation of their lives. The apostle Paul on the way to Damascus was going to hunt Christians to death, but the voice of one who said, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest" changed his mind so completely that he became the greatest of all preachers of Christ. You have, most of you, I dare say, heard of the life of Colonel Gardiner, a dissipated officer, who indulged, as too many soldiers do, in wantonness. One night he had made an appointment of the most vicious kind, and reached the place an hour too soon. Waiting there alone he thought that he saw upon the wall the Saviour on the cross, and he thought that he heard Him say to him, "I did all this for thee! What hast thou ever done for me?" He fled the house; and you know what an earnest soldier of Christ from that moment he became. Such miracles have been wrought in every age, and will be wrought to the end of time. Nor are they so rare that you need search far for them. One and another will tell you if you will listen—some here can tell you for themselves—that the sight of Christ has changed them altogether.

The transformation of the lives of men by the sight of the cross of Christ is matchless, superb—there is nothing like it; and they that have once felt its transforming power laugh at infidelity. "What," say they, "no truth in the cross? Let the man that has been a leper, the man that has been lame or blind, suddenly receive a cure, and then tell him that there is nothing in it. 'Pshaw!' says he, 'there is nothing in you, or you would not make the remark,'" and he goes his way, and that is all the answer that he deigns. Matters of actual experience may be contradicted, but they cannot be disproved. Men may say what they will, but we are of the same opinion still, when once the cross has wrought its marvels upon our souls.

THE HEROES OF THE CROSS.

Ah, brethren, and think again what power the cross has had on other men's minds to gird them to heroic deeds. I shall never forget when I shook the hand of Livingstone. I count it one of the great honors of my life to have known him, and even men of the world will join in doing homage to his name. But it was the love of Christ that made him tread pathless Africa and die among the heathen. He was not the first by many a thousand who counted it all joy to succumb to climate and to perish among strangers for the cross of Christ. Moffat still lives, and what a life! There was a John Williams, of whom you older men can tell, who laid down his life at Erromanga for Christ's sake. These are but the later ranks of a mighty host that counted not life dear to them for Jesus' sake.

Our own land has seen the heroes of the cross enduring unto the end. Over there at your Smithfield, why, there were men and women there who early in the morning, while yet the sun was scarcely up, were summoned forth to stand at fiery stakes and burn; and they were seen to clap their hands, when every finger was a candle, and cry, "None but Christ! None but Christ!" And the crowd that stood around them, who were they? There were cruel men, and brutal priests, but there were also men, and women, and children, of whom it is itten, in the humble church records of the day, it they went there to see their pastor burned to rn the way. Oh, that is grand!—to learn the y to die when their turn came; for the idea of er yielding up to the papacy, or of giving up rist because they must die for Him or else deny m, never entered into their heads. Even boys d girls learned at their mother's knee so much Jesus' sufferings that they became invincible. , and we should be so again if it ever came to e same pass; for the old name and the old love ll linger in the hearts of Christians to-day, with their faults and infirmities. This is what the oss of Christ can do: it can make men suffer for is name's sake.

Ah, but you may not be called to that, you say, What is the use of the cross of Christ to us in ery-day life?" Why, it is of this use—that men ho love the suffering Saviour become patient in eir every-day sufferings. They say to themlves,

'His way was much rougher and darker than mine.
Did Christ my Lord suffer, and shall I repine?"

hey learn to hate sin by seeing the agonies by hich redemption was obtained; they learn to be oright by seeing with what a price they are ought; they learn to be self-denying at the feet of ne Crucified; and this is the good of the cross to iem, and this is the way they learn both to live nd to die. This black cloth which casts its somre hue around my platform is the memorial of ne dear soul, my sister, who learned to love the aviour while she was yet young, and in her early ays joined with this church; and in her death, hen it was a pang to draw each breath, she found er joy, her victory, in resting in the divine Saviour. he was a soldier's daughter, and was not ashamed o join with the despised people of God, and in her ong pains and agonizing death she found sustainng power in the doctrine of the cross, and found ictory in death.

This is what multitudes of men and women have ad to do with Christ. They have not passed Him y, but bowed at His feet, and found life, light, oy, perfection, heaven.

III. And I close with this last appeal: what, lear hearers,

WHAT HAVE YOU TO DO WITH HIM?

'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, nd see if there be any sorrow like unto my sor-ow."

Now, I do not suppose that Jesus Christ is much o some that are here present, I mean people that are getting on in the world. Everything is going very easily with you. You are rising like a balloon, you are filled and inflated with prosperity. You are getting as much money as you can count. You are going on very well without a Saviour. You have your portion in this life. I should not wonder if you turn on your heel and despise him, and say that you do not want a Saviour. We will meet another day, young sir, when all that wine is sour and that gold is corroded, and those pleasures, like the rime of the morning, shall have disappeared beneath the burning sun of care. But for a while, I doubt not, Jesus Christ will be nothing to you. It is dreary talk, and a weariness to hear about Him.

But is there one here heavy of heart? Are there not many here conscious of fault? Are you wrong? Would you be right? Are you guilty? Would you be forgiven? Ah, then, the cross for you! Jesus for you! Turn aside and look at Him. Look till your eyes are full of tears. Look till you brush those tears away and say, "I see it all. Jesus has suffered in my stead. I am forgiven. My Father has adopted me. I am His child. I am glad." Oh, guilty ones, there is something in Christ for you, for He died, the just for the unjust, to bring us to God.

Peradventure there is another here who is not so much laboring under a sense of fault as under a sense of aimlessness in life. Do you feel, "Well, somehow, I have no purpose in life. I keep on like a blind horse round a mill, but I do not get any forwarder, and what is more, I do not know what I am toiling for." To bring up my children? Well, perhaps that is done. They are all settled in life, and you say, "I do not know what more is to be done. I do not seem to have any object worth striving after." My Master's sorrows may enlist you. The Red Cross Knight, when he bore the cross upon his arm, as he fought with the Saracen, though he was under a grave delusion, for Christ would not have us fight with deadly weapons, yet felt strong because he thought that the name of Christ was named upon him; but if you become a true knight of the red cross by living for the glory of Christ you will rise to a noble enthusiasm, and find an aim in life of which you will never tire.

Perhaps you are anxious to benefit others. Oh, if you are, you want to be doing something real and effective. The world is going to the bad. There is a great deal of mischief abroad. You say, "I want to do good." Friend, turn aside and look at Christ's sufferings, and see whether you have not there the fulcrum for your lever. To move rocks and mountains here is an unrivalled force; not steam power or dynamite, but something stronger, for an ounce of the doctrine of the cross would blast all the walls of error, and burst the dungeons of misery, if rightly applied. Come you to Christ and see if you have not there by the power of the Holy Ghost an irresistible agent of good to all mankind.

"Oh," says one, "I do not believe in Him." What do you believe in?—for whatever you believe in, try to use it for the good of your fellow-men. I would like to see you sending city missionaries from street to street to preach what you do believe in. Come, be reasonable and do something more than find fault. Some are so fond of pulling down. Would they try a little building up? Come, then. You say that we Christians are doing no good. Just try your own hand at it. Go to the dying; go to the sick; take them bottles of your philosophy, and comfort them with

THE ELIXIR OF SCIENTIFIC DOUBT.

Go ahead!

If somebody says that the current system of medicine is faulty, we reply, Very well, sir; have you found the right medicine? "Yes." Then distribute it, train physicians, and build hospitals. Get to work at it. Why not? Now, you that do not believe in God or Christ, send your own missionaries abroad. Enlighten the heathen by telling them that there is no God, no sin, no hell, no heaven, no soul, no anything. Go into the centre of Africa, and win them from their bloody superstitions by the doctrines of science. Go ahead. If you have a Gospel, do not hide it. What? You have no zeal in that direction. But why not? There is no particular use in it, is there? Not worth spending your money on. Miserable comforters! Wretched physicians that cannot heal!

But now, if you want to know whether there is power in the cross, ask a city missionary to let you go with him for a day. Pitch on the right man, and go and see for yourself. He will show you what the doctrine of the cross can do in comforting, in sobering, in cheering, in elevating. "I do not believe it," says one. No one said you did. Here is a ship filling with water, and you do not believe in pumps. Very well. I am going on pumping. You are anxious to discuss. Discuss away, but meanwhile I pump. Let every Christian man here make practical use of the cross of Christ, and keep on at it; and if men will not even take the trouble to inquire what are its results, their disbelief is irrational and inexcusable, and they must take the consequences. Our skirts are clear of their blood.

Dear friend, what if it should turn out that you have such a connection with the cross that Christ redeemed you there—that Christ put your sins away there? What if He so bought you there that He means to have you? What if you are so His that He means to save you? What if, when He died there, He bought for you eternal life, and insured for you a place in heaven at the right hand of God, to reign there with Himself?

"Oh, if I thought that," says one, I would come to Him." Come to Him, then, and it is true, for "whosoever believeth in Him hath everlasting life." Let me say that word over again. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." If he only believed a minute ago—if he only believed a second ago, he has not only life but everlasting life. That life, therefore, is a thing that can never die. You have heaven, as well as all the blessings of earth, if you believe in Jesus.

But if you say, "I will have nothing to do with Jesus,' I would like you to say so to yourself in a deliberate manner. If Christ be not worth having, say that you will not have Him, and say it most distinctly. I feel hopeful when a man will come to a decision one way or the other. The sort of people for whom I tremble are those who say, "I hope it will be all right somehow." Oh, sirs, do not hesitate another hour, but answer me as in God's name I question you, Will you have Christ to-night or will you not? Say "Yes" or "No." I would ask you to write down your decision when you get home. Is Christ's yours or not? Sit down deliberately and say, "Yes, my Lord, in the merits of thy death I put my trust;" or else write it if you mean it, "He is not mine at all." We have known some to get comfort out of this act of decision.

There was a poor girl who had long been a Christian, but she was very sad at heart through sickness; and when her minister came to see her he said to her, "Well, Susan, how is your hope?" She said, "Sir, I am afraid I am not a Christian. I do not love the Lord Jesus Christ." He said, "Why, I always thought you did. You acted as if you did." "No," said she, "I am afraid I have deceived myself, and that I do not love Him." The minister wisely walked to the window and wrote on a piece of paper, "I do not love the Lord Jesus Christ," and he said, "Susan, here is a pencil. Just put your name to that." "No, sir," she said, "I could not sign that." "Why not?" "I would be torn to pieces before I would sign it, sir." "But why not sign it, if it is true?" "Ah, sir," said she, "I hope it is not true. I think I do love Him."

Get to know where you are, friend. If Baal be God, serve him; if God be God, serve Him; if Christ be a Saviour, serve Him; if He be not a Saviour, do not pretend to serve Him. Decide one way or the other. God help you to decide to-night, as you will decide when the heavens are on a blaze, when sun and moon have vanished from their spheres, when the solid earth shall rock and reel, and over all shall be heard the trumpet-note, "Come to judgment! Come to judgment! Come to judgment!" There sits the Judge, the Crucified, whose sorrows surpassed all sorrows, but whose glory then shall surpass all glory as He shall divide the saints on the right from the graceless on the left, and from His mouth shall come the final sentence which shall settle the doom of believers and unbelievers.

God bless you, dear friends, every one of you. Henceforth and forever may you be the Lord's. Amen and amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Psalm 22.]

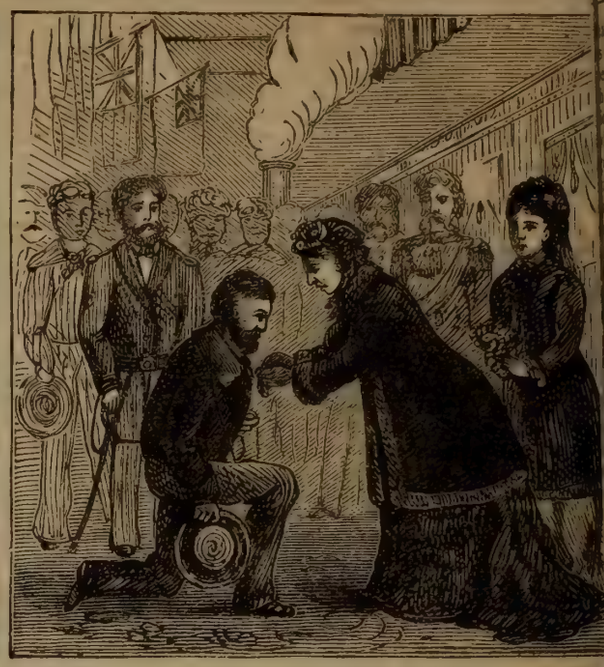
Among the hymns sung at the service was the following by the late Frances Havergal, which Mr. Spurgeon adapted for music—

"I could not do without Him!
Jesus is more to me
Than all the richest treasures
Of earth could ever be.
The more I find Him precious—
The more I find Him true—
The more I long to witness
The self-same bliss in you.

"You need not do without Him,
For He is passing by;
He's waiting to be gracious,
Waiting to hear your cry;
He's waiting to receive you—
To make you all His own!
Why will you do without Him,
And wander on alone?

"Why should you do without Him?
It is not yet too late;
He has not ceased His pleading,
He has not shut the gate.
He calls you!—hush! He calls you:
He would not have you go
Another step without Him,
Because He loves you so."

George Oatley's Heroic Rescue of a Shipwrecked Crew.



The Queen Decorating Oatley.

THE DECORATION OF A HEROIC COAST-GUARDSMAN.

Our young people, in reading history, are apt to acquire a false notion of heroism. The names which stand out most prominently in the records of our own and other nations are the names of generals and valiant soldiers, who have risked their lives in their country's service. But there are other heroes who never saw a battle-field, and it is well that boys should know that they may distinguish themselves by saving life as well as by destroying it. One such instance is the subject of our illustration. The following account of this deed of daring is taken from an English journal :

On Monday, February 16th, during a heavy gale, the Swedish schooner Auguste struck on some rocks on the British coast near Peterhead. Two rockets with ropes attached were fired by the coast-guard ; the first failed to cover the distance, but the second carried a line over the stern of the imperilled vessel. The crew, however, were ignorant of the working of the apparatus, and were unaware that they should make the end of the rope fast, to form a connecting link with the shore.

Among the crowd on the shore was George Oatley, a coast-guardsman, who, seeing the peril of the sailors on the wrecked vessel, resolved that they should not die without an effort being made to rescue them. Speedily divesting himself of his heavy outer clothing, he dashed into the raging ocean, and, swimming with a strong, steady stroke through the seething breakers and broken water, continued to breast the waves until he gained the comparatively smooth water between the ship and the rock, and was pulled on board by a rope which the Swedish mariners threw to him. He then proceeded to haul in the life-line and fix it firmly to the rigging, and this done, the crew were one by one drawn safely ashore. Oatley, who was the last to leave the ship, was landed completely insensible with cold and fatigue.

The account of this daring exploit was published in the newspapers, and so came under the notice of the authorities in London. It was decided to recommend the queen to distinguish the brave man by conferring upon him the Albert medal. This order was instituted fourteen years ago as a means of recognizing heroism in civil life. It is only conferred for special instances of bravery displayed in an effort to save life. It is regarded with especial pride, as it differs in this from the other decorations worn by the queen's German favorites, which simply show that the queen is partial to them. It is an oval medal, having the V and A artistically interlaced with an anchor, and bears the inscription of "For Gallantry in Saving Life at Sea," and it is suspended by a blue-and-white striped ribbon.

As a further distinction, Queen Victoria was induced to present the medal in person to the brave man, and accordingly she consented to have her train stopped at a junction while she was on one of her journeys to Balmoral, her Scottish home, where she spends most of her time undisturbed by the cares of state. At Ferryhill Junction a large concourse of people had assembled, including the sheriffs of the county and the magistrates of the city of Aberdeen. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice left the saloon carriage, and were conducted to a small platform erected for the occasion. George Oatley was then introduced to the queen, who attached the medal to his left breast.

The Christian sees in such a scene a faint type of a future event, when those who have distinguished themselves in zeal for their Master's cause, and who have been the means of saving souls, will be honored by the King of kings. Then the honor will be eternal, not conferred by a human being, whom the accident of birth has raised to an exalted station, but by Him who gave His life that we might enjoy life everlasting (Daniel 12 : 3).

THE SOLEMNITY OF DEATH.

"No man dieth to himself."—Romans 14 : 7.

Old Jewish Disputations—A False Standard of Piety—Selfishness in Religion—The Cure for the Evil—How it Works—Breaking up Selfishness—Taking away Solicitude—The Solitariness of Death—Friendless, Companionless, and Helpless—Three Aspects of the Apostle's Truism—I. No Choice as to the Time of Death—"Whom the Gods Love Die Young"—II. No Choice as to the Place of Death—"Home, Sweet Home"—Wanderers' Graves—III. No Choice as to the Manner of Death—Sudden Death—A Good or an Evil?—God's Wise Appointments.

The drift of the apostle in this chapter was toward the correction of harsh judgments against those whose opinions and practices do not agree with ours. Judaism had fallen into great hardness of spirit and adherence to formality before the coming of Jesus ; and that old Judaism, like certain vegetable growths, seems most difficult to eradicate from the field of the world. It is the spiritual nut-grass. It prevails in Christendom. It is the occasion of the heart-burnings and quarrels and persecutions of Christian sects.

The fact is, it is the cause of sectarianism. The breaking away of sects is on some question "of doubtful disputation," such as the Jewish sabbaths, baptisms, meats, temple service, and things of that sort, not one of which is worth an hour's thought, being old Jewish forms which were admirable in their first intent, but afterward became hard and empty, and were abolished by Jesus.

Nevertheless, there were those in the Christian society in the city of Rome who were still afflicted with the

and desired to keep the ritualism of the old form of religion with the doctrines of the new, to pour the new wine of Christianity into the old bottles of churchism. They would be hard on the brethren who were using the liberty of the gospel.

It was in human nature to retort by charging the Jewish converts with "formalism" and "resting in the letter." No feuds seem so bitter as those which are fought over no material issue.

We shall never be rid of this temper until we come to see the relation of each man to God as settling the question of his relation to his fellowmen. Our mistake is in reversing this process. We determine a man's relation to God by his relation to us. If he be in conformity to our views, if he follow us, if head here to our clique, if he espouse and vigorously maintain our dogmas, he is right with God because he is right with us. Partisanship makes purity. If he served us, of course he served God ! If he was against us, of course he was an enemy of God.

And so, when a man dies after having been blasphemous and obscene and a neglecter of God and a promoter of evil, if he have served a party faithfully, that party will preach him into heaven and paint pictures of his reception among the blessed and immortalize him in statues, while the party against which his talents were directed believe that the man went straightway to hell, if there be a hell, and if there be not, that the existence of such characters as the deceased would justify the existence of a place of torment in the world beyond the grave.

It is to correct this violence of judgment and this wrong method of judging that the apostle Paul writes this argument. Each man is the servant of God. If a man realize that fact so thoroughly that it controls his life, so that he becomes convinced that he does not live to himself and does not die to himself, the whole selfishness of religion disappears.

There is such a thing as

SELFISHNESS IN RELIGION.

A man may be so intent on saving himself as to

* Published instead of Dr. Deems's sermon of Sept. 25, on Ps. 76 : 10.

ave no regard for God beyond the use that God to him, no sympathy with the suffering of Jesus eyond the atoning influence of His sacrifice on is special Christian's personal salvation, no par- cular admiration of heaven beyond the comfort hich the thought of it gives him now and the ood he hopes to get out of it hereafter. The sal- ation of others may be a happy incident in the ture history of this selfish Christian, and he is illing to see heaven crowded because it must be a etter sight than an empty heaven ; and he is will- g to have countless millions singing in heaven ecause that thundering chorus will be so much ore glorious than if his solitary harp and voice ade the only music in eternity. But that is all s selfishness sees in the salvation of others.

Such a Christian would naturally be impatient ith any opposition to his judgment and any devia- on from his religious practices. He judges all is fellow-men, and specially all his fellow-Chris- ans, as they "stand" or "fall" to him. But Paul ehemently asks, "Who art thou that judgest nother man's servant? To his own master he andeth or falleth." And you are not his mas- r ; nor are you his slave ; he belongs to God ; ou belong to God ; he does not live to himself ; ou do not live to yourself ; he does not die to him- lf ; you do not die to yourself.

This great truth does two things for us. 1. It reaks up our selfishness. We neither live nor die ourselves. We are not, therefore, to turn every ream into the reservoir of our personal interests nd wishes. We are not to lead every man to our ay of thinking. We are not to hold every man to ur standard. Every man is to be turned to God.

It takes away our solicitudes. If we do not ac- omplish everything for ourselves, we are doing omething always for another ; and that other is he Lord. We are His. He will not forsake His wn. Our life is thus safe. Our death is thus ecure. There is a dignity in living and there is a randeur in dying. All of our operations are rought into His great work of carrying the world orward to consummations the most sublime.

It is perhaps more easy to perceive and feel that ur life is not altogether our own than it is to per- eive and feel that our death is not altogether our wn. To human observation it would seem that othing so specially belongs to the self of a man, nd so little to any one else, as his death. It is n each man's history. In the most primary pro- uction of his existence a man's parents have a hare. In his birth the mother and the child are artners in the agony and the joy. Along all the ays of life he may have a companion, in all the orrows and joys of life one who sympathizes. In ll the walks of life he keeps step to the music of umanity. But when he comes to die he is sepa- ated. He is alone. He is bearing a burden which one can share. He is fighting a battle, single anded, in the dark, in a vacuum in which clashing teel can give no sound.

Or, to change the figure, he has sailed out. The ables have been loosened. The anchors have een lifted. He is slowly moving from the port. he spectators look on in solemnity. He glides nto the stream. He steams down into "The Narrows." A haze gathers about him. But long efore he is lost to sight he is lost to hearing. If e speak, we hear him no longer. If he fire the arewell gun, we see the flash down the bay, but here are too many intervening sounds, and we are oo far off to hear the report. He goes on and on, ke a vessel going to sea, until his masts are like a peck on the horizon, and then he has gone. No ring of cannon, no waving of signals, no tele- raphic communication can reach the ship. It is ut on the ocean, and shall behold token of land o more until it see the birds that come flying and he flowers that come floating from the shore on he other side.

Such seems a man's death to us who see it from his side. You cannot touch his sensibilities at any oint. Bankruptcy, poverty, calumny do no longer larm him. You may flash the keen edge of a leadly blade before his eyes, and he does not vink. You may pluck the flesh from his limbs vith white-hot pincers, and he does not move. Pestilence may be sweeping the city, and he cares not. The house may be on fire, and he heeds not. He may be lying on the battle-field, the field on which has been raging a conflict on which he had staked all that a man values. But the fatal blow falls. He sinks, to die. He is not dead ; but crown and wife and child and country and fame have all vanished from the brain that was full of them. The artillery thunders past him, and he hears not. The cavalry gallop over him, and he heeds not. He is alone in the dense centre of massed troops, alone, all alone. In the heart of intense life, in the core of intense activity, death sweeps a place for the man to lay down and die in.

on the burning deck may lash themselves together, striving to make themselves one, and clasp each the other in the last embrace of fondest love, and leap together into the sea ; but down there, in the waves, heart to heart, and cheek to cheek, each dies as lonely as if the other were a thousand leagues away. They cannot die together. A mo- ment comes when the bodily embrace is forgotten in a solitary wrestle down in the dark waters, with the personal fate. A mine may cave in on a hun- dred workmen and mash them together so closely that they become one compact mass of flesh and bone, and yet each of the hundred dies as solitary and alone as if he were the only one buried alive.

To human imagination nothing seems so inde- scribably and solemnly and awfully lonely as the act and the fact of dying.

To save us from the breathless terror of this iso- lation our most holy faith comes in with Paul's assurance, "No man dieth unto himself." That breaks the solitude. And then it adds, "If we die, we die unto the Lord." That binds the human hope to the things beyond the grave. "Whether we live or die, we are the Lord's." That sancti- fies all activity and all aspiration. Looked at from this side the death-fact is the loneliest ; looked at from the other side it is the most cheering.

We can now contemplate the assertion which Paul makes of every Christian man, "No man dieth to himself," in several aspects which may make the study profitable.

I. First of all, we have

NO CHOICE AS TO THE TIME.

We cannot say, "I will stay in the field and labor in the vineyard so long, and then I will go to my rest in my home." We cannot engage to serve so long and then cease. We need not be anxious to live to a good old age or desirous to depart early. It was a fond and foolish adage of the ancients, "Whom the gods love die young." Whom the Lord loves live out all their days. These days may be few ; then they are early with the Lord. They may be many ; then they are crowded with opportunities for usefulness, and are occupied with laying up treasures in heaven. A Christian need not be at all concerned about the time of his death. Indeed, he knows that he could not of himself make an appointment with death. He could not say, "Thirty years from this day, at noon, will I go with thee, death, to the land beyond the grave." He does not know but that at that very hour there may be more reason for his living than there has ever been before.

Indeed, I cannot conceive how any man can ever be ready to die, in the sense of having nothing more to do. An active man is always enlarging his field and widening his work, and when called away there seem to be more things for him to do than ever before. He that is most fit to live is in this sense least ready to die ; and he that is most fit to die is the readiest man for all that is whole- somely active in good living. Let us thank God that the responsibility of the two surpassingly grave questions of the time of our birth and the time of our death is not devolved on us. We have been born, and that is accomplished. We shall die some time, and that will be accomplished with just as little influence and responsibility on our parts.

II. We have

NO CHOICE AS TO THE PLACE.

In the human heart and in human history there are two opposing forces. One is conservative, and makes us love to stay at home ; the other is pro- gressive, and leads us out in the hope that we shall be led up. How we desire to cling to our homes and yet cannot ! There is not a man in Christen- dom whose heart does not respond tenderly to the sentiment of the air and words of the song "Home, Sweet Home," a song that was written by a man who never had a home, and who died a wanderer. It has occurred to me that the pathos of that song lies in the fact that almost no one has a home. To most men it is an ideal. It is what they should love to have. A very few do have it ! just enough to give to the idea of home some form and pressure.

In this large congregation I venture the asser- tion that it is probable you could not find a hun- dred people who live in houses owned by them- selves, and not two hundred more who even live in hired houses. The rest of us are "camping" in hotels and boarding-houses. And I venture to say that there are not three people in this assembly who are living in the houses in which their fathers lived, and there is probably not one of us who will die in the house in which he was born.

As what is called "civilization" advances, more and more we wander. We cannot tell where we shall be next year. Civilization makes less room at home. It presses men out. It makes demands which can be satisfied only from without. As Christians come to have larger views of their duties to the race the more are they drawn from cozy re- treats and soft nests out to work among their fel- low-men in all parts of the world. And it is a trait of men and birds that they do not like to go back to the old cold nests. We cannot prepare a soft bed for our hour of dying, and say, "I will come back and lay me here, and close my life amid the scenes that have been dear to me." While we are gone they may destroy the place, as while the Em- peror of France was absent from Paris they burned the Tuileries, the magnificent palace in which he was born.

But how immaterial are such considerations to a Christian ! He is to be nowhere that duty does not call. He must be where duty does call. He is not to consider how near that brings him to the death hour. The Lord regulates that. Standing in his place at all times, he will be in his place when the stroke of death shall come. It may be on the mount with Moses, gazing from Pisgah over the Promised Land. It may be at the rich man's door with Lazarus, gazing at dogs and vermin. It will be just where it ought to be. Where "we die, we die unto the Lord."

III. We have

NO CHOICE AS TO THE MANNER.

According to a man's temperament will be his preferences in all things, even in the matter of dying, as to its place and method. Generally there seems to be a desire that death might not be in- stant. Thousands have repeated the petition of the Episcopal Prayer-Book, "From sudden death, good Lord deliver us." Is it a good prayer? To a Christian is sudden death a thing so undesirable that it should be classed with pestilence, famine, battle, and murder, as it is in the Litany? Is it more desirable to feel one's powers wasting through long years, the old ties loosening, office by office vacated, one association after another dis- solved, until our life becomes a weariness to our- selves and a burden to others?

For my own part I have long thought and often said that I should prefer to live fully in perfect play of all my powers, and busier than ever ; ready to go, but quite as ready to stay, and then, in a moment leap the narrow dividing stream from the banks of this island of mortal life to the banks of the conti- nent of the life everlasting. To a Christian in full power it must be glorious to have the lightning flash fling the doors of immortality open. And yet it is not becoming that you and I should be fondly dwelling on such pictures.

It may be that God intends us to long racking pain that we may be made perfect through suffer- ing, that we may be monumental of that divine grace which is sufficient for us. He may assem- ble about our beds crowds of great and small, be- cause there is some lesson which our death shall have special power to teach. Perhaps He will cut us off so that none of our most intimate friends shall know anything about our latter end, as when men fall in the mêlée of battle and are hurriedly buried in trenches crowded with unrecognized corpses, or drop overboard at sea, or are lost in African explorations; in which cases the lives of the departed stand out sharply cut and without the shadow of death. Of friends who have so gone we have recollections simply of their lives when those lives were full of life. The last time seen those friends were in the usual business of their position, jocund and gay, or strong and full. There is no memory of weakness connected with such a life.

But the choice, thank God, is not with us. "Whether we live, we live unto the Lord; or whether we die, we die unto the Lord." We have this assurance, that the very moment in which any Christian's life shall close will be that which shall give his whole earthly existence its greatest capability of benefiting the race and promoting among men the knowledge of the Lord our Saviour. No Christian can desire more. Every Christian is sure that he shall not have less. "No man dieth unto himself." Not by himself, not for himself, not to himself. The Christian dies "unto the Lord." His death consecrates his whole life with all its influence to the Lord whom he has served. He leaves that life and that influence to work for his Lord when he has gone, and then he goes to be "forever with the Lord," enjoying the double immortality of perpetual influence on earth and everlasting work and happiness in heaven.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

Upfold Farm.

ROLAND'S mother went on sadly enough upstairs to see if she could find out anything about her son; and Phebe and Felix had turned into the terraced garden, where the boat-house was built close under the bank of the river.

"I should be sorry for my mother to be like other people," said Felix, proudly. "She is like the evening star, my father says, and I always look out at night to see if it is shining. You know, Phebe, when we row her up the river, my father and me, we keep quite quiet, only nodding at one another which way to pull, and she sits silent with eyes that shine like stars. We would not speak for anything, not one little word, lest we should disturb her. My father says she is a great genius; not at all like other people, and worth thousands and thousands of common women. But I don't think you are a common woman, Phebe," he added, lifting up his eager face to hers, as if afraid of hurting her feelings, "and my father does not think so, I know."

"Your father has known me all my life, and has always been my best friend," said Phebe with a pleasant smile. "But I am a working woman, Felix, and your mother is a lady and a great genius. It is God who has ordered it so."

She would have laughed if she had been less simple-hearted than she was, at the anxious care with which the boy arranged the boat for his mother. No cushions were soft enough and no shawls warm enough for the precious guest. When at length all was ready, and he fetched her himself from the house, it was not until she was comfortably seated in the low seat, with a well-padded sloping back, against which she could recline at ease, and with a soft, warm shawl wrapped round her—not till then did the slight cloud of care pass away from his face, and the little pucker of anxiety which knitted his brows grow smooth. The little girl of five, Hilda, nestled down by her mother, and Felix took his post at the helm. In unbroken silence they pushed off into the middle of the stream, the boat rowed easily by Phebe's strong young arms. So silent were they all that they could hear the rustling of the young leaves on the trees, under whose shadows they passed, and the joyous singing of the larks in the meadows on each side of the sunny reaches of water, down which they floated. It was not until they landed the children on the osier island, and bade them run about to play, and not then until they were some distance away, that their merry young voices were heard.

"Phebe," said Felicita, in her low-toned, softly-modulated voice, always languid and deliberate, "talk to me. Tell me how you spend your life."

Phebe was sitting face to face with her, balancing the boat with the oars against the swift flowing of the river, with smiles coming and going on her face as rapidly as the shadows and the sunshine chasing each other over the fields this May morning.

"You know," she answered simply, "we live a mile away from the nearest house, and that is only a cottage where an old farm laborer lives with his old wife. It's very lonesome up there on the hills. Days and days go by, and I never hear a voice speaking, and I feel as if I could not bear the sound of my own voice when I call the cattle home, or the fowls to come for their corn. If it wasn't for the living things around me, that know me as well as they know one another, and love me more, I should feel sometimes as if I was dead. And I long so to hear somebody speak—to be near more of my fellow-creatures. Why, when I touch the hand of any one I love, yours, or Mr. Sefton's, or Madame s, it's almost a pain to me; it seems to bring me so close to you. I always feel as if I became a part of father when I touch him. Oh, you do not know what it is to be alone!"

"No," said Felicita, sighing, "never have I been alone, and I would give worlds to be as free as you are. You cannot imagine what it is," she went on speaking rapidly and with intense eagerness, "never to belong to yourself, or to be alone; for it is not being alone to have only four thin walls separating you from a husband, and children, and a large busy household. 'What are you thinking, my darling?' Roland is always asking me; and the children break in upon me. Body, soul, and spirit, I am held down a captive; I have been in bondage all my life. I have never even thought as I should think if I could be free."

"But I cannot understand that," cried Phebe. "I could never be too near those I love. I should like to live in a large house, with many people all smiling and talking around me. And everybody worships you."

She uttered the last words shyly, partly afraid of bringing a frown on the lovely face opposite to her, which was quickly losing its vivid expression, and sinking back into statuesque coldness.

"It is simply weariness to me and vexation of spirit," she answered. "If I could be quite alone, as you are, with only a father like yours, I think I could get free; but I have never been left alone from my babyhood; just as Felix and Hilda are never left alone. Oh, Phebe, you do not know how happy you are."

"No," she said cheerfully, "sometimes when I stand at our garden gate, and look round me for miles and miles away, and the sweet air blows past me, and the bees are humming, and the birds calling to one another, and everything is so peaceful, with father happy over his work not far off, I think I don't know how happy I am. I try to catch hold of the feeling and keep it, but it slips away somehow. Only I thank God I am happy."

"I was never happy enough to thank God," Felicita murmured, lying back in her seat and shutting her eyes. Presently the children returned, and, after another silent row, slower and more toilsome, as it was up the river, they drew near home again, and saw Madame's anxious face watching for them over the low garden wall. Her heart had been too heavy for her to join them in their pleasure-taking, and it was no lighter now.

Phebe rode slowy homewards in the dusk of the evening, her brain too busy with the varied events of the day for her to be in any haste to reach the end. For the last four miles her road lay in long by-lanes, shady with high hedge-rows and trees, which grew less frequent and more stunted as she rose gradually higher up the long spurs of the hills, whose rounded outlines showed dark against the clear orange tint of the western sky. She could hear the brown cattle chewing the cud, and the bleating of some solitary sheep on the open moor, calling to the flock from which it had strayed during the daytime, with the angry yelping of a dog in answer to its cry from some distant farmyard. The air was fresh and chilly with dew, and the low wind, which only lifted the branches of the trees a little in the lower land she had left, was growing keener, and would blow sharply enough across t unsheltered table-land she was reaching. But s she loitered, letting her rough pony snatch tufts fresh grass from the banks, and shamble leisur along as he strayed from one side of the road the other.

Phebe was not so much thinking as ponderi in a confused and unconnected manner over all t circumstances of the day, when suddenly the t figure of a man rose from under the black hedg row, and laid his arm across the pony's neck, w his face turned up to her. Her heart throbb quickly, but not altogether with terror.

"Mr. Sefton!" she cried.

"You know me in the dark, then?" he answ ed. "I have been watching for you all day, Phe You come from home?"

She knew he meant his home, not hers.

"Yes, it was Felix's birthday, and we have be down the river," she said.

"Is anything known yet?" he asked.

Though it was so solitary a spot that Phebe h passed no one for the last three miles, and he h been haunting the hills all day without seeing soul, yet he spoke in a whisper, as if fearful of b traying himself.

"Only that you are away," she replied, "a they think you are in London."

"Is not Mr. Clifford come?" he asked.

"No, sir; he comes to-morrow," she answere

"Thank God!" he exclaimed, in a louder ton When he spoke again, he did so without looki into her face, which indeed was scarcely visible the deepening dusk.

"Phebe," he said, "we have known each oth for many years."

"All my life, sir," she responded, eagerl "father and me, we are proud of knowing you."

Before speaking again he led her pony up t steep lane to a gate which opened on the moo land. It was not so dark here, from under t hedgerows and trees, and a little pool beside t gate caught the last lingering light in the wes and reflected it like a dim and dusty mirror. Th could see one another's faces; his was workin with strong excitement, and hers, earnest a friendly, looked frankly down upon him. H clasped her hand with the strong, desperate gr of a sinking man, and her fingers responded with warm clasp.

"Can I trust you, Phebe?" he cried. "I ha no other chance."

"I will help you even to dying for you and your she answered. The girlish fervor of her mann struck him mournfully. Why should he burde her with his crime? What right had he to d mand any sacrifice from her? Yet he felt sl spoke the truth. Phebe Marlowe would rejoice helping, even unto death, not only him, but an other fellow-creature who was sinking under so row or sin.

"Come on home," she said; "it is bitterly co here; and you can tell me what to do."

He placed himself at the pony's head again, an trudged on speechlessly along the rough roa which was now nothing more than the tracks ma by cart-wheels across the moor, with deep ruts, ov which he stumbled like a man who is worn out wi fatigue. In a quarter of an hour the low cotta was reached, surrounded by a little belt of field and a few storm-beaten fir-trees. There was dull glow of red to be seen through the lattice wi dow, telling Phebe of a smouldering fire, made u for her by her father, before going back to h workshop at the end of the field behind the hous She stirred up the wood-ashes and threw upo them some dry, light faggots of gorse, and in a fe seconds a dazzling light filled the little room fro end to end. It was a familiar place to Roland Se ton, and he took no notice of it.

But is was a curious interior. Every niche the walls was covered with carved oak; no wain scoted hall in the country could be more richly o more fancifully decorated. The chimney-piec over the open hearth-stone, a wide chimney-piece was deeply carved with curious devices. Th doors and window-frames, the cupboards and th shelves for the crockery, were all of dark oak, fash ioned into leaves and ferns, with birds on thei ests, and timid rabbits, and still more timid wood-nice peeping out of their coverts, cocks crowing ith uplifted crest, and chickens nestling under he hen-mother's wings, sheaves of corn, and tall, lub-headed bullrushes—all the objects familiar to country life. The dancing light played upon hem, and shone also upon Roland Sefton's sad nd weary face. Phebe drew her father's carved rm-chair close to the fire.

"Sit down," she said, "and let me get you omething to eat."

"Yes," he answered, sinking down wearily in he chair; "I am nearly dying of hunger. Good eavens! is it possible I can be hungry?"

He spoke with an indescribable expression of ingled astonishment and dread. Suddenly there roke upon him the possibility of suffering want in any forms in the future, and yet he felt ashamed f foreseeing them in this, the first day of his great alamity. Until this moment he had been too aborbed in dwelling upon the moral and social con-equences of his crime, to realize how utterly worn ut he was; but all his physical strength appeared o collapse in an instant.

And now for the first time Phebe beheld the hange in him, and stood gazing at him in mute urprise and sorrow. He had always been careful f his personal appearance, with a refinement and laintiness which had grown especially fastidious ince his marriage. But now his coat, wet through luring the night, and dried only by the keen air of he hills, was creased and soiled, and his boots were thickly covered with mud and clay. His ace and hands were unwashed, and his hair hung nbrushed over his forehead. Phebe's whole eart was stirred at this pitiful change, and she aid her hand on his shoulder with a timid but ffectionate touch.

"Mr. Roland," she said, "go up-stairs and put ourself to rights a little; and give me your clothes nd your boots to brush. You'll feel better when ou are more like yourself."

He smiled faintly as he looked up at her quiver-ng lips, and eyes full of unshed tears. But her omely advice was good, and he was glad to folow it. Her little room above was lined with richly arved oak panels like the kitchen below, and a ookcase contained her books, many of which he ad himself given to her. There was an easel tanding under the highest part of the shelving oof where a skylight was let into the thatch, and a half-finished painting rested on it. But he did ot give a glance toward it. There was very little nterest to him just now in Phebe's pursuits;
hough she owed most of them to him.

By the time he was ready to go down, supper was waiting for him on the warm and bright hearth, and he fell upon it almost ravenously. It was twenty-four hours since he had last eaten. Phebe sat almost out of sight in the shadow of a large settle, with her knitting in her hand, and her eyes only seeking his face when any movement seemed to indicate that she could serve him in some way.
But in these brief glances she noticed the color coming back to his face, and new vigor and resolution changing his whole aspect.

"And now," he said, when his hunger was satisfied, "I can talk to you, Phebe."

THE PEACE OFFERING.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 23. Lev. vii. 11-18. Golden Text, Ps. 50 : 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"Offer unto God thanksgiving; and pay thy vows unto the Most High." Such is our Golden Text, and it is a most precious keynote to our subject. Last week, in considering the Burnt Offering, we saw the completeness of sacrifice in our Lord's blessed life on earth, and we saw our vocation to present our bodies "a living sacrifice" to Him. But this is wholesale sacrifice, and many might believe that they had honestly and really offered themselves to Him, if there were not details in which they find it difficult to sacrifice their wills; these are typified by the Peace Offering. Man has his part in that which he offers to God in detail, for the priests and the offerer had each their portion to eat from the peace offerings, whereas in the burnt offering, the one full, complete, unreserved surrender of ourselves to God, as being one with Christ, no man can have a part. As Christ, the God-Man, was God's undivided property, so we, who in Him offer and present ourselves to God, are the property of none but Him; and if we are subject to rulers, parents, pastors, or teachers, our subjection is for Him and in Him.

The Peace offering was the offering of a life, just as the burnt offering and the sin offering; but it was neither wholly burnt upon the altar like the burnt offering, nor yet burnt without the camp like the sin offering. The inwards and the fat, with some part of the flesh, were to be offered upon the altar, after the blood had been sprinkled round about it. A certain portion was the perquisite of the priests, which might be eaten by Aaron and his family.

The peace offering might be for a thanksgiving, or for a vow or voluntary offering. If for thanksgiving, the Israelite must offer with it "unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil, and cakes mingled with oil of fine flour, fried." "Bread corn is bruised" (Is. 28 : 28), and thanksgiving offered with the oil (the unction of the Holy Ghost) comes most readily from a broken and contrite heart which has been ground small in God's mill, and which mingles readily with the precious oil. Besides the cakes, he must offer leavened bread. But out of the whole oblation only one cake might be offered unto the Lord, "and it shall be the priest's that sprinkleth the blood of the peace offerings."

"Whoso offereth praise glorifieth Me" (Ps. 50 : 23). God is graciously willing to accept very imperfect thanksgiving when it is brought with the blood of the Lord Jesus, and mingled with the oil of the Holy Ghost. While, in the burnt offering, the inwards and the legs must be washed with water; this is not commanded in reference to the peace offerings and sin offering. The burnt offering is the type of God's ideal, the "King's daughter" who "all glorious within" (Ps. 45 : 13). Much which the holy eye of God may detect as impure may yet exist, while the heart is full of real and unfettered thanksgiving to God; but there must be no "blemish," no known sin recognizable, by us or by others, no condemnation of heart, or the offering cannot be accepted. And the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace offerings for thanksgiving shall be eaten the same day that it is offered; he shall not leave any of it until the morning. Thanksgiving must always be fresh, always flowing, a thank offering cannot be kept over; when it ceases to be spontaneous, it is valueless.

Thanksgiving and praise to God is a sacrifice which gives joy to His heart, spreads joy among His people, and rejoices and strengthens him who offers it. What a sunbeam it is in a prayer-meeting to meet with any one whose heart is full of praise! What a lightening of the burden of those who are oppressed, when one person in the house has the true spirit of thanksgiving, and sees the bright side, because God's side, of everything. The natural result of being filled with the Spirit is "giving thanks always for all things to God the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. 5 : 18-20); the antidote to all anxiety is "in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God" (Phil. 4 : 6). But "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (1 Cor. 5 : 8), must be offered with it; and this is not the offering of a natural unrenewed heart, it is only acceptable when oil has been poured upon it, which indicates that only the Spirit's unction can make the most sincere praise acceptable unto God.

If the peace offering were a vow, it might be eaten the day it was offered, and also on the morrow, but not on the third day, the sign of resurrection; for a vow, although it may endure and may not need to be continually new like the thanksgiving, yet cannot die and rise again. A promise made to the Lord is binding, yet is it not true that many of us have more lightly broken our promises made in secret to the Lord than those which we have made openly to man? Yet each of these is made on the ground of the poured-out life of Jesus, each is anointed with the Holy Ghost, for all which is not so offered is unacceptable to God. Let us be careful how we make promises to God. "When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it: for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee. That which is gone out of thy lips thou shalt keep and perform."

Are there not some children of God who, convicted by the Holy Ghost of want of prayer, have promised the Lord to rise earlier, and having done so for some few mornings consecutively, have afterward allowed little excuses to hinder them from continuing? Are there not those who have been urged by the Spirit to give such and such a portion of their means to such and such a work of God? In a moment of zeal the promise has been made to the Lord to do this. But after thoughts have revealed how much inconvenience this would cause, an excuse has been found for doubting whether the call came really from God; an easy belief that the impulse arose from hasty, untempered zeal, and the vow was not paid. Every time we allow a doubt about the leading of the Spirit in this manner, we are sowing uncertainty for the future. Prompt obedience ensures clear guidance. It is an awful thing to take advantage of our ignorance of the Spirit's voice to allow ourselves in those things about which He deals with us.

The Lord prohibited anyone from eating the flesh of the peace offering, having uncleanness upon him, or having touched any unclean thing. Any contact with the dead or with the flesh, any contact with sin, sufficed to make a man unclean, and as such neither thanksgiving nor vow could be accepted at his hand. "I am crucified with Christ," said Paul the Apostle, "nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." Now any contact with the crucified and buried Paul, any touching him, considering him, handling him, would make the apostle unclean; it was for him to consider the new Occupant of his redeemed body, to bring all things in relation to Christ, who lived in him, and not to himself.

O, how often a child of God who is under some trial, considers his own inconvenience or suffering, pities or sympathizes with himself, and thinks it hard if others do not sympathize with him, totally forgetting that all this is touching the dead, coming in contact with that condemned being whom God has crucified with Christ. If he turns to God's side of the trial, that his God has permitted him to suffer for His sake, that, in Christ, he has full power to endure, that God is both making him more like Jesus and glorifying Himself in the grace which is being manifested in Him; then his heart warms with glad and joyous thanksgiving, and vows are made and paid unto God. Then he brings one peace offering after another to the altar, God's pleasure is manifested to him, the royal priesthood of God's children is nourished and strengthened thereby, and his own inner life receives renewal.

One thing more we must notice in the peace offering. "All the fat is the Lord's. It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood" (Lev. 3 : 16, 17). "Ye shall eat no manner of fat of ox, or of sheep, or of goats . . . For whosoever eateth the fat of the beast, of which men offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, even the soul that eateth it shall be cut off from his people" (Lev. 7 : 23-25). God's portion would never become man's, it was consecrated, holy unto the Lord, and it was desecration to appropriate it: this was in part the sin of Eli's sons (1 Sam. 2 : 15, 16). The prohibition to eat blood is renewed in the New Testament (Acts 15 : 29), but the prohibition against eating fat belongs to the Old Covenant. The Lord in loving mercy teach us the blessed practical lessons which we may learn from these Old Testament shadows, that our life may be an offering unto God as a whole, and in all its parts; that all we are and do may point upward, and that our whole being may speak the glory of God. Then, in our eating and drinking, our labor, speaking, and writing, in our very silence, we shall be "partakers with the altar" of our God.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Chief Foreign Event of the Week has been the orations of the British Premier, delivered at Leeds. Mr. Gladstone mainly concerned himself with the two prominent internal questions of the day, with only slight reference to foreign topics. Dealing with the Irish question he made a vigorous attack on Mr. Parnell, whom he described as a preacher "of the doctrine of public plunder." He said that the British nation was coming to a state of things when it would be a question of law on the one hand, and of lawlessness on the other. After this scathing exposure of the aims and modes of procedure of the Land League he launched a threat against that organization which they will do well to heed, for a man so patient and forbearing as Mr. Gladstone has proved himself, is always a more dangerous enemy when the limits of his patience are passed, than is a more impulsive man. Mr. Gladstone said that if the law, "purged from defect and the stain of injustice, is still refused, and the first condition of political society is unfulfilled, then, I say, gentlemen, the resources of civilization are not exhausted." That is the most ominous expression to which the Premier has given utterance. He appears for the first time to have realized that the Land Bill he has succeeded in passing, has worked for himself and his party unmitigated disaster. It has alienated a multitude of his friends, and it has not gained him the friendship of those of his enemies whom he has benefited.

The Second Topic to which Mr. Gladstone devoted his attention was that of Fair Trade. On this subject the British Premier is at home. Even his most inveterate opponents acknowledge that in the capacity to deal with financial questions Mr. Gladstone is unequalled. He admitted, that there is a serious depression of trade, but expressed his conviction that it proceeded from decreased purchasing power. He calculated that between 1878 and 1880 Great Britain had lost on her export trade an amount equivalent to $120,000,000, but as much as $500,000,000 from bad harvests. Referring to the Fair Trade League, he said some persons complained about the American tariffs. America sent to England $15,000,000 worth of manufactures, while England sent to America more than ten times that amount. Fair traders wanted America to cease to be the customers of England. More unfair leaguers he never knew. He declared that he himself "would be no party to a retrograde movement." Mr. Gladstone made an eloquent defence of free trade. As an illustration of its benefits, he pointed out that the export of manufactured goods from England to Asia, Africa, and Australia amounted to sixteen times the sum that America sold to those continents. The trade of France and America together did not equal the English. Although both enjoyed protection, England beat them in all neutral markets. Mr. Gladstone said: "So long as America adheres to protection our commercial supremacy will be secure. We need not disturb ourselves the slightest on that score."

The Tenant Farmers of England, Encouraged by the concessions granted to the Irish farmers, have commenced an agitation for their own relief. They have prepared an act of Parliament which they hope to induce the Government to introduce next session. The bill aims at the establishment of complete security for the capital of the farmers, and entire immunity from capricious eviction; the right of the tenant to sell his improvements in open market, with provisions that the landlord must accept as a tenant for seven years and at the same rent as that of the outgoing tenant the person who purchases them; and the creation of a land court in every district for the settlement of questions concerning rents and all other disputes.

The Boers of the Transvaal in South Africa have formulated their objections to the treaty under which the British granted them independence. Their protest covers several points in the treaty. The first relates to the indemnity, which the Boers consider excessive. Secondly, they object to the power the British have reserved to control the external relations of the state, including the conclusion of treaties and the conduct of diplomatic intercourse with foreign Powers, and the article defining the duties of the British resident. They also object to the article providing for complete freedom of religion and protection for all denominations; the article declaring that no slavery or apprenticeship partaking of slavery shall be tolerated by the Boers; to the article providing for the rights of all persons, other than natives, who conform to the laws of the Transvaal, and to the article declaring that all inhabitants of the Transvaal shall have free access to courts of justice for the protection and defence of their rights. But their chief objection is to the right the British claim to regulate the relations of the Boers with the native tribes. The Queen's government insist on this point, because they have reason to believe the last two wars with South African savages were the result of Boer attacks on the natives.

Affairs in Egypt Appear to be Rapidly Tending to a serious crisis. The Sultan of Turkey, who claims the suzerainty of the Viceroy of Egypt, has interfered, and England and France show signs of sinking their own rivalries in united opposition to Turkey. The Sultan has dispatched commissioners of his own to Egypt with definite instructions. These are to discover the causes leading to the recent military outbreak at Cairo, to participate in the ultimate diplomatic negotiations between the Khedive and the representatives of the Powers, and to report to the Sultan the reasons why the Khedive has hitherto neglected making a voyage to Constantinople to tender his allegiance. The English and French representatives met the commissioners on their arrival and formally requested them to leave Egypt. The delegates replied: "As to the matters which were referred to the Sultan by the Khedive, we shall institute a rigid investigation, and insist upon a full maintenance of the Sultan's authority." Meanwhile Araby Bey, the leader of the insurgents, has taken up a position near the Suez Canal, and declares that if foreign troops are landed he will blow up the canal.

Another Royal Interview is Reported from Europe. The Kings of Spain and Portugal met on October 8th at Valencia de Alcantara, a Spanish city near the Portuguese frontier. The ostensible object of the meeting was the opening of a new line of railway connecting Madrid and Lisbon, the capitals of the two countries. A very cordial feeling is said to exist between the two monarchs.

Arrests of Russian Nihilists Continue. Twenty pupils of the Constantine Military School were arrested last week. Many Nihilist proclamations were found on them. The Russian authorities, in view of this fact, are adopting the severest measures. Markets and fairs are prohibited wherever there is the least suspicion that the Nihilists intend to use such gatherings for their own purposes. The Russian Government has not abandoned the hope of inducing other governments to co-operate in the endeavor to suppress the allies of nihilism. The Russian official journal says: "The Russian Government has no intention of exercising a pressure in any quarter. It regards the action of such criminals against society as threatening all states alike, and therefore thinks that defensive measures against the scourge should be collective. From a moral point of view, however, the maintenance of social order is a matter that concerns all civilized states."

A Curious and Suggestive Calculation is made by an ingenious dean in Switzerland, who thinks he has discovered a close relationship between divorce courts and drinking saloons, and claims to be able to ascertain, on an average, the number of divorces per thousand marriages by doubling the number of saloons per thousand men. In Appenzell, for instance, there are 37 public houses and 78 divorces; in Zurich, 25 and 57; and in Berne, 16 and 36. Another coincidence has been noted by a Russian statistician, who has been testing the influence of the liquor saloons on the prosperity of the people. He finds that there is a connection between the number of vodky shops in a village and the number of live stock possessed by the villagers. In the government of Orel the village of Jarnovo has three public houses, whereas the village of Petroffskoe has none. In the former, although the farms are double the size of the latter, 38 per cent of the peasants have neither horse nor cow, while in the latter the number destitute of live stock is only 7 per cent. A temperance worker named Katkoff, with a band of active colleagues, is now engaged in promoting temperance principles in Russia.

The Pope is Again Reported to be Meditating a departure from Rome. The Paris Figaro of October 5th announced that the previous day, when receiving a deputation of Roman sympathizers, the Pope informed them that the time might not be far distant when to protect the dignity and independence of the Pontificate and to save himself from the party of revolution he should have to quit the "Eternal City."

A Revival in Japan is Described by a Writer in a contemporary as follows: "The largest theatres are too small to hold the thousands that gather to hear preaching that is carried on entirely by native Christians The newspapers have entered the lists, and while some are for choking down, by fair means or foul, this 'cursed way,' others are boldly siding with the new religion as the only hope for the country. Buddhism and Shintoism, too, are at last aroused to their danger, and have not only begun their mass meetings, but have also put forth several polemic tracts, which, of course, serve to awaken public interest." Japan, he thinks, is on the eve of a great religious movement that will attract the attention of the world.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Commenced their transatlantic labors on Sunday last, at Newcastle-on-Tyne. It is expected that their stay in that busy town will be brief, after which they will proceed to Scotland, where they expect to hold services in most of the principal cities.

A Relic of the Mayflower Pilgrims.—Mr. Benjamin Scott, the Chamberlain of London, writing to the London Times, suggests as a means of giving an enduring proof of England's sympathy toward America, that the manuscript of the library of the See of London, in the handwriting of Governor Bradford, one of the Pilgrim Fathers who landed in Massachusetts in 1620, be given to America in the name of the Queen and the nation. This manuscript contains the compact or constitution out of which arose eventually the federation now termed the United States. The document was captured by a British soldier during the War of Independence. "It is," says the writer, "considered by many Americans as the Book of Genesis of their nation, and regarded with much the same veneration as that with which Englishmen contemplate the original of Magna Charta."

Methodism in England.—A Prominent Daily journal, reviewing the results of the recent Œcumenical Conference of Methodists in London, expresses the opinion that the reports proved that, though there has been a considerable extension of Methodism in towns, there has been a decided falling off in the rural districts of England. Thus in 1869 Bedford and Northampton district had 11,463 members, and has only 10,801 to-day; Cornwall has in the same period reduced its number from 20,725 to 18,523, while a detailed examination of the numbers in other parts of the country shows a marked diminution.

WHAT were the missing incidents of our Lord's life is a question on which many Christians have meditated. We should like to have known them all, even if it had caused as great a multiplication of books as the Apostle John supposed it would have done. However, God in His wisdom allowed four independent selections to be made; and it is an interesting study to compare the Gospels, and to notice how each writer has narrated those events which apparently made the most marked impression on his mind. In doing so we are impressed with the fact that while some incidents are described by one Evangelist and omitted by the others, there is one that is recorded by them all. It is not an event which in a life so sublime, an ordinary biographer would have deemed important; but the inspired writers who had sat at the feet of Jesus thought otherwise, and they have told the story in simple touching words. It is the story of a woman's devotion. Thus our Lord's prophecy has been fulfilled, and wherever in the whole world any single gospel has been translated into the language of the people, there they have read of this woman who broke her box of spikenard over her Saviour's feet, regarding no treasure as too precious to sacrifice for Him. As Jesus said of her, so may He say of us, "She hath done what she could."

Who can ever write the history of the labors and achievements which Christian women have since then wrought in the cause of Christ? How many Godly men have entered into rest, how many successful men are now laboring in Christ's vineyard who owe their salvation to God's blessing on the prayers and counsels of a Christian mother, or sister, or wife? And, besides these indirect results, the history of the Church teems with instances of womanly self-sacrifice; with the stories of women who have laid down pleasure, wealth, station, even life itself, at their Master's feet, satisfied if they could follow in His footsteps and go about doing good. The narrative of one such life has recently been published, and we this week present, with a portrait of the heroine, a brief summary from its pages, of its events. It is the story of a young lady of aristocratic birth and connections who gave up a life of ease and pleasure that she might devote herself to the work of succoring and consoling the sick poor in the hospitals.

Agnes Elizabeth Jones was born at Cambridge, England, on November 10th, 1832, her father was Lieutenant-Colonel of a regiment in the British army. She was such a tiny, fragile creature that no one expected her to live. She continued very delicate until nearly two years of age, when she was taken on a visit to Ireland, the native country of both her parents, and at her maternal grand-father's spent several months, growing healthy and strong in the pure country air.

On August 12th, 1837, Lieutenant-Colonel Jones and his family sailed from Cork for the Mauritius, in the Indian Ocean, not far from Madagascar. Here six years were spent by the bright-eyed little child, and it was her delight in after years to recall the birthday excursions to the Pampelmousse Gardens at Port Louis, the capital of the Island, where many beautiful palm-trees and rare tropical plants grow in native luxuriance; also the pleasant months spent by the seaside at Matrebourg, where wonderful shells with rosy tints and pearly lining were now and then the prize of the eager searcher.

MEMORABLE BIBLE READINGS.

Meanwhile, circumstances were moulding her character for the steadfastness of self-consecration which in after-life distinguished her. Her sister says, "No recollection of those early days comes back to me so often as her pleasure in accompanying our parents to the Bible-readings held at the house of the French pastor, Monsieur Le Brun." And Agnes herself some years afterwards wrote, "I think my first real concern for my soul was awakened by the closing sentence of young M. Le Brun's sermon, one week-day evening, 'And now, brethren, if you cannot answer me, how will you, at the last day, answer the Great Searcher of hearts?' This sentence haunted me night and day for some time."

Here, too, she became interested in the Madagascar Christians, then suffering cruel persecutions for conscience' sake. So deeply impressed was she with the state of these converted heathens that, child as she was, she resolved to devote herself to missionary work. The wish, as she then formed it, was never granted, but truly her whole life was a noble missionary work, conceived and executed in the spirit of the Divine Master whom she so loyally served.

A TERRIBLE STORM AT SEA.

In the year 1843, her father's health obliged him to return to England, and not long after he left the army. During the voyage a severe storm was encountered which made a deep impression on her mind. For a whole day the lives of all on board were in imminent danger, the furniture and boxes slipping from side to side as the vessel rolled heavily. At last the storm moderated, and holding their father's hand, Agnes and her sister were allowed to venture on deck. At that moment an upturned boat was drifted past on a huge green wave, which curled over as if it would engulf the vessel. For the first time they seemed to realize what danger they had been in, and returned, silent and awed, to their mother's side.

A few days later the pilot, who went on board off Land's End, took some English papers, one of which contained a graphic account of a shipwreck that had taken place in that very storm. The invalid father read this to his children, and then asked them very solemnly where they would have been had not God in His mercy spared their vessel when others were lost. The question struck home to their young hearts, and that evening both, with tears and earnest prayers, expressed a desire to choose Christ as their portion. The impressions then made appeared transient, but the feelings excited never wholly died away. It was the first call, which in loving mercy was repeated again and again, until their hearts turned to their only true rest in the love of the Redeemer.

The voyage over, they went to their grandfather's country home at Ardmore, in the North of Ireland.

HER STRUGGLE WITH A KANGAROO.

Instances were not wanting in Agnes' early childhood to show her strength of resolve, and her determination in carrying out a purpose once formed. One example may be given. At Mauritius, when she was about eight years old, a friend sent her a present of a young kangaroo from Australia. An inclosure was made for it in the garden; and Agnes delighted to feed and visit it daily. One day as she opened the gate it escaped and bounded off into a neighbor's plantation. Agnes followed, fearing it might do mischief, climbed over the low wall which separated the two gardens, and, after a long chase, succeeded in capturing the fugitive.

Some minutes afterwards her mother went into the garden, and was horror-stricken to see her child returning from the pursuit, the kangaroo, which she held bravely by the ears, struggling wildly for freedom, and tearing at her with its hind feet, while her dress was streaming with blood from the wounds inflicted by its nails. Many children so assailed would have loosed the animal, but she would not do so until she got it safely into its house, but it was a considerable time before she lost the marks of her battle and victory.

In January, 1848, Agnes and her sister were sent to Avonbank, Stratford-on-Avon. After spending two years and a quarter there, they were summoned home by the death of their father, whose health had suddenly broken down in the autumn, and who was called away from earth on March 19th, 1850. From entries which Agnes made in her journal at various times, it would appear that her love for her father was deep and passionate and his removal occasioned her the most poignant grief, but when its fiercest paroxysms had passed away, her character developed with most marked rapidity, especially in its simple, unselfish devotion to others, principally to her bereaved mother and sister.

CONVERSION.

A few months after the death of Lieutenant-Colonel Jones, the bereaved family removed to Dublin. They attended the ministry of the Rev. John Gregg, afterwards Bishop of Cork; and Agnes immediately joined his confirmation classes. His clear gospel teaching and earnest personal appeals to the hearts of the young awoke in her new desires after God. One who watched over her spiritual life with the deepest solicitude says, "Her confirmation seemed to me the time of Agnes's real conversion. From that time I truly believe the earnest desire of her heart was to live to God."

Early in 1853, in company with her mother and sister, Agnes started for the Continent, and spent six months in France, Germany, and Switzerland. On April 25th she paid a visit to the Foreign Deaconess' Institution in Paris, of which she now heard for the first time, but which was to influence so decidedly her whole after-life.

Residing at Bonn, on the Rhine, in the month of June, she became acquainted with the Rev. W. Graham, a missionary to the Jews in that ancient town, and on the 21st accompanied him to Kaiserswerth, and spent a long day in visiting the various schools, hospitals, and other departments of that most valuable institution, which will ever be remembered as the training-school of Miss Florence Nightingale. It was founded about thirty-four years ago, by the celebrated Pastor Fliedner. At the age of twenty he had been appointed pastor of the little weaving village of Kaiserswerth. A subsequent failure of the proprietor of the place involved the whole population in ruin.

Penniless themselves, they could no longer support their young pastor, with whom they would willingly have shared their last morsel. He was reluctant to leave his post, but his only means of support having failed, he had no choice. Followed by many prayers and blessings, he left his people, in order to seek, in Christian liberality, help for the little flock. Germany was traversed, and also England. There was to be sown the seed of that work of faith, the Deaconess Institution, which now bears fruit in many lands.

The visit of Agnes Jones to the institution produced a deep and abiding effect on her.

In June, 1856, Agnes re-entered the home of her childhood at Fahan, near Londonderry. On ner arrival she knelt in a small apartment which her father had used as a dressing-room, and asked for the Divine guidance and blessing. And now, at Fahan, the long-cherished dream of a life devoted to the sick and sorrowful began to be realized. In the school, or by the sick-bed of the dying, or in the lowly cottage where some sudden accident had brought sorrow and despair, and where her gentle self-possession and prompt wise action seemed often to bring healing and hope—everywhere she was to be found about her Father's business.

Every morning, unless detained by home duties, she set off on her rounds after breakfast, returning to early dinner, only to start again immediately afterwards, and prolonging her absence often until the darkness had closed in. No weather deterred her; no distance was too great; no road too lonely. During the five years she remained at Fahan, there was scarcely any cessation in those busy labors.

Her skill and her gentle but firm touch in dressing wounds, and especially in cases of burns and scalds, soon became famous in the neighborhood. The turf fires on the cottage hearths, round which little Irish peasant children often gather without much watching or care, were the fruitful source of many severe burns; and, on such occasions, Agnes was always sent for. Sometimes it was a very fearful sight that met her, but she never shrank from anything because it was painful, if she ld but relieve suffering; and day after day she uld go to dress the burns until her care was no ger needed.

t was in 1853 Agnes Jones first saw Kaisers-th; but though she longed to be numbered ong the workers and learners there, it was not il 1860 that her earnest but unexpressed wish s granted. In September of that year, Agnes, ugh looking pale and thin, could not be induced take rest or in any way relax her exertions. an opportunity of again visiting Kaiserswerth urred and she was willing to avail herself of t, feeling that she might learn much there that uld be useful in her own parish.

The next few months were months of difficult profitable service. She lived as in the very sence of God, and sought continually to know l do His will. At one time she thought the ce of her Divine Master called her to help the aconesses in Syria. While she was patiently and yerfully waiting for light and guidance in the tter, Pastor Fliedner told her that having heard her wish to go to Syria as a nurse, he thought could put before her a more urgent call nearer ne. He proposed that she should be trained o the habits of obedience and duties of a nurse the hospital, and then, if by God's will and aid alified, commence work under Miss Nightingale. n the month of April, 1861, Miss Jones received etter from Mrs. Ranyard, (whose portrait and appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of uary 8th, 1880), to whom she had been intro-ced in 1859. In the letter Mrs. Ranyard said, friend is building a house for me in St. Giles's, ormitory for fifty girls, besides our rescue home. ur mother would sooner see you settle in Lon-n to help me in the great work of Bible women, n that you should go to Syria." After prayer direction she determined on visiting Mrs. Ran-d, and went to London for the purpose.

HOSPITAL WORK IN LONDON.

Upon her arrival in London, she immediately mmenced work in connection with Mrs. Ran-d's Bible Mission, and, for a time, the thought hospital occupation was laid aside. This was iefly from her mother's strong objection to her dertaking any course of training which would volve residence in a hospital. About this time o she had an interview with Florence Nightin-le, who proposed to her that in order to qualify rself for hospital work at Liverpool—which had en suggested to her—she should enter St. omas's Hospital for a year, as one of the Night-gale probationers, putting before her kindly and inly the trials of such a vocation. In writing to friend at this juncture, she says, "Trustfully d prayerfully have I left it in the hands of my eavenly Father, and if He incline not my other's heart to allow of my going to St. omas's, I shall thank Him that He has provided e with another field of labor."

For the next few months Miss Jones's time was iefly occupied in preparing a dormitory, in Drury ane, London, which was opened by Lord Shaftes-ry on June 5th, 1861, and in superintending the rnishing and arranging of the Refuge in Dudley reet, Seven Dials, a poor district in London, as ell as in holding mothers' meetings, and in mak-g herself useful to Mrs. Ranyard.

THE GREAT LONDON BRIDGE FIRE,

hich broke out on June 22nd, 1861, and which used the death of Superintendent Braidwood, as a scene never to be forgotten by those who tnessed it, and among the number of awe-struck ectators was Miss Jones. We will let her tell r story in her own words. "Eleven acres of eat storehouses on fire, many vessels and barges, e smoke of every shade of color reaching up to aven; tongues of fire of varied hue from palest llow to deepest orange, sometimes completely rapping the walls of the buildings, hiding even eir form, sometimes roaring up through skeleton alls—the roofs, one after another, falling in, nding up sparks, while beams and rafters came hirling through the air, often falling on some omed vessel to add it to the general conflagra-on.

"Sometimes the smoke rolled back, and through the windows we saw the flames defining every angle of the ill-fated houses; then the oil and other combustible substances were burning on the river, and one felt the mighty power of fire licking up even the water which should have extinguished it. Oh, it taught such a lesson of man's impotency! The play of the engines were but as threads of water on those mighty flames, which seemed to revel in all the desolation they were creating." Our frontispiece picture on the right hand side of the portrait represents the scene.

HER VISIT TO ITALY.

Miss Jones was summoned in January, 1867, to Rome, for the purpose of nursing her sister, who had fallen seriously ill. For her it was a providential circumstance, compelling her to avail herself of a much-needed change of air and scene. She determined that she would remain at Rome until the invalid should recover, and wrote to Mrs. Ranyard that she must give up all hope of resuming her London work. She seized the opportunity of visiting Florence, where she met Rosa and Francesca Madiai, two Kaiserswerth deaconesses, who had just established themselves in the town, and whose imprisonment in Spain has since brought their names before the public. A little later she visited some of the deaconess institutions in Switzerland. Towards the end of June, she spent some days with that remarkable woman Dorothea Trudel, of whose faith and prayer she ever spoke with the deepest admiration.

ENGLISH HOSPITALS.

A month later, Agnes Jones joined her family in Paris, and almost her first words to her mother were a request that she might devote herself entirely to nursing work; all that she had witnessed at these institutions having more deeply impressed upon her the conviction she had long felt, that her special talent was for laboring in hospitals. Her mother could no longer resist her wish, and when they arrived in London, Agnes entered at once into correspondence with Miss Nightingale, and it was arranged that in October she should enter St. Thomas's Hospital as a Nightingale probationer.

For the next twelve months, therefore, Miss Jones was immured in a London hospital, and absorbed in its multifarious duties. As the year drew to a close she was invited to superintend the Great Northern Hospital in London, and later an urgent request was received to take charge of

LIVERPOOL POORHOUSE HOSPITAL.

She began her work at Liverpool in April, 1865, but unfortunately no materials exist, either in letters or memoranda, which furnish more than a very disjointed history of the work which Agnes Jones attempted and accomplished in the Liverpool Poorhouse during the years she managed it; the work, however, exists and speaks for itself.

Early in the summer she began Sunday evening readings in one of the wards. This class she continued to the end. Her sister once visited her, and says of this meeting: "I shall never forget it. We came into the ward, where about twenty patients were in bed, a few minutes before the appointed hour. Agnes passed at once to her seat at the top of the room, and sat quietly until the clock struck. In the meantime the room had filled: on each bed men were seated closely packed together, others standing by the wall, or grouped around, and there they stood in almost painful silence. She began with a short prayer; then read part of a chapter, on which she commented in very simple but striking words, closing with a practical application and earnest appeal to the hearts of all present. After reading a hymn, she again prayed, and so ended the class."

As an instance of the strength of her personal influence over the patients, we may relate that of a man suffering from aneurism; and who greatly dreaded death from it. He could not speak loud, and seldom tried to speak to Miss Jones, but as she read and talked to him, she used to see the quiet tears streaming down his cheeks, and both his look and the pressure of his hand at parting told of his loving gratitude. He never would allow her to be sent for, even when he was longing to see her, but he told the nurse, "the lady could never know what she has done for me." Once he said, "Oh, nurse, I wish no one but you ever came near me, no doctor, no one!" "Not even the lady?" she asked. "Oh, the lady, oh yes! I think I am in heaven when she comes."

Constantly caring for others, she forgot herself; the strength, which though above the average, was yet not superhuman, and long-continued strain on mind and body told at last. Her nerves, spirit, and strength were all over-taxed and increased duties added to her danger. A new female ward, with its unruly inmates, and new revelations of sin and unnatural conduct, was placed under her care; it proved too much for one already weighed down with care and overwork. Then came a period of unusual sickness, the hospitals crowded beyond their allotted numbers, and fever attacked several in the house.

DEATH FROM TYPHUS FEVER.

A young nurse who had been suffering from bronchitis showed symptoms of typhus when too ill to be moved into the Fever Hospital, and Agnes, with her usual thought for others and forgetfulness of herself, gave up her own bedroom to the sufferer, and slept on the floor of her sitting-room. A few days afterwards she became unwell, and at last her disease was declared to be typhus. She lingered on for about twelve days and then it became clear that her life-work was done. On the evening of the twelfth day one of the nurses whispered to her, "You'll soon be with Jesus." "Yes," she cheerfully replied, "yes, I'll be better then." After some time she opened her eyes; the dulness had all gone out of them; they looked bright and beautiful. She looked round as if she knew the faces of those about her; her breathing gradually became slower, then longer intervals between; at last it ceased, and she was with Jesus whom she so faithfully served.

Thus, at the early age of thirty-five she heard her Divine Master say, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." And in the words of Miss Florence Nightingale, we would say: "Let us bring living flowers to her grave, 'lilies with full hands' not fleeting primroses, not dying flowers. Let us bring the work of our hands and our heads and our hearts to finish her work which God has so blessed. Let her not merely rest in peace, but let hers be the life which stirs up to fight the good fight against vice and sin and misery and wretchedness as she did—the call to arms which she was ever obeying.

"'The Son of God goes forth to war,
Who follows in His train?'

Oh, daughters of God, are there so few to answer?"

The Retort of a Colporteur.—A Number of German farmers one market day were sitting at a long table, in an inn, when a colporteur entered. One of the farmers was offered a Bible, and the colporteur began to talk to him. He looked very uneasy, and bought a copy simply to get rid of his tormentor. "But," says the colporteur, "matters grew warm, some jeered and scoffed. One man said, 'We men are no better than beasts; monkeys were our common ancestors, and when we die we shall fare no better and no worse than they.' I said, 'Monkeys were not my ancestors.' 'Who then?' 'I was made in God's image and after His likeness. Had monkeys been my ancestors, possibly I might have thought as you do about God and the future of my soul.' At this retort some laughed, others looked serious, and several took my part and bought Bibles."

The Padlock on the Lips.—Dr. Clemance Re-lates: "When Messrs. Moody and Sankey were in England, I was trying to do a little work in the inquiry room at one of their meetings, and my attention was specially drawn to a lady whose face was full of trouble. She came to me and told me she was a teacher in a boarding-school, and wanted to speak for Christ there, but felt as if she had a padlock on her lips, and could not utter a word. I said, 'Tell no one else what you have told me, but go and tell the Lord Jesus all about it.' We parted, but I saw her a few weeks after, looking bright, serene, and happy. She told me that she had taken her burden to Christ and left it with Him, and now she could speak to anybody and everybody as opportunity offered."

THE SHEPHERD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, October 16, 1881.*

WHAT with post and rail fence, and our pride in Southdown and Astrakhan and Flemish varieties of sheep, there is not much use for the old time shepherd. He could catch all the poetry there was abroad, standing twelve hours, perhaps, watching the sheep by day, and then waking at night, looking up at the stars. If the stars, or the flowers, or the torrents had anything to say, the shepherd was very apt to hear it. The Ettrick Shepherd, who afterward took his position in the brilliant circle of Christopher North and Lockhardt, says he got his inspiration while watching the sheep of Mr. Laidlaw.

There was a quaint poetry in the heart of

THE OLD TIME SHEPHERD.

One of them having lost his only son, was overheard making this prayer: "O! Lord, it hath seemed fit to Thee to take the staff out of my right hand at the time when to us sand-blind mortals I most needed it, and how I am to climb up the hill of sorrow and auld age without it, Thou mayst ken, but I dinna."

David, the shepherd boy, was watching his father's sheep, watching them on the very hills where a Lamb was born afterward, of which you have heard much—"the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." He was beautiful, he was musical, he was poetic. I think he often forgot the sheep while in his reveries. He struck a harpstring which has vibrated through all the ages. David, the shepherd boy, getting ready to become David the poet, David the king, David the warrior. Like other boys, I suppose he sometimes cut the sapling with his knife, and in after days he came to say, "the cedars of the Lord are full of sap." He remembered how the juice exuded from the tree branch. Like other boys, I suppose he sometimes looked for birds' nests, and once on a time probably drove the stork off the nest to see how many eggs were under her, and in after life he comes to say, "as for the stork, the fir trees are her house."

One night, lying on his back looking up at the stars, it seemed to him as if the sky was a piece of divine embroidery, the threads of light and beads of stars worked into it, and in after time he said, "when I consider Thy Heavens, the work of Thy fingers; the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained." When he became an old man, talking about the goodness of God, the bleating of his father's sheep seemed to come across the years, and he remembered the time when he watched those sheep on the hills of Bethlehem, and he cried out: "The Lord is my Shepherd."

I propose this morning to speak to you of the shepherd's plaid, the shepherd's crook, the shepherd's dogs, the shepherd's pasture grounds, and the shepherd's flock.

I. First, I speak to you of

THE SHEPHERD'S PLAID.

It would be an absurd thing for a man to go forth for rough work in very exquisite apparel. The potter does not toil at the wheel in velvet, nor does the waiting maid come to her duty in satin, nor does the shepherd clothe himself in soft and exquisite apparel when he goes forth among the storms, and among the rocks, and among the wildernesses to look after the lost sheep.

Christ, our Heavenly Shepherd, put aside the girdle of light and the robes of power, and the sandals of beauty, and wrapped Himself in the torn, and tattered, and be-soiled garments of our humanity, coming forth on the mountains to look after the lost sheep, wrapped in the shepherd's plaid. I know that nearly all the old painters represent a halo around the babe Christ, and whether you see the babe Christ's picture in the galleries at Edinburgh, or at Venice, or in the Louvre and Luxembourg, you always find a halo of light around the head of that babe; but I do not suppose there was any more halo around that child's head than there was around the head of any child born that night, that Christmas eve in the land of Judea.

We often hear of the robe that Christ wore in after time, of the seamless robe, and people speak of it as something very costly and very beautiful because it was a seamless robe. Why, my friends, there was no beauty about it at all. The scissors, and the needle had done nothing to make it graceful. It was just a rough sack with three holes in it, one for the neck and two for the arms. You tell me that the soldiers gambled for that seamless robe at Christ's crucifixion. That is no proof that it was a valuable garment. I have seen two beggars quarrel over the refuse of an ash barrel! It was not a costly garment, it was not a remarkable garment. It was an old garment, a homely garment, perhaps a repulsive garment that Christ wore. Even that he sometimes did not have on.

What is that towel that I see gathered at the side of Christ, and gathered at the waist? What is that? Is it a coat of arms? Is it a sign of royalty? O no. It is a coarse towel, for the disciples have been wandering on the road and their feet are bedusted, and they are to sit down at the evening meal and their feet are not fit to be put on the sofa or lounge on which the people in those times reclined at meals, so Christ washes their feet and then gathers them up in the towel and dries them.

O! it was humiliating work on which Christ came; it was rough work, it was rugged work on which Christ came. The storms were to beat Him, the mobs were to pursue Him, the crowds were to jostle Him, the dust was to besprinkle Him. O! Heavenly Shepherd, well didst Thou leave behind Thee Thy imperial robe. Come forth, O! Heavenly Shepherd, wrapped in the plaid of our humanity, our poor humanity, our sinful humanity, our lost humanity.

"Cold mountains and the midnight air Witnessed the fervor of His prayer."

II. I come in the next place to speak of

THE SHEPHERD'S CROOK.

That is a rod with a curve at the end which has to be dropped on the neck of a sheep when it goes astray, and with that crook it is pulled back. When not employed in that way, the shepherd would often use it as a crutch to lean upon. I have a shepherd's crook in my house full of suggestiveness to me. When I parted in 1879 from the Earl of Kintore in London, he said to me: "Mr. Talmage, when you get to America, send me a stick"—by which the Englishman or the Scotchman means a cane—"and then I will send you a stick." I started the cane from New York for Aberdeen, Scotland, but before it got there the good Scotch earl had entered upon higher honors than Great Britain could ever give him—even the honors that are before the throne of God. After a while came, in very careful package, a shepherd's crook beautifully engraved and prepared, but still a shepherd's crook—the first one I ever saw, meaning more to me as it stands in my house than any other shepherd's crook possibly could mean. It was sent to me, I suppose, as suggestive of my work as an under shepherd, the office that every minister of Jesus Christ holds.

Well, now, the shepherd's crook was an absolute necessity in olden times—bringing back the lost sheep, finding one wandering out in this direction, pulling him back—finding a sheep wandering out in another direction, pulling him back. All we, like sheep, have gone astray, and if the Lord had not dropped His crook upon us and pull back long ago, we would have fallen ove precipices. There is a man who is makin much money. He has got proud, he has got his heart is puffed up, he says: "I am inde ent of everything. My soul, eat, drink, an merry, you are provided for." Disaster co commercial misfortune. His estates fly. He down on his knees and says: "O! Lord Thou against me, that all my estate is s away." O! no, my brother, the Lord has any grudge against you; He has only droppe you the shepherd's crook, not in wrath, b mercy, pulling you back out of your worldline

There is a man who has no patience with lids. He calls them a wheezing, coughing c and it makes him nervous to have them abou house, or in a rail train, or at a summer wate place. After a while, his health will go, and man will wake up and he will say: "O! L art Thou against me?" O! no, the Lord is against you, He has just put the shepherd's c on you to pull you back out of your worldli and to pull you back into gracious sympathies.

There is a parent who has a beautiful fa but he is not training his children for God Heaven. He never gets down on his knees thanks the Lord for his domestic blessings. S ness comes after a while, and death swoops u the household and a child is gone, and the says: "O! Lord, Thou are against me, T hast taken my loved one away. Why hast Th grudge against me, O! Lord?" O! no; Lord has nothing against you. He has dropped the shepherd's crook upon you to pull back out of your ingratitude and back out of y sin into the divine sympathies. O! the shephe crook, the shepherd's crook.

O! THE MERCIES OF OUR TROUBLES.

When I was crossing the ocean, I got a cin in my eye that was very painful, and I wen many friends to have them remove it. They irritated it and made it worse. I was told that engineer down among the furnaces had partiu skill in removing a cinder from the eye, so I w down to him. He was a swarthy man. seemed too stout for so delicate a work. He his sooty hand upon me, and then he took out knife and he turned the lid of the eye over knife, and I was affrighted, I can assure you, without any hurt, and in an instant, the trou was all gone. He was as gentle as he was st And so giant trouble comes along. We h something that is going to destroy our spirit eyesight. Giant trouble comes along, and bla handed, he lays hold of us, and he removes t which would have ruined our spiritual eyesi forever.

You find apples and plums in the shade of tree, and the richest Christian fruits are to found in the deep shadow of trouble. During last war the question was often asked, "Will colored soldiers fight well if they are put in army?" The question was asked at the No and at the South, and the colored troops w tried on both sides, and they were heroic. An tell you, my friends, it is not the white regimen joy, it is not the white regiment of gladness, t wins the greatest victory for your soul, but black regiment of trial, the black regiment temptation and want and woe that is going to for you the greatest victory. I take all the gl nesses of your life and put them in one regim of ten companies under Colonel Joy, and the gather all the sorrows of your life and I put th in one regiment of ten companies under Colo Breakheart. Which gets the greater triump The regiment under Colonel Breakheart.

There is no animal that struggles more violen than a sheep when it is cornered and you are t ing to catch it. I see one of those lost she down in the glen. The people come around a try to catch it. They only frighten it. Here com a ploughman across the field. He tries to catch He frightens it. The miller comes along, a drops his grist and tries to catch the sheep, b only frightens it. After a while a man brea through the thicket. The sheep comes right to him. He puts his arm around it and it is pa now they go after those which are astray and them back into the fold. Every shepherd ogs—every shepherd, from the nomads of times down to the Scotch herdsman watch- is flocks on the Grampian Hills. And our nly Shepherd has His dogs. They are the per- ons and the trials of this life which hound us to the fold, for you know there are those who their whole life in barking at Christians. Christian go astray, or let him show any im- tion of character, how many of these dogs are that will hound him, and bark at him, ite at him; and they howl, and they howl, he Lord just allows them to drive the lost back to the fold. Your persecutions and trials are not to make you mad, they are to you. They are the shepherd's dogs gone o drive you in.

nost everybody has the hounds after him times. Sometimes it is an ecclesiastical sometimes it is a political dog, sometimes it ocial dog; but do not blame him. They are ogs of the Good Shepherd, not to devour you, o tear you to pieces, but to drive you in nearer eart of the Great Shepherd and there they can ou no harm. The sharp knife of persecution ly to trim the vines so that there shall be r grapes. The more you pound marjoram rosemary, the better they smell. The more there are after you, the quicker you will get ie gate. Do you not know that the bloody les of persecution in the days gone by have ded millions of souls into glory? They are shepherd's dogs; shepherds' dogs that perse- l God's people. They have their work, they their mission. Do not get mad, do not be .ted, do not strike back. Only come up nearer ieart of the Great Shepherd.

ery shepherd has a mark for his sheep. I in Canada last summer, in a region where were innumerable sheep, and I said to the ers: "It seems to me your flocks would get tricably mixed." "Oh," said one of the far- , "don't you see the mark on each one?" one you would find a red mark, on another a mark, on another a yellow mark, on another ack mark, on another a crooked mark, on her a straight mark, so that every shepherd ing forth, every farmer coming forth may pick his sheep. So the Lord knoweth them that are How? By a mark He has put upon them, a mark—the mark of the cross. "Blessed are that are persecuted for righteousness' sake, heirs is the Kingdom of Heaven."

. I come next to speak of

shepherd drives his sheep to the mountains in summer, down into the valleys in winter. He has wells prepared, and they are covered up with large stones so the elements will not destroy the wells, and then he whistles up the dogs, and calls to the sheep, and he leads them this way and that way, and yonder, and up over in this direction, and in that direction, finding for them the very best pasture. So the Lord leads His flock; in the summer, to the mountains; in the winter, to the valleys. By which I mean that in warm days of prosperity He leads us up on sun-gilt Sabbath tops and on hills of transfiguration, and we are so high up we can almost see the gates of the great city. Then there come wintry blasts and storms of trouble, and He drives us down into the valley, and we say, "is any sorrow like unto my sorrow?"

But blessed be God, His sheep can find pasture anywhere, between two sharp rocks the succulent promises, green pastures by still waters, long, sweet grass between bitter graves. O! yes. I suppose you have noticed the structure of the sheep's mouth. It is so made that it can pick up the blade of grass, or the head of clover from the very narrowest place; and God's children can get instruction anywhere if they seek for it. Where others can find none, they can find plenty. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him."

"The hill of Zion yields
A thousand sacred sweets
Before we reach the Heavenly fields,
Or walk the golden streets."

V. I remark once more, in regard to

THE SHEPHERD'S FOLD.

At sheep-shearing time there was great rejoicing in olden times and in lands where they had shepherds. Wine was poured and there were dancing and great glee. There was a wall inclosing the sheep, so that the shepherds could go out and count the sheep easily, and see if any had been carried off by the jackals, or any had been wounded. That was called the sheepfold. And the Lord has His sheepfold. I speak now of the place He has provided for His loved ones in the better country.

How the old sheep will be glad when they see the lost lambs. The walls of that sheepfold so high that no sorrow can climb in—so high that no joy can break out. Millions of children in Heaven! O! how they will catch up the song. Not many long-metre songs there, but quick music, jubilant music. If they danced and clapped their hands on earth, what will they do when to the gladness of childhood on earth is added the gladness of childhood in Heaven? O! my brothers and sisters, this thought ought to take all the morbidity out of our religion, and all the morbidity out of our thoughts about dying. Religion too often seems to be planing a coffin or driving a hearse, or to smell of the varnish of the funeral casket. We want more of it in our religion. Come out into the sunlight of Gospel provision and Gospel instruction, and understand that he who goes out of this world pardoned by the grace of God goes into the glorious sheepfold.

"O!" says some trembling Christian, "there is a river between that and this, and that's what I'm afraid of; it's the river between here and the Heavenly sheepfold." Ah! my friend, that Jordan is only for the sheep washing, and you will go up on the other bank snowy white, and there shall be one flock and one shepherd. Alas! that any should perish on the mountains when all the bars are down of that sheepfold and all the gates open. Twelve gates!

When Moscow was burning, there was a party dancing in the palace right over a gunpowder magazine. They did not know the flame was approaching, so the leader of the festivity shouted: "One dance more!" and the voice was taken up through the palace and the cry was "One dance more!" and the music played, and the feet bounded and the laughter rang out; but suddenly through the fire and the smoke and the thunder of the explosion eternity broke. Alas! that some will dance on in their sins and their frivolities, and their worldliness, until in an hour that they know not eternity breaks in and they are destroyed, and that without remedy. Suddenly! suddenly!

COME INTO THE SHEEPFOLD.

The gate is wide open. I invite one, I invite all. Do not let any one sitting or standing in all the house think that he is not invited. I swing open the door this morning so wide all the world may come in fourteen hundred million abreast. O! the generosity of this Gospel that takes lost sheep back, and the worst man and lifts him to a throne in Heaven. Do you not hear the bars falling, the bars of the sheepfold so that you can all come in? Now is the time for your salvation.

Sometimes a shepherd will play so sweetly upon the reed or upon the pipe that the sheep will gather round and listen. Although they are dumb and unintelligent animals, still they seem charmed by the shepherd's music. Would God that the voice of my Heavenly Shepherd this day might sweetly call you as by divine and celestial music to come away from your sin and to come into the glorious sheepfold of the Gospel. Would that all this flock might this morning hear the piping of the Good Shepherd.

A French Girl's Request.—Miss Leigh, Well known and loved as the worker in Paris among English girls there, says that one day a girl was with her, and suddenly asked, "Have you seen Jesus?" She was a Romanist, and such a question was a surprise to Miss Leigh. "What do you mean?" she asked the girl. "Oh, because the sisters and I were talking of you, and they said that you would never have undertaken the work you have done for us unless you had had a vision of our Lord and heard Him command you to do it." Miss Leigh answered, "You know we do not believe in visions. We have something better. We believe in always seeing Jesus by faith." Suddenly the girl's head sank, and she buried her face in Miss Leigh's lap. "Oh," she sobbed, "that must be glorious!" Later on, Miss Leigh found a paper on her table. Inside it were the words, "Pray for me that I may see Jesus by faith."

"Seventy-Five Pretty Barmaids" is the Attraction openly advertized in the less scrupulous of the daily papers to induce gentlemen to visit the Cremorne, a nocturnal resort in Thirty-second Street, New York. The place is so contrived as to be a moral pitfall. In 1879 scores of young men, more fools than knaves, met their ruin and sealed their damnation in that place. In 1880 scores of others did the same thing. Scores more are doing so this year. The story of the "barmaids," if told, would be more pitiful still. Nearly every one represents a blighted home, and every one lives a hopeless life. The lessee, a man without pity and without remorse, regardless of God and eternity, is piling up wealth and using every known device to keep up the supply of "barmaids," who fade away and die off at an awful rate, and to entice the best manhood of the rising generation into his gay halls. The place is also much frequented by middle-aged and elderly gentlemen, whose whole lives are unsuspected frauds. They go to their business in the morning guilty; they return to their families in the evening guilty; they move in genteel society guilty. Such is a place which the civilized and nominally Christian city of New York allows to flourish in its midst with complacency.

We proceed with pleasure to say that a counter-influence is very soon to be established in the Cremorne building by Jerry McAuley, of the well known Water Street Mission. He has purchased for $3000 a portion of the premises 100x25 feet in extent, abstracting so much from the large room where the "barmaids" entertain their customers till the small hours of the morning. A cloth curtain is all which separates at present Mr. McAuley's part from the space where the jingling of glasses and the noise of laughter tell of Satan's work in full operation. That curtain is to be replaced by a solid wall, and the premises are to be altered so as to form a suitable room for Gospel meetings on the ground-floor, with dwelling-rooms upstairs. These alteratons will cost $5000, making a total cost of $8000, of which $6000 have been secured. Subscriptions to the amount of the remaining $2000 will be gratefully received and promptly acknowledged by Mr. McAuley, if sent to him at the following address: 316 Water Street, New York, N. Y.

SYLPH SOMERS.

Sylph's Eyes Opened—The Evening Sermon—A Change Observed—Dr. Gilbart's Questions—He Disparages John Welsey.

SYLPH on reaching home retired to her room; and there, for the first time, entered into conscious fellowship with the Father of her spirit. What a changed condition of thought and feeling was hers! The universe was no longer an overpowering and unliving magnificence; but the many-mansioned house of a personal and ever-present God; a home where she could not lose herself, nor drift away into sunless gulfs or stark nothingness.

She had discovered a great secret—one that served to explain the meaning and mystery of her being. One, too, that she felt every human creature should know; and yet, strange to tell, she dreaded to reveal it. It seemed a thing too intimate with her own personality, and too sacred to put into words. She especially shrank from making known her new-born experience to Doctor Gilbart; she instinctively felt that he could not understand her; and yet the holy joy and wonder within, must have some utterance, and the abundance of her heart an outflow. There was thus a mysterious inconsistency, and a strange antagonism in her impulses—known to every one in the same crisis of their being. She turned her thoughts to Phœbe, thinking that perhaps she would know something of this divine life into which she herself had entered. Her nurse she knew had listened to the same words she had heard, and seemed as absorbed as she was in Wesley's message.

To her great joy she found that Phœbe also had felt the breath of a great religious spring-time, and that, some time before her young mistress. On various occasions the old nurse had attended the preachings of the great Methodist revival; and had proposed to herself to be present that very evening at the service to be conducted by John Wesley. "I will go with you," said Sylph. "Will you take me, nurse?" "Certainly," was the reply. "But will the doctor be satisfied, miss?" "I think so," answered Sylph; "especially nurse, when I tell him you will take good care of me." And accordingly she went.

"Take heed that there be not in you an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God" (the text in Hebrews, which—as has been stated—John Wesley took that evening), was singularly appropriate for one who felt she had just found that living God. So thought Sylph, as she heard the words enforced by Wesley, as with a tongue of fire. She resolved that she would, at all events, ever thrust back all dark, invading doubts—those tempters of the mind—that would murder her hopes, so full of immortality; and rob her of her newly-secured inheritance.

From this period Dr. Gilbart observed that his adopted daughter passed a more than usually retired life, keeping to her own room very much; and even, that when she joined the family circle, she was uncommunicative and silent. He also observed, to his surprise, a pleasing change in her general appearance notwithstanding this. Her melancholy had evidently departed; their wonted light and fire had come back to her eyes, while fresh color glowed upon her cheeks. An indescribable happiness, that he could not account for, seemed to beam from her countenance—a something strange and subtle, that gave him the impression, however, of a satisfying peace and joy within.

Had he seen Sylph in her little room at times he would have wondered at her still more. Delivered from "a darkness of eclipse and anguish dread," the thought of God "in the light of its own demonstration" was ever present to her. The firmament—as now she looked up to it of a clear night—was to her His glorious dwelling-place. No longer an appalling dread—as alien to her soul, and vacant of life and love—but a calm delight and unutterable satisfaction.

Doctor Gilbart, unable to explain to himself this seeming inconsistency between Sylph's conduct and appearance—her living much alone, and her quietness and silence on the one hand, and her restoration to health and happiness on the other—resolved to obtain by questioning her a solution of the mystery.

Sylph, herself, as we know, shrank from introducing the subject now uppermost in her thoughts, but she felt glad that the doctor had started it. For some time she had felt under a great and solemn responsibility toward him in the matter of religion; but she had been too cowardly to discharge it. Now, looking up for help, she would courageously unburden her heart of the great tidings she had for him, and beginning with an account of John Wesley's visit to Chester, she gave the doctor the particulars of the open-air meeting she was present at, and revealed its blessed and far-reaching consequences to herself.

The doctor did not get angry at Sylph's news; he was too fond of her; and, as a philosopher, too tolerant for that; but he gave her a look of pity, mingled with contempt that disappointed her. She had tried hard to persuade herself that he would have gladly welcomed from her lips the message which had brought to herself light and joy.

"Ah, Sylph," said he, "so you have been caught, dear, in the Methodist trap, have you? I thought more of your common-sense and intelligence, Sylph, than ever to suppose you could become the victim of John Wesley's superstitious nonsense and fanatical cant." Such definitions were common at that time.

"Oh, do not speak in that way, father," cried Sylph; "I assure you, you are mistaken in your estimate of John Wesley. His words, believe me, are not dreams and superstitions, but eternal realities."

"Stay a little, Sylph," said the doctor, "do not interrupt me, dear. I was going to prove the justness of my language. Would you believe it, Sylph, this man you so admire actually has faith in ghosts and witches, and bogeys and demons! and moreover that they can at their own will, manufacture thunder and tempests; besides this, he thinks that his God, at his prayer, however the crops may fare, will turn rain into sunshine; and all to give him fair weather for ventilating to gaping crowds his crude ideas and absurd doctrines."

Observing, from Sylph's face, her surprise and incredulity, he went on to say, "Yes, Sylph, dear, I do not wonder at your amazement, but it is a fact. I have one or two still more astonishing statements to make. My friend, Doctor Priestley, wrote me the other day that this same Wesley went, a short time ago, to visit Bolton's great engineering works, near Birmingham, when were shown to him various steam-engines in action. And what think you was the remark of this sage John Wesley as he looked upon those giant machines at work, as though instinct with a mighty life? Why this, the idiot, 'Wonderfully ingenious, but as wonderfully useless.'* Sylph, did you ever hear of such gross ignorance and stupid simplicity?

"And more than this, the same self-confident Wesley has not refrained from meddling with matters connected with the medical art; and has proved himself, if anything, more absurd and ridiculous there. Upon the authority of a certain Dr. Wilson, a poor simpleton of a man in his profession, he has declared himself an unbeliever in Dr. Harvey's great discovery of the circulation of the blood; and is silly enough to say that in his conviction the heart is not the moving power at all, but that it only receives the blood, which then moves on through its channels, on the mere principle of suction, assisted by the ethereal fire.† Yes, I protest, 'suction and the ethereal fire!' Sylph, whatever in the heavens above or the earth beneath that may mean;" and Doctor Gilbart laughed outright at the nonsense of John Wesley's physiology.

Sylph felt abashed at the doctor's banter and sarcastic criticism. She was grieved, likewise, that the spiritually wise and holy man whom she had learned to venerate, had laid himself open to damaging assault by meddling with matters which in her judgment seemed outside his proper sph[ere] and by dabbling in scientific questions.

Sylph saw that Wesley's philosophic crudi[ties] would severely damage, in Dr. Gilbart's mind, [the] authority upon matters about which, from pati[ent] thought and long study, and deep and trustwor[thy] experience, Wesley had an unchallengeable righ[t to] speak.

"If Mr. Wesley," she replied, "has said th[ese] things, father, I am extremely sorry for it. It o[nly] shows the weakness of human nature, even at [its] best. But he has said in my hearing far strang[er] things than any of these you mention, and yet [I] know them to be true. Father, my soul once f[elt] a hunger and thirst which nothing could assua[ge], and my very spirit fainted and failed within m[e]. All the world and all the knowledge which y[ou] gave me could not fill it. Life was a vanity an[d a] cheat, and the universe itself a desolation.

"But Mr. Wesley directed me to the sar[e] source of satisfaction and happiness. I have go[ne] to the great Author of my being as His weak a[nd] erring child; have cast myself upon His love, [and] have brought my spirit into a living touch, as [it] were, with His infinite spirit. I know it, for I ha[ve] tasted an unearthly bliss in the act that is all u[n]speakable and divine. And ever since, I fe[el] within me, what only Christ's own words will e[x]press: 'A well of water springing up unto eve[r]lasting life.'"

Sylph's whole form seemed to dilate and gro[w] as she spoke; her cheeks glowed, and her eye[s] were as though enkinded with a celestial fire, an[d] she seemed to the wondering and somewhat awe-struck Doctor Gilbart as a sybil of ancient Rom[e], or a Hebrew prophetess under the spell of inspira[-]tion; and yet his admiration was mingled with [a] pitiful scorn at what he deemed her foolish mys[-]ticism and fanatic zeal.

"Ah! Sylph," he cried, "you are a proof ho[w] hard it will be to drive priests and their delusion[s] from the world. Wesley, I fear, has deeply drugged your soul with his sacerdotal nostrums, or with practised skill has been playing upon you[r] feminine sensibilities—has, in short, cunningly caught you in his Methodistic trap to make a foo[l] and a tool of you."

"Hush, father!" exclaimed Sylph indignantly, "and do not wrong an aged man to whom I have never spoken; and what he has played upon (to use your own word) is not merely sensibility, but is, as I surely know, the deepest and most sacred instinct of my being; and what has answered that cannot be a delusion. No! by the very response which it has given me—full and satisfying—it proves itself real and divine."

Doctor Gilbart was both fascinated and touched by the fervor and logic of this fair champion of the truth. Sylph could not but observe this, and it emboldened her to make a direct assault upon his scepticism.

"Oh, my father," she cried, with an intense and loving earnestness, "come and make an actual test, as I have done, of the truth of Christ's religion. Before I did so, and while I was under the spell of your lofty though cold philosophy, my life was not only a mystery to me but a pain, but at length I have found the light I longed for, and the peace which I sought. For myself I have put this matter to the test and have proved it true, and I tell you this because I greatly love you;" and her look showed how true was the statement. "Oh, father, do come and taste the blessedness I know."

Doctor Gilbart was deeply touched by the words and manner of his daughter, and he felt something of their force and pathos; yet neither her reasoning nor her loving enthusiasm served to conquer his long established doubts, and yet he had felt, as Sylph had, the hollowness and nothingness of the world.

A nobleman in modern times* thus mourned over the wreck of his early belief: "I am not ashamed to confess, that with this virtual negation of God, the universe to me has lost its soul of loveliness; and when at times I think, as think at times I must, of the appalling contrast between the lowed glory of the creed which once was mine, l the lonely mystery of existence, as now I find at such times I shall ever feel it impossible to id the sharpest pang of which my nature is ceptible."

Something of this had likewise been, in hours of ely thought, the feeling and soliloquy of Dr. bart, since that dark and sorrowful day when at grave of his little daughter, resenting his be- vement, he abandoned faith in a living God. late he had suppressed such meditations, they re too distressing to indulge. But now Sylph's nestness caused him to painfully sigh after the h in a God which once was his.

PROPHECY AND POLITICS.

By Rev. William Maude.

tter-Day Democracy—Its Rise in Europe—The 'Nineteenth Century" and Government—A Commingling, but not Coalescence—"The Gospel of Dynamite"—Russia and Germany—France and Bulgaria—A Worldly Scribe's Conviction of the State of Things.

It was the saying of good old John Newton that read the newspaper "to see what his Father was ing in the world." And if this could with truth said in his day by one who had received but lit- light on God's revelations of the future, how uch more may it be said in ours, especially by ose who have been led to give heed to the sure ord of prophecy, when the events transpiring ound us from day to day, both in their main cur- nt and in their side issues, are so plainly ac- mplishing the explicit predictions of inspired ophecy. Indeed, if prophecy can be defined as story in solution, it may, without exaggeration, : said that scarcely a month now passes without ir witnessing—if only we preserve a watchful at- ude of mind—some prophetic intimation crystal- ing into accomplished fact, while the awful goal contemporary history is seen with ever-increas- g clearness to coincide with that of Divine pre- ction as it respects the character of the closing ays of the present dispensation.

LATTER-DAY DEMOCRACY.

As a striking example of what is meant, we may oint to one of the most marked features in the resent aspect of European politics, which, inas- uch as it refers to the general state of things, and ot to any one particular occurrence, is the less pen to special objections. "Coincidence," the ver-ready expedient of those who wish to evade he evidence of supernatural working, whether in iracle, prophecy, or sign, is hardly available to ccount for an undeniable identity between the rediction and the actual character of a clearly de- ned period of time—the prediction anticipating he fulfilment by more than fourteen centuries.

In Daniel's description of the great metallic im- ge seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his prophetic ream, whereby the course of the four great Gen- ile world-powers was so accurately and unmistaka- ly indicated, we are told that the fourth or Ro- nan empire was represented by the legs and feet f the image, the legs being "of iron, and his feet art of iron and part of clay" (Daniel 2 : 33). In egard to the symbolic meaning of this strange ad- nixture of iron with clay, we are informed, more- over, in the prophet's subsequently given interpre- ation of the dream, that whereas the king "saw he feet and toes, part of potters' clay and part of ron, the kingdom (or government) shall be divid- ed ; but there shall be in it of the strength of the ron, forasmuch as he saw the iron mixed with miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong and partly broken. And whereas he saw iron mixed with miry clay, they shall min- gle themselves with the seed of men ; but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay" (Daniel 2 : 41–44).

ITS RISE IN EUROPE.

By the general consent of commentators we have here a symbolic prophecy of the rise of democracy during the last days of the Roman empire ; the democratic element being aptly represented by the "miry clay" which weakens and disintegrates the "iron" of sovereign power and authority. Now the rise of this democratic power, which asserts an ever-increasing influence over the politics of mod- ern Europe, is unquestionably to be traced to the first French Revolution at the close of the last cen- tury. It was then that the "iron" of the govern- ment of Rome, which in some form had endured so many centuries, was effectually and forever bro- ken, and became from henceforth mixed with the "clay" of popular suffrage. Hence it is no longer true to say that "sovereigns and statesmen alone rule the world ;" the voice of the people—too often the voice of the devil rather than the voice of God —is now a third factor in the solution of every po- litical question ; and is apt, when provoked, to make itself heard in such tones of thunder as drown at once the commands of sovereigns and cajolery of statesmen.

"The French Revolution," observes an able writer in the Nineteenth Century (Frederic W. H. Myers), "was but the manifestation, in a specially concentrated form, of a phase through which the awakening coincidences of the masses must needs conduct every civilized nation in turn. Its charac- teristic assertions of the independence the essen- tial equality of men, are apt to lead, not to any improved social structure, but to sheer individual- ism, to the jealous spirit of democracy, which re- sents the existence of lives fuller and richer than its own. This spread of an enlightened selfishness is in the moral world a fact of the same nature as the exhaustion of coal-fields in the physical world. In each case the existing generation is living upon, and not replacing, the economies of the past.

"The self-abnegation which in a rude society was plainly needed to prevent the tribe's extinction now seems to serve only to maintain a pampered and useless court or aristocracy. The proletariat gradually discover that they are the stronger party, and their instinctive reverence for their hereditary leaders dies away. If circumstances are favorable they devote themselves to pleasure and money- making ; if not, they rise, perhaps, as in 1789, and 'decapitate the nation,' leaving themselves in- capable of self-government, and certain to be made the prey of military force, the only power left standing among them.

"Meanwhile it is not only the proletariat whose coherence in the body politic is loosened by the dictates of an enlightened selfishness. The feudal leader, quite as much as his retainer, subsisted by virtue of his possession of certain social instincts— courage in defending his clan, and a rude identifi- cation of his interests and pleasures with theirs. . . . But as civilization becomes more as- sured, there is no longer anything which the noble- man feels plainly called on to do for the common people, who are protected by law without his aid. And moreover, as numbers get vaster, and differ- ence of wealth more extreme, the rich man finds his pleasure more and more aloof from the poor. His instincts, both of leadership and of companion- ship, tend to decay ; he lives in some luxurious city, and converts his territorial primacy into a matter of rents.

"Individualism, in short, as opposed to active patriotism, becomes increasingly the temptation of rich and poor alike. The reserve forces of in- herited and instinctive virtue (to return to the simile of the coal-fields) are becoming exhausted, and while we live in a society which has been ren- dered possible by the half-conscious self-devotion of the past, we have not as yet discovered a source of energy which shall maintain our modern states at the moral temperature requisite for organic life."

A COMMINGLING, BUT NOT COALESCENCE.

These remarks are well worthy of our attentive consideration. They present the present political condition of Europe with force and truthfulness, and that political condition corresponds with the forecast of inspired prophecy as accurately as the wax impression does to the seal that makes it. The iron and the clay are mingled together, "but they do not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay." The balance of power oscillates between the rulers and the people—to- day revolution, to-morrow despotism triumphs— and so the political pendulum will continue to oscillate with ever-increasing momentum, till the last and greatest manifestation of democracy in the scarlet-colored beast with the uncrowned horns (Revelation 17 : 3) is succeeded by the final tyranny of the last personal Antichrist ; the beast having his ten horns each crowned with a diadem (Reve- lation 13 : 1).

Just now the reaction of the two great forces is specially apparent all over Europe. In almost every European country at the present time we see the same kind of struggle going on between the force which calls itself authority and the force which is described as revolution. Not since the sudden season of terrible political reaction that set in after the wild revolutionary outbursts of 1848 has Europe seen a similar state of things prevail- ing. Nor, indeed, can it be said to be confined to the Continent of Europe, and to that alone. Among ourselves (in Britain) we see the same contest of forces. We have in Ireland coercion in full operation ; the suspension of constitutional rights, the arrest of men simply on suspicion of their complicity in unlawful designs. And on the other hand we have the open and daring proclama- tion of what is called

"THE GOSPEL OF DYNAMITE."

Thus the (American) Sunday Democrat, the Fenian organ, says : "The war for Irish inde- pendence is begun. The work is easy and the vic- tory sure. It needs no great armies or big navies. It requires only a little dynamite, heroically ap- plied where it will do most good in England."

Again, the St. Louis Post has printed an ac- count of a recent interview with O'Hara, the Irish revolutionist, in which that unscrupulous man ex- pressed himself "with perfect frankness" on the subject of the infernal machines seized at Liver- pool. The plan, he stated, was to place them on board English ironclads at Plymouth. Since the 20th of June eighty-six had been shipped, and he thought fifty had escaped capture. The intention was to attack the English navy as the best means of dismembering the British Empire. A thousand men are united with him in waging this war against the crown. "We are rebels," he said, "making stand against authority. Science now enables one man to kill a thousand ; this is not assassination— it is private war." *

"It certainly is a remarkable fact," says the London Spectator, "that this vast increase in the power of destructive agencies should have occurred at a time when there is also such a vast decrease in the power of constructive agencies, when a cold and defiant unbelief is taking the place of all ennob- bling creeds in the minds of multitudes of men all over the earth. It looks almost as if there were a real correspondence between the course of human passions and the course of human knowledge ; since, just at a time when tens of thousands in very many different parts of the earth are in the exact sense 'Nihilists,' so far as human order is concerned, agencies like dynamite and other explo- sives calculated to annihilate and disorganize hu- man efforts, both by their physical effects and by the fear which is entertained of them, should have been supplied by science in abundance—and, of course, supplied in combination with the resources for either a cowardly or a bold use of them."

THE CONDITION OF RUSSIA.

Taking a wider view, it is hardly needful to refer to the political phenomena visible in Russia. Hardly even in the Middle Ages was so grim and mournful a spectacle beheld in Europe as that which is presented by the terrible death-struggle of des- potism in that unhappy country against its re- morseless and irrepressible enemies. It is true Russia lies beyond the area of the prophetic "world," but we have as a companion to the pic- ture of Russian political intrigues and revolution, the trials recently brought to a close in Turkey. There we have still the immemorial palace in- trigues and assassinations of the Mohammeds or the Suleimans, to set off against the horrors of the Court of the Romanoffs, as if in order that the ancient rivalry between Russia and Turkey should be maintained even on this arena of tragedy.

(To be concluded.)

* This definition of murder as "private war" ap- pears to us as not wholly an untrue one, but of course only on the assumption that war is wholesale murder.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Election of Senator David Davis as President pro tem. of the Senate was accomplished on Thursday, October 13th, in accordance with the decision of a Republican caucus held the day before. After the senators-elect from New York and Rhode Island were admitted, the only element of doubt as to the power of the Republicans to elect a temporary president consisted in the vote of Mr. Davis himself. When that Senator votes with the Democrats there is a tie in the Senate, and as it was generally understood that if nominated he would abstain from voting, there was a probability of the Republicans being in a majority of one. When Senator Logan, of Illinois, moved the resolution for the election of Mr. Davis, Senator Bayard announced his intention of not voting. He said: "I have never obtained office by my vote, and I never shall retain it by my vote." Mr. Davis was accordingly elected by a vote of 36 to 34. In taking his seat Mr. Davis expressed his gratitude for the mark of confidence, and intimated, for the benefit of those it might concern, that he did not propose to reciprocate the favor, but to act with "entire fairness."

The New York State Democratic Convention assembled at Albany on Tuesday, October 11th. The Hon. D. B. Hill, of Chemung, was chosen temporary chairman. On the roll of delegates being called, the credentials of the three contesting delegations from New York City were referred to the Committee on Contested Seats, which decided to give seats to the County Democracy "on the ground of their regularity as an organization," thus excluding both Tammany and Irving Halls. The Hon. Erastus Brooks was then elected permanent chairman. The platform adopted declares the fidelity of the party to the principles of the conventions of 1874, 1875, and 1876; insists on the necessity of reform, as demonstrated by the Star Route exposure; deplores the assassination of the late President; advocates civil service reform by legislative enactment and administrative action, and recommends an early submission to the people of an amendment to the Constitution in favor of free canals. The nominations were made in accordance with the platform; and domestic affairs of the State, rather than national questions, appear to have determined the choice of the delegates. The convention is chiefly remarkable for the repulse of Mr. John Kelly, which was decisive. A vigorous protest has been issued by Tammany against its exclusion, but at present no one seems able to predict what course the Tammany men will take in November. With the halls excluded from the Democratic Convention, and the Stalwarts overpowered in the Republican Convention, there seems to be a prospect of rather a mixed result.

The Ohio Election has Resulted in a Republican victory. The returns are not all in, but it is estimated that Gov. Foster's plurality will be 20,000. The vote is light, and the scratching unparalleled. In many instances Foster's name was sustituted for Bookwalter's, and vice versa. The temperance vote, so far as is ascertained, appears to have been smaller than was expected, although it shows a substantial gain on former years. The Republicans claim that they have a majority in both Houses of the Legislature. In Iowa the Republican majority is estimated at 55,000.

Some Misconception Prevails as to What would be the Constitutional course if President Arthur should die before the completion of the term of office. It is now authoritatively stated that the temporary President of the Senate would become acting President of the United States, but not for the remainder of the quadrennial term. It would be his duty to communicate immediately with the Governors of all the States, notifying them of the vacancies, instructing them to arrange for the election of presidential electors, and specifying the day when such election must take place. A president and vice-president thus elected would serve the usual term, and thus the sequence of the presidential election years, as they now stand, would be altered. These contingencies were provided for in 1792 by an Act of Congress.

Guiteau, the Assassin of President Garfield, was indicted for murder on Friday, October 14th. He manifested the utmost fear when informed that he would be taken to court, and begged that the proceedings might be delayed. There was, however, no demonstration against the prisoner, and the carriage in which he was driven to and from the court was not molested. Guiteau listened attentively to the reading of the indictment, and when called upon to plead, desired to make a statement, but when informed that it would be inappropriate at that time, he entered the plea of "Not guilty." Mr. Scoville, Guiteau's brother-in-law, appeared as his counsel and stated that his defence will consist of two points: First, that Guiteau is insane, and second, that the wound was not necessarily mortal, and was not the cause of President Garfield's death. The trial was fixed for November 7th. Prior to that date the question of jurisdiction will be argued, as the prisoner's lawyer contends that, as the President died outside the District of Columbia, the court has no jurisdiction. The statement Guiteau wanted to read, reaffirms his conviction that he was divinely commissioned to kill the President, but he is obviously insincere in that statement, or he would not be afraid of his own assassination.

An Anti-Mormon Resolution has been passed by the Cincinnati Methodist Conference on Mormonism. It is thus worded: "That it is the urgent duty of the general Government to apply at once adequate remedies for the extirpation of Mormon polygamy. If the ordinary processes of the civil and criminal courts are not enough, then the laws should be executed by arms. That we call upon the people everywhere, by discussion, appeal, and petition, to cease not to agitate on the subject until the crime shall be abolished." There ought to be no delay in responding to this resolution. The apathy of governments is soon quickened when the people are determined. The blood of men, women, and children murdered by those miscreants at the head of the Mormon community cries to Heaven for vengeance. Virtuous women inveigled to Utah are forced to become plural wives to men they abhor, or face the alternative of death by starvation or worse means. Men who, deluded by the wiles of Mormon missionaries, have come from Europe, see their homes robbed of their daughters and dare not protest. Yet all the time Christian governments like those of England and Sweden suffer their ignorant subjects to be so beguiled, and make no effort to warn them, and the Washington government gives no protection to the sufferers. Compared with that vicious city, Sodom was virtuous. God will not hold us guiltless if we do not agitate in this matter, and use what power we have for its extirpation.

One of the Most Destructive Fires New York has seen for many years broke out on Monday, October 10th, at the Fourth Avenue car stables. Its origin is unknown, but as the stables contained the winter store of fodder for the horses, its spread was very rapid. The telegraph soon summoned to the spot every fire engine in the city, but against such a conflagration all human resources were unavailing. The building was burned to the ground, and for four days the débris continued smouldering, in spite of the streams of water poured on it day and night. It is feared that many horses were burned. All that were in the stables were set at liberty when the fire broke out, and most of them have been recovered, but it is believed that at least three hundred failed to make their escape. The flames from the building rose to a great height, and the wind carried them across the street to a furniture store, which was also destroyed. This is one of the saddest, features of the catastrophe, for many citizens, believing the building fireproof, had deposited pictures and other priceless art treasures there for safety. Some of these were stored in the vaults and may have escaped, but at present the entrance to the vaults is blocked by ruins and cannot be opened. The loss of property will exceed two million dollars, but happily no lives were lost.

The News of the Sudden Death of Dr. J. G. Holland will not be read in any of our cities without deep emotion. On Tuesday evening, October 11th, he was in good health and was at the office of Scribner's Monthly, of which periodical he has been editor for eleven years. He retired to rest at his usual hour, but on attempting to rise in the morning, he suddenly fell back on his pillow and died. A sincere Christian, a true gentleman, an accomplished scholar, and an able editor, the world is poorer now that he has left it. There was a sweetness and purity in his work that we look for in vain in that of too many of his contemporaries. Those who knew him only through his writings, respected and admired him; those who knew him personally loved him. The influence of a man so humble, yet so good and wise, both in the press and in personal association, cannot be over estimated. May it continue to live now that he has gone from our midst!

Mayor Grace Continued his Tour of Inspection through the tenement houses of New York City last week. He was accompanied by the Sanitary Engineer of the Board of Health and other officials. The state of matters in all the homes visited was disgraceful in the extreme. Families were found living in one room day and night. In others they had two rooms only, the room used as a bedroom being without window or ventilation of any kind. Yet ten dollars per month, and in some cases higher rates, up to eighteen and twenty dollars, are exacted from the wretched tenants as rent. Leaky drains and general sanitary defects abound. One of the Mayor's party said: "The most expressive words descriptive of squalor and filth would give but a faintly glimmering idea of the condition of affairs in these most wretched and compactly crowded abodes." In one of the houses a woman insisted on shaking hands with the Mayor, with which moderate request he good-naturedly complied. "I thought from the carriages," said the woman, "that there was a funeral." "And there would be if we should stay here long," he answered. The Mayor hopes that the publication of the information he has acquired during these visits may induce some philanthropic capitalists to do for the poor of New York what George Peabody and the Baroness Burdett-Coutts have done for the poor of London.

A Temperance Breakfast was Given in New York, October 11th, in honor of the arrival of Mr. R. Graham, late Secretary of the Church of England Temperance Society, who has come here on the invitation of the Protestant Episcopal Church Temperance Society for the purpose of organizing the temperance work in the United States upon a basis similar to that which has obtained such remarkable success in Great Britain. Mr. Graham said that although he had undertaken the work for one year only, he intended to become an American citizen, and remain here permanently. Dr. Thorold, the Lord Bishop of Rochester, and a warm friend to the temperance cause, was present at the breakfast, and warmly commended Mr. Graham to the American temperance workers, speaking very highly of his success in England. Alluding to the Yorktown Celebration, the bishop said that he could meet it without a blush. His grandfather was from Lincoln, and one of the seven members who voted against the war with America. He did not pretend to be a sensible man; but he was glad to say that his grandfather was sensible.

A Diphtheria Plant.—In a Lecture Delivered before the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, on October 11th, Prof. Horatio C. Wood gave the result of his researches into the origin of this terrible epidemic made at the instance of the National Board of Health. He said that he and the scientific men associated with him had made many experiments, resulting in the important discovery that this fatal and insidious disease is propagated by "a microscopic plant or fungi, existing in all human beings, especially in the mouth and throat, but lacking the power of reproduction until given increased vitality by those disordered conditions of the mucous membrane which attend sore throat when caused by cold." Thus increased, they poison the blood and choke the vessels, producing the fatal membrane which is a sign of the disease. The professor held out the hope that further experiments might lead to the discovery of a system of inoculation by which the fatal results of the disease might be prevented. Thus we see that in our physical nature, as in our spiritual nature, we carry about with us the seeds of death, which only need an impure atmosphere or contact with infection to develop and propagate.

A United States Senator's Start in Life.—The newly elected Senator from Rhode Island, Nelson W. Aldrich, is stated, on the authority of the New York Tribune, to have entered the city of Providence in the same modest manner that the illustrious Whittington entered London—on foot, and with his clothes slung over his back. Being a bright, active youth, he soon procured employment in a wholesale grocery house. But with a genius superior to his station, he rose in life, till he is now the head of one of the largest firms in the State, and holds the high position of United States Senator. Mr. Aldrich is not quite forty years old. He is married, and has four children.

Convicts' Commiseration.—The Convicts in the Ohio Penitentiary have sent $100 to the Michigan sufferers. They raised this sum by denying themselves the luxury of tobacco and by the sale of trinkets which they had made. It is very seldom that an example of self-denial for the benefit of others comes from the penitentiary, but this is one to be commended to the notice of many self-indulgent people who do not happen to be in jail.

A Search for a Lover on a Battlefield was recently described by the lady who undertook the ghastly task, to a fellow-passenger in the train that carried them over the scene of the struggle. She lived in Memphis in 1861, and her lover was an officer in the Confederate army, but she removed to Kentucky when his regiment was engaged there. A battle occurred, and one of the wounded soldiers who managed to crawl back to hospital, told her he had seen her lover fall, as he supposed, mortally wounded. He described, as well as he could, the spot where he lay, and the lady instantly started out for the field. As she went, the deep roar of the guns told her the battle was still in progress. But she thought little of her own risk of being hit by a stray ball, or being trampled upon in a cavalry charge. She thought only of her lover who might be needing the restoratives she carried. She walked through lines of dead and dying men, scrutinizing each face, until at length she came upon the form she sought. To her intense relief he was alive, but appeared to be slowly bleeding to death. Quickly she stanched the blood, and bound up the wound. Then she gave him her restorative and waited till he was strong enough to rise. With all her strength she helped him, and leaning on her he dragged his way off the field to the surgeon's quarters. There his wound was properly dressed and he recovered. At the close of the war he became the husband of the heroic woman who had saved his life. People would not call that man a fanatic, however ardently he loved his wife; yet that is the epithet applied to Christians who give their lives to the service of Him who has rescued them from eternal death (1 Cor. 6 : 20).

Dr. Stuart Robinson, for Many Years Pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Louisville, Ky., died October 5th. During the last eighteen months he has suffered from cancer of the stomach. Dr. Robinson was born at Strabane, near Londonderry, Ireland, November 26th, 1816. He graduated in Amherst College in 1836, and afterward studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, Prince Edward, Va. He then became Presbyterian pastor at Frankfort, Ky. From 1852 to 1856 he resided at Baltimore. He was professor of ecclesiology at Danville, Ky., from 1856 to 1858. In 1858 he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Louisville, where he took a leading position among the clergymen of the South. During his long career Dr. Robinson was an active writer. Among his works are "The Church of God an Essential Element of the Gospel" and "Discourses of Redemption," the latter having been reprinted in Edinburgh. Dr. Robinson's sympathies were with the South during the war, and many of his pamphlets treated of the various questions at issue between the Northern and Southern Presbyterians.

An Appeal to President Arthur has been made by the managers of the National Temperance Society on behalf of many thousands of temperance workers throughout the country. The managers have forwarded a petition to the President, in which they say, "We most earnestly pray that, as chief executive, in dispensing official hospitality at the White House, in your appointments to the public service—civil, military, and naval—and in your official recommendations to Congress concerning revenue and other legislation involving the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages, you will so use your great opportunity as to discourage all injurious social-drinking usages, to lessen the great and threatening evil of intemperance and to promote the ultimate suppression of the wasteful and destructive alcoholic liquor traffic." The President has had abundant opportunities of witnessing the evils of intemperance, and it would be a happy thing for the country if he should be moved to discourage the use of liquor by his influence and example.

A Twenty-Five Cent Subscription to "The CHRISTIAN HERALD" was secured by one of our readers, who thus narrates the circumstances: "A few days ago I met a man who, I suppose, never read a religious paper, and who seems to care little or nothing for religion, and seldom or never attends a place of religious worship. When I met him I had in my hands a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and he asked me to read him the news. I read him a few notes on Current Events, which seemed to interest him. I then told him that the number I had been reading contained a very interesting sermon from Dr. Talmage on the death of the President, and he asked me to read that too. I did so, and he seemed to be deeply interested; and when I had finished it I asked him what he thought of it, and he replied that he thought it was one of the best sermons he ever listened to, and that the man who delivered it must certainly be a great and good man. Then he pulled out twenty-five cents from his pocket, and told me to have the HERALD sent to him as soon as I could."

Men who have never read a religious paper and who do not attend church are just the sort of subscribers we are anxious to secure.

THE ARK OF THE COVENANT.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and increased in the land, in those days, saith the Lord, they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord: neither shall it come to mind: neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit it; neither shall that be done any more."—JEREMIAH 3 : 16.

THIS text speaks concerning the material ark. I should like to append to that another, which speaks of the ark spiritually, and tells us where its antitype is to be found.

"And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament (or covenant)."—REV. 11 : 19.

When inward piety is low the externals of religion are frequently cried up. Those who know nothing of God are the very people to exclaim concerning themselves and their brethren, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these." The Pharisees, who were furthest from God, were the most bitter advocates of ritualism and formalism; they would not even have a man healed on the Sabbath day, or allow the hungry to rub a few ears of corn out of the husks. It is not always so; but yet too often, "The nearer the church the further from God." The more gown, the less grace. The more phylactery, the less sanctity. The more of ecclesiasticism, the less of true godliness. On the other hand, whenever the Spirit of God is largely poured out, although the ordinances of God are carefully attended to, yet as external things they are sure to be put into their proper place, and that proper place is a secondary one.

The spiritual is put foremost and the ritualistic is placed hindmost when grace is largely given. It was so with David in the fifty-first Psalm: when he had made a hearty confession of his sin, and cried to God for mercy, he uttered those memorable words, "Thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it: thou delightest not in burnt offerings." He puts aside the symbol because he has a clearer view of the substance. That is exactly the case with the people mentioned in my text: they had been sadly sinful; but God in His mercy promised to turn to them, and to bless them, and bring them back into their own land again, and he says—"And I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding. And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and increased in the land, in those days, saith the Lord, they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord; neither shall it come to mind: neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit it; neither shall that be done any more." The visible golden ark which was so much their glory, should be quite forgotten, because of the gracious visitation of God. That shall be our subject this morning.

First, I shall invite your attention to the symbol reverenced; secondly we shall see that reverence obliterated; and, thirdly, we shall dwell upon that reverence transferred; for though we no longer revere the ancient ark of shittim wood overlaid with pure gold, we do honor to that forever-enduring ark of which we read in our second text—"the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in His temple the ark of his covenant."

I. First, then, let us think upon

THE SYMBOL REVERENCED.

The ark of the covenant was a small coffer not exceeding four feet and a half in length by about two feet eight inches in breadth. It was made of an enduring kind of wood, and was covered with pure gold both within and without. Upon the upper part of it was a golden crown, into which fitted a solid slab of gold, which formed the lid of the ark. That golden lid was called the propitiatory or mercy-seat; in the Hebrew, Kapporeth, or a place of covering. Upon the two ends of this mercy-seat, and part and parcel of the same solid metal, were two cherubs, with outstretched wings. The Lord said of them, "And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy-seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another; toward the mercy seat shall the faces of the cherubims be." Between those wings, when God was favorable to His people, the bright light, called the Shekinah, was wont to shine forth: and when, once in the year, the high priest went into the innermost place, bearing with him a cloud of incense and sprinkling the blood, he saw the glory of that light.

This ark was the object of great reverence, and very fitly so, because it symbolized God's presence, the presence of Jehovah, the living God, in the midst of His people. To no other people had God given such a token of His presence. He walked in the midst of no other camp; but of Israel He had said, "My Spirit shall go with thee." It was the first article of the tabernacle concerning which Moses received instructions, for, indeed, it was the first in honor. Read the twenty-fifth chapter of Exodus, and see how speedily the Lord who gave the law provided a chest for its honorable preservation. Although Solomon made most of the furniture of the holy place anew he retained the same ark, which was too much esteemed to be changed. When it was carried abroad in the marchings of the Israelites it always went in front, and it was distinguished from all the other furniture by being covered externally with blue, as if to signify its heavenly character. Lifted high on men's shoulders, upon golden staves, the blue colored wrapping of the ark was seen in the van of the Lord's host occupying the place of honor. We do not wonder, therefore, that it was much spoken of and esteemed by the tribes of Israel.

The ark was held in reverence by the Israelites because

IT WAS THEIR LEADER.

When the time came to march the ark went in the forefront. How often did Moses cry, "Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered," and on they went across the pathless desert rightly led by this ark of the covenant. When they came to the brink of Jordan, as soon as the feet of the priests that bare the ark touched the waters, the river was parted, and they went through dry shod. It was so trusted in that they bore the ark on one occasion into the battlefield, when God was not with them, and the golden coffer was carried into captivity to vindicate its own honor among the Philistines, by smiting its captors with sore diseases, and breaking in pieces Dagon, their god.

A wonderful ark it was when God was with it. It was such a symbol of power that we wonder not that when David brought it up to Mount Zion all the people shouted, and with sound of trumpet celebrated its triumphal march. It was also so much a symbol of holiness that Solomon removed Pharaoh's daughter out of the city of David, for he said, "My wife shall not dwell in the house of David, King of Israel, because the places are holy, whereunto the ark of the Lord hath come."

In Solomon's day the ark was finally installed in the temple, and the king placed over it two greater cherubim, ten cubits high, with outspread wings. These were made of olive wood overlaid with gold, and probably covered the entire structure of the coffer and the smaller cherubim, which were component parts of it. Then they drew out the staves of the ark, signifying that there the ark was to stay; but they left the ends of the staves visible, to show that God might yet depart from them if they sinned against Him. In the temple the ark rested until the time of the captivity, and from that time it was no more heard of, and possibly never appeared again in the temple that was built by Zerubbabel or in that which was enlarged and beautified by Herod.

The ark was to Israelites, after their wanderings were over, the fixed centre of their nationality, even as while they were in the wilderness it had always been placed in the centre of the camp. In the desert it had been the central kernel of the whole army. Outside the ark was the tabernacle or holy place, and outside of that, in various rows and orders, were the tents of the tribes; but the core of it all was this honored ark. To-day we have a centre to which we rally, a fixed centre which faith perceives in heaven, whither the true ark of the covenant has gone up.

Marvel not that the men of Judah paid great reverence to this ark when in so many ways it was a token for good to them. What they did to this ark is mentioned in the text. First, they recognized it as the ark of the covenant of the Lord. They were wont to say, "The ark of the covenant of the Lord." They spoke much of it, and prided themselves upon the possession of it. Nay, they not only spoke of it, but for we read, "Neither shall it come to mind," or as the margin has it, "Neither shall it come upon the heart." The ark of the covenant was upon the hearts of God's people; they had a deep affection for it. When it was carried away captive we read that the aged Eli fell backward with horror at the tidings. It was very dear to the people of God, and if it was taken away they reckoned that the glory was departed from them.

Hence, in the next place, they remembered it, as the text plainly informs us. If they were captives they prayed in the direction in which the ark was situated; wherever they wandered they thought of God and of the coffer which represented His presence.

Next, they visited it. On certain holy days they came from Dan and from Beersheba, even from the utmost ends of their land, in joyful companies, singing from stage to stage, and making joyful holiday as they went up to the place where God did dwell between the cherubim. When they came back they rejoiced because they had worshipped before the ark of the covenant, even before the presence of the Most High God.

Visiting it, they were accustomed also to speak highly of it; for in the margin of your Bibles you will find, "Neither shall they magnify it any more." They used to tell one another what the ark had done; the glory that shone forth from it, the acceptance of the offering whose blood was sprinkled upon it on the Day of Atonement, and the testimony which was heard from between the cherubic wings.

II. Secondly, I would have you observe that

REVERENCE OBLITERATED.

They were to say no more, "The ark of the covenant of the Lord." Yet that fact was to be a blessing. Observe that the words are not spoken as a threatening, but as a gracious promise. Now, this cannot merely mean that they would be without the ark; for they would certainly understand that to be a sign of divine anger. Neither would the mere absence of the ark fulfil the prophet's words; for if the ark were gone they would remember it still, and their hearts would hanker after it. If they could not visit it, yet it would come to their minds, and they would speak of it.

It was somehow to be a boon to them that they should speak no more of the ark of the covenant, for the text was delivered in the form of a promise. The fact is they were to have done with the symbol because the substance would come. They were no more to speak of the ark itself, because they would have that which the ark was intended to foreshadow. Bear with me with great patience this morning while I try to interest you in the points in which our blessed Lord Jesus Christ is the ark of the covenant now in the temple of God for us.

Our Lord Jesus by His coming has put out of His people's thoughts the material ark of the covenant, because its meaning is fulfilled in Him; and this, first, in the sense of preservation. The ark was intended to be a sacred treasury in which God laid up the two tables of stone upon which the law was written, that they might be kept there as priceless things, not to be commonly handled or even seen, but shut up there as the most precious gifts of heaven. We know not where the tablets are now, and we know not what has become of the golden chest; but where is the law now? Once it lay broken at your feet and mine, even as the tables were shattered at the feet of Moses.

The law apart from Christ is a terror to our guilty souls, because it is a law broken, and therefore condemning; but the law in Christ Jesus, honored and fulfilled by Him, is a delightful sight to true worshippers. In Him the law is more honored than by any merely human obedience, and it smiles upon us as if we had perfectly obeyed it. It was not within His heart alone, but within all His life; His whole thoughts, words, and acts went to make up a golden chest in which the precious treasure of the perfect law of God should be contained. O come, let us magnify His blessed name!

Next, the ark signified propitiation; for over the top of the sacred box which held the two tables of the law was the slab of gold called which covered all. We will not talk of that golden covering now, but we will speak of Jesus, our blessed Lord, who covers all. When God looks down upon His law, He does not see it nakedly, but He beholds it in the person of His Son. He sees it there perfectly preserved without taint or flaw of any kind, and He rejoices therein. "Ah," said the Jew, "we have a mercy-seat that covers all." "Ah," say we, "but we have one who does not do that typically, and in outward pattern alone, but He is the real covering upon which we lay our prayers and thanksgivings, and find ourselves accepted." We come not to God on the footing of the law, but the interposing propitiation covers all, and comes between, and upon that mercy-seat we offer our petitions and praises.

The next word is a very blessed one, and that is covenant. The ark was called "the ark of the covenant." It represented a covenant of works, as it was a part of a visible sanctuary; and, ah, how soon was that covenant broken! There is no wonder that in the breaking of that covenant the golden pot of manna was lost, and that Aaron's rod that budded was no more seen; for we are told in the Chronicles that when they opened the ark, in the days of Solomon, there was nothing found in it "save the two tables which Moses put therein at Horeb, when the Lord made a covenant with the children of Israel, when they came out of Egypt." Paul tells us that they were there originally, and so it is probable that they were taken away by the Philistines.

Ah, how soon we should lose the sweet things of God if we were under the covenant of works, and how soon we should miss the gentle sovereignty of His shepherd rod! I thank and bless God that in Christ Jesus we have a covenant of grace which can never fail, and never can be broken, and in Him we have all that our souls desire: pot of manna and rod of Aaron, covenant provision and covenant rule we find in Him. Oh, how I wish some of the people of God understood it, and realized that there is established between God and us in the person of Christ Jesus a covenant ordered in all things and sure. May the Holy Ghost teach you this. God has pledged His honor for the salvation of His people, and He has sealed the covenant with the precious blood of Jesus, and therefore He will not turn away from it, but will keep it for His son's sake. Oh, blessed Jesus, we want no ark of the covenant; for Thou art the covenant itself to us, and in Thee we rejoice.

Further, because this ark was the ark of the covenant of God it was from it that He was accustomed to reveal Himself, and so it is called the "ark of testimony." Jehovah often spoke from off the mercy-seat to His waiting people. His priests and prophets heard a voice coming forth from the thick darkness of the secret chamber wherein God dwelt, a voice from off the mercy-seat giving them promises of succor in their times of need. It was a great thing to possess what they called "the oracle." No other people had a true oracle except these chosen ones of God; but now that its voice is silent we need not regret it, for we have another oracle. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son."

Some will say that they know God by study, others declare that they have found out God by reflection, and certain dream that they perceive Him by imagination; but all their knowledge put together cannot equal the blessed testimony of God which He hath given us concerning Himself in the manifestation of His incarnate, holy, obedient, suffering, dying, risen Son. We say no more, "the ark of the testimony," but we rejoice that God was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, and saw the Father in the Son.

We have only reached the middle of the subject now: this ark also signified enthronement; for the top of the ark was, so to speak, the throne of God. It was "the throne of the heavenly grace." There God reigned and dwelt; that is, typically. It was a throne to which petitioners came with their pleas to obtain favors at the hand of the great King. Where now is the visible throne of God? Ah, sirs, His holy place has been broken down, and He dwelleth not in temples made with hands, that is to say of this building. There is no visible throne of God upon the face of the earth now.

If you would see the throne of God, behold the person of the Christ; for in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. The Lord reigneth from the tree, from the cross: here is the kingdom of God set up in the person of Christ Jesus among the sons of men. Oh what a blessing to have such a throne to come to—to Jesus Himself, who is the throne of the invisible God! We talk no longer of the ark, and of its gold, and of its crown, and of its golden lid, and of the winged cherubs; for the Lord Jesus is infinitely better than these. Oh, our beloved Lord and Master, Thou dost chase away these shadows from our minds, for the very throne of God art Thou!

Out of this grows the next idea, that as it was the place of God's enthronement, so it was

THE DOOR OF MAN'S APPROACH.

Men never came nearer to God on earth typically than when they stood in the holy place close by the ark. Israel was nearest to God symbolically on that day when the atonement had been made and accepted, and her priest stood before the ark awe-stricken in the presence of God. You and I need not speak of the ark of the covenant; for we have a blessed way of approach. We do not come to Christ once in the year only, but every day in the year, and every hour of the day. He who came but once in the year came tremblingly. The Jews have a tradition that they put a cord about the foot of the High Priest, so that if he should die before the ark they might draw out his corpse; such was their servile fear of God. The tradition shows what was the trembling nature of that entrance within the veil: how different from the apostle's words, "Let us come boldly unto the throne of the heavenly grace." We are not afraid of being stricken with death there: we are full of reverence, but we have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear.

There is no approaching God except in Christ; but in Christ our approach to God may be as near as possible. Come nearer, nearer still; it is your fault that you do not come near enough. There is nothing to tremble at here—come right up to God and speak with Him as a man speaketh with his friend. We come boldly because we come through Jesus. Who is afraid of Jesus? Who shudders when drawing near to Him? And if He be the mercy-seat to which we come, and the place where the Father meets us, we feel that He permits the holy familiarity, the humble freedom which is suggested to our hearts by the spirit of adoption.

I must go a step further—the ark was the place of gracious power. On the top of the mercy-seat stood cherubic figures, and, notwithstanding all that learned men may have said, I do not think that any idea is nearer the mark than that these cherubim were types of angelic power, and of all the powers of providence which God is pleased to use in the behalf of His people. Notice how frequently the Word associates angels with our Lord; for instance, when Jacob saw the ladder which reached to heaven, and God at the top of it, there were angels ascending and descending upon it. Cherubim were on all the curtains of the most holy place which enclosed the ark, and the ministry of angels is interwoven into the great covenant plan of salvation. "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Consider, then, that the angels on the mercy-seat typify the power of God by which He will defend His people.

Every angel is the servant of our covenant Head, and so the guardian of every member of Christ. As He might have summoned twelve legions of angels by one uplifted glance to heaven, so will He fill the mountain with horses of fire and chariots of fire whenever His people need such succor. The stars in their courses fight for the Saviour and for the saved ones: nothing shall by any means harm them. In heaven, and earth, and hell the warrant of the great King stands in full force, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm;" and this protection comes to us because we are preserved in Christ Jesus.

III. Thirdly, let us see this

REVERENCE TRANSFERRED.

Let us render to Jesus the honor which aforetime was offered to the ark. First: let us say that Jesus is our covenant. We are told, "They shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord." People must talk, it is natural to them, they must say something—what else are their tongues for? Let us, then, say concerning Christ that He is the ark of the covenant of the Lord. Come, let us each one say it for himself—"Lord Jesus, I am in covenant with God through Thee. Jesus, thou art my propitiation, by Thee I approach unto the Father." Recognize this truth for yourself, my brother, and it will be a grand day for you. When you have said it to yourself, say it to those about you. Say it to strangers, but especially say it to your own brethren. When you have said all you know, say it over again, and when you have said it again, say it a third time. This is a kind of note of which the human ear, when once it is cleansed, never grows weary.

The text takes you a step further; for it says of the original ark,. "neither shall it come to mind," or (I give the margin), "neither shall it come upon your heart." Brethren, let Christ come upon your heart, and dwell there. Beloved, let us not have Christ in the head, but Christ in the heart. Know all you can about Him; but love Him on account of everything you know; for everything we learn about Christ ought to be another argument for affection to Him. How I loved Him when I only knew myself a sinner and Christ a Saviour; but oh, I love Him more as I begin to see my greater need and His greater fulness; as I see my greater sinfulness and His greater graciousness!

And, next, if we should ever grow dull or cold at any time, let us take the third step in the text, let us remember the Lord.

> "What peaceful hours I once enjoyed,
> How sweet their memory still."

If I have not this enjoyment now, I will remember it, and struggle till I find my Lord again. O my Lord, I will remember thee. If I forget thee, let my heart forget to beat.

> "Gethsemane, can I forget?
> Or there Thy conflict see,
> Thine agony and bloody sweat,
> And not remember Thee!
>
> "When to the cross I turn mine eyes,
> And rest on Calvary,
> O Lamb of God! my sacrifice!
> I must remember Thee.
>
> "Remember thee, and all thy pains,
> And all thy love to me;
> Yes, while a breath, a pulse remains,
> Will I remember Thee."

O memory, leave no other name than that of Jesus recorded upon thy tablets. Let us sometimes set apart a little space for the exercise of our memory. It is good for children at school to have their memories trained. Should not we sometimes, especially we who speak so much, get quite alone and sanctify our memory by going over all the blessings of the covenant which come to us by Christ, all the glory of His person, and all the wonders of His word. Oh, yes, we must remember it!

The next thing is, let us visit Him. We cannot set out on journeys now to go to Jerusalem on foot—little bands of us together; yet let us visit Jesus. Let us continually come to the mercy-seat alone. Who that knows the worth of prayer but wishes to be often there? Next, let us come up by twos and threes. Perhaps we have not been agreeing as we should together, let us go and hear what God the Lord will speak, for He may speak peace to us, in more senses than one. Perhaps we have had a trouble to-day, and we do not see our way—let us go up to the ark of the covenant and hear what the oracle will tell us. Peradventure the Lord will say, "This is the way, walk ye in it," and we shall know what to do.

If you live where they are giving up prayer-meetings, carry home a live coal and drop it into your minister's bosom. "Ah," say you, "he might not like it." That is very likely, but he certainly needs setting on fire if he lets the prayer-meeting go out. Churches without prayer-meetings! Pull them down, their day is over! Stop the preacher's mouth if he does not pray, and let his church be scattered to the winds; for the church that forgets to assemble for prayer has "Ichabod" written on its walls. No prayer, no power. The ark of the covenant is gone when the people no longer come together to cry unto the Lord in their companies.

The last thing is, "Neither shall that be done any more;" but the margin has it, "Neither shall that be magnified any more." Transfer your reverence, then, and as you cannot magnify the literal mercy-seat, come and magnify Christ, who is

THE REAL MERCY-SEAT.

Oh, that I knew how to speak words worthy to lie under the soles of my Master's feet! Oh, that I could speak a sentence that was fit to be laid in the road like the palm branches, with which the disciples strewed His way, not worthy to be touched by His feet, but by the feet of the beast that He rode upon! I am not worthy to unloose His shoe latchet. He is so glorious that archangels fall on their faces to adore Him. Heaven is splendid, but the splendor of heaven is the presence of my Lord and Master. His throne is a glorious high throne, but it owes its glory and its height to Him that sits upon it. Hallelujah unto thee, O Christ. Hallelujah for ever and ever! for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us unto God by Thy blood!

If the Jew was ever permitted to look upon the golden chest of the ark, he saw but little compared with what I see in Thee, thou man, thou God! The wood that could not rot, covered over with precious gold, was a poor representation of His perfect manhood and glorious Godhead. The ark was crowned, but we see Jesus made a little lower than the angels, and crowned King of kings and Lord of lords. Again my heart cries hallelujah!

The Jew could but see a slab of gold that was called the throne of God, but we see the spotless, perfect life, and infinitely precious atonement of Christ, which are better than the much fine gold. I see God, not as a light for the eyes, but as shining upon the soul in Jesus my Lord. Oh, the glory, the glory of that light! I am reconciled! I am a child of God! I am brought near! Jehovah speaks to me! I speak to Him! Hallelujah! All praise to Him through whom such fellowship is rendered possible, so that a man can see God and live! Glory, glory be unto Him who is now in the temple above. The veil is rent, and faith can see Jesus, to whom we come this day. God bless you, beloved. Amen.

THE LATE DR. S. MANNING,

Of the Religious Tract Society.

THE death, on September 13th, last, of this esteemed Secretary of the Tract Society of Great Britain, has made a vacancy in the official staff that will not easily be filled.

Samuel Manning was born on November 26th, 1821, and has been called from the midst of manifold and far-reaching earthly usefulness to higher honors and nobler service, at the early age of fifty-nine. He was a native of the busy town of Leicester, where he spent his early years. He was favored both in regard to his parentage and in the associations of his youth. In the second quarter of the present century, his father, Mr. Manning, was for some years churchwarden of St. Martin's parish, a poor living, then held by the Rev. E. T. Vaughan, the father of Dr. Vaughan, now Master of the Temple Church, London.

When about eighteen years of age Samuel Manning left Leicester for Liverpool, where he actively engaged in commercial pursuits. A very prosperous future appeared to be opening before him, when in obedience to the advice of judicious friends he relinquished commerce for a ministerial life. He now entered the Baptist College at Bristol, but soon left Bristol to continue his studies at the University of Glasgow.

On completing his college course, Dr. Manning had a choice of several settlements in the Nonconformist ministry, and at length he became Baptist minister at Frome, in Somersetshire. It was in this picturesque town that John Foster preached and wrote in the early years of the present century; and Dr. Manning not only had the happiness of succeeding to the pulpit of the essayist, but of having as a friend and helper the venerable John Sheppard, one of Foster's chosen companions, and his correspondent to the last. As a minister of the Gospel, Dr. Manning was eminently successful from the first. At the end of a year his church was obliged to be rebuilt, and during the fifteen years of his stay in the town it was several times enlarged.

From the outset of his career Dr. Manning has also been a very considerable author, for he has not only largely contributed to periodical literature, but has produced several works of acknowledged merit, which have been very extensively circulated. Among these may be mentioned "Selections from the Prose Works of John Milton, with Memoir, Notes, and Analyses," published in 1862. Many anonymous works from Dr. Manning's pen still command a large circulation, and some of the most successful of the publications issued by the Religious Tract Society are his productions. Several of these, the result of his travels in Switzerland, Spain, Italy, Egypt, Palestine, and America, are very widely known.

Dr. Manning on several occasions refused the degree of Doctor of Divinity; but some years ago he accepted the diploma of LL.D. from the University of Chicago.

It is in connection with the Religious Tract Society, with which he was associated for fifteen years, that the career of Dr. Manning is chiefly interesting to the general public. Nothing in his character was more remarkable than his combination of business aptitude and literary skill with unfailing geniality, and true, almost child-like, devotion. His ability and sagacity in the management of affairs were the astonishment of those who had dedicated their lives exclusively to commerce; while in the social circle his good spirits and flow of happy anecdote were an unfailing charm. His literary skill was at the same time considerable. As editor of the Tract Society's volumes for fifteen years, he evinced a rare discernment and taste, while his own literary activity was great.

REV. JOHN WILKINSON,

Director of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews.

MENTION has frequently been made in these columns of the mission to the Jews which has for its headquarters the Conference Hall at Mildmay Park, London. We give above a portrait of Mr. Wilkinson, whose exertions in connection with that mission have been blessed of God to the conversion of many of "His chosen people."

Some thirty-seven years ago Mr. Wilkinson was learning his first lessons in the school of Christ in a quiet village in Lincolnshire, England. He was a decided Christian at the early age of fourteen, but although his friends even then recognized his future vocation, and spoke of him as "cut out for a missionary," he manifested an invincible repugnance to speak or act in public.

Ultimately the claims of Jewish Missions were so urgently put before him that he felt the call was of the Lord and must not be evaded. Accordingly he wrote to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, inclosing his testimonials and stating his conviction of a call to the work. He was accepted, and entered upon a course of preparatory study, in which he achieved no little success.

In April, 1854, his true missionary career began among the Dutch cattle-drovers of the London Market; and from that date onward for twenty-two years his connection with the Parent Society remained unbroken, his sphere widening as time went on.

In 1875 a deepening conviction that the close of the "times of the Gentiles" and the restoration of Israel were events near at hand, led Mr. Wilkinson to feel the importance of devoting himself exclusively to missionary labors. Not being able, however, to obtain the consent of the directors of the British Society to his taking that course, he decided, in February, 1876, to tender his resignation, and to start on an independent course of labor, casting himself and his family on the providence of God.

Unsought, various personal friends of Mr. Wilkinson came forward and undertook the charge of providing for his personal and family needs during the next three years, and thus he found himself free from all care for the morrow, and able to devote himself wholly to aggressive work among the Jews of London.

His home had for some years past been in the neighborhood of Mildmay Park. He had lived on terms of Christian intimacy with the late beloved William Pennefather, and had watched the gradual development of the Mildmay institutions with warm interest and sympathy. More than once Mr. Wilkinson had said to him: "Your work at Mildmay will never be complete until you have linked to it a mission to the Jews," but neither he nor Mr. Pennefather had then any light as to how or by whom such a mission would be carried out.

When in April, 1873, Captain Moreton, on the death of Mr. Pennefather, succeeded to the work he had left unfinished, Mr. Wilkinson wrote and offered his services gratuitously as Missionary to the Jews in connection with the Conference Hall, and received from Captain Moreton a warm response, which resulted in the establishment of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews. Since then the work has been carried on amid many unmistakable tokens of blessing, and many Jews have been led to recognize in Jesus of Nazareth "He of whom Moses and the prophets did write."

THE LATE REV. ALEXANDER RALEIGH, D.D.

AMONG the eminent Congregational ministers of London few ever exercised so strong a personal influence over their people as did the late Dr. Raleigh. To know him was to love him. His eloquence thrilled the hearer, his profound thought won his respect, and his high personal religious character, combined with his genial and sympathetic disposition won the love of those with whom he came in contact. People used to say of him that his influence was magnetic, but it would have been more correct to say that it was Christlike.

He was born on the farm of Flock, Kirkcud-brightshire, Scotland; but in early years he left his native land for Liverpool, where his school days were spent, and although Scotland claimed a brief portion of his subsequent career, his associations were chiefly of an English character, and in England his best work was done. It was after he had left school, and when he became alive to spiritual realities, that what he at least would term education began. One who knew him in his younger days does not hesitate to call him "a veritable hero in his pursuit of knowledge under difficulties," alluding to the fact that the early surroundings of his life necessitated attention to business as well as to books. His ministerial studies were commenced at Blackburn Theological Academy, of which the Rev. Gilbert Wardlaw was principal, and continued at Lancashire Independent College.

From those days until his death a certain ardor of nature was one of his chief characteristics, and this helped him to turn obstacles which would have seemed insuperable to others, into incentives to zeal and unwearied perseverance.

On leaving college, in 1844, his first pastoral charge was at Greenock, where he continued for six years. In 1850 he became minister at Masborough, Rotherham, and remained there until 1855, when he succeeded Dr. Wardlaw as pastor of Elgin Place Chapel, Glasgow. Four years afterward he accepted an invitation to Hare Court Chapel, London, which important sphere of labor he occupied until 1875. It was in London that he became most widely known, both as an author and a preacher.

He sought constantly, like the preacher of old, for "acceptable words," and thus he built up for himself that reputation for competency of theological acquirement and conscientiousness in pulpit preparation which induced the Glasgow University, in 1864, to bestow upon him the degree of D.D.

His reputation as an author almost equalled his reputation as a preacher. One of the books, perhaps, which will give the best idea of his power is his "Quiet Resting Places," published in 1863. The next effort in this direction was his volume on "The Story of Jonah." Some critics accorded higher praise to this than to "Quiet Resting Places," and it certainly uttered a very solemn voice to the times. The charm of the book was the perfect adaptation to our modern life of the great spiritual lessons taught by the history of the prophet so many centuries ago. It enabled the preacher himself to become a messenger of the Lord against the vices and impurities of the great city in which his lot was cast. He subsequently issued "The Little Sanctuary," and a volume of sermons on the Book of Esther was the last volume published by him.

In 1875 he resigned his pastorate to become the successor of his beloved friend, Rev. Dr. Stoughton, at Kensington. In this sphere of duty he found scope for the full exercise of his best gifts, and he was enabled to continue as perhaps no one else so well could, the work Dr. Stoughton inaugurated.

On the 19th of April, 1880, at the age of sixty-three, with Sir James Paget, Dr. Allon, and beloved friends around him, this devoted man of God "fell asleep." A brief period of suffering terminated a life of great beauty and of extended usefulness, in which there seemed to be promise of that high service which the ripe and mellowed experience of a pure and noble spirit alone can render. His death caused deep sorrow in a large circle of friends, and those who only knew him as a preacher mourned for him as for a friend. The accompanying portrait is considered to be a life-like one.

Mrs. Conyers' Return Home.

MAUD CONYERS' REFUGE IN TROUBLE.

"Is that my wife?" said a feeble voice, as the sound of carriage wheels was heard on the stones of a street lined on both sides with elegant mansions. The voice came from a bed on which was stretched the form of a man in the prime of life who but a few hours before had been full of health and vigor. He had been away from home on a visit, and in returning, the high-spirited horses he was driving, were frightened by a passing train, and starting on a wild gallop, had overturned the carriage and left him on the roadway a mangled, almost unrecognizable form. He was carried to his chamber, and a surgeon summoned. It was evident that his injuries were mortal; but he recovered consciousness, and his first inquiry was for his wife. He was told that she was not at home; had gone to call on some friends, but was expected soon. His anxiety was pitiable, and at the sound of every vehicle that passed the inquiry was repeated, "Is that my wife?"

An attendant stood by the window eagerly watching for the expected lady, and after an interval of less than an hour, but which seemed to all in the death chamber endless, an elegant carriage stopped before the door. The light from the windows of the house fell upon it as the door was opened, and a lady stepped out. She was very beautiful. Her face, a delicate oval, surrounded by a gauzy veil, looked the perfection of human loveliness. Luxuriant dark brown hair set off an exquisite complexion, and her dark eyes sparkled with intelligence and sensibility. She was the bride of only a few weeks, and as she stepped lightly from her carriage she seemed the impersonation of grace and beauty.

A few words from the servant who admitted her sufficed to acquaint her with the heart-breaking news, and with a suppressed shriek Maud Conyers ran breathlessly to her husband's room.

It was a sad scene, that meeting between husband and wife. The sands of life were running out fast, and the last loving parting was at hand. To both it was very bitter, for it was for the stricken man a going out into the dark. No ray of hope illumined the unseen world, and he could form no idea of the bourne to which he was drifting. Neither husband nor wife had given a thought to the momentous question of their souls. They had both lived only for pleasure, and now, as one lay face to face with death, the other could impart no comfort nor hope.

A skilful surgeon had been summoned to consult with the one who was first on the scene, and under his treatment the sufferer somewhat revived. "He might live a day or two," the new comer said, "but he could never recover." While the two men of science were consulting, Maud was alone in her room, thinking. A friend of her girlhood had called upon her a few days before to ask her for subscription to a charity. He was a clergyman now, though he had once been a prominent man in the world of fashion. She remembered the sensation made when he suddenly bade farewell to his worldly friends and gave his life to the service of religion. Maud had pitied him then as an enthusiast; she thought him almost demented, and wondered how one so brilliant could abandon society to visit "horrid people who lived in tenement houses, and stand at the bedsides of fever-stricken hospital patients."

Could her old and whilom despised friend help them now, Maud asked herself, and did not stay to consider how strange it was that she should desire his presence rather than that of her fashionable worldly acquaintances. She penned a hasty but importunate note to the clergyman, begging him to come immediately, and entrusting it to her coachman, instructed him to drive quickly, to wait for the clergyman and bring him without fail.

Before another hour had passed the servant of Christ was at the Conyers' mansion, and, standing by the aristocratic sufferer, surrounded by all the elegant appointments that wealth could purchase, he delivered the same message that he had proclaimed so often before in the poverty-stricken homes of the destitute. God is no respecter of persons, and the message of the Gospel was blessed to the dying aristocrat as it had been blessed to countless multitudes of the poor. It needed no special adaptation. The blessed word "Whosoever" covered this case as it covered all others. When at midnight of the following day the wounded man breathed his last, it was in the confident hope of salvation through the blood of Jesus; and he wondered most of all at the assurance that one who had neglected God all his life would not be cast out now that he humbly sought for mercy.

Maud Conyers, too, learned a lesson during those hours of woe she has not forgotten. She saw in the eyes of her beloved husband the light of joy and hope, and she sought for herself the same peace and consolation. Many attempts were made to draw her back into the scenes of pleasure of which she had once been the most brilliant ornament. But they were made in vain. Her life is one of consecration. Her wealth and her time are given to works of Christian service, and many a home on which sickness and poverty are pressing heavily is brightened by her visits and its anxieties relieved by her bounty. A happiness the world never gave her fills her heart, and the thought of death has no terrors for her.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

A Confession.

ROLAND SEFTON sat silent, with his shapely hands resting on his knees, and his handsome face turned toward the hearth, where the logs had burned down and emitted only a low and fitful flame. The little room was scarcely lighted by it, and looked all the darker for the blackness of the small uncurtained window, through which the ebony face of night was peering in. This bare, uncovered casement troubled him, and from time to time he turned his eyes uneasily toward it. But what need could there be of a curtain, when they were a mile away from any habitation, and where no road crossed the moor, except the rugged green pathway, worn into deep ruts by old Marlowe's own wagon? Yet, as if touched by some vague sympathy with him, Phebe rose, and pinned one of her large, rough working aprons across it.

"Phebe," he said, as she stepped softly back to her seat, "you and I have been friends a long time; and your father and I have been friends all my life. Do you recollect me staying here a whole week when I was a schoolboy?"

"Yes," she answered, her eyes glistening in the dusky light; "but for you I should have known nothing, only what work had to be done for father. You taught me my alphabet that week, and the hymns I have said every night since then before I go to sleep. You helped me to teach myself painting; and if I ever paint a picture worth looking at, it will be your doing."

"No, no; you are a born artist, Phebe Marlowe," he said, "though perhaps the world may never know it. But being such friends as you say, I will trust you. Do you think me worthy of trust, true and honest as a man should be, Phebe?"

"As true and honest as the day," she cried, with eager emphasis.

"And a Christian?" he added, in a lower voice.

"Yes," she answered, "I do not know a Christian if you are not one."

"That is the sting of it," he groaned; "true, and honest, and a Christian. And yet, Phebe, if I were taken by the police to-night, or if I be taken by them to-morrow, I shall be lodged in Riversborough jail, and tried before a jury of my townspeople at the assizes next month."

"No, it is impossible!" she cried, stretching out her brown, hard-working hand, and laying it on his white and shapely one, which had never known toil.

"You would not send me to jail," he said; "I know that well enough. But I deserve it, my poor girl. They would find me guilty and sentence me to a convict prison. I saw Dartmoor prison on my wedding journey with Felicita, Heaven help me! She liked the wild, solitary moor, with its great tors and its desolate stillness, and one day we went near to the prison. Those grim walls seemed to take possession of me; I felt oppressed and crushed by them. I could not forget them for days after, even with Felicita by my side."

His voice trembled as he spoke, and a quiver ran through his whole frame, which seemed to thrill through Phebe's; but she only pressed her pitiful hand more closely on his.

"I might have escaped last night," he went on, "but I stumbled over a poor girl in the street, dying. A young girl, no older than you, without a penny or a friend; a sinner too like myself; and I could not leave her there alone. Only in finding help for her I lost my chance. The train to London was gone, and there was no other till ten this morning. I expected Mr. Clifford to be at the bank to-day; if I had only known he would not be there I could have got away then. But I came here, why I hardly know. You could not hide me for long if you would; but there was no one else to help me."

"But what have you done, sir?" she asked with a tremulous long-drawn sigh.

"Done?" he repeated; "ay, there's the question. I wonder if I can be honest and true now with only Phebe Marlowe listening. I could have told my mother, perhaps, if it had been of any use; but I would die rather than tell Felicita. Done, Phebe! I've appropriated securities trusted to my keeping, pledging some and selling others for my own use. I've stolen £10,000."

"And you could be sent to prison for it?" she said in a low voice, glancing uneasily round as if she fancied she would be overheard.

"For I don't know how many years," he answered.

"It would kill Mrs. Sefton," she said. "Oh, how could you do it?"

"It was for Felicita I did it," he replied absently; "for my Felicita only."

For a few minutes Phebe's brain was busy, but not yet with the most sorrowful thoughts. There could be no shadow of doubt in her mind that this dearest friend of hers, sitting beside her in the twilight, was guilty of the crime he had confessed, but she could not as yet dwell upon the crime. He was in imminent peril; and his peril threatened the welfare of nearly all whom she loved. Ruin and infamy for him meant ruin and infamy for them all. She must save him if possible.

"Phebe," he said, breaking the dreary silence, "I ought to tell you one thing more. The money your father left with me—the savings of his life—six hundred pounds—it is all gone. He intrusted it to me, and made his will, appointing me your guardian; such confidence he had in me. I have made both him and you penniless."

"I think nothing of that," she answered. "What should I ever have been but for you? A dull, ignorant country girl, living a life little higher than my sheep and cattle. We are rich enough, my father and me. This cottage, and the fields about it, are our own. But I must go and tell father."

"Must he be told?" asked Roland Sefton anxiously.

"We've no secrets," she replied; "and there's no fear of him, you know. He would see if I was in trouble; and I shall be in trouble," she added, in a sorrowful voice.

She opened the cottage door, and going out, left him alone. It was a familiar place to him; but hitherto it had been only the haunt of happy holidays, from the time when he had been a schoolboy until his last autumn's shooting of grouse and woodcock on the wide moors. Old Marlowe had been one of his earliest friends; and Phebe had been something like a humble younger sister to him. If any one in the world could be depended upon to help him, outside his own family, it must be old Marlowe and his daughter.

And yet, when she left him his first impulse was to rise and flee while yet there was time—before old Marlowe knew his secret. Phebe was a girl, living as girls do, in a region of sentiment and feeling, hardly understanding a crime against property. A girl like her had no idea of what his responsibility and his guilt were, money ranking so low in her estimate of life. But old Marlowe would look at it quite differently. His own careful earnings, scraped together by untiring industry and ceaseless self-denial, were lost—stolen by the man he had trusted implicitly. For Roland Sefton did not spare himself any self-reproaches; he did not attempt to hide or palliate his sin. There were other securities for small sums, like old Marlowe's, gone like his, and ruin would overtake half a dozen poor families; though the bulk of the loss would fall upon his senior partner, who was a hard man, of unbending sternness and integrity. If old Marlowe proved a man of the same inflexible stamp he was lost.

But he sat still, waiting and listening. Round that lonely cottage, as he well knew, the wind swept from whatever quarter it was blowing; sighing softly, or wailing, moaning, or roaring past it, as ceaselessly as the sound of waves against a fisherman's hut on the sea-coast. It was crying and sobbing now, rising at intervals into a shriek, as if to warn him of coming peril. He went to the window, and met the black face of the night, hiding everything from his eye. Neither moon nor star gleamed in the sky. But even if old Marlowe was merciful he could not stay there, but must go out, as he had done last night from his own home, lashed like a dog from every familiar hearth by an unseen hand and a heavy scourge.

Phebe had not lingered, though she seemed long away. As she drew near the little workshop, she saw the wagon half laden with some church furniture her father had been carving, and with which he and she were to start at daybreak for a village about twenty miles off. She heard the light tap of his carving tools as she opened the door, and found him finishing the wings of a spread-eagle. He had pushed back the paper cap he wore from his forehead, which was deeply furrowed, and shaded by a few straggling tufts of gray hair. He took no notice of her entrance until she touched his arm with her hand; and then he looked at her with eyes blue like her own, but growing dim with age, and full of the pitiful, uncomplaining gaze of one who is deaf and dumb. But his face brightened and his smile was cheerful, as he began to talk eagerly with his fingers, throwing in many gestures to aid his slow speech. Phebe, too, smiled and gesticulated in silent answer, before she told him her errand.

"The carving is finished, father," she said. "Could we not start at once, and be at Upchurch before five to-morrow morning?"

"Twenty miles; eight hours; easily," he answered; "but why?"

"To help Mr. Sefton," she said. "He wants to get down to Southampton, and Upchurch is on the way. Father, it must be done; you would never see a smile upon my face again if we did not do it."

The keen, wistful eyes of her father were fastened alternately upon her troubled face and her moving hands as slowly and silently she spelled out on her fingers the sad story she had just listened to. His own face changed rapidly from astonishment to dismay, and from dismay to a passionate rage. If Roland Sefton could have seen it he would have made good his escape. But still Phebe's fingers went on pleading for him; and the smile, which she said her father would never see again—a pale, wan smile—met his eyes as he watched her.

"He has been so good to you and me," she went on, with a sob in her throat; and unconsciously she spoke out the words aloud and slowly as she told them off on her fingers; "he learned to talk with you as I do, and he is the only person almost in the world who can talk to you without your slate and pencil, father. It was good of him to take that trouble. And his father was your best friend, wasn't he? How good Madame used to be when I was a little girl, and you were carving all that woodwork at the old bank, and she let me stay there with you! All our happiest days have come through them. And now we can deliver them from great misery."

"But my money?" he interposed.

"Money is nothing between friends," she said eagerly. "Will you make my life miserable, father? I shall be thinking of them always, night and day; and they will never see me again if he is sent to jail through our fault. There never was a kinder man than he is; and I always thought him a good man till now."

"A thief; worse than a common thief," said her father. "What will become of my little daughter, when I am dead?"

Phebe made no answer except by tears. For a few minutes old Marlowe watched her bowed head and face hidden in her hands, till a gray hue came upon his withered face, and the angry gleam died away from his eyes. Hitherto, her slightest wish had been a law to him; and to see her weeping was anguish to him. To have a child who could hear and speak had been a joy that had redeemed his life from wretchedness, and crowned it with an inexhaustible delight. If he never saw her smile again, what would become of him? She was hiding her face from him even now, and there was no medium of communication between them save by touch. He must call her attention to what he had to say by making her look at him. Amost timidly he stretched out his withered and cramped hand to lay it upon her head.

"I must do whatever you please," he said, when she lifted up her face and looked at him with tearful eyes; "if it killed me I must do it. But it is a hard thing you bid me do, Phebe."

He turned away to brush the last speck of dust m the eagle's wings, and lifting it up carefully ried it away to pack in his wagon, Phebe hold- the lantern for him till all was done. Then, d in hand they walked down the foot-worn path oss the field to the house, as they had done ever ce she had been a tottering little child, hardly e to clasp his one finger with her baby hand.

Roland Sefton was crouching over the dying em- s on the hearth, more in the utter misery of il than in bodily chilliness, though he felt cold d shivering, as if stripped of all that made life sirable to him. There is no icy chill like that. did not look round when the door opened, ough Phebe spoke to him ; for he could not face Marlowe, or force himself to read the silent eloquent fingers, which only could utter words reproach. The dumb old man stood on the reshold, gazing at his averted face and downcast ad, and an inarticulate cry of mingled rage and ef broke from his silent lips, such as Phebe her- f had never heard before, and which, years after- rd, sounded at times in Roland Sefton's ears.

NADAB AND ABIHU.

S. Lesson for Oct. 30. Lev. 10 : 1–11. Golden Text, Ps. 19 : 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN the two chapters preceding that from which r subject for to-day is taken, we read of the anoint- of Aaron and his sons; Nadab and Abihu, ose history we consider to-day, were of the mber. They had been washed with water, othed with the holy, priestly garments, the blood the ram of consecration had been put "upon e tip of their right ear, and upon the thumbs of ir right hands, and upon the great toes of their ht feet," and the holy anointing oil had been ured upon them. For seven days they had ten nothing but consecrated food, they had ver gone out at the door of the tabernacle night day for seven days, for this they were com- anded to do, and to "keep the charge of the rd, that ye die not." They had been present hen Aaron, their father, "lifted up his hand ward the people and blessed them," they were esent there, they saw the glory of the Lord hich "appeared unto all the people;" and they w that "there came a fire out from before the rd, and consumed upon the altar the burnt fering and the fat : which when all the people w, they shouted and fell on their faces" (Lev. : 9, 22–24).

How came it, then, that these sons of Aaron, ese anointed and consecrated men, "took either them his censer and put fire therein, and it incense therein, and offered strange fire be- re the Lord, which He commanded them ot?" The fire which came down from heaven as God's fire, which they were commanded keep ever burning (Lev. 6 : 13) no earth-kin- ed fire could be tolerated upon God's altar. here is something terribly solemn in the fact that ey who committed this daring sin of presumption ere the only ones mentioned by name of the venty elders of Israel who came up unto the ord in Mount Sinai, and "saw the God of Is- el" (Ex. 24 : 9, 10). Their position as Aaron's dest sons, their unusual privileges, their solemn onsecration, would have led us to expect other nings of them.

"Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and aketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth om the Lord" (Jer. 17 : 5). Never let us make ither gifts or graces an excuse for trusting in an. And let us learn that no spiritual attain- ents, however great; no intercourse with God, owever near; neither the anointing of the Holy host nor yet the full consecration of ourselves to od, is in itself sufficient to keep us. Our only afety is in the blood of our beloved Lord. "Nothing but the blood of Jesus." When we ee a Christian highly gifted, let us bless our God, ut not exalt men, when he appears to be full to verflowing with the unction of the blessed Spirit ; till let us know that in himself he is nothing, and et us pray that God may keep him low, that so He nay continue to bless and to use him. Keep back hy servant also from presumptuous sins ; let them not have dominion over me ; then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.

Awful judgment followed the sin of these two priests. "And there went out fire from the Lord and devoured them, and they died before the Lord. Then Moses said unto Aaron, This is it that the Lord spake, saying, I will be sanctificed in them that come nigh Me, and before all the people I will be glorified. And Aaron [the bereaved father] held his peace." It must have been a fearful moment for him. "Like father like son;" surely the sin of the golden calf and his own grievous part in it must have risen up before Aaron's eyes ; but nothing was be done, and he must hold his peace. God is a holy God, His service is a holy service. "Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord" (Isa. 52 : 11). For this reason "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver ; and He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness" (Mal. 3 : 3).

The cousins of the dead priests were called to carry away the slain bodies, but neither father nor brothers were allowed to take one last look at the dead, for God's priests were His property. Israel was under the law, the time of grace was not yet. "And Moses said unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar, and unto Haman, his sons, uncover not your heads, neither rend your clothes ; lest ye die, and lest wrath come upon all the people ; but let your brethren, the whole house of Israel, bewail the burning which the Lord hath kindled. And ye shall not go out of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die : for the anointing oil of the Lord is upon you." "Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples : and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come" (1 Cor. 10 : 11). God has made us kings and priests unto Him, we are called before all else to be separate from the dead. "The law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. 8 : 2).

The verses which follow give us some clue to the origin of Nadab and Abihu's sin. "And the Lord spake unto Aaron, saying, Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die : it shall be a statute forever throughout your generations : and that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean ; and that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses." Alas, it seems likely that Nadab and Abihu, after the solemn days of consecration, had been drinking wine, perhaps the strong wine which ought to be poured out unto the Lord (Num. 28 : 7), had become excited, that the enemy had taken care that the excitement should take a religious turn, and thus it happened that they had desecrated the altar of their God by bringing an unhallowed offering and "strange fire."

Can such a sin be consummated in our days of spiritual worship? Alas, yes! When the work of God is done in the spirit of emulation, and when the desire to have larger meetings than others, more successful meetings than others, prompts a Christian worker to renewed energy, this is fire, but such as never burned upon the altar, for it is strange fire. When a man in the excitement of a great natural energy rushes forward in the work of God, takes every opening, strains his powers to the utmost, without first learning to hear the voice of God, to know whether all this effort is really of Him, there is strange fire, it is not the fire of God's altar. Still worse, if a man who is nervous, seeks to brace himself for preaching by taking wine or sal volatile, he is seeking for strange fire. A young clergyman was going to preach in the church of that saintly man of God, the late Rev. Robert Aitken, of Pendeen, and feeling nervous at the thought of preaching before such a man, he said, "Will you give me a glass of wine before I preach?" "I would see you die first," was the reply ; "you need a different power than that to preach Christ's Gospel."

Much strange fire has been offered in our outward worship for many years past, the place of the Holy Ghost has been usurped, men of God, instead of seeking to be possessed and energized by the Holy Ghost, instead of yielding themselves up to Him as willing, humble instruments, have worked in another spirit altogether, and been independent of the altar fire, thinking that their learning or their earnestness, or their natural power over their fellow men sufficed. Others have sought to control the Holy Ghost and make use of His power to quicken into life their plans and methods, to guide Him instead of being guided by Him. Now all this savors of "strange" fire. To preach "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. 1), we must be at the disposal of the Holy Ghost, and must learn to give place to Him and to work under Him ; we cannot give Him the second place. The Holy Ghost comes only when He is welcomed, and where He comes He must fill the whole place, the whole heart, the whole body ; then He can act. In these days of infidelity and superstition we need a power which will convince. When Stephen was full of the Holy Ghost, of faith, and of power, men could not resist the wisdom and the spirit with which he spoke. God send among us this power.

Now are we ready to put away all strange fire? Look at the work of Müller of Bristol, how steady, how enduring it is! nothing done by fits and starts, and yet these great houses full of orphans tell throughout the world that God answers prayer. The fire from heaven burns in this work ; it is not carried on with strange fire. Look at the work of Mr. Hudson Taylor in China, with his staff of missionaries, all of whom trust the Lord for food and clothing, no salary being assured to any of them. When we think how they have been enabled to penetrate into the very interior of China, and that sometimes young women alone have been the agents used, and many natives have been brought by their means to the feet of Jesus, we see that the altar fire is there burning. Neither Müller nor Hudson Taylor make desperate appeals for help ; the Spirit of God, who guides into all truth, has led them to the truth of the trustworthiness of their God, and they count on Him.

Strange fire brings death in its wake, it cannot endure ; if we are ready to put it away, we must let God judge us for it, i.e., bring us to death and nothingness. When He purely purges away the dross and takes away all the tin (Isa. 1 : 25) very much is taken away which we have thought to be silver. Much grows cold which we had thought to be heaven's fire. Let Him have His way, He makes no mistakes, and though we may be humbled into nothingness, and lose all esteem for ourselves, we shall be fitter for the Master's use, though others may not understand us, and may think that the position of nothingness which we take is a mistake, let us follow the meek and lowly Master and be led alone by His Word and His Spirit. Then in the place of our power His will be manifest, instead of our own fire, the fire of the Holy Ghost.

Deuteronomy a Hated Book.—More Virulent attacks have been made on the book of Deuteronomy by rationalists than on any other portion of God's word, and Dr. Mackay of Hull, in a recent address, suggested a reason for this spite. He said that when he was in Germany he could not tell how it was that the wonderful critics over there seemed to have a special spite against the Book of Deuteronomy. They did not care so much for Genesis, Numbers, Leviticus, and the rest, but for Deuteronomy they had a peculiar dislike. At last he found out how it was. When Satan tempted Jesus he received three thrusts from the Sword of the Spirit, in the form of three texts, and they were all taken from the Book of Deuteronomy. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God and Him only shalt thou serve." No wonder that the German Rationalistic servants of Satan should hate a book from which he received thrusts like these!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Intense Excitement in Ireland has been Produced by the arrest of Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, Mr. O'Kelly and other prominent leaders of the Land League. Mr. Parnell was arrested on Thursday, Oct. 13th, at his hotel in Dublin, as he was preparing to proceed to Naas, where he was announced to preside at the Kildare County Convention of the Land League. He was quietly conveyed to Kilmainham jail before any of his followers were aware of his arrest. The warrant against him was for "inciting the people to intimidate others from paying their rents and from taking the benefits accruing under the new Land act." Since his incarceration he has been served with a second warrant charging him with treason.

Mr. Dillon succeeded Mr. Parnell as the leader of the organization and he was arrested on Saturday afternoon. His last public appearance was at an Indignation Meeting held on Friday in the Dublin Rotunda. The meeting was crowded to excess and thousands of persons were unable to gain admission. Mr. Dillon, like Mr. Parnell, is charged with treason. The other leaders arrested on Saturday were O'Brien the editor of United Ireland, the journal of the League; James O'Kelly, member of Parliament, formerly a reporter on the New York Herald; Mr. Quinn, Secretary of the League, and Mr. Sexton, a prominent speaker. Warrants have been issued for the arrest of many others, some of whom have made good their escape to France. The cable reports that Sackville, Grafton and the principal Dublin Streets were on Saturday and Sunday crowded with people, cheering, hooting, yelling, and whistling. The military were under arms at all the barracks. Mounted police were patrolling everywhere. The ordinary force of foot and police has been doubled, and twenty rounds of ball cartridge served out to each soldier and policeman.

The Policy of the British Government in thus attempting to suppress the Land League by force, has given rise to marked difference of opinion both in England and Ireland. Some of the leading journals, both Liberal and Conservative, regard the determined action as wise, and express the opinion that it ought to have to have been taken long ago. The general opinion, however, is that it was necessary, owing to the sympathy the Liberals showed toward the Irish tenantry before they came into office, that concessions should be made to them before using force; and that a liberal land law having been passed, this is the proper time for summary measures.

On the other hand, there are not wanting people who view the proceedings of the Government with regret. They contend that the Land Act had weakened the Land League, and that if the leaders had been let alone, the allegiance of the people to that organization would have been weaned by the substantial benefits of the new law; but by imprisoning the agitators, the Government have excited the sympathy of the people for men they were beginning to despise, but whom they now regard as martyrs. It is also charged that Mr. Gladstone's action is the result of personal vindictiveness. He assailed Mr. Parnell by name, and Mr. Parnell retorted with asperity, and then the Premier, who had borne with equanimity the outrages on the landlords and the lawless doings of the League, was stirred to action by the personal attack on himself. It is likewise regretted by many liberal politicians because "the stamping out process" places England on the same footing as Russia, and is unlikely to achieve the object all desire, the pacification of Ireland.

The Egyptian Difficulty Remains Unsettled. Great Britain has proposed to France that a joint demonstration should be made by the two countries, and suggested that an identical note be addressed to Turkey, explaining the perfect understanding existing between France and England, and declaring that while both nations fully recognized the Porte's right of Suzerainty they would not tolerate any manifestation likely to endanger the influence and rights proposed by the two Powers in the financial administration. The English and French diplomatic agents at Cairo were also informed that, if required, two iron-clads would be sent to Alexandria. Hobart Pasha, an Englishman in the service of the Sultan of Turkey, has written to an English journal that "Nobody can deny the Sultan's right of sovereignty in Egypt, and, although the Sultan has wisely and liberally allowed foreign interference in the finances of Egypt, it is too much to tell him that when a serious émeute occurs among the troops, who are nothing more nor less than Turkish soldiers, he is expected to fold his arms and say nothing." As to the relative situation of England and France on the question, the London Times says: "Although the government is naturally anxious to maintain an understanding with France in Egyptian affairs, it will probably recognize the necessity of making it perfectly clear that the interests of France in Egypt, however important, cannot for a moment be compared to ours." Thus Egypt appears likely to embroil Turkey, England, and France in mutual jealousy.

The Trial of the Four Russian Nihilists of the Black Division was commenced in St. Petersburg on October 11th. It lasted the whole day, and the verdict was not announced until half past two the following morning. The prisoners were allowed the assistance of counsel, and besides were permitted to make speeches in their own defence. Kriloff, the female nihilist, was found guilty, and sentenced to five years transportation; Piankoff was banished to Siberia; Kislenko was sentenced to one month's imprisonmnt, and Pereletchikoff was acquitted.

The Concessions Demanded by the Boers of the right to hold slaves and to manage their own relations with the natives are apparently to be refused by the British Government. The ominous announcement is made that the government has selected a general officer to proceed to South Africa and take command of the troops there, should hostilities break out. This indicates that the Ministry has resolved to hold the Boers to the terms of the convention. A misapprehension exists in the Transvaal as to the power of Great Britain. Some of the Boers insist that the British should be treated as defeated foes, and they believe that if the struggle is renewed, the whole power England could put in the field would be vanquished. The leaders, however, have a better knowledge of the situation and it is thought that they may yet succeed in obtaining a ratification of the treaty.

A Disastrous Hurricane Passed Over Great Britain on Friday, October 14th, doing considerable damage. Reports show the loss of property all over the country to have been enormous. Many lives were lost by the blowing down of houses and chimneys. At least twenty persons were killed in London, and a large number were wounded. Reports from the provinces mention innumerable disasters, especially on the coasts. Telegraphic communication was everywhere interrupted. "Up to this morning," states a telegram, "about fifty or sixty boats have not returned. There was considerable damage done to the shipping in the Mersey. The gale inflicted severe damage to property in all parts of the country. Many persons were killed and many injured. Houses were unroofed and unfinished buildings collapsed."

An Act of Barbarous Cruelty is Reported from Ireland. A man was recently arrested at Kanturk for putting needles into the potatoes which he was giving to the cattle of a Boycotted farmer, and at Tipperary a discovery was made of several large cases filled with packets of needles which were being distributed to men who undertook to put them in the hay of cattle and horses belonging to obnoxious persons. There is something diabolical in this device. The men engaged in this Land League struggle appear to be lost to ordinary human feeling, or they would recoil from inflicting suffering so horrible on innocent animals.

The Revised New Testament has been Approved by the Congregationalists of Great Britain. A cable dispatch dated October 5th says: The Congregational Union of England and Wales, now in session at Manchester, yesterday carried a resolution tendering the hearty thanks of the Union to the English and American revisers of the New Testament, and congratulating them upon the favorable reception of their labors by the general body of Christians. The Union passed a resolution of sympathy with America in the death of President Garfield. A letter was read from the Rev. Dr. Hopkins, chairman of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, who is now in Paris, in which he expressed his strong fraternal feeling for the Union and alluded to the English sympathy in the case of President Garfield. The Rev. Mr. Trowbridge, for twenty-five years a missionary in Armenia, described the work being carried on by American missionaries there. Drs. Strong, Storrs, and Strieby, American delegates, also spoke.

A Grotesque Proposal is Made in an Advertisement in a British newspaper. It suggests that a duplicate of a statue of Mr. Gladstone, which is now ready for casting, be made and presented to the United States, to be erected in Washington "to commemorate the kindly sympathy expressed from the highest to the lowest with the United States in the national sorrow." The cost of the duplicate would be $15,000. The motive of the advertiser is not wholly disinterested, as it appears he is the bronze founder. The kindly sympathy of England with us in our hour of darkness and sorrow will never be forgotten, and the idea of commemorating it is not in itself objectionable, but there is something singularly incongruous in commemorating British sympathy with America by sending us a statue of Mr. Gladstone.

The Cedars of Lebanon.—The Once Famous and extensive cedar forest of Lebanon, according to a writer in the Vienna Politische Correspondenz, has dwindled down to the dimensions of a mere thicket, numbering about 400 trees. To save it from complete destruction and preserve it at least in its present extent, Rustem Pacha, the Governor-General of the Lebanon, has issued a special ordinance, containing a series of stringent regulations calculated to check, if not quite to put a stop to, the vandalism and carelessness of most travellers. It is expressly forbidden to put up tents or other kinds of shelter within the district of the trees, or to light fires or cook any provisions in their vicinity. No one is allowed to break off a bough or even a twig from the trees. It is forbidden to bring any beasts of burden, be they horses, mules, asses, or any other kind of animal, within the district. Should oxen, sheep, goats, or other pasturage cattle be found within the prescribed limits, they will be irredeemably confiscated.

A Fortune Lost Through Distrust of the Jews.—One of the best known citizens of Hanover has lost his entire fortune through the Anti-Jewish agitation. Having confided his capital with an eminent Jewish banker, one of his friends, a determined Jew hater, remonstrated with him and persuaded him that, as a Christian, the principle of Christian charity compelled him to patronize the members of his own faith. In consequence he notified his banker of his intention to withdraw his money. The latter, without enforcing the ordinary month's notice, immediately returned the capital entire to the depositor. The same day the owner deposited the sum thus withdrawn with a Christian banker. A fortnight afterward the latter failed for a large sum, and the depositor thereby paid the penalty of his Anti-Semitism.

"Coming Wars," by the Rev. M. Baxter. Two Pamphlets; price five cents each by mail. First Pamphlet contains "Ten Signs of the End, and a Description of Approaching Events;" with two maps of the territory to be under Antichrist's rule, and four large diagrams. Second Pamphlet contains valuable quotations from twenty-six Expositors on the same subject. Address, with price inclosed, The Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Following Works by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon are for sale at The Christian Herald Office at prices much below what they can be obtained for elsewhere. Remittances must accompany orders. John Ploughman's Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 cents. The Treasury of David, an exposition of the Book of Psalms, vols. II., III., and IV., from Psa. 27 to 103, $3 a vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day Book. This popular gift-book contains a suitable passage selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every day in the year, with a blank space opposite for autographs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeon appear at their respective birthdays. The book is gorgeously bound, and the price is 75 cents.

THREE EMINENT PHYSICIANS.

DURING the eighty days that President Garfield lay suffering, medical science became an almost popular study. Amid their sympathy and sorrow, fifty millions of people directed their attention to the wondrous construction of the human body. Before then thousands of people did not know the number of beats the pulse of a healthy man gives in a minute, or what was normal temperature, or respiration. Then, too, we realized how important issues depended on medical skill, and how important a part the physician is called on to perform in the affairs of life. Thus the warrior, the statesman, the millionaire banker, generally very prominent in society, were in effect bidden to stand aside to make way for the physician. So it often is in the crisis of our lives. We surround ourselves with friends whom we love; we would have them often with us; but let sickness or a sudden injury befall us, and the man who receives the warmest welcome is the skilful physician, though he may be a stranger.

This week we give on our first page the portraits of three men whose names are well known in the records of medical science, believing that the interest recently quickened in the subject of medicine will render information in this department of the world's benefactors welcome to our readers.

DR. WILLIAM HARVEY.

Born at Folkestone—His Parents—Sent to Canterbury Grammar School—And Cambridge—Studies in Italy—Obtains his Diploma—Joins the College of Physicians—Becomes Lecturer on Anatomy—Publishes His Treatise on "The Motion of the Heart and Blood"—Appointed Physician to Charles I.—His Demeanor at the Battle of Edgehill—Death in 1657—Unveiling his Statue on August 6, 1881—Pulpit Notices in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey.

ONLY a few weeks ago a group of distinguished men assembled at Folkestone, England, to do honor to Dr. William Harvey, who as the discoverer of the circulation of the blood is looked upon as the father of modern medical science. A statue had been erected in his native town, and, amid impressive ceremonies, it was formally unveiled.

William Harvey was born in Folkestone on April 1st, 1578, a little more than three hundred and three years ago. Of the parents of Harvey little is known. They had a numerous family, consisting of seven sons and two daughters.

William, the first-born, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece, adopted the profession of medicine, and five of his brothers were merchants of weight and substance, trading especially with Turkey and the Levant, at that time the main channel through which the wealth of the East flowed into Europe.

HARVEY'S MOTHER.

There is, however, evidence that, like so many men who have become celebrated in the world, Dr. Harvey had a good mother. That evidence is contained in the inscription on her monumental tablet in the chancel of the old church at Folkestone. Her epitaph implies that she was a woman of such mark and reputation, that it was considered due to her memory to leave her moral portrait to posterity, as is done in the beautiful and affectionate words, penned, as is supposed, by her illustrious eldest son himself: "A.D. 1605, Nov. 8. Dyed in ye 50th yeere of her age, Joan, wife of Tho. Harvey, Mother of seven sones and two davghters; a Godly harmless woman, a chast loveing wife, a charitable qviet neighbovr, a cofortable frendly matron, a prvident diligent hvswyfe, a carefvll teder-harted mother, deere to her hvsband, reverensed of her children, beloved of her neighbovrs, elected of God; whose sovle rests in Heaven, her body in this grave: To her a happy advantage; to hers an vnhappy loss."

At ten years of age, in 1588, Harvey was sent to the Grammar School of Canterbury, where he was initiated into a knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages; and there he seems to have remained until he was about fifteen years of age. In May, 1593, he entered as a scholar at Caius College, Cambridge, where he spent from three to four years in the study of classics, dialectics, and physics. From there he went to Italy; and after passing four years at Padua, he being then in his twenty-fourth year, obtained his diploma as Doctor of Physic, with license "to practice and to teach Arts and Medicine in every land and seat of learning."

ENTERS ON HIS PROFESSION.

Having returned to England in the course of the same year, and submitted to the requisite forms, he received his Doctor's degree from the University of Cambridge; and then, going to London, he entered on the practice of his profession and married the daughter of a physician of the day, Dr. Lancelot Brown.

In 1604 Harvey joined the College of Physicians, and in 1607, the term of his probation having passed, he was admitted to a fellowship. From this period onward he was one of the most conspicuous men of his time and profession.

At the first vacancy he was appointed Physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in 1609, and in 1615, in his thirty-seventh year, was chosen lecturer on anatomy at the College of Physicians. Early in the course of these lectures he presented a detailed exposition of his views concerning the circulation of the blood, which he repeated yearly, but which he did not issue in book form until 1628, when he was fifty-one years of age. Then his celebrated treatise on the motion of the heart and blood first saw the light, and laid the foundation of modern medical science.

BECOMES PHYSICIAN TO KING JAMES I.

Harvey by this time had been chosen Physician-Extraordinary to King James I., and seems now to have been at the zenith of his fame as a practitioner. He was subsequently appointed Physician to Charles I., by whom he appears to have been greatly loved. This unhappy king was afflicted with a malady which Harvey himself could not cure, and which, in greater or less degree, afflicted all the Stuarts. He had, we are told, an incurable propensity to dark and crooked ways, a tyrannical spirit which was dangerous to the liberties of his people. He was a bad, wicked man, as were both his sons. Had he applied to the Great Physician, he might have received a new heart, and have lived to a good old age instead of dying on the scaffold, a warning to all kingly wrong-doers. But Charles I. made no such application, and for men so afflicted the pharmacopœia has no remedy.

Harvey's professional prosperity was marred by his great discovery. He himself confesses that "after my book on the 'Circulation of the Blood' came out I fell mightily in my practice; and it is believed by the vulgar that I am crack-brained, and all of the physicians are against me." So has it mostly been with those who have added to the sum of human knowledge. Nearly all great discoverers have been ridiculed and opposed when they gave forth their inventions in advance of the age in which they lived.

In 1632 he was formally chosen physician to King Charles, and thenceforth appears to have devoted much of his time to attendance upon the king and retainers of the court. In 1639 he accompanied his sovereign on his first hostile expedition into Scotland, during which matters were amicably settled between the king and his Scottish subjects, whom he had driven to take up arms in defence of their religious liberties. As physician to the king, Harvey was with Charles also on his march toward the Border in the following year, when the king's authority received the first check at the battle of Newbury.

AT THE BATTLE OF EDGEHILL.

In the autumn of 1642 Charles brought matters to a crisis between himself and his English subjects in the persons of their elected representatives, and as he remained obstinate there was for them no resource but civil war or slavery. At the battle of Edgehill, October 23d, 1642, Harvey was present in the field, though he took no part in the sanguinary fray, and seems, indeed, to have felt little solicitude either about its progress or its issue. A historian of the period thus narrates the episode:

"When King Charles, by reason of the tumults, left London, Harvey attended him, and was at t[he] fight of Edge Hill with him; and during the fig[ht] the Prince (afterward Charles II.) and Duke o[f] York were committed to his care. He told m[e] that he withdrew with them under a hedge, an[d] tooke out of his pockett a booke and read. But he had not read very long before a bullet of a grea[t] gun grazed on the ground very neare him, whic[h] made him remove his station." The act of read[ing] a book pending a battle, the result of whic[h] was greatly to influence his master's fortunes, certainly shows a singular degree of coolness, and absence of interest in military matters.

Harvey afterward retired to Oxford with the king when the latter had been driven with deserved ignominy from his metropolis. Here the studious physician became again absorbed in his medical studies. Charles who was a great friend to Harvey allowed him the means and material necessary for his experiments, and took delight in being present thereat.

Our picture in the left-hand corner of the lower portion of the frontispiece represents Harvey explaining one of his experiments to Charles I. At Oxford the honorary degree of Doctor of Physic was conferred upon him, and he was made Warden of Merton College by the Royalist party in 1645, a position which he held for a year only, as the army of the Parliament captured Oxford in 1646. Soon after his house was plundered and burned by the same party, and, unfortunately, several unpublished works, of which only notices are given in other writings, were destroyed.

At the age of sixty-eight he retired to study, and soon afterward the second of his great works appeared, in 1651. In the following year, when he was regarded by common consent as the most distinguished anatomist and physician of his age, the College of Physicians placed his statue in their hall at Amen Corner, where it perished in the fire of London, in 1666.

His confidence in the beneficence of God, and the perfections of His handiwork as seen in nature, were unbounded. He appears also to have been possessed of an active religious sentiment. He evinces unmistakable and elevated piety through the whole of his later and more important treatises, and seizes every opportunity of giving utterance to his sense of the direct and immediate agency of God in nature.

In his will he "most humbly renders his soul to Him that gave it, and to his blessed Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

Accumulating years, and repeated attacks of gout, at length asserted their mastery over a declining body, and on June 3d, 1657, William Harvey, then in the eightieth year of his age, bade farewell to the agitations and vicissitudes of earth. The funeral took place a few days afterward at Hempstead, in Essex.

On Saturday, August 6th, 1881, more than two hundred members of the International Medical Congress, whose sessions had been held in London during the week, varied the round of their learned labors by a journey to Folkestone to assist at the

which his townsmen have erected in his honor, a picture of which appears in the right-hand section of the lower portion of our frontispiece. The proceedings on the occasion were prefaced by an address from Professor Owen, though the lapse of ages, and the eulogy of the physiologists of every country, left the orator little that was new to say on the subject. It is more than two centuries since the discoverer of the circulation of the blood was laid in his brother's vault at Hempstead, but even yet his reputation is as fresh as in the memorable year of 1626, when he published his classical "Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis." The statue which the Royal College of Physicians reared in his life-time, the bust still in their hall, that placed on his tomb, the statues in the University of London and in the House of Assembly in Sydney, and among other portraits that by Cornelius Jansen, which escaped the great fire, have made his features known to nearly ten generations.

We close our sketch with extracts from two ser-

s by well-known ministers which show the esite the Christian preacher forms of the func-s of the medical profession.

IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL,

Sunday afternoon, August 7th, the Rev. Canon lon, in the course of a sermon on "Christ healthe sick," remarked that "Teaching and heal-' might well be the motto of that great medical gress which they welcomed among them, and se work, like that of the Saviour Himself, cons the welfare of the whole human race. The ght carries us back eighteen hundred years to feet of Jesus of Nazareth, whose labors were uently more those of a doctor of a city hos-l seeing his out-patients, than those of an ordiclergyman of the present day. We have the rd of many cures effected by Christ. There hree cases of raising to life, six cures of demos, or persons suffering from various forms of tal disease, and seventeen cures of cases which it have presented themselves for treatment at ndon hospital—blindness deafness, dumbness, psy, dropsy, an issue of blood of twelve years' ding, a maimed limb, etc.; and these doubtless nly typical cases out of many. Christ's labors, ct, shed a radiance upon the whole medical ession."

IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY,

he morning of the same day, the Rev. Canon
y preached a sermon, bearing upon the work ne Medical Congress, many of whose foreign provincial members were present. Canon y took his text from 1 Thess. 5 : 23 : "I pray your whole spirit and soul and body be pred blameless unto the coming of our Lord s Christ." He said : "The conviction that work is in the true use of the word, a mission, been brought out to us in new vividness and r in the Gospel of Christ. Christianity, in nction from most beliefs of other days, grasps nity of nature in all its parts. It looks upon body not as an incumbrance, not as a prison-e, but as an integral part of our human na-capable of reaction upon our higher faculties, inking the individual with the physical world.
the text, the Gospel distinguishes the spirit the soul, and gives due importance to the performed by the body. The true perfection an's nature requires the perfection of the
as well as of the spirit."

PROFESSOR OWEN, F.R.S.

n in 1804—Education—His First Appoint-nt as Public Lecturer in 1843—Subsequent ppointments—His Statements on Two Sword-nes—Publications and Lectures.

CHARD OWEN, whose portrait appears in our tispiece this week, and who performed the mony of unveiling Dr. Harvey's monument at estone, was born at Lancaster, July 20, 1804, is now seventy-seven years of age. He red his early education at the grammar-school s native town. He afterward studied at the ersity of Edinburgh, and soon acquired a g bias for pursuing the subject of Compara-Anatomy. In 1825 he went to London, and ed St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where he beanatomical assistant to *the celebrated Dr.
nethy*. It had been Mr. Owen's intention to the navy, but when he finished his education ccepted an appointment as assistant to Mr.
the Curator of the Museum of the Royal Col-of Surgeons.

e first appointment of Mr. Owen as a public er was to the chair of Comparative Anatomy, 34. In 1836 he succeeded Sir Charles Bell rofessor of Anatomy and Physiology in the ge of Surgeons, and was, in the same year, nted by the College as first "Hunterian Pro-
." Mr. Owen's position as Curator of the erian Museum, to which he succeeded on the of Mr. Clift (whose only daughter he mar- n 1835), awakened in him a special interest in mous founder In 1837 he published a new n of Hunter's "Animal Economy," adding ll the known published papers of its author, iving in the preface for the first time a narra-f Hunter's real discoveries.

In 1856 he was appointed the Superintendent of the Department of Natural History in the British Museum. On the revival of the lectureship on Philosophy, on the foundation of Sir Robert Read, at the University of Cambridge, he was appointed Professor, and received the honorary degree of D.C.L. at the termination of the course.

He was subsequently chosen Fullerian Professor of Phyisology to the Royal Institution—an office which denotes its possessor to hold the highest rank in the branch of science to which it is attached. His reputation as an original investigator in natural science, with his contributions to the literature of science generally, led to his election as President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, at their meeting held in Leeds in 1858—an office in which he was succeeded by his late Royal Highness the Prince Consort in 1859. On the decease of Dr. Robert Brown, the great botanist—whom Humboldt expressively called "Botanicorum facile princeps"—Professor Owen was elected, in 1859, one of the eight Foreign Associates of the Academy of Sciences in the Institute of France. He is also a member of most of the learned societies in Europe and America.

At a trial which recently took place respecting a ship which was alleged to have been pierced by a sword-fish, Professor Owen made some interesting statements, which were thus reported. He said that he was acquainted with the nature of sword-fish. The sword was composed of the hardest bony substance known, and was covered with a substance still harder, like the enamel of a tooth. He was acquainted with two instances of these animals having penetrated ships. In both cases the swords were broken off and left in the vessels' sides. He knew of no instance of the sword having been withdrawn from a ship's side. One specimen of penetration was at Surgeons' Hall. In that case the vessel was an old gun brig, and the sword was found in breaking up the vessel. In this case the sword had "penetrated the copper sheathing, felt, deal, and hard oak timbers to the depth of fourteen inches, and nearly that extent of sword had been broken off by the effect of the blow, and had been retained in the wood. The fibres of the oak timber have been bent and crushed as by the passage of a swivel ball."

A second specimen was in the British Museum. The vessel was an East Indiaman, and the sword had gone in at least fourteen inches. He said that Mr. Hugh Cummings, a distinguished naturalist and accurate observer, was on a ship in the Bay of Panama when he felt a shock as though the ship had struck a rock. He rushed upon deck, and found that all the crew had rushed there too. Attention was attracted to a great dashing in the sea over the bow of the vessel, and then they saw a sword-fish, twelve feet long. It had run its sword through the timbers of the ship and into the berth beyond. The struggles of the fish to extricate itself ended in its snapping off the sword close to the head, and it was left in the timbers, just as in the instance mentioned above. Mr. Cummings told him (Professor Owen) that he saw the fish, that had killed itself by the rupture of vessels, consequent on the efforts that broke off the sword, rolling over and slowly descending.

Professor Owen has, by his indefatigable industry and sagacity, effected for natural history a larger amount of scientific research and instruction than any other person. He has brought to its study astonishing powers of observation, combined with accurate and severe reasoning, and the additions he has made to the general stock of information, in every department of the science, have been so varied and extensive as to make it a matter of surprise that one man could ever have produced such results.

He has published original papers of great lucidity on every branch of the animal kingdom, living and fossil, and it has been justly said of him that, from the sponge to man, he has thrown light on every subject he has touched. Some idea of the magnitude of his labors may be formed from the fact that his published productions amount to more than three hundred different papers and works, many of them being of the most voluminous and laborious character. In reference to the principles inductively established in Professor Owen's work on "The Archetype of the Animal Framework," it has been concisely remarked that "he is the Newton of Natural History."

He has lectured on his favorite topic in Exeter Hall for the Young Men's Christian Association, and is a reverential exponent of the works of God in Nature, from the smallest insect to the most exalted creature in the scale of creation.

SIR JAMES PAGET.

SIR JAMES PAGET, whose portrait appears in our frontispiece, together with those of Dr. Harvey and Professor Owen, is one of the most eminent surgeons of the day. He is the son of a well-known merchant in the Eastern counties of England, and was born at Great Yarmouth in 1814, being, therefore, now sixty-eight years of age.

Having qualified himself by a rigid course of study, Dr. Paget became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1836, and a Fellow in 1843. He is Sergeant-Surgeon Extraordinary to the Queen, Surgeon to the Prince of Wales, and Consulting Surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He has been President of the College of Surgeons since July, 1875.

He was created a baronet in August, 1871, and in the same month the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him by the University of Edinburgh. He is a voluminous author on surgical subjects, and his productions are highly valued by the medical profession.

He presided over the sessions of the recent International Congress in London. The Congress embraced the first naturalists of the age, and physicians who represented almost every civilized nation on the face of the globe. Over 2500 medical men, English and foreign, attended the deliberations of the different sections. This is the greatest assembly, we believe, in its representative nature, that has ever met to consider the science of healing, and, it may be concluded, has arrived at results which will bring permanent blessings upon mankind.

The Late President's Idea of the Highest blessing it was possible to invoke on the head of a beloved friend is expressed in the following lines, which, when he was a young professor, he inscribed in the album of a young lady of his acquaintance :

If the treasures of ocean were laid at my feet,
And its depths were all robbed of its coral and pearl,
And the diamonds were brought from the mountain's retreat,
And with them were placed all the wealth of the world—
Not silver, nor gold, nor the spoils of the sea,
Nor the garlands of fame that the world can bestow,
But a purified heart that from sin has made free,
I would ask for thee, friend, on thy journey below.

HIRAM, Jan. 8, 1857. J. A. GARFIELD.

A Night in a Spanish Dungeon.—The Rev. Fritz Hiedner, of Madrid, was lately arrested and ill-treated in a Spanish prison for no offence save the not having a passport. He writes : "I will not describe the night I passed among the prisoners in the dirty and unhealthy dungeon, which they forced me to occupy. When the jailer threw me in for the second time, the prisoners asked me who I was, and on hearing that I was a Protestant, one said, 'Oh, I know the Protestants still believe in God. We do not. How can you know that there is a God?' I answered that I knew because He heard me when I prayed to Him ; and when he asked me for a proof, I said, 'You all saw how the jailer abused me just now, and you see that I am man enough and strong enough to give him as good as he gave me ; and you may be sure he would have got it, had I not prayed to my God for patience. In that moment I got it and will keep it to the end.' This telling argument made a visible impression on them, and when I asked them to unite with me in prayer for our brutal jailer, they all maintained a respectful silence at least. They received my tracts eagerly, and continued till late at night reading them."

CHURCH ATTENDANCE—IS IT FALLING OFF?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, October 23, 1881.*

"Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together"—Heb. 10 : 25.

No Decadence—Proof from Hard Facts—New Church Buildings—Some Churches Depleted—Causes of Decline—Forcing the Old upon the New—The Old Apparatus—Where the Trouble Begins—Theological Seminaries Turned into Asylums—An Incongruity at General Assembly—How Christ Crucified is Preached—In the Home Circle—Ministerial Laziness—Need of Freshening Up—The Worst of All Humdrums—Where Christ got His Illustrations—A Little Girl's Death on the Rail Track—A Michigan Mail Carrier in the Fire—A Lightning Bolt on the Adirondacks—Mr. Cookman's Death—Miss Havergal's Joyful Entrance—Time to Stop Skirmishing—How Moses Marched.

Startling statements have been made in many of the pulpits and in some of the religious newspapers. It is heard over and over again that church attendance in America is in decadence. I deny the statement by presenting some hard facts. No one will dispute the fact that there are more churches in America than ever before, one denomination averaging a new church built ever day of the year. The law of demand and supply is as inexorable in the kingdom of God as it is in the world. More churches supplied argues more church privileges demanded. More banks, more bankers. More factories, more manufacturers. More ships, more importers. More churches, more attendants.

I have known these two cities for thirty years, and never so many people attended the churches as now. It is so in Boston, it is so in Chicago, it is so in all the great centres where I have inquired in regard to the facts. How is it in our own city? Within a few years the Baptist and Methodist churches on Hanson Place enlarged to almost double their original size. Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church built; Classon Avenue Presbyterian Church built; Central Congregational Church built; St. John's Methodist Episcopal Church built—any one of those immense structures large enough to swallow up two or three of the old time churches. I say nothing of our own church. I cannot understand with what kind of arithmetic and slate-pencil a man calculates when he comes to the conclusion that church attendance in America is in decadence. Take the aggregate of the number of people who enter the house of God now, and compare it with the aggregate of the people who entered the house of God twenty-five years ago, and the present attendance is four to one. The facts are most exhilarating instead of being depressing. That man who presents the opposite statistics must have been most unfortunate in his church acquaintance.

You are not to argue adversely because here and there a church is depleted. Churches have their day. Sometimes merchandise will entirely occupy a neighborhood and crowd out the churches and the families ordinarily attendant upon them. Sometimes a church perishes through internecine strife. But these are no facts to overthrow the statement that I have made in regard to the increasing attendance upon the house of God. Now I am ready to admit, as every intelligent man will admit, that there are churches which have been depleted, and it is high time that a sermon be preached for the benefit of young men who are just entering the gospel ministry, and for the warning of this and all other prosperous churches as to what are in any case. If merchandise crowd out a church, that cannot be helped, but under all other circumstances decadence in church attendance is the fault either of the church or of the pastor.

Churches are often cleared of their audiences by the attempt to transplant the modes of the past into the present. The modes and methods of fifty years ago are no more appropriate for to-day than the modes and methods of to-day will be appropriate for fifty years hence. Dr. Kirk, Dr. McElroy, Dr. Mason, Dr. De Witt, Dr. Vermilyea, and hundreds of other men just as good as they were, never lacked audiences, because they were abreast of the time in which they lived.

People will not be interested in what we say unless we understand the spirit of the day in which we live. All the woe-begonish statistics are given by those who are trying in our time to work the worn-out machinery of the past times. Such men might just as well throw the furnaces out of our church basement and substitute the foot-stoves which our grandmothers used to carry with them to meeting, and throw out our organs and our cornets and take the old-fashioned tuning-fork, striking it on the knee and then lifting it to the ear to catch the pitch of the hymn, and might as well throw out our modern platforms and modern pulpits and substitute the wine-glass pulpit up which the minister used to climb to the dizzy height of Mont Blanc solitariness, and then go in out of sight and shut the door after him. When you can get the great masses of the people to take passage from Albany to Buffalo in stage-coach or canal-boat, in preference to the lightning express train which goes it in eight hours, then you can get the great masses of the people to go to a church half a century behind the time.

WHERE THE TROUBLE BEGINS.

The trouble begins away back in the theological seminaries. It is a shame that larger provision is not made for ministers of religion, for the sick and the aged and the infirm who have worn themselves out in the service of God. We have naval asylums and soldiers' asylums for men who fought on land and sea for our country, when these men have become aged or crippled, and it is a shame that larger provision is not made for the good soldiers of Jesus Christ who have worn themselves out in battling for the Lord. But lack of provision in that respect makes a tendency to turn our theological seminaries into a hospital for sick and aged and infirm ministers. When a man begins to go down they give him the title of D.D. by way of resuscitation. If that fail, then the tendency is to elect him to a professorate in some theological seminary.

There are grand exceptions to the rule; but it is often the case that the professorate in a theological seminary is occupied by some minister of the Gospel who, not being able to preach himself, is set to teach others how to preach. In more cases than one the poorest speaker in the faculty is the professor of elocution. We want more wide-awake, more able-bodied, able-minded men, more enthusiastic men in our theological seminaries and in the professorates—men like Addison Alexander, who can during the week teach young men the theory of preaching, and then on Sabbath go into the pulpit, and with the thunder and lightning of Christian eloquence show them how. What would you think of a faculty of unsuccessful merchants, to train young merchants, or a faculty of unsuccessful lawyers to train young lawyers? It is often the case that theological seminaries cut a man, and clip him, and square him, and mould him, and bore him, and twist him, until all the individuality is gone out of him and he is only a poor copy of a man who was elected to a professorate because he could not preach. We want less dead wood in the theological seminaries, and more flaming evangels. I declare that a man who cannot preach himself cannot teach others how to preach.

At a meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, a clergyman accustomed on the Sabbath to preach to an audience of two or three hundred people, in an audience room that would hold fifteen hundred, was appointed to preach a sermon on how to reach the masses! I am told the incongruity was too much for the risibilities of many of the clergy in the audience. Now a young man coming out from such bedwarfing influences, how can he enter into the wants and the woes and the sympathies of people who want on the Sabbath a practical Gospel that will help them all the week and help them forever?

Young ministers are told they must preach Christ and Him crucified. Yes, but not as an abst tion. Many a minister has preached Christ Him crucified in such a way that he preached audience of five hundred down to two hundred, from two hundred to one hundred, and from hundred to fifty, and from fifty to twenty, and down until there was but little left save the sex who was paid to stay until the service was c and lock up! There is a great deal of cant ab Christ and Him crucified. It is not Christ Him crucified as an abstraction, but as an omn otent sympathy applied to all the wants and w of our immortal nature—a Christ who will hel in every domestic, social, financial, political, nati al struggle—a Christ for the parlor, a Christ the nursery, a Christ for the kitchen, a Christ the barn, a Christ for the street, a Christ for store, a Christ for the banking-house, a Christ the factory, a Christ for the Congressional ass bly, a Christ for the court-room, a Christ for ev trial and every emergency and every perturbatic

It is often the case that the difficulty beg clear back in

with misapprehension as to which child ought be consecrated to the ministry. John is a ke bright boy. He is good at a bargain. When trades at school he always gets the best of Make him a merchant. He will soon gather a tune and go right up to take his place among Grinnells and the Lawrences. George has gi cerebral development. Phrenologically, langu is large. Make him a lawyer. He will argue way to the front, and he will take his place am the Mansfields and the Storys. Henry has la girth at the chest, and is military in his step bearing. Send him to West Point. We shall him yet a brigadier-general. William is fonc sketching, especially of sketching ships, and knows as much about a vessel as an old sai Make him a shipbuilder. The vessel that builds will successfully wrestle with the Caribb whirlwind. Aleck is not very well. He has ne had very good digestion. Since that last mala attack his spleen is enlarged. He has a mor way of looking at things. He will sit for ho looking at one figure in the carpet. His manr are so mild, so soft, so gentle, so affectionate heavenly, and he cries easily. Make him a m ister! Now, my friends, that is a great mista If you want to consecrate one of your sons to Gospel ministry, take the one widest awake, brawniest, the most brilliant, the most irresisti the most potent. A tremendous work opens fore a profession whose one object is to lift nations toward God, and prepare them for heav

Ah! my friends, churches will be largely tended just in proportion as we ministers can n their wants, meet their sufferings, meet their reavements, and meet their sympathies. If th be a church with small help, small audien medium help, medium audience; large help, la audience. If there be a famine in a city, and th depots of bread, and one depot have a hund loaves, and another depot five hundred loaves, another depot ten thousand loaves, the depot t has a hundred loaves will have applicants, depot that has five hundred loaves will have more applicants, the depot that has ten thous loaves, throngs, throngs, throngs.

Oh, my brethren in the Christian ministry—I see many before me to-day—my brethren in Christian ministry, we must somehow get a shoulder under the burden of the people on Sabbath, and give them one good stout lift, we can do it. We have it all our own way. I a great pity if, with the floor clear and no interr tion, we cannot during the course of an hour our hymn, or our prayer, or our sermon un such momentum we can lift the people, bo mind, and soul, clear out of their sins, temp tions, and troubles.

I think that

often empties the churches of auditors. Hear who are intelligent through reading newspap and by active association in business circles not on the Sabbath sit and listen to platitud Hearers will not come to sermons which have em no facts, no information, no stirring power, adaptation, no fire. The pew will not listen to e pulpit unless, at least on the subject that day nder discussion, the pulpit knows more than the ew. Ministerial laziness has cleared out many hurches. Such ministers saunter around from arlor to parlor under the name of pastoral visi- tion, and go gadding about through the village the city on errands of complete nothingness, nd wrap their brains around a cigar and smoke em up, and then on Saturday afternoon put a w crude thoughts together, and on Sunday morn- g wonder that the theme of Christ and Him rucified does not bring a large audience, and on Monday sit down and write jeremiads for the re- gious newspapers about the decadence of church ttendance!

People will not go to church merely as a matter f duty. There will not next Sabbath be a thou- and people in Brooklyn who will get up in the norning and say, "The Bible says I must go to hurch; it is my duty to go to church, therefore I vill go to church." The vast multitude of people who go to church go to church because they like t, and the multitude of people who stay away from church stay away because they do not like it. I am not speaking about the way the world ought to be; I am speaking about the way the world is. Taking things as they are, we must make the cen- tripetal force of the church mightier than the cen- trifugal. We must make our churches magnets to draw the people thereunto, so that a man will feel uneasy if he does not go to church, saying, "I wish I had gone this morning. I wonder if I can't dress yet and get there in time. It is eleven o'clock; now they are singing. It is half past eleven; now they are preaching. I wonder when the folks will be home to tell us what was said, what has been going on." When the impression is confirmed that our churches, by architecture, by music, by sociality, and by sermon shall be made the most attractive places on earth, then we will want twice as many churches as we have now, twice as large, and then they will not half accom- modate the people.

I say to the young men who are entering the ministry, we must put on more force, more ener- gy, and into our religious services more vivacity, if we want the people to come. You look into a church court of any denomination of Christians. First, you will find the men of large common-sense and earnest look. The education of their minds, the piety of their hearts, the holiness of their lives qualify them for their work. Then you will find in every church court of every denomination a group of men who utterly amaze you with the fact that such semi-imbecility can get any pulpits to preach in! Those are the men who give forlorn statistics about church decadence. Frogs never croak in running water; always in stagnant. But I say to all Christian workers, to all Sunday- school teachers, to all evangelists, to all ministers of the Gospel, if we want our Sunday-schools and our prayer-meetings and our churches to gather the people, we must freshen up. The simple fact is, the people are tired of Religious humdrum is the worst of all humdrum. You say over and over again, "Come to Jesus," until the phrase means absolutely nothing. Why do you not tell them a story which will make them come to Jesus in five minutes? You say that all Sunday-school teachers and all evangelists and all ministers must bring their illustrations from the Bible. Christ did not when He preached. The most of the Bible was written before Christ's time, but where did He get His illustrations? He drew them from the lilies, from the ravens, from salt, from a candle, from a bushel, from long-faced hypocrites, from gnats, from moths, from large gates and small gates, from a camel, from the needle's eye, from yeast in the dough of bread, from a mustard seed, from a fishing-net, from debtors and creditors. That is the reason multi- tudes followed Christ. His illustrations were so easy and so understandable. Therefore, my brother Christian worker, if you and I find two il- lustrations for a religious subject, and the one is a Bible illustration and the other is outside the Bi- ble, I will take the latter because I want to be like my Master.

THE HUMDRUM OF RELIGIONISTS.

Looking across to a hill, Christ saw the city of Jerusalem. Talking to the people about the con- spicuity of Christian example He said, "The world is looking at you; be careful. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid." While he was speak- ing of the divine care of God's children a bird flew past. He said, "Behold the ravens." Then looking down into the valley, all covered at that season with flowers, He said, "Consider the lilies." O, my brother Christian workers, what is the use of our going away off in some obscure part of history, or on the other side the earth, to get an illustration, when the earth and the heavens are full of ILLUSTRATIONS.

Why should we go away off to get an illustra- tion of the vicarious suffering of Jesus Christ, when only last week at Bloomfield, New Jersey, only ten or fifteen miles from here, two little children were walking on the rail-track, and a train was coming; but they were on a bridge of trestle-work, and the little girl took her brother and let him down through the trestle-work as gently as she could toward the water, very carefully and lovingly and cautiously, so that he might not be hurt in the fall, and might be picked up by those who were stand- ing near by. While doing that the train struck her, and hardly enough of her body was left to gather into a funeral casket. What was that? Vicarious suffering. Like Christ. Pang for others. Woe for others. Suffering for others. Death for others.

What is the use of our going away off to find an illustration in past ages, when four or five weeks ago, in Michigan, a mail-carrier on horseback, riding on, pursued by those flames which had swept over a hundred miles, saw an old man by the roadside, dismounted, helped the old man on the horse, saying, "Now whip up and get away." The old man got away, but the mail-carrier per- ished. Just like Christ dismounting from the glo- ries of Heaven to put us on the way of deliverance, then falling back into the flames of sacrifice for others. Pang for others. Woe for others. Death for others. Vicarious suffering.

What is the use of our going away off in ancient history to find an illustration of the fact that it is dangerous to defy God, when last summer in the Adirondacks I saw a flash of lightning and bolt so vivid, I said, "That struck something very near." A few hours after- ward we found that two farmers that Monday morning had been seated under a tree, the one boasting how that the day before, on the Sabbath, he had got his hay in, and so cheated the Lord out of that part of the time anyhow, and both of them laughing over the achievement by which they had wronged the Lord of His holy day, when the light- ning struck one dead instantly, and the other had been two weeks in bed when we left the Adiron- dacks, and has become an invalid, I suppose, for life. He did not make as much out of the Lord as he thought he did. Was it any less an illustration for my soul because I met the clergyman on his way home from the funeral, and he told me of the facts, and said the body of the man who had been destroyed was black with the electricity?

O Christian workers, we have got to freshen up. What is the use of our going back in the Christian classics to find an illustration of the victorious Christian death-bed, when my personal friend, Al- fred Cookman, a few years ago went away in as imperial grandeur as did Edward Payson. Is it any less an illustration to me and to you because I met him a few weeks before, in front of Trinity Church, Broadway, and I said, "Cookman, you look as if you were working too hard." Where in all the classics is there such a story as that of Cookman, when in his last moment he cried, "I am sweeping through the gates washed in the blood of the Lamb"?

What is the use of going away off to get an il- lustration, when on Thursday night, in a house on Third Avenue, Brooklyn, I saw a woman dying, and she said, "Mr. Talmage, Heaven used to be to me a great way off, but it now is just at the foot of the bed"? What is the use of your going away off to get illustrations of a victorious death-bed, when all Wales, when I was there two years ago, was filled with the story of the dying experience of

FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL?

She got her feet wet standing on the ground preaching temperance and the Gospel to a group of boys and men, went home with a chill, and con- gestion set in, and they told her she was very dangerously sick. "I thought so," she said, "but it is really too good to be true that I am going. Doctor, do you really think I am going?" "Yes." "To-day?" "Probably." She said, "Beautiful, splendid, to be so near the gate of heaven." Then after a spasm of pain she nestled down in the pillows and said, "There, now, it is all over—blessed rest." Then she tried to sing, and she struck one glad note, high note of praise to Christ, but could sing only one word, "He," and then all was still. She finished it in heaven.

O fellow Christian workers, what is the use of our being stale and obsolete and ancient when all around us are these evidences of God's grace, God's deliverance, God's mercy, and God's wis- dom? We have got to freshen up—freshen up in our sermons, freshen up in our songs, freshen up in our zeal, freshen up in our consecration; and if we do it, my brethren and sisters, we will no more have to coax people to come to church than if you throw corn on the ground you have to coax pigeons to come and eat it; no more than you would have to coax a tired horse to eat the oats you throw in his manger. Yes, we must freshen up in our Sunday-schools, and in our prayer-meetings, and in our pulpits.

Let the Church of God stop its apologetic air. It is high time that the Church of God stopped writing apologies for the Church. Let the men who are on the outside, who despise religion, write the apologies. If any people do not want the Church they need not have it. It is a free country. If any man does not want the Gospel he need not have it. It is a free country. But you go out, O people of God, and give the Gospel to the five hundred thousand people of Brooklyn who do want it, and to the forty millions of America who do want it. It is high time we stop skirmishing and bring on a general engagement. I want to live to see the Armageddon, all the armies of heaven and hell in battle array, for I know our Conqueror on the white horse will gain the day. Let the Church of God be devoted to nothing else, but go right on to this conquest.

When Moses with his army was trying to con- quer the Ethiopians, profane history says, it was expected that he would go in a roundabout way and come by the banks of the river as other armies had done, because the straight route was infested with snakes, and no army and no man had dared to go across this serpent-infested region. But Moses surprised them. He sent his men out to gather up ibises. The ibis is a bird celebrated for serpent-slaying, and these ibises were gathered into crates and into baskets, and they were carried at the head of the army of Moses, and coming up to the serpent-infested region the crates were opened and the ibises flew forth, and and the army of Moses marched right on and came so unexpectedly on the Ethiopians that they flew in wild dismay.

O Church of God, you are not to march in a roundabout way, but to go straight forward, de- pending upon winged influences to clear the way. Hosts of the living God, march on, march on! Church attendance, large now, is going to be larger yet. The sky is brightening in every direc- tion. I am glad for the boy and girl five years old: I think they may see the millennium. The wheel of Christian progress has never made one revolu- tion backward.

Last week, at Yorktown, France and England and Germany and the United States celebrated one event. France forgot all about Waterloo, and the United States saluted the English flag. Think of George Washington saluting the English flag! He would rather have been shot. The world moves, the kingdom advances. All nations will yet salute the flag of Prince Immanuel. To Him be glory in the Church, throughout all ages. Amen!

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

The Discussion Interrupted—An Awful Explosion—Dr. Gilbart Summoned—Sylph Receiving the Wounded Man—The Antecedents of Miles Rossiter—Dr. Gilbart's Care of Him—His Admiration of Sylph.

THERE is no knowing how long this discussion between Dr. Gilbart and Sylph would have continued, had it not been interrupted by a sudden and alarming phenomenon. A peal, louder than thunder, rolled through the air; and every pane of glass in Doctor Gilbart's house, above and below, was shattered into fragments. What had occurred? An entry accurately taken from the Chester Register of the time will give the answer.

"On ———, a dreadful accident occurred in the old building, founded by Sir Thomas Egerton many years ago, near the Water Gate. The first floor was engaged by a travelling artist for a superior kind of puppet show; and, in the midst of the exhibition, by some unknown mishap, eight hundred pounds of gunpowder, lodged in a warehouse beneath, took fire, and with tremendous force blew up three stories. Twenty-three persons were killed; and eighty-four were severely burned and maimed. The windows of numerous houses in the neighborhood were completely shattered, and the concussion of the air was felt several miles around the city."

It was not long before Dr. Gilbart was summoned to the scene of the disaster to render assistance to the wounded. Sylph, too, hastily threw on her cloak to see for herself what had happened, and to lend the doctor her help if he should require it. She hesitated at first to do this; but the excitement in the street and the cries of distress which reached her ears put to flight her scruples and timidity; besides, upon looking out at the window she recognized, by the lanterns which they carried, several persons whom she knew, and felt she could safely go with them.

When she passed into the open air, however, and had descended one or two steps leading from the door to the causeway, she was stayed in her progress by seeing some persons convey a wounded man toward the doctor's dwelling. When they came to where she stood, one of the men, recognizing her, informed her "that Dr. Gilbart had directed them to say that Miss Somers was to place the wounded man on the couch in the surgery until the doctor himself should return home, which would be as soon as possible." The wounded man, who was groaning as if in great pain, they intimated had had one of his limbs severely crushed by a falling beam of timber; and the compound fracture he had received, they heard the doctor say, would need the most careful attention.

As Sylph held a light to guide the steps of the bearers of the agonized man, she saw that he was young in years, and though ghastly pale, of a noble countenance; she marked, too, that after he had cast a glance upon her he suppressed his heavy groaning, as though disdaining to utter a cry of pain in the presence of a woman.

It would seem as though his handsome and youthful features and manly fortitude excited Sylph's special sympathy; for she exceeded the doctor's directions in her ministry of mercy. She had the stranger removed to a bed, and lighted the way herself to his appointed chamber.

While he there awaits Doctor Gilbart's coming, we must give the reader a sketch of his history.

The barony of Forth is, without exception, the most interesting district in the east of Ireland. It is situated in the south-east portion of Wexford County, and for several centuries, strange to say, has been inhabited by men, not of the Celtic, but of the Saxon and Norman race. They are the descendants of those soldiers, who, in Strongbow's time, were employed by Dermid, King of Leinster (guilty of David's crime of old), to maintain his unholy cause against his liege lord, the Ard-riagh, or supreme Monarch of Ireland. Several hundred of these soldiers came over to fight the battle of the justly exiled Dermid, under Fitzstephen, a Norman knight, induced by the promise of a grant of land for their services.

As too often has occurred in this world, the evil cause triumphed; and Dermid, called upon to fulfil his engagement, parcelled out the barony of Forth among his hired English soldiery

Mingling little with their neighbors, the native Irish, the Forth people perpetuated their ancient customs, and for many generations spoke a language of their own. Three hundred years ago the quaint old chronicler, Holinshed, thus rather wittily described their dialect: "It is a medley and checker-work, a mingle-mangle, crabbedly jumbled together, neither goode English, nor goode Irish."

Even to the close of the last century there was among this people but little mixture of Celtic blood, as was manifest from their Roman noses, dark eyes, and oval visage; and also, perhaps, from their quiet manners, frugal habits, and plodding industry. They were also intensely Roman Catholic, not one in a hundred professing the Reformed Faith.

It was from this unique barony of Forth—a sort of island within an island—that Miles Rossiter came—the wounded man, whose silently-borne pain touched Sylph with a kind of romantic pity. His father was a respectable yeoman farmer in the barony, and his ambition was to see Miles in holy orders in the Roman Catholic Church.

Miles, on his way to a college seminary in Paris, had that morning landed at Parkgate, the port, at this time, of Chester. On reaching the city in the afternoon, he found he could not proceed until the following day to London, no coach until then being available; and to pass away the time—to his misfortune, as it proved—was induced to become a spectator at the well-advertised puppet-show.

"The little manikin figures," said Miles, when afterward describing the exhibition to the doctor, "were of the most lifelike appearance; and having never before seen such wonderful pieces of mechanism, I could hardly keep from thinking that they were alive. Kings held themselves proudly, and strutted about; warriors fought and bled; queens and their ladies fair, in bright array, moved gracefully, and beckoned to and smiled upon gay gallants, and fairies and fiends strangely flitted to and fro, and performed their antics or awful deeds in the most natural and lively manner. I was breathless and lost in wonder.

"In this state of entrancement I was suddenly aroused by a vivid flame and an awful crash; the earth seemed to open in a gulf of fire, and the whole room to heave and rock, as though by an earthquake. I remember nothing more until, having been drawn from a mass of broken materials, and borne into the free air, I awoke to consciousness, but with a feeling of extreme pain. Not knowing the extent of my injuries, I was making an effort to rise, when you, Dr. Gilbart, as my good angel, came to my assistance, and gently held me down, and kept me quiet."

"And it was well that I did so, my young friend," said the doctor, "and at that moment; for had you determinedly sought to put the broken limb beneath you, the splintered bone from the compound fracture you had received would, in all probability have pierced through the flesh, and, it is almost certain, would have made amputation necessary. As it is, your case, I fear, will prove a tedious one; but I have no doubt we shall safely bring you through it."

"Yes, with the help of God and the Blessed Virgin," exclaimed Miles Rossiter, with a racy and not unpleasant brogue. And this was the first token to Doctor Gilbart that his patient was not only Irish but a Roman Catholic.

This discovery, however, made no change in Doctor Gilbart's treatment. All religious beliefs were, in his estimation, a good deal similar; or, as he phrased it, one was neither much better nor worse than another. Miles Rossiter, whether Catholic or Protestant, was a fine young man; and above all, to the doctor's delight, his injury presented a most interesting case for the display of skilful surgery.

For several weeks young Rossiter was confined to his bed, and deemed it a great advance toward recovery when he could be moved to a chair and be placed at his bedroom window.

The window looked out upon a small but pretty flower garden at the rear of the doctor's dwelling, and it was from this elevation that Miles Rossiter looked down upon that vision which carried him away to a sort of wonderland. Miles, during his lonely hours upon his invalid couch, had frequently heard a soft and dulcet voice, accompained by a harpsichord, discourse sweetest music in the doctor's house; and he often longed to look upon the chorister that filled the air with sounds, he thought, harmonious enough to have come from heaven. It is true he had caught a glimpse of Sylph, when she lighted the way for his bearers to his chamber of suffering; but it was only a glimpse; and at the time he was in too much pain to make much use of his opportunity.

As a candidate for the Roman Catholic priesthood, Miles should not have allowed his thoughts to wander at all after one not of his own sex. Miles felt this, and at times his conscience a little smote him. But how could he help it? He was very lonely in his little chamber; had nothing to occupy his mind; the ravishing music filled the whole house; he must listen to it; it would have been most ungracious, uncomfortable, and a dreadful sef-denial—for he delighted in music—of set purpose to close his ears. And listening to the music, what else must result but thoughts concerning the singer? "An archbishop himself," said Miles, "ay! were he St. Hilary himself, couldn't but transgress as I have done."

The day that Miles had his wistful curiosity first satisfied was one of bright sunshine, and when roses and lilies were in their summer bloom. Sylph had tripped into the garden to trim and train her floral favorites, and busy and quite absorbed in her pleasant task, was all oblivious of any looker-on; and so much so as to accompany her labor of love with snatches of melody.

Miles, as he timidly and cautiously looked down from his window upon the fair young girl, her golden hair falling in rich and careless tresses upon her neck, and humming to herself notes of magic sweetness, her rosy fingers all the whole moving to and fro amid a blaze of blossoms, thought, in succession, of Eve, "fairest of her daughters," amid the flowers of Eden; and of Rachel, when first seen and surprised into blushes by the fond salute of Jacob; and of Jephthah's loveliest daughter; and of the daughter of Jairus, when raised anew to the flush of maiden life; and of St. Cecilia and St. Agatha, and of many other virgin saints as fair, in the calendar of Holy Church. And he felt rapt away into an enchanting reverie.

When Sylph left the garden, Miles felt a strange change come over the scene beneath him; the sunshine became less bright, the flowers seemed to fade, the air to grow less warm. Much of the beauty and charm had departed from the little flower garden; nor were they brought back again until each day the enchantress, Sylph, all unconscious of her power, restored them by the magic of her presence.

"Growth is one of nature's mysteries," so we are told; but as mysterious, we think, are the restorative, or, as the doctors call them, the recuperative powers of the human system; those hidden forces within us, by which injured bone, or tissue, or muscle takes to itself, as though learned in science, the very substance it needs, and which is alone fitted to renew it to its normal condition. "We are fearfully and wonderfully made;" and, from serious ailments, not less "fearfully" and "wonderfully" are we restored.

Miles Rossiter was an illustration of this. The limb that seemed at one time bruised and broken beyond possible recovery, Nature, under Gilbart's good surgery, built up slowly but surely into its former condition of strength and usefulness; and he was able to leave his room and join the social circle.

Doctor Gilbart freely admitted him to the privilege, because he got to like the young man, finding him manly, intelligent, and honest-minded, and though country bred, of much native refinement; and besides this, Miles had no friend or acquaintance in Chester; and, on his way to a foreign land, his sojourn would only be brief.

A nearer approach to Sylph did not serve to less-his admiration, nor to free him from the spell her enchantment. Rather he came to recognize her new forces of attraction. He had thought those outside his church as being heretics, ther through their early teaching or wilful unbe-f; were, more or less, ipso facto, reprobates. et, with a thrill of wonder, he marked in Sylph a nctity of soul, and a rapt fervor of spirit that as not surpassed by that of the canonized virgins, ints, and martyrs of his church, the story of hose lives had been for years his study.

PROPHECY AND POLITICS.

By Rev. William Maude.

atter-Day Democracy—Its Rise in Europe—The "Nineteenth Century" and Government — A Commingling, but not Coalescence—"The Gospel of Dynamite" — Russia and Germany — France and Bulgaria—A Worldly Scribe's Conviction of the State of Things.

GERMANY, above all other Continental states the and of culture and education, is at present just as nuch under the sway of militarism and despotic au-hority as the most rude and ignorant state could be. All her learning, her science and her philosophy, have not saved Germany from being taken possession of by the most inveterate unmanageable form of Socialism. And to cope with this Socialism there is put forth an exercise of despotic authority which hardly seems to be in keeping with the most elementary conditions of modern civilization. A state of siege is proclaimed in places like Dresden, a city which most English people associate with picture galleries, museums of art, and cultivated society. And perhaps the most significant indication of the political condition of that great empire is to be found in the fact that at the present moment twelve millions of Germans are living beyond its boundaries.

FRANCE AND BULGARIA.

France, again, is once more asserting herself on the field of European politics, and in Northern Africa she has lately entered upon an enterprise of annexation quite in the old imperial style, whereby she has involved herself in serious political difficulties abroad, while at home the elections, which are proceeding almost as we write, will in all probability pave the way to a dictatorship, though whether the dictator is to be a Napoleon or a Gambetta remains to be seen.

A remarkable illustration of the prevailing condition of political lawlessness in Europe is presented by the course of procedure lately adopted by the Prince of Bulgaria and by those who champion his cause. The Prince of Bulgaria has broken his coronation oath, and trampled on the constitution to which he himself gave his solemn adhesion. That the Prince of Bulgaria should have done this is not perhaps very surprising. It is no new thing for Continental princes, when opportunity offered, to act in a similar way. But what we wish to draw attention to is the kind of defence which has been set up for the Prince of Bulgaria by one of his foreign and volunteer champions. This defence in itself, and in the way in which it has been again and again repeated, is a striking illustration of the depth of political degradation into which Europe is at present sunk.

The Bulgarians, we are told by defenders of the prince, are not fit for popular liberty. They are not able to work a genuine political constitution. They are so ignorant, they do not know what a constitution means. The prince put up with them as long as he could, but found at last he must take things into his own hands. Now all this is, morally, beside the question. The question is, not what the Bulgarians may be, or what they understand, but whether the Prince of Bulgaria knew what he was doing when he swore to be true to the constitution, and whether he understands what he has done now when he has violated his oath?

A WORLDLY SCRIBE'S CONVICTION.

Writing of the present condition of Europe, an influential London newspaper lately remarked: "If one did not know by experience that such flood-tides of despotism and of conspiracy rise and fall according to their season, an imaginative person might almost believe that the principle of despotism and the principle of popular revolution were coming to a final and a death struggle in European politics." That is how it strikes the mere worldly scribe. But he who holds in his hand the divinely-lit lamp of prophecy knows that there is no "imagination" in the matter. The "final and death struggle" is indeed at hand. The "iron" and the "clay" cannot cleave one to another. Just now the "iron" seems to be asserting its ascendency. Repression, the refusal of political rights, military law, seem the order of the day. But the "clay" is there, and will presently overpower the iron.

The great army of democracy is already in motion; "the gospel of dynamite" is its terrible evangel; the Nihilist, the Socialist and the Fenian are its forlorn hope; and soon it will roll its wild and weltering flood over crowns and thrones, to form the restless heaving sea out of which St. John saw, in prophetic vision, that awful beast arise concerning whom it is written: "Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six" (Revelation 13: 18).

WORK AMONG THE HOP-PICKERS.

MR. JOHN BURNHAM, one of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's evangelists, gives the following interesting account of recent evangelistic efforts among the hop-pickers:

"Kent, especially at this season of the year, has a charm peculiarly its own. A very small proportion of Englishmen have the remotest idea of the beauty of the hop-gardens in August and September, and the interesting operation of hop-picking. The hop must not be gathered before it is ripe, and when ripe it needs gathering quickly, or soon it will blow to pieces and occasion much waste. We have not nearly enough 'home-dwellers' to gather them in, and we are obliged to import help. This help comes in the shape of thousands of poor people from the courts and alleys of our cities and large towns, many of whom are strangers to the 'good news' of the Gospel.

"This immigration affords us a grand opportunity of telling them the 'old, old story.' Recognizing this, some of God's servants have for years sought in a variety of ways to improve this opportunity. With a plentiful supply of tracts and illustrated fly-leaves, three or four of us start off in the morning to the hop-gardens, and there, distributing ourselves, go from bin to bin, handing tracts to the pickers, and seeking opportunity of conversation with them. Very varied are the characters we meet with in the gardens; many carry unmistakably the marks of the fallen, and others the badge of the beerhouse, yet not unfrequently do we meet with some earnest, humble believers among them to whom the names of Ned Wright, Lewis, Orsman, Holland, or Varley are familiar.

"On Sunday morning, taking a band of singers with us, we visit the 'camps' (or, 'hopper-houses,' as they are more generally called), and sing and speak the Gospel to the poor 'strangers.' What a medley we have here! Some men sitting on logs smoking and chatting, or listening to one of the number as he reads Lloyd's paper or the Police News; others hunting the hedgerows for blackberries and nuts (if gypsies, more likely to be beating the hedges and bushes for hedgehogs); half a dozen women round the wash-tub; around another tub or pail a group, vigorously applying soap and water, as a luxury that only falls to their lot with each returning Sunday morning; here are some young women attending to their toilet, while there are others just turning out from their straw beds, with little regard for decency; and here a group of women and children gathered around some burning fagots, in true gypsy style—there are three cross-sticks, and suspended therefrom a large pot, in which may be seen a piece of meat, floating among carrots, turnips, cabbages, potatoes, dumplings—all thrown in together in glorious confusion. As soon as we open our organ and commence singing, we have this motley group about us, with eyes and mouth agape, listening to the message of mercy proclaimed in song and speech.

"On the Sunday afternoon, weather permitting, we gather the 'strangers' in a large field to a 'free tea,' and when they have done ample justice to the meal, they are willing to sit or lie on the grass, and listen as we sing or speak to them. Our hearts are greatly cheered as we observe many among them with eager, upturned faces and tearful eyes, drinking in the message of the Saviour's love. From this open-air gathering many will follow to the evening service in the chapel to hear more of the 'Word of Life.' During the week evenings we visit the surrounding villages, in turn, whither the 'strangers' resort to the shop or the alehouse, and in the centre of the village, opening our organ, with the help of a band of singers from Mr. Kendon's school we soon find ourselves surrounded by an attentive audience.

"It is now many years since Mr. Kendon commenced this work among the hop-pickers. In a quiet, unostentatious way it was begun in a single garden by Mr. Kendon alone; a year or two later, feeling the growing need of help, he secured the assistance of a city missionary, and more help as the years rolled round. Now for the past four or five years there have been five of us in this centre (besides brethren in other parts) fully employed each returning September."

Our picture represents a group of hop-pickers engaged in stripping the clustering flowers from the hop-vine, while they listen to the evangelist, who is seizing the opportunity to sow the good seed of the Word of God in their hearts. A correspondent of the London Times states that a society founded by the Rev. J. Y. Stratton, Rector of Ditton, has this year no fewer than twenty-one missionaries (with whom the clergy have co-operated) laboring under its auspices among the hop-pickers. We are glad to hear from a Wesleyan contemporary that the Methodists also are in the field.

The Results of a Life Consecrated to God are described by Rev. J. O. Peck, D.D., in a communication to a contemporary. It appears that a deed of trust just executed, is the fulfilment of a vow made thirty-two years ago by Dr. Henry Foster, a young Christian physician of New York. At that time Dr. Foster was moved by the Holy Spirit to ardently desire a sanctified heart and life, and the enjoyment of God's abiding presence. "He thereupon entered into solemn covenant with God that he would devote his whole life and attainments to Him; that, if God would go with him and give him but the daily consciousness of His favor, he would devote the entire prosperity of his profession to the cause of Christ." Dr. Foster says that from that hour he has in all his trials and perplexities never for a moment been without the conscious presence of God with him.

He on his part has been true to his promise according to his conscience. With the early proceeds of his professional labors, he built the Clifton Springs Sanitarium, and has gradually enlarged it. Since it was established, Christ's needy people to the number of sixty thousand have received gratuitous treatment there. Dr. Foster, being now sixty years of age, has executed a trust deed conveying to representatives of all the evangelical denominations of Christians in trust, the Sanitarium, a fine block of buildings, the rents of which shall be used as endowment for the Sanitarium, and his own cottage residence as a perpetual home for the chief physician. The beneficiaries are to be missionaries and their families, Christian ministers and their families, and private Christians in needy circumstances. Preference to be give in the order named. Dr. Foster also provides for the salary of a regular chaplain, who shall give all his time to the institution, and stipulates that "no physician shall ever be employed who is not a consistent working Christian as well as a regular graduate of some reputable medical college." The donor has also made provisions for extra accommodation above the income of the Sanitarium, so that if any Christian person or church desires to permanently endow one or more beds nominating beneficiaries, such beds may be set up there and the patients receive gratuitous treatment.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Imposing Ceremonies at Yorktown, commemorative of the surrender of the British General Cornwallis with his army, to George Washington and his allies a hundred years ago, attracted an immense number of distinguished visitors from other States and from Europe. The corner stone of a monument to commemorate the surrender was laid October 18th. The ceremony was performed by Peyton S. Coles, Grand Master of the Virginia Free Masons, who used the identical jewels which George Washington had when he held the same office. The President and his Cabinet, twenty State Governors, General Hancock, and the French and German representatives witnessed the ceremony, Gov. Holliday of Virginia delivering the address of welcome. The following day the celebration included speeches by the President, Minister Outrey, and the Marquis de Rochambeau of the French Republic, Baron von Steuben of Germany, and Hon. Robert C. Winthrop of Massachusetts. On Thursday the celebration terminated with a grand review of troops by the President and our foreign guests, in which the regiments of the various States and the regulars took part, over nine thousand men being in line. Some little difficulty was occasioned by an incident indicative of national jealousy. The vessels in the river showed the French flag at the foremast, the Stars and Stripes at the main, and the German flag at the mizzen-mast. But the President's boat had only two masts, and the two foreign flags were run up side by side at the fore. The French guests were offended by the proximity of their flag to that of the Germans, and it was only by the exercise of considerable tact that their wounded susceptibilities were appeased. This little incident suggests ominous reflections as to the future relations of Germany and France.

President Arthur's Address at the Yorktown centennial on Wednesday, October 19th, was in every respect worthy of the occasion. He accurately defined the principle which the celebration was designed to indorse by saying: "Upon this soil one hundred years ago our forefathers brought to a successful issue their heroic struggle for independence. Here and then was established, and as we trust made secure upon this continent for ages yet to come, that principle of government which is the very fibre of our political system, the sovereignty of the people." He then protested against the celebration being regarded as an act of exultation over a defeated foe, and pointed out the true value of the ceremonies. He said: "It is altogether fitting that we should gather here to refresh our souls with the contemplation of the unfaltering patriotism, the sturdy zeal, and the sublime faith which achieved the results we now commemorate. For so, if we learn aright the lesson of the hour, shall we be incited to transmit to the generation which shall follow the precious legacy which our fathers left to us—the love of liberty, protected by law." Then followed words of welcome to our foreign guests, representatives of the governments of France and Germany and descendants of our brave allies in the Revolutionary war. The President concluded his address with the following appropriate words: "None of the memories awakened by this anniversary are more grateful to us all than the reflection that the national friendships here so closely cemented have outlasted the mutations of a changeful century. God grant, my countrymen, that they may ever remain unshaken, and that ever henceforth, with ourselves and with all the nations of the earth, we may be at peace."

The British Flag was Saluted by Order of President Arthur at the conclusion of the commemorative services at Yorktown. The President, in giving the order, said that he did so "in recognition of the friendly relations so long and so happily subsisting between Great Britain and the United States, in the trust and confidence of peace and good-will between the two countries for all centuries to come, and especially as a mark of the profound respect entertained by the American people" for Queen Victoria. Both the order and the reference to "Old Mother England" in the speech of the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, the venerable orator from Massachusetts, evoked loud applause. At five o'clock on Thursday evening, just as the sun was sinking behind the Yorktown bluffs, the British flag was shown on the fore of the U. S. ship Trenton, and a gun was fired. Instantly the other ships ran up the same colors, and gun answered gun along the line.

It is very gratifying that as the sovereign and people of Great Britain have expressed their sympathy with us in our trouble, the Yorktown victory should have been commemorated without any ungenerous reflections.

The Nominations Sent by the President to the Senate last week were of minor importance. They are understood to have been those President Garfield selected, but which, owing to the protracted struggle over the New York nominations, he did not send in. Speculation has been busy as to the Cabinet offices, but up to Saturday last no definite information was given. On Friday, October 21st, General Grant, Senator Logan, and Senator Cameron had a lengthy conference with the President, which is supposed to have been mainly concerned with Cabinet nominations, and according to one unauthoritative report ex-Governor Morgan of New York was selected for the secretaryship of the Treasury, and ex-Senator Howe of Wisconsin for Attorney-General, the present holders of those offices having peremptorily resigned. It is believed that the President would have preferred all the Cabinet retaining their offices until the regular session in December, as he will have to depend very greatly upon the reports of the heads of Departments for the information and recommendations which are necessary for his guidance in the preparation of his message to Congress. The name of Gen. Longstreet is mentioned as the representative of the South in the Cabinet, and that of ex-Senator Frelinghuysen of New Jersey as Secretary of State.

Exact Details of the Losses Caused by the Michigan forest fires are furnished by a correspondent of the New York Tribune who lives at Port Huron, Mich., on the verge of the burned district. He has ridden over the scene of the fire, carefully collecting facts. He states that 1800 square miles were burned over, causing a loss which is put at $2,346,413, reduced by insurance, amounting to $628,632, to $1,722,781. Eleven hundred and forty-seven dwellings, 28 school-houses, 8 churches, 130 stores, 12 hotels, 34 grist and saw mills and 20 docks were burned. The fire in most instances did its work so effectually as to leave nothing but the bare ground. Where were flourishing farms nothing remains but a blackened waste. Houses, barns, orchards, fences, and even the uncleared forest have been swept away. No one who has not witnessed the scene can form any adequate idea of the utter destruction which has been caused by this fire. The well-to-do, those who considered themselves independent of any possible calamity, are in most instances as badly off as the new-comers who had nothing but log-cabins and small clearings. Both are on the same level now. In most of this region the forest was composed of pine and underbrush, the latter more especially in the swampy parts. Over this pine region the flames raged with the utmost fury. Hundreds of thousands of acres have been swept almost as clean as though a forest had never grown there. The entire region is a wilderness. Not a green tree, bush or leaf is to be found anywhere. There is pressing need still of funds to enable the sufferers to live through the winter. The Governor of Michigan has appointed a committee of responsible citizens to receive contributions and supplies, which are distributed to the sufferers free of expense, as the railroad companies make no charge for freight of charitable parcels.

The Urgent Question of Civil Service Reform should be kept prominently before the public during the coming campaign. It is the one political questions of the time on which action is imperatively needed. The National Civil Service Reform League has now its Central Committee, with its officers and sub-committees in working order, and it will endeavor to exercise an influence upon public opinion, and through it upon the government of the country, by means of publications, public addresses, and petitions. But it will do little good unless the people show at the polls their determination that the abuse which has worked so much ill shall cease at once. At present the two bills respectively prepared by Mr. Pendleton and Mr. Willis are the only two definite proposals before the country, and about the merits of these two, voters need to decide.

The Reforms in the Postal Service Have Already borne fruit. The department returns show that during the first three months of Postmaster-General James's administration the expenditure was only $79,879 in excess of the receipts. The deficiency in the corresponding quarter of the previous year was $586,698. So great a difference in the accounts occurring even before the Postmaster-General had fully completed his reforms, encourages the hope that still further reductions may be effected now that those reforms are in full operation. A report was in circulation last week that President Arthur had asked Assistant Postmaster-General Tyner to resign, because he must have been cognizant of the Star Route knaveries. The report is now contradicted, and Mr. Tyner's friends aver that he was clear of responsibility, having reported the matter to Mr. Key and to Mr. Hayes himself, who decided to take no action in the matter lest the interests of the party should suffer.

The Floods in the North-west are Working fearful destruction. The rainfall has been heavy, and the Mississippi on Friday last had risen eighteen feet above low-water mark, eight inches higher than in the floods of last spring. Nearly west of Rockport, Ill., and thirty-six miles below Quincy, there is a break in the Sny Levee, three hundred feet wide, and the river is steadily cutting out the earthwork at either end of the crevasse. An immense volume of water is pouring through the opening, spreading out over the country and gradually inundating the fields and farms, and threatening Rockport, which is four miles distant. There is also a break, not quite so serious, in the Indian Grove Levee. A telegram received at Chicago, from Quincy, says: "The railroad tracks on the Sny Levee are submerged, and the basements of houses in South Hannibal are filled with water. The Keokuk and St. Louis Railroad is under water for several miles, and a number of washouts have taken place."

Twenty-four Mormon Missionaries Sailed for urope on the Guion steamer Abyssinia, October 8th, to recruit the ranks of the Mormons in Utah. these men were going to Africa to steal negroes nd bring them here to be slaves, they would be revented by law, but they are allowed by our own overnment and the governments of Europe to ntice with impunity white men and women into a ondition of life far worse than slavery ever deeloped.

An Extraordinary Dream with an Amusing xplanation is reported in a Bath, Me., journal. A dy in Bath was recently much alarmed by dreamg that some one was holding her wrist. Vainly ndeavoring to scream for assistance, she succeeded length in whispering just loud enough to awaken erself. After a few minutes' relief at being no nger under the influence of the dream, she beame conscious that some one was really holding er left wrist, and all her strength was inadequate release it. Whether to call her hostess or not as easily decided, for her terror rendered her as peechless as she had been before awakening. It ould not be that any of her friends had seized her rist in sport; it was too rigid a clasp, and had een continued some time, for her left hand was old and numb. But just as she should be able to peak, in a moment she found the relentless grasp as that of her own right hand, and not easy to ithdraw from its twin companion, so desperate ad become its hold. How like this is to the exerience of many an anxious soul desiring reconliation with God, yet held a prisoner by its own oubts and difficulties, prompted by Satan.

A Family was Gathered Together for the rst time in seventy-two years at Lewiston, Me., n October 12th. All of the living members of he family were present. There are seven brothrs, ranging in age from 47 to 72 years. Perhaps he most interesting feature of this occasion was he meeting for the first time of all the brothers. The oldest brother left home before the youngest as born. An attempt has several times been nade to get all of the family together, but on each uch occasion one or more of the brothers would e necessarily absent. A married sister presided t the table at which all the brothers for the first ime sat down together. The occasion must have een one of great interest to the united family. It uggests the thought of that wonderful scene when vith our brethren who have passed the flood, the rophets and apostles, and martyrs whom we have never seen, we sit down to the marriage supper of he Lamb (Rev. 19:7).

The Danger of Putting off the Acceptance f Christ as a Saviour was illustrated recently by erry McAuley of the Water Street Mission at his sual evening meeting. He told of a man who ame to the meeting one evening about two years go, under deep conviction of sin, and when the nvitation to inquirers to come to the front was given, put out his foot to rise and go forward. But n a moment he hesitated and said, "No, I'll come orward to-morrow." "To-morrow is not yours," eplied Mr. McAuley; but the man persisted in his urpose to make a confession of Christ the next evening. By the next evening, however, he had joined two evil companions, who took him away to Jersey Flats, and there the three went out in a boat and boarded a schooner with the intention of plundering it. But being encountered by the captain, they made a murderous assault upon him, nearly cleaving his head with an axe, for which they were tried, convicted, and sentenced to twenty years in the State prison.

A Wedding in a Cave is Described in a Kentucky journal. The parties seem to have displayed a taste as eccentric in selecting the scene for the ceremony as those we mentioned in a recent number, who were married on the top of a mountain. This couple took an opposite course by going under ground for the ceremony. "The bridegroom," says the Lexington Gazette, "accompanied by a small party, arrived at Cave City. Country wagons were procured, and the gay company, which included a Louisville clergyman, drove over the hills to the Mammoth Cave. The great hole in the ground was bravely entered; 'Fat Man's Misery' was passed, the bride crawling on hands and knees along the tunnel; Green River, with its blind fish, was safely ferried over, and, after an underground tramp of nine miles, the spot selected for the wedding was reached. There, under nature's glittering gems, with darkness filling the depth beyond, and torches weirdly lighting the immediate space, the clergyman did his duty." This craving for the romantic and sensational in these momentous affairs of life appears to be increasing; it would be well for society if respect for the marriage tie and a faithful performance of its obligations were also increasing, but in too many cases both husband and wife think but lightly of vows solemnly made before God, and lead lives so little in accord with those vows, that they might have been appropriately commenced under ground amid the glare of torches and across rivers full of blind fish.

A Protest Against Calling an Englishman a foreigner was entered by Mr. Edward A. Freeman, the English historian now on a visit to this country, in the course of a recent lecture at Boston, Mass. He said: "While we do not belong to the same nation, we are one folk in all things save that local and political separation which nature and events have wrought. Surely I am more to you than a man of Mexico; surely you are more to me than a man of France or Spain. The words foreign and foreigner should not be used between our countries. I am not a foreigner, and will not bear to be a foreigner when I come to this country. You are not foreigners and strangers when you come to my country. Our ancestors may have come together from the old Teutonic mainland, have fought together under the same banner, suffered defeat or gained the victory together. The great difference between us is that you have taken two great voyages and we have taken only one, but we took that first voyage together."

Rev. Abijah Green, a Presbyterian Clergyman, was suffocated in his bedroom on Thursday, October 20th, in New York. He had been attending the Synod in Dr. Ramsey's church, and at the end of that day's session returned to his hotel. He retired to rest at his usual hour, but in the morning he was found dead in his bed, his room being full of gas. The burner was found turned on, but not lighted. It is supposed that he must have inadvertently turned the tap on extinguishing the light. Mr. Green had been a member of the N. Y. Synod for over forty years, but latterly, owing to ill health, had not occupied any pulpit.

Miss Kate Shelley, of Ogden, Iowa, Whose heroic act in crawling across a bridge in a hurricane to save a train from wreck in a washout, was described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 4th, has been presented with a watch by the railroad conductors of that State. On the case is engraved a picture of the bridge over which the brave girl crawled at the risk of her life to stop the train. Miss Shelley has been ill since the day of her heroic effort, the shock and the exposure having overcome her but she has now happily recovered.

The Remarkable History of a Treasured coin was recently related. Mr. William McClintock, proprietor of the Downington Marble Works, Penn., is in possession of a five-dollar gold-piece, dated 1807, that has connected with it quite an interesting history. He received it this week from Mrs. Mary Ann Taylor, in whose possession it has been since 1847, when it was bequeathed to her by her father, Mr. Casper Peterman, who died in that year. Mr. Peterman had owned it since 1812. It came into his possession as his first earnings after he arrived in this country. He said while he lived "it should never be spent unless it had to go for bread." For sixty-nine years it has never been in circulation. Mrs. Taylor had intended to present it to her nephew, Samuel Casper Jones, who died last year, on his becoming of age, but this being denied her she invested it as part pay for a cradle inclosure for his grave. It is singular that a coin treasured so many years should, after all, have been used to pay for a tomb and not for bread. It is a coincidence that the first time we read in the Bible of money being used it was for the same purpose—to purchase a grave (Gen. 23:16).

MONGREL RELIGION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"So these nations feared the Lord, and served their graven images, both their children, and their children's children: as did their fathers, so do they unto this day."—2 KINGS 17:41.

The Spiritual Descendants of the Samaritans—A Live Subject—The Mongrel Religion—I. Its Nature—The Devotees were not Infidels—Were Willing to be Taught—But Stuck to Their Old Gods—The Gods of To-Day—Bacchus, Venus, Mammon—II. The Manner of its Growth—They were on Jehovah's Land—In Fear of the Lions—Had a Trimming Teacher—A Large-hearted Man—III. Its Value—Feeble on Both Sides—At First an Apparent Improvement—Afterward an Enmity—Satan's Livery—Provoking to God—IV. Its Continuance—It Yields a Sort of Comfort—It is Perpetuated in Families—V. Its Cure.

"So do they unto this day," said the writer of the Book of Kings, who has long since passed away unto his fathers. Were he alive now he might say concerning the spiritual descendants of these Samaritans, "So do they unto this day." This base union of fearing God and serving other gods is by no means obsolete. Alas, it is too common everywhere, and to be met with where you might least expect it. From generation to generation there have been mongrel religionists, who have tried to please both God and the devil, and have been on both sides, or on either side, as their interest led them.

Some of these wretched blenders are always hovering around every congregation, and my hope is that I may convince the consciences of some here present that they themselves are guilty, and that of them it might be said, as of these Assyrian immigrants, "They feared the Lord, and served their own gods." My sermon will by no means be an essay upon an extinct race, but it may be placed among "the present-day papers," for "so do they unto this day." He that hath ears to hear, let him hear, and to whomsoever the word shall apply let its rebuke be taken home, and through the teaching of the Holy Spirit may it produce decisive results.

ITS NATURE.

I. I shall first call your attention to the nature of this mongrel religion. It had its good and bad points, for it wore a double face. These people were not infidels. Far from it: "they feared the Lord." They did not deny the existence, or the power, or the rights of the great God of Israel, whose name is Jehovah. They had not the pride of Pharaoh who said, "Who is Jehovah that I should obey His voice?" They were not like those whom David calls "fools," who said in their hearts, "There is no God." They had faith, though only enough to produce fear. They knew that there was a God; they feared His wrath, and they tried to appease it.

So far they were hopeful persons, and under the influence of a feeling which has often led up to better things. It was better to dread God than to despise Him; better slavishly to fear than stupidly to forget. We would not have men so foolish as to doubt the existence of God, nor so profane as to defy Him. There was something commendable about men of whom it could be said that they feared Jehovah, even though that fear was a selfish and servile one, and was by no means so efficacious upon them as it ought to have been, for it did not cause them to put away their idols.

Another good point about these mixed religionists was that they were willing to be taught. As soon as they found that they were not acting rightly toward the God of the land, they sent a petition to their supreme ruler, the king of Assyria, setting forth their spiritual destitution. Church and State were fused in those days, and therefore they applied to their king that he would help them in their religious distress, and he acted to the best of his light; for he sent them one of the priests of the old religion of the land. This man was a Bethelite, one who worshipped God under the symbol of an ox, which the Scripture calls a calf. He was a very slight improvement upon a heathen; but we must be glad even of small progress.

Though these strangers feared Jehovah, and were willing to learn the way of his worship, yet they stuck to their old gods. "Ah," said the Babylonian, "I listen respectfully to what you have to say of this God of the land; but Succoth-benoth for me; when I go home I shall offer sacrifice to him." The men of Cuthah said, "Verily this is good doctrine concerning the God of Israel; but the god of our fathers was Nergal, and to him will we cleave;" and the Sepharvites, though they wished to hear of the pure and holy Jehovah, and therefore learned from His law the command, "Thou shalt not kill," yet still they passed their children through the fire to Moloch, and did not cease from that most cruel of all religious rites. Thus you see that this mingle-mangle religion left the people practically where they were: whatever their fear might be, their customs and practices remained the same.

Have you never met with persons of the same mongrel kind? If you have never done so, your class of acquaintances must be superior to mine. At this moment I shall not speak at random, but aim at individual cases; for I know of persons who come to this place of worship with great regularity, and yet they serve their sins, and obey their own vicious passions. They take delight in the services of this house, and yet they are much at home with the god of this world.

Some worship a deity quite as horrible as Moloch, whose name in the olden time was —the god of the wine-cup and the beer-barrel. They pay their eager devotions at his shrine, and yet they would be numbered with the people of God. They were drunk last night, and yet they are here this morning: possibly they will keep sober to-day; but they will not let many days pass before they will once more stagger before their abominable idol. In all places of worship there are people of this kind. Do not look round to see if there is a person present dressed like a workingman, for I have not the poor in my eye at this time. Alas, this vice is to be met with in one rank as well as another, and the person I mean looks quite respectable, and wears broadcloth. Many worshippers of Bacchus do not drink so as to be found drunk and incapable in the street. Oh no; they go up-stairs to their beds in their own houses, so that their condition is not observed; but still they must know that they are verging upon intoxication, if not actually gone. Woe unto such, who, while they pretend to be worshippers of Jehovah, are also worshippers of the beastly god of drunkenness. Is that too harsh a word? I beg the beasts' pardon for thus slandering them.

Alas, there are others who adore the goddess Venus, the queen of lust and uncleanness. I say no more. It is a shame even to speak of things which are done of them in secret. Too often the God is Mammon, who is as degraded a deity as any of them. Such turn religion into a means of gain, and would sell Jesus Himself for silver. The sin of Judas is one of which we may say, "So do they unto this day." Judas professes to serve Jesus, but all the while he is really serving himself, for secretly he abstracts from the treasury somewhat for his own pocket. "He had the bag, and kept that which was put therein." There are such still in the churches of God: they do not actually steal, but they follow Jesus for what they can make or get out of Him and His disciples. The symbols of their worship are the loaf and the fish. Now, this is as degrading a form of worship as the adoration of graven images. Gain is the god of many in all congregations: they seek Jesus, not because they care for His words, but because they eat of the loaves. They fear the Lord, but they serve other gods.

Persons are to be found, without a lantern and candle, who earn their money by ministering at the altars of Belial, and then offer a part of it to the Lord of hosts. Can they come from the place of revelling to the chamber of communion? Will they bring the wages of sin to the altar of God? He who makes money over the devil's back is a hypocrite if he lays his cankered coin at the apostles' feet. "Thy money perish with thee." How some men can rest in their impious pretensions it is not for me to guess; but methinks if their consciences were quickened, it would strike them as being a horrible thing in the land that they should be fearing the Lord and serving other gods.

I knew one who was always at the place of worship, prayer-meetings and all, and yet he had forsaken the wife of his youth, and was the companion of gamblers, and drunkards, and the unclean. I know another of a much milder type: he is a regular hearer, but he has no sense of true religion. He is a steady, hard-working man; but he lives to hoard money, and neither the poor nor the church of God ever get a penny from him: bowels of compassion he has none. He is a stranger to private prayer, and his Bible is never read; but he never misses a sermon. Oh, unhappy men, to come so near salvation in appearance, and to be so far off in reality! How can I explain their conduct? Truly, I must leave them among the mysteries of the moral world; for "they fear the Lord and serve their graven images unto this day."

II. Let us now consider

THE MANNER OF ITS GROWTH.

However came such a monstrous compound into this world?

Here is the history of it. These people came to live where the people of God had lived. The Israelites were most unworthy worshippers of Jehovah; but still they were known to others as His people, and their land was Jehovah's land. If the Sepharvites had stopped at Sepharvaim they would never have thought of fearing Jehovah; if the men of Babylon had continued to live in Babylon they would have been perfectly satisfied with Bel, or Succoth-benoth, or whatever the name of their precious god might be; but when they were fetched out from their old haunts, and brought into Canaan, they came under a different influence and a new order of things. God would not allow them to go the whole length of idolatry in His land; though He had cast out His people, yet still it was His land, and He would make these heathens know it, and show some little decency in their new abode.

Now, it sometimes happens to utter worldlings that they are dropped into the midst of Christian people, and they naturally feel that they must not be different from everybody about them. A kind of fashion is set by the professors among whom they dwell, and they fall into it. Everybody in the village attends a place of worship, and the newcomers do the same, though they have no heart to it. They have not the courage of their want of conviction, so they just drift with the current, and as it happens to run in a religious direction they are as religious as the rest. Or it may be they have a godly mother, and their father is a believer, and so they adopt the traditions of the family. They would like to be free to forsake the ways of piety, but they cannot be quite so unkind to those whom they love, and so they yield to the influences which surround them, and become in a measure fearers of God, out of respect to their neighbors or their families. This is a poor reason for being religious.

Something else happened to these Assyrian immigrants which had a stronger influence still. At first they did not fear God, but the Lord sent lions among them. When these lions had torn one and another, then the people trembled at the name of the God of the land, and desired to know the manner in which He would be worshipped. Affliction is a wild beast by which God teaches men who act like beasts. This is the growth of mongrelists. First, they are among godly people, and they must, therefore, go a little that way; and next they are afflicted, and they must now go further still. The man has been ill, he has seen the brink of the grave; he has promised and vowed to attend to good things, in the hope that God would relent and permit him to live. Besides that, the man's extravagance has brought him into difficulties and straits; he cannot go as far or so fast as he formerly did, and hence he inclines to more staid and sober ways. He dares not follow his bent, for he finds vice too expensive, too disreputable, too dangerous.

Many a man is driven by fear where he could not be drawn by love. He does not love the Lamb, but he does fear the lions. The rough voices of pain, poverty, shame, and death work a kind of law-work upon certain consciences which are insensible to spiritual arguments. They are forced, like the devils, to believe and tremble. Apprehension does not in their case lead to conversion, but it compels an outward respect for divine things. They argue that if the ills they feel do not reform them they may expect worse. If God begins with lions, what will come next? Therefore, they outwardly humble themselves, and yield homage to the God they dread.

One reason why they dropped into this self-contradictory religion was that they had

A TRIMMING TEACHER.

The king of Assyria sent them a priest: he could not have sent them a prophet, but that was what they really wanted. He sent them a Bethelite, not a genuine servant of Jehovah, but one who worshipped God by means of symbols; and this the Lord had expressly forbidden. If this priest did not break the first commandment by setting up other gods, yet he broke the second by making an image to represent the true God. This priest taught them the calf worship, but he winked at their false deities. When he saw them each one bowing before his own idol, he called it a natural mistake and by no means spake indignantly to them. If one of them worshipped Succoth-benoth, so long as he also brought an offering to Jehovah, he was not so uncharitable as to condemn him. He cried "Peace, peace," for he was a large-hearted man, and belonged to the Broad Church who believe in the good intentions of all men, and manufacture excuses for all the religions of the age.

I know of no surer way of a people's perishing than by being led by one who does not speak out straight, and honestly denounce evil. If the minister halts between two opinions, do you wonder that the congregation is undecided? If the preacher trims and twists to please all parties, can you expect his people to be honest? If I wink at your inconsistencies will you not soon be hardened in them? Like priest, like people. A cowardly preacher suits hardened sinners. Those who are afraid to rebuke sin, or to probe the conscience, will have much to answer for. May God save you from being led into the ditch by a blind guide.

And yet is not a mingle-mangle of Christ and Belial the common religion of the day? Is not worldly piety, or pious worldliness, the current religion of England? They live among godly people, and God chastens them, and they therefore fear Him, but not enough to give their hearts to Him. They seek out a trimming teacher who is not too precise and plain-spoken, and they settle down comfortably to a mongrel faith, half truth, half error, and a mongrel worship half dead form, and half orthodoxy. God have mercy upon men, and bring them out from the world; for He will not have a compound of world and grace.

Thus have I described the nature and the growth of this cross-bred religion.

III. Thirdly, let us estimate

THE VALUE OF THIS RELIGION.

What is it worth? First, it must evidently be feeble on both sides, because the man who serves Succoth-benoth cannot do it thoroughly if all the while he fears Jehovah; and he who fears Jehovah cannot be sincere if he is worshipping Moloch. The one sucks out the life of the other. Either one or the other alone might breed an intense worshipper; but when there are two deities, it is written, "Their heart is divided, now shall they be found wanting." A man of the world who is out and out in his conduct can make the best of his worldliness: what joy there is in it he gets, what profit there is to be made out of it he obtains; but if he tries to mix godliness with it he is pouring water on the fire, and hindering himself.

On the other hand, if a man goes in for godliness, he will assuredly make something of it, by the blessing of God; if there be any joy, if there be any holiness, if there be any power, the man who is thorough-going wins it; but suppose he is pulled back by his love of sin, then he may possess enough religion to make him miserable, and enough of sin to prevent his salvation; but the two are pposed, and between them he finds no rest. The an is lame on both feet, impotent in both direc- ons. He is like the salt which has lost its savor, either fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill, ut to be trodden under foot of men.

At first I should think that the mixture of the ue with the false at Samaria looked like an im- rovement. I should not wonder but what the riests of Judah were rather glad to hear that the ons had come among the strangers, and that the eople wanted to know something about Jehovah. t had a look in the right direction, and conse- uently the Scripture says that they feared God ; ut yet this fear of God was so hollow that, if you urn to the thirty-fourth verse, you will read, 'They fear not the Lord." Sometimes a verbal ontradiction most accurately states the truth. hey feared the Lord only in a certain sense ; ut, inasmuch as they also served other gods, it ame to this when summed up, that they did not ear God at all. The man who is religious and lso immoral, to put it in short, is irreligious. He ho makes a great fuss about godliness and yet cts in an ungodly way, when all comes to all, is n ungodly man. The value of this mixture is ss than nothing. It is

These Samaritans in after years became the bit- erest foes of God's people. Read the Book of Ne- emiah, and you will see that the most bitter op- onents of that godly man were those mongrels. heir fear of God was such that they wanted to oin with the Jews in building the Temple, and hen they found that the Jews would not have hem, they became their fiercest foes. No people o so much hurt as those who are like Jack-o'- oth-sides. The mixed multitude that came out f Egypt with the Israelites, fell a-lusting. The ischief does not begin with the people of God, ut with those who are with them, but not of them. he tares which you cannot root out grow with the heat, and draw away from it that which should ave nourished it. As the clinging ivy will eat out he life of a tree around which it climbs, so will hese impostors devour the church if they be left o their own devices.

This patchwork religion is of more value to the evil than to any one else ; it is his favorite livery, nd I pray you hate it, for it is a garment spotted y the flesh. I believe, dear friends, that those eople who have a dread of God, which makes them ppear religious, and who yet all the while live in heir sins, are most in danger of any people in the vorld ; for there is no getting at them to save hem. You preach to sinners, and they say, "He loes not mean us, for we are saints." You bring he thunders of the law to bear on the congrega- ion, and they, being inside the church, are not fraid of the tempest. They hide behind their alse profession. There is more likelihood of the alvation of a downright outsider than of these retenders. They hold with the hare and run with he hounds, they fear the Lord and serve other ods, and they will perish in their folly. Their uin will be all the more terrible because they sin n the light.

How provoking this adulterated religion must e to God! It is even provoking to God's minister o be pestered with men whose hypocrisies weaken he force of his testimony. Here is a man who is nown to be one of my hearers, and yet at the ame time he drinks, and speaks lewdly, and acts vickedly. What have I to do with him? His ongue is never still, and he tells everybody that e is a friend of mine, and my great admirer, and hen men lay his conduct at my door, and wonder vhat my doctrine must be. I could almost say, 'Sir, be my enemy, for this will harm me less han your friendship."

If this grieves His ministers, how provoking nust it be to God Himself ; these people are seen o worship Him, and when strangers come into the ssembly they spy out these hypocrites, and straightway charge the holy Jesus with all their aults. "See," say they, "there is old So-and-so. He is a great man among them, and yet I saw im come out of the gin-palace more than three heets in the wind." Thus the holy God is dis- honored by these unholy hypocrites. True religion suffers for their falsehood. One may fancy the Lord Jesus saying, "Come now, if you must needs serve the devil, do it ; but do not loiter around my gates and boast of being my servants."

IV. I pass briefly to another important point, which is this, for the text says, "As did their fathers, so do they unto this day." I believe in the final perseverance of the saints ; I am almost obliged to believe in the final perseverance of hypocrites ; for, really, when a man once screws himself up to play the double, and both to fear God and serve other gods, he is very apt to stick there. It takes a great deal of effort to bring yourself to that degree of wicked- ness ; you must use a great deal of damping of conscience and quenching of the Spirit before you can reach that shameless point, and having once gained that position you are apt to keep it all your life long. "So do they unto this day."

THE CONTINUANCE OF THIS EVIL ;

One reason why it can be said of most men, "so do they unto this day," is because it yields them a sort of comfort ; at any rate it keeps off the lions. "Why," say they, "it must be the right thing to do, for now we are quiet." While they lived in sin without a pretence of religion, when the minis- ter preached the word powerfully, they went home trembling ; now they do not care what he preaches about : the lions roar no longer, not so much as a cub shows itself. Though they do drink a little, though they do use strong language now and then, though they are really unconverted, yet since they have taken a pew at the church, or the chapel, they feel wonderfully easy in their minds. It is so soothing and pacifying to the conscience to feel that you mix up with the best of the saints, and are highly esteemed by them. So they wrap it up, and go down to hell with a lie in their right hand.

The worst of it is that not only men themselves do this, but their children and their children's chil- dren do the same : "As their fathers did, so do they unto this day." In an out-and-out godly family it is a great joy to see the children springing up to fear God ; but these double people, these borderers, see no such desirable succession. Fre- quently there is an open decline from apparent re- ligion : the sons do not care to go where the old man went at all ; nor need we wonder, since it did him so little good. He made all unhappy at home, and none are eager to imitate him.

In other cases, where there was kindness at home, the children are apt to try the same plan as their fathers, and mingle a little religion with a great deal of worldliness. They are just as keen and sharp as their worldly sire, and they see on which side their bread is buttered, and therefore they keep up the reputation of religion. A little gilt and paint go a long way, and so they lay it on. They fly the flag of Christ, at any rate, even though the vessel does not belong to His dominion, and is not bound for the port of glory. As vessels some- times run a blockade under a false flag, so do they reap many advantages from sailing under Christian colors. This detestable iniquity will not die out ; it multiplies itself, scattering its own seed on all sides, and so from generation to generation it lives on ; whole nations fear the Lord and serve other gods.

THE CURE.

V. I shall now close by saying a few words by way of cure of this dreadful evil of mongrelism ; this fearing the Lord, and serving other gods. Suppose men were thus full of duplicity in politics, what would be thought of them? If a war should rage between two nations, what would be thought of the man who professed to serve the Queen, and all the while was playing his cards to win favor with the Queen's enemies. What would he be? A liberal-minded person? A gentleman of broad sympathies? Perhaps so. But also he would be a traitor, and when he was found out he would be shot. He who in any way tries to serve God and His enemies, is a traitor to God : that is what it comes to.

In ordinary politics, if there be two parties, and a man comes forward and says, "I am on your side," and all the while he is doing his best to help the opposition, everybody says that he is a mean fellow. And what meanness it is to say, "I am for Christ," and yet practically to be for His ene- mies ; to cry up holiness, and yet to live in sin ; to preach up faith in Christ, and yet to trust in your own merits. This wretched shuffling indi- cates a meanness of soul from which may God in infinite mercy deliver us. Suppose a man in busi- ness said, "Oh, yes, I will be an honest man, but I will at the same time practise a trick or two ; I will be as straight as a line, but yet I will be crook- ed too." Why, he would very soon be known by only one name, and that name a dishonorable one. A merchant cannot be honest and dishonest, a woman cannot be both chaste and unchaste, pure and impure, at the same time ; and a man cannot be truly with God and yet with the world ; the amalgamation is impossible. Everybody sees through such

SHAM GODLINESS.

Ah, my dear friends, suppose that God were to treat us after the like double fashion ; suppose He smiled to-day and cursed to-morrow ; suppose He said, "You fear me, and so I will give you com- fort to-day ; but inasmuch as you worship other gods, when it comes to the last I will send you to your own gods ; you shall go down to hell." You want one course of conduct from God—mercy, tenderness, gentleness, forgiveness ; but if you play fast and loose with Him, what is this but mocking Him? Shall a man mock God? O thou great Father of our spirits, if we poor prodigals return to thee, shall we come driving all the swine in front of us, and bringing all the harlots and citi- zens of the far country at our heels, and introduce ourselves to thee by saying, "Father, we have sinned, and have come home to be forgiven and to go on sinning"? It were infernal—I can say no less. Yet some attempt it.

Lastly, what shall I say of the Holy Spirit? If He does not dwell in our hearts we are lost ; there is no hope for us unless He rules within us. And shall we dare to say,

"Come, Holy Spirit, heavenly Dove,
With all thy quickening powers,"

meanwhile I will live in filthiness and selfishness. Come, Holy Spirit, come and dwell with me, and I will hate my brother, I will boil with angry temper, and will be black with malice, so as to make my home miserable. Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove, come dwell within my soul, and I will carry thee to the theatre, and the ball-room, and the house of evil name.

I hate to utter such language, even for the sake of exposing it ; but what must God think of men who do not say so but who act so ; who, like Ba- laam, live in sin and yet cry, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." I dare not preach from that very popular text, for it is the mean, selfish wish of a man who even at the last would save his own skin. The old sneak! He wanted to live and serve the devil, and then cry off at the last. Surely he might have said, "I have been a prophet of Satan, and have sold my soul to him ; let me die as I have lived." I would wish to live in such a way as I would wish to die. If I would not like to die as I am, then I ought not to live as I am. If I am in a condition in which I dare not meet my God, may God in mercy fetch me out of the condition at once. Let me be right, and let there be no mistake about it ; but do not let me try to be both right and wrong, washed and filthy, white and black, a child of God and a child of Satan.

God has separated Heaven and hell by a gulf that never can be passed, and He has divided the two characters which shall people those two places by an equally wide gulf. This division can be passed by His grace, but none can inhabit the in- termediate space. None can hang between spirit- ual death and spiritual life, so as to be partly in one and partly in the other. Decide, then, decide. Be one thing or the other. "How long halt ye between two opinions?" Again I say with Elias, upon Carmel, "If the Lord be God, follow Him ; but if Baal, then follow him." But do not mix the worship of the two, for thus you will provoke God, and cause His anger to burn like fire against you. May God bless this word, for His name's sake,

Charles Edwards Makes a Confession.

The Mother's Gift to her Sailor Boy.

CHARLES EDWARDS' FLING.

FRANK EDWARDS and his wife were spending a winter evening at home. They were young people, and Frank after his return from the city was wont to spend the evening reading and chatting with his wife. Their little cottage had another inmate, Frank's brother, but he usually did not return till midnight, and sometimes even later. He was a bachelor, and used to say he should marry and settle down when he "had had his fling." Having his fling, with Charles meant like that other ominous phrase, "sowing his wild oats," a life of dissipation. He was a clerk in a large city house, and boarded with his brother since the latter had set up housekeeping.

On this night the husband and wife were surprised to hear Charles come home before ten and go straight to his own room. The door was sharply closed, and they heard no more. This was so unusual that Frank told his wife he would speak to his brother, for he feared he must be ill. Opening the door, he was surprised to find that the lamp was still unlighted, and he called to his wife to bring their own lamp. She did so, and bending over the lounge they saw the form of Charles stretched in agony. He was in a paroxysm, but it passed, and then he spoke. "Frank, old boy," he said in broken accents, "you were right. This life could have only one end. I am ruined, disgraced, dying. I have had my fling."

Again the paroxysm came upon him, and the wife in her distress clutched her husband's hand while he held the lamp with the other so that the rays fell on the face of the dying man. She said, "Can we do nothing? Let us send for the doctor." "No," said the prostrate man, "too late—gambling—embezzlement—poison." His broken words interrupted by gasps for breath told the tale. He had lost heavily at the gaming table, had robbed his employers, and then finding detection inevitable had taken poison. There lay the empty bottle beside him. It was soon over. His last words were, "I have had my fling." What followed in the awful moments when his spirit took its flight to appear before God it is awful to imagine. He had had his fling; who can tell the sum of all he had flung away!

THE SAILOR BOY AND HIS TESTAMENT.

SOME time ago there was a pious widow living in the north, on whom devolved the sole care of a numerous family, consisting of seven daughters and one son. It was her chief anxiety to train up her children in the path of virtue, and as far as the female branches of her family were concerned, her efforts were crowned with success.

But alas! her boy proved ungrateful for her care; and her only son, her darling, became her scourge and her cross. He formed evil acquaintances, and fell into all kinds of sin, and at last his bad companions induced him to leave home and go to sea. When his mother took her leave of him, she gave him a New Testament, inscribed with his name and her own, solemnly and tenderly entreating that he would keep the book, and read it for her sake. He was borne far away upon the bosom of the trackless deep, and year after year elapsed without tidings of her boy.

Wherever the disheartened mother went she made it a point to inquire for the ship in which her son sailed, if perchance she might hear any tidings of the beloved one who was always uppermost in her thoughts. On one occasion she accidentally met with a captain of a vessel, who informed her that he knew the ship, and that she had been wrecked; that he also knew a youth of the name of Charles ——, and added, perhaps with too little reserve and caution, that he was so depraved and profligate a lad, that it were a good thing if he, and all like him, were at the bottom of the sea.

Pierced to her inmost soul, this unhappy mother withdrew from the house as soon as she could compose her agitated feelings, that she might at once indulge her hopeless grief. "I shall go down to the grave," she said, "mourning for my son."

After the lapse of some years, a half-naked sailor knocked at her door to ask relief. The sight of a sailor was always interesting to her, and never failed to awaken recollections and emotions better imagined than described. She heard his tale. He had seen great perils in the deep, had been several times wrecked, but said he had never been so dreadfully destitute as he was some years back, when himself and "a fine young gentleman" were the only individuals of a whole ship's crew that were saved. We were cast upon a desert island, where, after seven days and nights, I closed his eyes. Poor fellow, I never shall forget it.' And here the tears stole down his weather-beaten cheeks.

"He read day and night in a little book which he said his mother gave him, and which was the only thing he saved. It was his companion every moment; he wept for his sins, he prayed, he kissed the book, he talked of nothing but this book and his mother; and at the last he gave it to me, with many thanks for my poor services. 'There, Jack, said he, 'take this book, and keep it, and read it and may God bless you—it's all I've got.' And then he clasped my hand, and died in peace."

"Is all this true?" asked the trembling, astonished mother. "Yes, madam, every word of it.' And then dragging from his ragged jacket a little book, much battered and time-worn, he held it up exclaiming, "and here's the very book, too."

She seized the Testament, saw her own hand writing, and beheld the name of her son, coupled with her own, on the cover. She gazed, she read, she wept, she rejoiced. She seemed to hear a voice which said, "Behold, thy son liveth."

"Will you part with that book, my honest fellow?" said the mother, anxious now to possess the precious relic. "No, madam," was the answer "not for any money—not for all the world. He gave it me with his dying hand. I have more than nce lost my all ince I got it with-ut losing this treas-re, the value of vhich I have learned or myself; and I vill never part with t till I part with the ›reath out of my ›ody."

Reverently kissing
he book, now twice
›lessed, the widow
›anded it back to ›er dead son's riend, and for the irst time in many years her boy's name was coupled in her mind with words of thankfulness to God. The promised answer to her many prayers had come, and she told the sailor of God's faithfulness, and how His words are surely fulfilled even though the blessing seem to tar-
ry. Aged and poor,
she had little to give,
but the half naked
man needed little.
His pressing necessities relieved, shelter and warmth for a day or two afforded,
he was again ready for sea, and throughout the remainder of the widow's life he was to her a son and she to him a mother.
The New Testament given in faith and a blessing upon its reading continually sought by prayer had issued in a double blessing.

THE APPROACHING RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

[NOTES of an address delivered in the City Hall, Glasgow, by T. Blake, Esq., ex-Member of Parliament for Leominster, at the conclusion of a Lecture on Prophecy by Rev. M. Baxter.]

Let me give you, from God's Word, as briefly and concisely as I can, seven distinct reasons for believing that the Jews will yet be gathered again to their own land. The first reason is because it is written in Isaiah 11 : 11, God will restore them a second time. This cannot be the former restoration from Babylon which is spoken of; it is a restoration from all the countries. There has been no second restoration. The first restoration was very partial indeed! Cyrus permitted as many to return as were willing : we have their number in Ezekiel and Nehemiah. It was a very small portion, only 240,360.

Just before, we find that the armed men of Judah, according to the census of David, consisted of eight hundred thousand men of Israel, and Benjamin five hundred thousand; in all, one million three hundred thousand. Only two hundred and forty thousand returned. There has been no semblance of a second return; and yet the fact that a second return is promised is emphasized and reiterated, and I might give you, instead of this one passage of Scripture on this point, at least a dozen where the word "second" is mentioned. There has been, then, no second restoration.

My second reason is that the restoration from Babylon was only partial. We find the exact numbering of the people given to us in Ezekiel and also in Nehemiah. These are the numbers of those returned—the whole congregation was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore, and in Nehemiah the words are precisely the same as to the number.

Third: It is to be a restoration of the two tribes of Judah and of the ten tribes of Israel. Now, the ten tribes went first down into Babylon, and they never returned, and some people will tell us we are part of those ten tribes. That is a question I have not gone into.

Well, these ten tribes never returned, but a portion of the two tribes returned. The time is coming, it says in this same chapter, "and He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth. The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off: Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim." This is a literal prophecy, because these Israelites became divided, and intense hatred existed between the two divisions, that the tribes are literally to become reconciled.

This is not the only scripture we have as a proof of this. If we turn to Ezekiel 37 : 16, we find it is written, "Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: and join them one to another in one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand, etc. And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord; Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all: and there shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all."

If I did not believe in the literality of this prophecy I should not believe in God's Word. Am I to take the pen and strike out all these things, or am I to make nonsense of them by applying them to something else? Israel meant Israel, and when they were scattered it meant Israel were scattered.

A fourth reason is from Jeremiah 16 : 14, and also in the 23d chapter of the same book : "I will gather the remnant of My flock out of all countries"—France, Egypt, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Russia. Read also Jeremiah 32 : 37.

Fifth: The restoration of Israel is to be connected with the blessings under the new Covenant (Isaiah 60 : 19): "The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness give light unto thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself: for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended." So also in Jeremiah 31 : 31. They will come not under a covenant of works, but under the same covenant under which we as Christians come. Then a nation shall be born in a day, and so they shall look upon Him, whom they have pierced. Read also Isaiah 30 : 25, and 65 : 19.

A sixth reason is, these blessings are to be permanent. The Lord says, "It shall be an everlasting covenant, and they shall dwell in the land forever." We have only to ask whether these things are fulfilled to-day? No, none have happened, but they are to happen.

Mr. Baxter has also hinted at the fact, that even of the territory promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the Jews have never had the whole part in possession. They had the greatest part under Solomon, but the land promised to them they have not yet had in its fulness. But God's promise in this respect will be fulfilled to the letter.

Another and the last reason is the Israelites in the millennium are to be missionaries to the Gentiles. Now, we have missionaries to the Jews, but they do not accomplish much. The Jews grope in darkness, and do not see the light in which we, as Christians, dwell. But by and by, when converted, the Jews are to be missionaries to the Gentiles, for thus it is written in the last chapter of Isaiah, "I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape unto the nations, . . . and they shall declare My glory among the Gentiles." To attempt to spiritualize all these prophecies, and say they relate to the present condition of believers, is to misinterpret the Scriptures.

For these and many other reasons we believe that these Jews are to be restored previous to the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. When the Lord comes upon the scene He makes short work of His enemies, whatever be their number.

We must understand that the resurrection body of Jesus was fashioned like the body that went down to the grave, but was a body which was immortal. It was a body that could be made invisible, and could pass through closed doors.

So by and by when our bodies are raised like unto His glorious body, we will never die, never hunger, and there will be no marrying or giving in marriage. We shall, like our Lord, be able to traverse through space with the speed of lightning, for our body shall be like unto His glorious body.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

The Old Bank.

It was nearly ten o'clock before the fugitive banker and his friends were on the road, old Marlowe marching at the head of his horse, and Phebe mounted on her wiry little pony, while Roland Sefton rode in front of the wagon at times.

Their progress was slow, for the oak furniture was heavy and the roads were rough, leading across the moor, and down steep hills into valleys, with equally steep hills on the other side. The sky was covered with a thin mist drifting slowly before the wind, and when the moon shone through it, about two o'clock in the morning, it was the waning moon looking sad and forlorn amid the floating vapor. The houses they passed were few and far between, showing no light or sign of life. All the land lay around them dark and desolate under the midnight sky; and the slow creaking of the wheels, and sluggish hoof-beats of the horse dragging the wagon, were the only sounds that broke the stillness.

In this gloom old Marlowe could hold no conversation either with Phebe or Roland Sefton, but from time to time they could hear him sob aloud, as he trudged on in his speechless isolation. It was a sad sound, which pierced them to the heart. From time to time Roland Sefton walked up the long hills beside Phebe's pony, pouring out his whole heart to her. They could hardly see each other's faces in the dimness, and words came the more readily to him. All the burden of his confession was that he had fallen through seeking Felicita's happiness. For her sake he had longed for more wealth, and speculated in the hope of gaining it, and tampered with the securities intrusted to him in the hope of retrieving losses. It was for her, and her only, he maintained; and now he had brought infamy and wretchedness and poverty upon her and his innocent children.

"Would to God I could die to-night!" he exclaimed; "my death would save them from some portion of their trouble."

Phebe listened to him almost as heart-broken as himself. In her singularly solitary life, so far apart from ordinary human society, she had never been brought into contact with sin, and its profound, fathomless misery; and now it was the one friend, whom she had loved the longest and the best, who was walking beside her a guilty man, fleeing through the night from all he himself cared for, to seek a refuge from the consequences of his crime in an uncertain exile. In years afterward it seemed to her as if that night had been rather a terrible dream than a reality.

At length the pale dawn broke; and the utter separation caused by the darkness between them and old Marlowe passed away with it. He stopped his horse and came to them, turning a gray, despairing face upon Roland Sefton.

"It is time to leave you," he said; "over these fields lies the nearest station, where you can escape from a just punishment. You have made us beggars to keep up your own grandeur. God will see that you do not go unpunished."

"Hush, hush!" cried Phebe aloud, stretching out her hand to Roland Sefton; "he will forgive you by and by. Tell me, have you no message to send by me, sir? When shall we hear from you?"

"If I get away safe," he answered, in a broken voice, "and if nothing is heard of me before, tell Felicita I will be in the place where I saw her first, this day six months. Do not tell her till the time is near. It will be best for her to know nothing of me at present."

They were standing at the stile over which his road lay. The sun was not yet risen, but the gray clouds overhead were taking rosy and golden tints. Here and there in the quiet farmsteads around them the cocks were beginning to crow lazily; and there were low, drowsy twitterings in the hedges, where the nests were still new little homes. It was a more peaceful hour than sunset can ever be, with its memories of the day's toils and troubles. All the world seemed bathed in rest and quietness except themselves. Their dark journey through the silent night had been almost a crime.

"Your father turns his back upon me, as all honest men will do," said Roland Sefton.

Old Marlowe had gone back to his horse, and stood there without looking round. The tears ran down Phebe's face; but she did not touch her father, and ask him to bid his old friend's son good-by.

"Some day no man will turn his back upon you, sir," she answered; "I would die now rather than do it. You will regain your good name some day."

"Never!" he exclaimed; "it is past recall. There is no place of repentance for me, Phebe. I have staked all, and lost all."

About the same hour that Roland Sefton set off under shelter of old Marlowe's wagon to attempt his escape, Mr. Clifford, the senior partner in the firm, reached Riversborough by the last train from London. It was too late for him to intrude on the household of his young partner, and he spent the night at an hotel.

The old bank at Riversborough had been flourishing for the last hundred years. It had the power of issuing its own notes; and until lately these notes, bearing the familiar names of Clifford and Sefton, had been preferred by the country people round to those of the Bank of England itself. For nobody knew who were the managers of the Bank of England; while one of the Seftons, either father or son, could be seen at any time for the last fifty years. On ordinary days there were but few customers to be seen in its handsome office, and a single clerk might easily have transacted all the business. But on market-days and fair-days the place was crowded by loud-voiced, red-faced country gentlemen, and by awkward and burly farmers, from the moment its doors were opened until they were closed at the last stroke of four sounding from the church clock near at hand. The strong-room of the Old Bank was filled full with chests containing valuable securities and heir-looms, belonging to most of the county families in the neighborhood.

For the last twenty years Mr. Clifford had left the management of the bank entirely to the elder Sefton, and upon his death to his son, who was already a partner. He had lived abroad, and had not visited England for more than ten years. There was a report, somewhat more circumstantial than a rumor, but the truth of which none but the elder Sefton had ever known, that Mr. Clifford, offended by his only son, had let him die of absolute starvation in Paris. Added to this rumor was a vague story of some crime committed by the younger Clifford, which his father would not overlook or forgive. That he was a hard man, austere to utter pitilessness, everybody averred. No transgressor need look to him for pardon.

When Roland Sefton had laid his hands upon the private personal securities belonging to his senior partner, it was with no idea that he would escape the most rigorous prosecution, should his proceedings ever come to the light. But it was with the fixed conviction that Mr. Clifford would never return to England, or certainly not to Riversborough, where this hard report had been circulated and partly accepted concerning him. The very bonds he had dealt with, first borrowing money upon them, and at last selling them, had been bequeathed to him in Mr. Clifford's will, of which he was himself the executor. He had, as he persuaded himself, only forestalled the possession of them. But a letter he had received from Mr. Clifford, informing him that he was on his way home, with the purpose of thoroughly investigating the affairs of the bank, had fallen like a thunderbolt upon him, and upon Acton, through whose agency he had managed to dispose of the securities without arousing any suspicion.

Early the next morning Mr. Clifford arrived at the bank, and heard to his great surprise that his partner had started for London and had been away the day before; possibly, Madame Sefton suggested with some anxiety, in the hope of meeting him there. No doubt he would be back early, for it was the day of the May-fair, when there was always an unusual stir of business. Mr. Clifford took his place in the vacant bank parlor, and waited somewhat grimly for the arrival of the head clerk, Acton.

There was a not unpleasant excitement among the clerks, as they whispered to each other on arrival that old Clifford was come, and Roland Sefton was still absent. But this excitement deepened into agitation and misgiving as the hour for opening the bank drew near and Acton did not arrive. Such a circumstance had never occurred before, for Acton had made himself unpopular with those beneath him by expecting devotion equal to his own to the interests of the firm. When ten o'clock was close at hand, a clerk ran round to Acton's lodgings; but before he could return a breathless messenger rushed into the bank as the doors were thrown open, with the tidings that the head clerk had been found by his landlady lying dead in his bed.

More quickly than if the town-crier had been sent round the streets with his bell to announce the news, it was known that Roland Sefton was missing, and the managing clerk had committed suicide. The populace from all the country round was flocking into the town for the fair, three fourths of whom did business with the Old Bank. No wonder that a panic took possession of them. In an hour's time the tranquil street was thronged with a dense mass of town's-people and country-people, numbers of whom were fighting their way to the bank as if for dear life. There was not room within for the crowds who struggled to get to the counters and present their checks and bank-notes, and demand instant settlement of their accounts. In vain Mr. Clifford assured them there was no fear of the firm being unable to meet its liabilities. In cases like these the panic cannot be allayed by words.

As long as the funds held out the checks and notes were paid over the counter; but this could not go on. Mr. Clifford himself was in the dark as to the state of affairs, and did not know how his credit stood. Soon after mid-day the funds were exhausted, and with the utmost difficulty the bank was cleared and the doors closed. But the crowd did not disperse; rather it grew denser as the news spread like wildfire that the Old Bank had stopped!

It was at the moment that the bank doors were closed that Phebe turned into Whitefriars Road. She had taken a train from Upchurch, leaving her father to return home alone with the empty wagon. It was a strange sight which met her. The usually quiet street was thronged from end to end, and the babble of many voices made all sounds indistinct. Even on the outskirts of the crowd there were men, some pale and some red with anxiety, struggling with elbows and shoulders to make their way through to the bank, in the vain hope that it would not be too late.

A strongly-built, robust farmer fainted quietly away beside her, like a delicate woman, when he heard that the doors were shut; and his wife and son, who were following him, bore him out of the crush as well as they could. Phebe, pressing gently forward, and gliding in wherever a chance movement gave her an opportunity, at last reached the archway at the side of the house, and rapped urgently for admittance. A scared-looking man-servant, who opened the door with the chain upon it, let her in as soon as he recognized who she was.

"It's a fearsome day," he said; "master's away, gone nobody knows where; and old Acton's poisoned himself. Nobody dare tell Mrs. Sefton; but Madame knows. She is in the dining-room, Miss Marlowe."

Phebe found her, as she had done the day before, sitting in the oriel window; but the usually placid-looking little woman was in a state of nervous agitation. As soon as she caught sight of Phebe's pitiful face she ran to her, and clasping her in her arms, burst into a passion of tears and sobs.

"My son!" she cried, "what can have become of him, Phebe? Where can he be gone? If he would only come home all these people would be satisfied and go away. They don't know Mr. Clifford, but they know Roland; he is so popular. The servants say the bank is broken; what does that mean, Phebe? And poor Acton! They say he is dead—he did kill himself by poison. Is it true, Phebe? Tell me it is not true!"

But Phebe could say nothing to comfort her; she knew better than any one else the whole truth of the calamity. But she held the weeping little woman in her strong young arms, and there was something consoling in her loving clasp.

"And where are the children?" she asked, after a while.

"I sent them to play in the garden," answered Madame; "their own little plots are far away, out of sight of the dreadful street. What good is it that they should know all this trouble?"

"No good at all," replied Phebe. "And where is Mrs. Sefton?"

"Alas, my Phebe!" she exclaimed, "who dare tell her? Not me; no, no! She is shut up in her little chamber, and she forgets all the world—her children even, and Roland himself. It is as if she went away into another life, far away from ours; and when she comes home again she is like one in a dream. Will you dare to tell her?"

"Yes, I will go," she said.

Yet with very slow and reluctant steps Phebe climbed the staircase, pausing long at the window midway, which overlooked the wide and sunny landscape in the distance, and the garden just below. She watched the children busy at their little plots of ground, utterly unconscious of the utter ruin that had befallen them. How lovely and how happy they looked! She could have cried out aloud, a bitter and lamentable cry. But as yet she must not yield to the flood of her own grief; she must keep it back until she was at home again, in her solitary home, where nobody could hear her sobs and cries. Just now she must think for, and comfort, if comfort were possible, these others, who stood even nearer than she did to the sin and the sinner. Gathering up all her courage, she quickened her footsteps and ran hurriedly up the remaining steps.

But at the drawing-room door, which was partly open, her feet were arrested. Within, standing behind the rose-colored curtains, stood the tall, slender figure of Felicita, with her clear and colorless face catching a delicate flush from the tint of the hangings that concealed her from the street. She was looking down on the crowd below, with the perplexity of a foreigner gazing on some unfamiliar scene in a strange land.

THE DAY OF ATONEMENT.

S.S. Lesson for November 6, Lev. 16–30. Golden Text, Rom. 5–11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER the death of Nadab and Abihu, the two sons of Aaron, the Lord directed Moses to tell Aaron that he should not come at all times into the holy place within the veil, for "the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest" (Heb. 9 : 8). In the first place, Aaron must bring with him "a young bullock for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering." This was for himself, to "make an atonement for himself, and for his house" (ver. 6-11). In order to do his priest's office, there must be no sin or uncleanness on him or on his house; every member must be pure before God, else Aaron could not be in a position to make an atonement for the people. But Jesus, our great High Priest, needed no offering; He was already "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners" (Heb. 7 : 26). Aaron must put on the holy garments, for he stood clothed in another's righteousness; himself was hidden. Christ, when He made atonement, was unclothed; His flesh was holy; it had passed through all temptations which are common to man, had "suffered being tempted," and remained "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate." As Adam needed no covering when there was no sin to hide, so Jesus, the holy One, needed no covering on the cross.

Aaron, having taken the bullock and the ram for himself and his house, must then "take of the congregation of the children of Israel, two kids of the goats for a sin offering, and one ram for a burnt offering." After having presented them before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, Aaron must "cast lots upon the two goats, one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scapegoat." The first must be offered for a sin offering. "But the goat on which the lot fell to be the scapegoat shall be presented alive before the Lord to make an atonement with him, and to let him go for a scapegoat into the wilderness" (ver. 10). Let us never forget that with regard to the great antitype of the scapegoat, no lot was cast. He was under no obligation, for He said, "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again" (John 10 : 17, 18).

Before the atonement could be made for the people, everything must be cleansed—Aaron, his household, and the tabernacle itself; the altar, also, must be sprinkled with the blood of the high priest's offering and the people's offering, for the very holy place itself could not be clean so long as the priest and the people were not cleansed. "And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness." And then Aaron must be alone in that solemn moment; "no man in the tabernacle of the congregation," but only God and Aaron, and the blood, the poured-out life; Aaron undertaking, under cover of that blood, to represent and atone for himself, his household, and the whole congregation of Israel. Again, before Aaron could be accepted he must bring incense kindled with God's fire, from off the altar, which should cover the mercy-seat with its cloud of smoke, "that he die not." Even the altar of burnt offering must be cleansed, the remembrance of the priest's sin and the people's, and the life-blood poured out for it must be put upon the horns of the altar: "and he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel."

The altar and the tabernacle both were types of Christ, and yet both imperfect, both defiled by the uncleanness of the children of Israel. Christ alone could identify Himself with our sin as the sin offering; could come in contact with sin, and yet know no sin and remain "without sin" (2 Cor. 5 : 21; Heb. 4 : 15); He alone could be made sin for us, even be "made a curse for us," and yet be "undefiled" (Gal. 3 : 13; Heb. 7 : 26). But the horrible anguish of those hours in Gethsemane and on the cross can only be imagined by considering the exact opposite. If the freedom, liberty, and sense of relief which I experience in the conscious pardon of my sins be so great, what, then, must have been the oppression, the inconceivable weight of anguish, which lay upon Him, when His pure being came in contact with all defilement?

"And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat: and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat; and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited; and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness." "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," for "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all," and "His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree" (or, Rev. Ver., "carried up our sins. . . . to the tree,") "that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness" (John 1 : 29; Isa. 53 : 6; 1 Pet. 2 : 24).

Imagine the shame of a thief in Israel, when, before all the congregation, Aaron told out the details of his sin, and laid it upon the head of the goat; think of the backbiter and slanderer, think of the liar and impure, think of the hypocrite and the covetous, when things which had not got abroad were dragged out from their hiding-places and exposed before all the congregation of Israel. It must have been a little judgment-day, dreaded and yet looked forward to, for when the poor goat who was under the curse was led away and disappeared out of sight, we can imagine the relief, the power to breathe again freely, among that awed and fasting multitude. The sin was gone, carried away, out of sight, "cast . . . into the depths of the sea" (Micah 7 : 19).

Reader, is all this merely a matter of historical interest to you? Does it only satisfy your curiosity about the customs of an ancient people? or do you see yourself therein condemned, reckoned unclean, defiled, and defiling all with which you have to do? and then do you hear your sins confessed over the head of God's Scapegoat, and do you see Jesus led out into the land which is "not inhabited," into the land of silence and death, bearing those sins which you have committed; and do you see therein God's provision for a separation between you and your sins? When Aaron came out from the holy place, he must leave his consecrated garments behind him, he must wash his flesh in water, and then he was in a position to offer unto God the burnt offering "of a sweet savor;" then, too, the fat of the sin offering might be burned upon the altar, because God can accept the sacrifice of a clean heart. But the man who led the scapegoat away, and he who had burned the skin and the flesh of the sin offerings, must wash themselves and their clothes in water before they came into the camp. So complete must be the separation from all contact with sin.

"For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that you may be clean from all your sins before the Lord. It shall be a Sabbath of rest unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls by a statute forever." No rest without cleansing. But, "if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" (Heb. 9 : 13, 14.) God would have us clean from all our sins, free from them as a garment is free from dirt when it is washed, and one could not have known that there had been stains upon it. He would have our conscience purged from dead works, not only from condemnation, but from all which is not alive with the life of God. It is our privilege to live "by the faith of the Son of God," and all "which is not of faith is sin," and has to do with death.

It was no dead work when Paul sung praises to God in the prison where they were cruelly and unjustly incarcerated, forgetting or ignoring all their wrongs in the blessed privilege of suffering with Christ; this was the faith of the Son of God. It was no dead work when Paul failed to take advantage of the open prison doors, the unlocked chains, after God had sent an earthquake; it was no dead work when he hindered the suicide of the jailer, and manifested more care for his safety than he did for his own freedom. This was the faith of the Son of God, Jesus Christ's faith lived out in their lives; they were pure from self-consideration, and acted as men crucified with Christ.

Purity and rest go together. Oh the relief of having nothing at issue between our souls and God, and nothing at issue between ourselves and other men—"a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men"! Then work is rest, and suffering is rest; struggles cease when our wills and God's will are one undivided will. "It shall be a Sabbath of rest to you, and ye shall afflict your souls." Yes, let the flesh fast, let it know its nothingness; the day of self's affliction is the day of God's deliverance, it is the rest promised to the weary and heavy-laden. God rests in us when we are cleansed by the blood, and living out of ourselves in Jesus, and we rest in God, and "he that is entered into His rest, he also hath ceased from his own works as God did from His" (Heb. 4 : 10). There is always some reason for the unrest of unrestful souls; there is something wrong, some foreign matter in the spiritual system, when the health of the soul is disturbed; some mote must be in the spiritual eye, if it is inflamed and cannot rest on God. O Lord, lead us into Thy perfect, Thine unbroken rest!

The Land Court Constituted Under the Irish Land Act held its first sitting on Thursday, October 20th, when the president explained the mode of procedure. The fee for entering the court, it was expected, would be so high as to deter small tenants from applying for its assistance, but from Lord Justice O'Hagan's statement it appears that a tenant can submit his case on the payment of a sum equivalent to twenty-five cents, so that no one can have any excuse for not taking advantage of the act. The test cases selected by the League have been temporarily withdrawn. They were cunningly selected from such property as was let below Griffith's valuation, with the view of entrapping the court into an increase of rent, and so justify an outcry against it. It will be remembered that at the commencement of the agitation Mr. Parnell being asked to define fair rent, specified Griffith's valuation as the standard, yet with singular inconsistency the test cases ask for a reduction of fifty per cent on rent already below that valuation.

Disturbances in Ireland have Followed the arrest of the leaders of the Land League. They are not worthy the name of riots. The offenders were chiefly idle boys and loafers, who took possession of the streets of Limerick and Dublin, and threw stones at the windows, but who fled when attacked by the police. The Lord Mayor of Dublin applied to Mr. Forster to restrain the police from retaliating on the mob and to protest against the ostentatious display of military force. Mr. Forster replied that the police had acted under orders, and would do the same thing again if necessary, finally waving the Lord Mayor and others out of the room with actual discourtesy. It would appear from this and from the large number of soldiers being sent into Ireland that the British Government has determined to act decisively in the preservation of order. There was comparative quiet toward the end of last week, but it is believed to be the result of terror rather than of contentment. A newspaper correspondent, cabling to a journal in New York, says: "Speaking to a Fenian yesterday, I asked if his party contemplated any mischief. He replied: 'Do you think we are fools enough to make trouble with 36,000 troops in the country? Wait till they go.'"

The Irish Land League, Exasperated by the arrest of the leaders, has taken a new departure, which has the appearance of being a reckless and stupid blunder. They issued an order, signed by Parnell and the other imprisoned men, directing the members of the League to pay no rent until they were released from prison. The manifesto says: "It is as lawful to refuse to pay rents as it is to receive them. Against the passive resistance of the entire population, military power has no weapon. Funds will be poured out unstintedly for the support of all who may endure eviction in the course of the struggle. Our exiled brothers in America may be relied upon to contribute if necessary as many millions of money as they have contributed thousands to starve out landlordism and bring English tyranny to its knees." This order removes the principal difficulty the British Government had in dealing with the Land League. So long as its operations were confined to political agitation it was not an illegal organization, but by inciting to the non-payment of rent it became treasonable. The government responded to the manifesto by proclaiming the Land League, cautioning the people "that the association having now avowed its purpose to be to prevent the payment of all rent, and to effect the subversion of law as administered in the Queen's name in Ireland, all persons are warned that the association is an unlawful and criminal association, and that all meetings and assemblies to carry out or promote its designs or purposes are alike unlawful and criminal, and will be prevented, and, if necessary, dispersed by force."

The Prompt Flight of the Men who Succeeded the imprisoned Leaguers in the charge of the funds and books of the League occurred immediately on the issue of the proclamation. When the news reached the Land League's Dublin office a hurried council was held. The books and documents were secured, and letters from the country were destroyed. Many books and papers were carted to a place of safety. The lights were extinguished and the doors were locked. The executive officials decamped, fearing arrest, leaving only a stock of note-paper and envelopes. The prisoners in Kilmainham are not harshly treated. They have comfortable, clean rooms, with easy chairs, books, and the Dublin newspapers. They can smoke, and have each day six hours of mutual intercourse. They can have food sent in. Some ridicule has been cast on the government detectives for permitting Mr. Arthur O'Connor to escape, but it is now understood that there was a motive for allowing him to escape. He has already on one occasion supplied valuable information to the enemies of his employers, and it is believed that the knowledge on which the government has based its charge of treason against Parnell and his colleagues was supplied by O'Connor.

The Situation in Russia is Growing More and more perilous. The Czar, instead of relaxing the tyranny which gave rise to the conspiracies that brought ruin upon his father, is proceeding to yet severer measures. He is evidently smitten with a panic of fear, and has reasoned himself into the belief that his only safety is in tightening the grip of the iron hand upon the people. His last ukase may well excite astonishment in the minds of onlookers. He has established in many parts of the country, including the old and new capitals, what is known as the minor state of siege, and threatens a still more searching tyranny known as the major state of siege. Under the one now established the Government may search the house of any citizen, may imprison any suspected person for two weeks, may keep anybody within the proscribed districts, bringing suspects to them or expel them from them. He has decided to fight Nihilism with force alone, but finds the ground honeycombed beneath his feet, and his throne as unstable as if it rocked on the jaws of an earthquake.

Another Female Nihilist Arrested.—A Telegram from St. Petersburg says M. Soldekine, head of the secret police, was walking down the Rue Moscowska, a street of St. Petersburg, when he noticed a woman carrying a pot of cream. Her face seemed to be familiar. When, a short time after, the woman entered a house he had police agents stationed at the doors, and went away to examine his collection of socialist photographs. He immediately identified her with a female Nihilist called Lebedeff, known to have been implicated in two abortive attempts on the life of the late Czar. Lebedeff, seeing that she was being followed, the same evening repaired to the Moscow station, intending to take the Moscow express. There she was arrested. She will be tried with seventeen other Nihilists in a few weeks.

The Pope of Rome Repeated his Complaints against the Italian Government on Sunday, October 16th, to a band of pilgrims who asked his blessing. The Pope in his address stated that the deplorable state of affairs placed before him the alternative of enduring continual captivity, made harder daily, or of going into exile. He therefore asked Catholics to watch and pray for the liberty and independence of the Pope. He concluded by saying that he was no longer secure in his palace; that he was outraged in his person and dignity in a thousand ways. The gravity and earnestness of the Pope made a profound impression. He closed his address with his arms raised to Heaven as though imploring help. A very hostile feeling exists against the Pope among the people of Rome. They stoned the pilgrims as they left the Vatican, and shouted, "Down with the Vatican!"

The Growth of Infidelity in Paris.—On September 24th, M. Rochefort went to St. Denis to administer to three children the rite of initiation, which is to supersede baptism among French Freethinkers. The proceedings commenced with a dinner in a small restaurant packed with fifty guests, who listened open-mouthed to the conversation with which the infidel seasoned the repast. Referring to his travels as having strengthened his patriotism he said: "I have seen that we are unquestionably the most independent nation on the earth. Look at England, that so-called classic land of liberty. Working men cannot throw off the shackles of religion. In America too, you are not allowed to be without religion." On the arrival of the dessert, the badges of the St. Denis Society of Freethinkers were handed to M. Rochefort, who said: "We are about to proceed, not to the baptism, but to the initiation of three little children to whom free thought opens its ranks. We must free ourselves from superstitions before thinking of destroying tyrants. Our fathers would not have demolished the Bastille if they had not previously overturned Christ." A young woman, with a baby in her arms, and a boy and girl of four or five, then timidly advanced and seated herself before M. Rochefort, who tied a broad red riband round the neck of each child. All present next signed a record of the ceremony, the usual toasts were drunk, and the ceremony was over.

Still Another Royal Interview is Projected. The King of Italy has arranged to visit the Emperor of Austria. The meeting will take place in Vienna. The newspapers state that Queen Margarita will accompany King Humbert of Italy on his visit to the Emperor Francis Joseph. This means another disappointment to French hopes. With Russia in alliance with Germany, and Italy reconciled to Austria, France can have but little prospect of securing an ally should she enter on a struggle with Germany.

The Ameer of Afghanistan is Reported to have re-established his authority throughout the country. The Viceroy of India, telegraphing to the British Government on October 22d, said "News has been received at Quetta that Abdul Kudus Khan, the Ameer's general, has written to the Ameer announcing that he captured Herat after a battle outside the city, during which the Herati infantry deserted Ayoub Khan. Abdul Kudus Khan is said to have occupied the city without resistance.

The Turkish Messengers from the Sultan have been withdrawn from Egypt. They embarked for Constantinople on October 19th. The Khedive informed them before their departure for Turkey that he would go to Constantinople as soon as the state of public affairs permitted, probably next summer. It is understood that the exact date of his visit and other details will be finally settled by the Khedive in concert with England and France. The French iron-clad was ordered to quit Alexandria immediately after the departure of the delegates. Similar orders were sent to the British iron-clad Invincible, which was stationed at Alexandria.

"He Loved Little Girls."—An English Lady, writing from Syria, says that the Mohammedan girls there are continually singing our beautiful hymns in Arabic. "Safe in the arms of Jesus" is a great favorite. A little Moslem girl accounted for her preference for the Christian religion by saying, "I like your Jesus because He loved little girls. Our Mohammed did not love little girls." She had been led to seize upon at least one of the great differences between Mohammedanism and Christianity. The reason for her preference is well understood, for "We love Him because He first loved us."

THE names of kings, great generals, discoverers, inventors, and the magnates of the commercial world are carefully preserved in the pages of history, but there have been many men who deserve to be remembered with honor, of whom history takes no note. They are men of unselfish, retiring disposition, chiefly concerned with the good of others, intent on doing their Master's work in the world, earnestly desiring to spread abroad the knowledge of salvation and to bring souls into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Such men, possessed of abilities that would give them a high place in the world, consecrate them to a service which seldom brings wealth or worldly fame, but which, we may be sure, God will reward at the last day when at the final assize there are last who will be first, and first who will be last.

These men in some cases become missionaries, and at the risk of their lives go into heathen lands to declare unto the savages the truth as it is in Jesus; others, with eloquence that would have won them high prizes at the bar or in the Legislature, become pastors of churches at low salaries; and others, while engaged in secular pursuits, consecrate the proceeds of their labors to Christian philanthropy and devote their time and energy to Christian work. To this last class belongs the Christian gentleman whose portrait appears on our frontispiece this week. Almost unknown to fame, he lived a life of usefulness and devotion which will well repay study and encourage us to emulation.

James Bundy was born in Dymock, Gloucestershire, England, in the year 1750, of parents who, though outwardly correct in life, could not be described as converted people. They, nevertheless, made it their endeavor to train James and their other children in habits which they hoped would fit them to discharge the duties of life honorably and well.

As their means were but slender, it was necessary that James should leave home at an early age, when he had not so much as learned the alphabet, to get his living, and he accordingly engaged himself to a neighboring farmer. Small as were his earnings at this time, he showed something of the unselfishness which afterward distinguished him, by giving every farthing of the first payment he received from the farmer to a medical man, in order that his mother, who lay ill at home, might have all necessary attention.

The early life of James Bundy is an example of the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties. One day, after entering upon his first situation, while looking after his sheep, he saw some young men sitting on a bank engaged in reading. On his drawing near to them that he might listen, they observed signs of interest in his face, and asked whether he could read. He replied that he could not, but would be glad to learn. To his great joy one of them offered to teach him, and he immediately set to work to learn his letters. Before long he had got over that elementary drudgery and was able to read easy words with some degree of pleasure. Close application and indomitable perseverance carried him through the difficulties of the later stages, and he became proficient in the ordinary branches of an English education. But greater and more important than this mental change, was that which he soon afterward experienced. By what means his conversion was brought about is not known, but it appears to have been preceded and followed by strongly-marked spiritual manifestations. Like John Bunyan, his conviction of sin was terrible in its depth and reality. Early in the morning, or when the labors of the day were over, he would retire to a secluded spot and there pour out his soul before God in an agony of earnest confession and entreaty. The peace which he afterward enjoyed, and the calm, clear sense of acceptance with God which was granted to him, were no less remarkable. As soon as he was thus brought into the light and liberty of the Gospel, the language of his heart was, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me?" Acting in the spirit of that question he set about establishing a religious meeting in his native parish, a step which brought upon him a good deal of abuse.

DEATH OF A GODLESS LADY.

One of those who most bitterly abused him was a lady, whom he had enraged by preaching the Gospel in the vicinity of her mansion. She resolved to prevent any repetition of the, to her, obnoxious practice, and in the hope that her influence would encourage a mob intent upon disturbing one of the young preacher's meetings, she on one occasion went with them and openly countenanced their insolent behavior. When her boisterous malice had in part been spent, she returned to her house, exulting at the supposed results of her efforts. But that was the last of her opportunities for opposing Christian evangelization. On the same evening she was stricken with death. As she crossed the threshold of her home she staggered and fell, and the bystanders going to her assistance, found life extinct. She died an unbeliever and a scoffer, and there was no hope in her death. The people who witnessed the awful event, and knew of her opposition to James Bundy's services, connected the two events and a profound impression was produced on many minds.

REMOVES TO BRISTOL.

Soon after his conversion, Mr. Bundy was called to visit the city of Bristol, where he found a revival going on among the Wesleyan Methodists. Into this revival he entered with great zeal and fervor, and finding his labors blessed, he resolved to take up his abode there. This step proved to be most providential.

Shortly afterward he found in marriage an alliance which proved in all respects happy and helpful to him. "The example he set before his children," says a descendant of one of them, "was such that it elevated him in their estimation beyond the common relationship of a father. He seemed to them as a consecrated priest, daily offering up to God spiritual sacrifices on their behalf, and pronouncing blessings in His name on all around him.

HE PROSPERS IN BUSINESS.

Mr. Bundy displayed business qualities of no common order; and a merchant who made his acquaintance during his visit to Bristol, gave him a situation in his store. There he not only enjoyed the good opinion of his employer, but was blessed to the conversion of that gentleman, who left him a large legacy in token of his confidence and gratitude. Mr. Bundy, however, saw the executors, and to their utter astonishment, declined to accept the bequest, insisting on their retaining it for the benefit of those whom he regarded as the lawful heirs, and observing that it never should be said that he had obtained riches by praying for the welfare of others. When he subsequently entered into business on his own account, the same stainless honor, unwearied assiduity, and noble generosity still characterized his conduct.

During one of his periodical visits to Bristol, John Wesley formed into a society those persons who had been converted to God, or were under religious convictions as the result of the prayer meeting which Mr. Bundy had established in his own house, and appointed him the "leader" of it. This office Mr. Bundy held as long as he lived, and in the discharge of its duties was greatly beloved and blessed.

MR. BUNDY AND THE BRASS BAND.

During the summer months a military band was accustomed to play on Sunday evenings on Clifton Down, and Mr. Bundy seized the opportunities afforded by the crowds thus brought together, to preach to the people. But the commandant of the forces stationed in the neighborhood was greatly enraged with the preacher on this account, and the band was directed to overpower the voices of people engaged. So earnestly, however, had Bundy exhorted, that one of the officers pres was convinced of his sin, and was led to impl pardon.

A PERSECUTOR DISARMED.

Once, when preaching in the open air, a mar a state of partial intoxication, cursing dreadfu reeled within the sound of the preacher's voi when he suddenly stopped and listened apparen with attention. He then approached Mr. Bun and frankly acknowledged that he had come th with the deliberate intention of stoning him. T man then emptied his pockets of the stones w which he had filled them (as shown in the fron piece), falling down on his knees, asked forgi ness, and entreated an interest in his prayers.

LABORS AS A PRISON PHILANTHROPIST.

While the church prayed for "all prisoners a captives," Mr. Bundy felt called upon to visit dreary dungeons where vice and guilt had th haunt and home, and himself alleviate their mi ries. His labors were first of all blessed to prisoners in the city jail of Bristol, where he sc became so well known and highly esteemed th with the exception of the chaplain, he was the o person who had access at all times to that pla of confinement. At that time there were ma heart-rending scenes witnessed, for burgla horse-stealing, forgery, and many other crim were punished by death.

After attending to his business engagemen during the day, Mr. Bundy would cheerfully f sake all the comforts of the domestic circle, a spend the whole or part of the night in the cell the felon, beseeching him to repent and be r onciled to God. The following is an account of with whom he labored. Richard Haynes, kno as "Dick Boy," was a man of extraordinary ph ical strength, and his disposition, when offend was most ferocious. At such times he was mo like a wild beast than a human being. He h been transported to Botany Bay for various fences, and, when there, had been guilty of su crimes that he was sentenced to receive one hu dred lashes, which were inflicted with unusual s verity, for he was a terror to the entire neighbo hood.

After his return to England, he committed ma robberies in different parts of the country, ma festing cunning and skill as well as resolute da ing, and often, when apprehended, contriving free himself from those who had him in charge.

At length Haynes was apprehended and confin in the prison of Newgate, Bristol. His condu here was most violent, and although his hands a ankles were heavily ironed, he was a terror to a Once, in some unaccountable manner, he got loo from his manacles, and seizing a large knif which, by a strange oversight, had been left with his reach, he bade defiance to all who sought approach him. A file of soldiers with fixed bay nets endeavored to intimidate him, but he resolut ly refused to surrender, vowing that he would su fer himself to be hewn in pieces rather than yiel

It was at this precise juncture that the inte course between Mr. Bundy and this ferocio character commenced.

Mr. Bundy, confiding in a higher power, unde took to appease the rage of the culprit. For th purpose the door of the prison was opened, and h calmly and heroically entered it. Haynes at on rushed toward him, and disdainfully said, "I su pose you are come to try to find out secrets. "No, sir," replied Mr. Bundy, "I am come you in the name of the Lord." This sentenc delivered in the impressive manner for which th speaker was so remarkable, and accompanied, i it doubtless was, with a Divine influence, seeme at once to exert a softening effect upon the ma and he was conquered. To use Mr. Bundy's h conic words, "Haynes fell down like a great ca on the ground before that mighty word whic breaks the rocks in pieces."

At length, under Mr. Bundy's instructio Haynes seemed to be looking up to God for pa don, and in consequence of this apparently favor ble change, he was allowed more liberty.

A NIGHT OF HORRORS.

After much prayer and consideration, Mr. Bundy resolved to spend one whole night with Haynes in the cell. Though strongly warned by the authorities not to allow himself to be within reach of the culprit, Mr. Bundy presented himself in the dungeon, and was, as he said afterward, "painfully affected with the sight of a fellow creature lying at full length on the floor, owing to the weight of his chains, which prevented him from having the free use of his hands or feet." He therefore pleaded with the jailer that at least one hand and one foot of the prisoner might be liberated.

As the clock struck ten the jailer left them, turning the locks of three massive doors upon them, so that escape was impossible, had it been thought of for a moment, nor could human aid be afforded, however urgently needed. Immediately that all was still, Haynes suddenly started to his feet, as though possessed by some evil spirit, and raising the hand that had been liberated, and grasping a large clasp-knife, which he had concealed behind a stone in the wall, he fiercely advanced to Mr. Bundy and, with a voice and countenance as of a demon, exclaimed: "Now you are in my power; I will kill you."

Mr. Bundy, for the moment, thought that his end was come; but the words passed through his mind, "Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above." Immediately he was endued with a faith that banished all fear, and with the greatest composure remonstrated with the enraged culprit, who seemed amazed at his victim's calmness in the face of death.

The paroxysm of fury passed as suddenly as it had seized him. Bursting into a flood of tears, he threw down the knife on the ground, fell prostrate at Mr. Bundy's feet, and implored forgiveness. He then stated that it had been his original intention not to leave the prison alive; but now he resolved that he would never again lift his hand against his own life, or that of any other person.

It would seem as if this wild attack upon Mr. Bundy was the last desperate effort of Satan to retain his hold of the prisoner, for from this time Haynes became gentle and tractable, gave proof of real repentance, obtained pardon and peace through the blood of the cross, and the moment before his execution commended himself once more into the hands of his Saviour. It was one of the most complete and notable transformations of character and disposition on record.

Another important case, which may be taken as a type of many more in which Mr. Bundy's efforts were crowned with success, was that of one who had moved in highly respectable circles, but who in a moment of extreme embarrassment had yielded to temptation and been making use of the name of an opulent London merchant. Having made himself acquainted with the particulars of the case and with some extenuating circumstances, Mr. Bundy felt very anxious to save this person, if possible, from being executed. With this object he went to London to search out the gentleman whose name had been forged. He found who demanded, in peremptory tones, the nature of the business on which the visitor had called. "Sir," said Bundy, "I understand that there is confined in His Majesty's jail at Bristol a person who has forged a bill upon you." "I know there is," interrupted the gentleman; "and what of that?" Mr. Bundy calmly answered, "I have taken the liberty to come to London for the purpose of entreating mercy for him." "Mercy, sir!" was the sudden reply; "he has committed a wicked deed and richly deserves to be hanged; and hang he shall; and what have you to say in arrest of the punishment he has so justly merited?" "I am perfectly aware," said Mr. Bundy, "that by the laws of his country his act is a capital offence, and if you demand justice without mercy, the probability is he will be sentenced to death; but will you, for the sake of the money, which, in a moment of sudden temptation he sought to wrong you of, but which he will take the earliest opportunity to refund to you, seek to hang a fellow creature, who is now sorry for his deed? I beseech you, sir, as you desire the mercy of God, to pause before you thus act."

All the arguments and entreaties of Mr. Bundy, however, seemed to be of no avail, and he rose reluctantly to leave the house. But when about to depart two of the merchant's children playfully ran into the parlor, and in their frolicsome mood went up to Mr. Bundy, and embraced him. Mr. Bundy inquired if those were his children, to which the merchant answered in the affirmative. Thereupon, Mr. Bundy, placing one hand upon the head of each said, by way of benediction, "My dear children, may God Almighty grant that you may never stand in need of a friend to ask mercy for you!" He then left the house, and shortly afterward returned to Bristol.

A few days afterward the assizes in the city commenced; the case of forgery was called, the indictment against the prisoner read, but the prosecutor declined to press the charge and the prisoner was acquitted. The prayer of Mr. Bundy for the merchant's children had awakened in him thoughts which led to his withdrawal from the prosecution.

Not long afterward a lady went to Mr. Bundy's office, and when satisfied that the plain man before her was Mr. Bundy, fell on her knees at his feet, declaring she was the wife of the man whose life he had just saved, and thanked him, with many tears, for his kindness.

MANIFOLD LABORS.

Mr. Bundy did not confine his labors to Bristol, but wherever he heard of cases of need, no distance, or danger, or inconvenience could prevent him from fulfilling the errand of mercy on which he had set his heart. At a time when, owing to his state of health, he greatly needed rest, he resolved to go to London once more, to visit all the jails. In one of them he was startled to find no fewer than thirty felons though under sentence of death. Shocked at the sight, he expressed his surprise that they should be so regardless of a future state as to waste their few remaining moments in trivial and worthless amusements. They immediately answered; "Why, no one cares for our souls." "Yes," was his reply, "I do, and have come a hundred and twenty miles to see you on that subject." One of them thereupon exclaimed, "Here, Jack," addressing a fellow convict, "is a man who says he has come a hundred and twenty miles to see us; come and hear what he has to say." They all soon gathered around him, while in his earnest and impressive manner he spoke to them of the value of their souls.

Their attention was at once arrested and fixed; their hearts were subdued; and on their requesting him to prolong his visit, he continued with them the whole of the ensuing night. In the morning he left them, but in the course of the day he went again to see them, and remained with them another night, spending it in prayer and religious conversation. When the time arrived for him finally to leave them, he commended them in prayer to the mercy of God, and then bade them farewell, fully impressed with the belief that at least some of them were under serious concern for their spiritual welfare.

During this visit to London he saw and spoke to upward of six hundred prisoners, and, though in very feeble health, he performed this arduous undertaking without having taken off his clothes, or slept in a bed, from the time he left his home until the night he returned, in a state of exhaustion.

The great secret of Mr. Bundy's success is doubtless to be found in the fact that he was MIGHTY IN PRAYER.

His wife was often heard to say that he would frequently get out of bed in the night, when he supposed she was asleep, and wrestle with the Lord in agonizing prayer on behalf of the sons of misery and crime. It was his settled and cherished conviction that simple earnest prayer cannot be offered in vain, and that the influence he was able to exert upon even the worst of characters came directly from God.

In labors such as these, the life of this honored servant of God passed away. He entered into the joy of his Lord on March 20th, 1818, aged sixty-eight, leaving as the heritage of his children and his country the memory of a Christ-like zeal and a life of love.

"THE LITTLE HORN,"

Identified with "The Seven-Headed Beast," and "The Prince that shall come."

By P. W. E.

THE little horn in Daniel "shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they—the saints—shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time." That is, for three and a half years.—Dan 7 : 25.

The seven-headed beast in the Revelation—Rev. 13 : 1—"was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months. That is, for three and a half years. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name and His tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints and to overcome them," Rev. 13 : 5-7.

The prince that shall come breaks the covenant that he makes with the many Jews, abolishes the worship of Jehovah and establishes idolatry in the temple, which lasts half of a sabbatic week, or three and a half years, Dan. 9 : 27.

The little horn arises out of the fourth beast, and is the last ruler, thus the last prince of the Roman empire, Dan 7. The seven-headed beast is the last ruler of the city of seven hills—thus the last prince of the Roman empire, Rev. 13. The prince that shall come is the last ruler of the people that destroyed Jerusalem and the temple—thus the last prince of the Roman empire, Dan. 9.

The little horn continues till "one like the Son of Man comes with the clouds of heaven . . . and to Him was given dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve Him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, Dan. 7 : 13, 14. That is, the little horn endures till the establishment of the Messianic kingdom.

The seven-headed beast continues till "one like unto the Son of Man, having on His head a golden crown," Rev. 14 : 14, followed by the armies in heaven, Rev. 19 : 14, comes forth, overthrows His enemies and sets up His own dominion on the earth, and becomes "King of kings and Lord of lords." That is, the seven-headed beast endures till the establishment of the Messianic kingdom.

The prince that shall come reigns during the last half week before Jerusalem is delivered from her enemies and Israel is restored; that is, he endures till the establishment of the Messianic kingdom.

The coincident is complete in every respect. The three persons, severally designated as the "little horn," the "seven-headed beast" and the "prince that shall come," are each rulers over the same empire, reign at the same time, continue for the same period, possess the same characters, perform the same deeds, and suffer the same disaster. Every incident, characteristic and date prove them to be one and the same power.

A Proposition to Erect a Memorial Hospital in Washington, to be called the Garfield Memorial Hospital, has been published, and popular subscriptions for the purpose invited. Justice Miller, of the United States Supreme Court, has appointed an executive committee to receive all subscriptions, not only from the United States, but from the world at large. General Sherman is chairman, and Mr. Blaine, Mr. Windom, General Swaim, and a large number of prominent citizens of Washington are associated with him. Treasurer Gilfillan is to act as treasurer of the fund. This proposal is most appropriate, and if it is realized will form the most enduring and useful monument to the late President's memory that could be devised.

THE NEWSPAPER.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, October 30, 1881.*

"And the wheels were full of eyes."—EZEK. 10 : 12.

"For all the Athenians, and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing."—ACTS, 17 : 21.

WHAT is a preacher to do when he finds two texts equally good and suggestive? In that perplexity I take both. Wheels full of eyes! What but the wheels of the newspaper printing-press, for all other wheels are blind? The manufacturer's wheel sometimes rolls over the operative with fatigue and rolls over nerve and muscle, and bone and heart, and sees nothing. The sewing machine wheel has pains and aches fastened to it tighter than the hand that turns it, sharper than the needle which it plies, and every minute of every hour of every day of every week of every month of every year there are hundreds of thousands of wheels of mechanism, wheels of enterprise, wheels of hard work which are eyeless.

Note so with the wheels of the newspaper printing-press. Their entire work is to look and to report. They are full of optic nerves from the axle to the periphery. They are as full of eyes as the wheels which Ezekiel saw—sharp eyes, keen eyes, eyes that look up, that look down, far-sighted, near-sighted, they take in the next street, the next hemisphere; eyes of criticism, eyes of investigation, eyes atwinkle with mirth, eyes glowing with indignation, eyes tender with love, eyes of suspicion, eyes of hope, blue eyes, black eyes, green eyes, sore eyes, historical eyes, literary eyes, ecclesiastical eyes, eyes of all sorts and eyes that see everything. "And the wheels were full of eyes."

But my second text gives the CRY OF THE WORLD FOR A NEWSPAPER.

Paul says that in the city of Athens there were people who did nothing but gather up and tell the news. Why more so in Athens than in any other city? Because Athens was the wisest city under the sun, and in proportion as men become wise they become inquisitive, not about small things, but about the greater. The great question in Athens is the great question now: "What is the news?"

To answer this cry in my text for a newspaper the centuries set their wits to work, and China first answered the cry, and there is in Pekin a newspaper which has been published every week for a thousand years— printed on silk. Rome answered this cry by publishing the Acta Diurna, in the same column putting fires, political events, marriages, deaths, tempests, earthquakes. France successfully answered this question when in Paris a physician wrote out the news for his patients.

England answered this cry by publishing in the time of Queen Elizabeth a paper regarding the Spanish Armada, and went on increasing in enterprise until at the time the battle of Waterloo was fought, deciding the destiny of all the nations of Europe, in the London Chronicle there was a third of a column given to the description of the battle—about as much room as a modern newspaper would take to describe a small fire. America answered this cry when Benjamin Harris published the first weekly newspaper, entitled Public Occurrences, published in Boston in 1690, and by the first daily newspaper which was published in Philadelphia in 1784, entitled The American Daily Advertiser.

But the newspaper did not suddenly spring on the world; it came gradually. I will give you of the newspaper.

The Adam of the race, which was a circular, or news-letter, was born of divine impulse in human nature, begat the pamphlet, and the pamphlet begat the quarterly, and the quarterly begat the monthly, and the monthly begat the weekly, and the weekly begat the semi-weekly, and the semi-weekly begat the daily. But alas! through what struggle the newspaper has come to its present development. Just as soon as it began to demonstrate its power, superstition and tyranny shackled it. There is nothing that despotism so much fears and hates as the printing-press. The wheel has too many eyes. Russia, which, considering all the circumstances, is the meanest and the most cruel despotism on earth to-day, keeps the printing-press under severe espionage. A great writer in the south of Europe declared that the King of Naples had made it unsafe for him to write on any subject save natural history. Austria could not bear Kossuth's journalistic pen pleading for the redemption of Hungary. Napoleon I., wanting to keep his iron heel on the neck of nations, said that the newspaper was the regent of kings, and the only safe place to keep an editor was in prison.

But the great battle for the freedom of the press was fought in the court rooms of England and the United States before this century began, when Hamilton made his great speech in behalf of the freedom of J. Peter Zenger's Gazette in America, and when Erskine made his great speech in behalf of the freedom to publish Paine's Rights of Man in England. Those were the Marathon and the Thermopylæ where the battle was fought which decided the freedom of the press in England and America, and all the powers of earth and hell will never again be able to put upon the printing-press the handcuffs and the hopples of literary and political despotism. It is remarkable that Thomas Jefferson, who wrote the Declaration of Independence, also wrote these words: "If I had to choose between a government without newspapers, and newspapers without a government, I would prefer the latter."

Stung by some new fabrication in print, we come to write or speak about an "unbridled printing-press." Our new book ground up in unjust criticism, we come to write or speak about the "unfair printing-press." Perhaps through our own indistinctness of utterance we are reported as saying just the opposite of what we did say and there is a small riot of semicolons and hyphens and commas, and we come to write or talk about the "blundering printing-press," or we take up a newspaper full of social scandal and of cases of divorce, and we write or talk about a filthy, scurrilous printing-press. But this morning I address you on a subject you have never heard presented; the immeasurable and the everlasting

BLESSING OF A GOOD NEWSPAPER.

Thank God that the wheels are full of eyes. Thank God that there is no need of our going around like the Athenians to hunt up and then to scatter the news, since the printing-press does both for us. I give you this overwhelming statistic which no Christian man can disregard or hear without a thrill of interest: that in the year 1870, the number of copies of literary and political newspapers published in this country was one billion five hundred millions. Since then a vast increase. What church, what reformer, what Christian man, what patriot, can disregard these things? I tell you, my friends, that a good newspaper is the grandest temporal blessing that God has given to the people in this century. All the people read the newspapers. The old man looks for the deaths, the young look to the marriages, the stock broker looks to the money column, the importer looks for the shipping, the philosopher looks to the editorial, the unemployed look to the wants, and the Christian looks all through to see what God is doing among the nations, and whether the world is really swinging around into the light of the glorious Gospel.

Now, I think I could arouse your appreciation of this great blessing if I told you the money, the brain, the exasperation, the anxieties, the losses, the wear and tear of heart strings involved in t publication of a newspaper. On the theory abro in the world that anybody can make one, inexpe enced capitalists every year are entering the lis and it is a simple statistic that there is an avera of a dead newspaper every day of the year. Ge rally three or four fortunes are swallowed up bef a newspaper is established. The large pape swallow up the small papers, one whale taki down fifty minnows. Although we have over sev thousand dailies and weeklies in the United Sta and the Canadas, only thirty-six of them are a h century old. The average of newspaper life is fi years. Most of them die of cholera infantum! is high time it were understood that the most su cessful way of sinking a fortune and keeping sunk is to start and conduct a newspaper.

NEWSPAPER MANIA.

Almost every intelligent man during his life smitten with the newspaper mania, and start newspaper, or have stock in one, he must or di This is often the process: A literary man has a idea, moral, social, political, or religious, which h wishes to ventilate. He has no money of his ow —literary men seldom have—but he talks his id among confidential friends, and forthwith they a inflamed with the idea, and they buy type and pres and rent a composing room, and engage a corps editors, and then a prospectus which threatens t conquer everything goes forth, and then the firs issue is thrown upon the attention of an admirin world.

After a few weeks or months, some plai stockholder finds that there is no especial revolu tion, and that neither the sun nor the moon ha stood still, and that the world still goes on lyin and cheating and stealing just as it did before th first issue of the New York Thunderer, or th Universal Gazette, or the Hallelujah Advocate.

Forthwith the plain stockholder wants to sell hi stock, but nobody wants to buy it, and others, dis gusted with the investment, want to sell thei stock, and an enormous bill of the paper factor rolls in like an avalanche, and the printers refus to work until they have their back pay, and the type-setter bows to the compositor, and the com positor bows to the managing editor, and the man aging editor bows to the editor-in-chief, and the editor-in-chief bows to the directors, and the di rectors bow to the public in general, and the subscribers wonder why their paper does no come.

Let me tell you, Oh! man, that if you have ar idea on any moral, social, political, or religious sub ject, you had better charge on the world through the columns already established. Do not take the idea so prevalent that when a man can do nothing else he can edit a newspaper. If you cannot climb the hill back of your house, you had better not try the sides of the Matterhorn. If you cannot navigate a sloop up the North River, you had better not try to engineer the Great Eastern over to Liverpool.

To publish a newspaper requires the skill, the precision, the vigilance, the strategy, the boldness of a commander-in-chief. To edit a newspaper one needs to be a statesman, an essayist, a geographer, a statistician, and so far as all acquisition is concerned, encyclopædiac. To man and to propel a newspaper requires more qualities than any other business on earth. I say this to save men from bankruptcy. If you feel called to start or publish a newspaper, take it for granted you are threatened with softening of the brain, throw your pocket-book into your wife's lap, and rush up to Bloomingdale asylum and surrender yourself before you do something desperate.

Meanwhile, let the dead newspapers be carried out to their burial week by week, and let the newspapers that live give good obituary. If they died after living a good life, say "peace to their ashes." If they died after living a bad life, give them at least a stickful of epitaph like that which was put over the grave of Sir Francis Charthouse: "Here lies the body of Francis Charthouse, who with an inflexible constancy and uniformity of life persisted in the practice of every human vice excepting prodigality and hypocrisy. His insatiable avarice exempted him from the first; his matchless impu-ı great blessing, because it makes knowledge nocratic and for all the people. A city or na-nal library is a reservoir to gather up the floods knowledge; but those floods of knowledge are d far away from the people. The newspaper nes along, and it is the tunnel to bring those ght waters down into the pitchers of the people. eat libraries make a few intelligent men and men. Newspapers lift nations into the sunlight. tter have fifty millions of people only tolerably elligent than a thousand Solons. The impres-n is abroad that newspaper knowledge must cessarily be ephemeral because periodicals are on thrown aside, and not more than one person t of ten thousand ever keeps a file of the periodi-s for future reference. But so far from being nemeral, newspaper knowledge makes up the ucture of the world's heart and brain, and de-ies the destiny of churches and of nations. nowledge on the shelf is of no worth; it is knowl-ge afoot, knowledge launched, knowledge in volution, knowledge winged, knowledge thunder-lted.

Nearly all the great minds and the great hearts the world either have had their hands on the wspaper printing-press, or will have their hands the newspaper printing-press. The Adamses, is, Hancock in revolutionary times went into the nctum of the Boston Gazette to compose articles the rights of man. Benjamin Franklin, Thomas fferson, De Witt Clinton, Quincy—all had their nds on the printing-press. Do you not know t the most of the good books of this day were ginally published in periodicals? All of Mac-lay's essays first appeared in periodicals; all rlyle's, all Ruskin's, all Sidney Smith's, all Intosh's, all Talfourd's afterward gathered up o books. Nearly all the best fictitious literature the day first appears as serials. Bryant's poems, well's poems, Longfellow's poems, Emerson's ems, Whittier's poems—all were fugitive poems. u cannot name ten literary men of the day with eat heads and great hearts who have not some-w been interested in newspaper literature. The ok will always have its place, but the newspaper the more potent. Do not think because it is ltitudinous it is also superficial. If one should nothing during his life in the way of literature, t the Bible, and Webster's dictionary, and a good wspaper, he would be fitted for all the duties of s life and for the happiness of the next.

A good newspaper is a blessing because

elf. Complaint is sometimes made because the l is reported as well as the good. The evil must reported as well as the good, or how will we ow what to guard against, what to reform, what fight down? A newspaper that merely presents fair and the bright and the beautiful side of so-ty is a misrepresentation. That family is best alified for the duties of life who have told to them only what good there is in the world, but what l is in the world, and told to select the good and ect the evil. Let children come up with the idea t all society is fair and beautiful—when they me out into life and find it so different from what y thought they will be as incompetent for the uggle as though you should throw your child into middle of the Atlantic Ocean and tell him to rn how to swim.

Our complaint is that sometimes sin is made at-ctive and holiness stupid, that sometimes the l is put in great headings and the good in an ob-ıre corner, that sometimes sin is set up in great primer" type and righteousness is put in nonpareil." Sin is loathsome—make it so. rtue is beautiful—make it so.

I believe a great step of improvement would be ten if our religious and secular newspapers should the most part drop impersonality—I say for the st part. The best pens, the best minds, of the are engaged in writing for newspapers, and ir writings often appear in the editorial columns, d yet many of these men die unknown—living, some of them, on incompetent salary, after a while their hand forgets its cunning, and without any resources they die. The world never knew them. Now, it seems to me, if the impersonality were dropped in many cases, and in the more important newspaper writings, it would be more justice and greater fairness to those who are enlisted in newspaper work. You know what great potency it used to give to an article in the New York Courier and Enquirer—some of the aged men remember—when at the end of an article were the initials "J. W.W.," or when in the old New York Tribune you saw the initials "H. G.," or in the old New York Herald you saw the initials "J. G. B.," or when in the old New York Times you saw the initials "H. J. R.," or in the old Evening Post you saw the initials "W. C. B.," or in the old Evening Express you saw the initials "E. B." When newspapers drop their impersonality that will be the time when literary men will come to larger appreciation. In that time men will get the credit for all the good they write, and they will be held responsible for all the evil they write.

It seems to me that no honorable man would want to write anything that he would be ashamed to put his name to, and yet suppose a man's character is assailed in a newspaper, who is responsible? It is the "we" of the editorial columns. What is a private citizen to do in contest with a misrepresentation multiplied into twenty and fifty thousand copies? A wrong done a man's character in a newspaper is more virulent than one done in private life. A man in hot temper may say a thing he will be very sorry for in ten minutes, but a virulent attack in a newspaper is a more deliberate thing, as it must be written out with a pen, and then it must be set up in type, and then the "proof" must be taken of it and read and corrected, and then for six or ten hours the presses are kept running, sending forth the misrepresentation. Plenty of time to repent, plenty of time to cool off, and yet all that under an impersonality. Now it seems to me that it will be a great use, a great advantage to the literature of this country when men get the credit for the good they write, and are held responsible for the evil they write. But first must come the dropping of the newspaper impersonality.

UNIVERSITY TRAINING NEEDED.

Another vast improvement will be made when our universities shall have departments where they prepare men for editorial and reportorial work. These institutions have medical departments, legal departments — why not editorial departments? Do the legal and the healing professions need more culture or greater drill than the editorial profession? Sometimes a man will accidentally stumble into newspaper success just as a man may stumble into success in any other profession or occupation; but would it not be better if when a man propose for himself newspaper life, there were an institution to which he could go and learn the qualifications, the responsibilities, the dangers, the temptations, the magnificent opportunities of editorial and reportorial life?

Let there be lectureships in which shall come the leading editors of the country to tell their struggle and the story of their victories and their mistakes, and how they worked, and what they have found to be the best way of working. Of course, men of genius will clamber up into editorial efficiency just as through sheer grit men climb up into success in other departments, but if you want colleges to make lawyers and doctors and artists and evangelists, you want colleges to make editors, for their position is so potent. I declare that the mightiest force for good to-day is a good editor, and the mightiest force for evil to-day is a bad one. To reinforce and to elevate the editorial profession you want editorial professorates in our colleges. When will Princeton, or Yale, or Harvard, or Rochester, or Middletown lead the way? Then the newspaper, the good newspaper, becomes a vast blessing not only for the day in which we live, but it lays the foundation for the history of these times in which we live.

We are dependent, for the most part, upon mere blind guess-work as to what antedated the newspaper, or upon the prejudices of this or that historian; but oh, what an opportunity the historians of the future will have with all the facts of this day before them! Our Bancrofts are dependent for the story of early times upon the Boston News-Letter, or the Massachusetts Spy, or the Philadelphia Aurora, or the Royal Gazeteer, or the Independent Chronicle—dependent for all the news about the Boston massacre, and about the oppressive taxes on luxuries which turned Boston harbor into a teapot, and Washington's death, and Rhode Island rebellion, and South Carolina nullification. But what opportunities the future chronicler will have in the presence of the files of a hundred standard American newspapers describing all the minutiæ of events now—ecclesiastical, literary, political, social, international, hemispherical. The student of history five hundred years from now—if the world lasts so long—will walk right past the musty corridors of other centuries, and ask the librarian for the volume which tells of the century in which American Presidents were assassinated, and the American civil war was enacted, and the cotton gin, and the steam locomotive, and the electric telegraph, and the electric pen, and the electric light, and the telephone, and Hoe's printing press were invented. Newspapers a blessing not only for to-day, but the reservoir of history.

Once more I remark, that a good newspaper is a blessing as

AN EVANGELISTIC INFLUENCE.

You know there is a great change in our day taking place. All the secular newspapers of the day—for I am not speaking this morning of the religious newspapers—all the secular newspapers of the day discuss all the questions of God, eternity, and the dead, and all the questions of the past, present, and future. There is not a single doctrine of theology but has been discussed in the last ten years by the secular newspapers of the country. They gather up all the news of all the earth bearing on religious subjects and then they scatter the news abroad again. The Christian newspaper will be the right wing of the apocalyptic angel. The cylinder of the Christianized printing-press will be the front wheel of the Lord's chariot.

I take the music of this day, and I do not mark it diminuendo—I mark it crescendo. A pastor on a Sabbath preaches to a few hundred, or a few thousand people, and on Monday, or during the week, the printing-press will take the same sermon and preach it to millions of people. God speed the printing-press!

GOD SAVE THE PRINTING-PRESS!

God Christianize the printing-press! When I see the printing-press standing with the electric telegraph on the one side gathering up material, and the lightning express train on the other side waiting for the tons of folded sheets of newspapers, I pronounce it the mightiest force in our civilization. So I commend you to pray for all those who manage the newspapers of the land, for all type setters, for all editors, for all publishers, that, sitting or standing in positions of such great influence, they may give all that influence for God and the betterment of the human race.

An aged woman making her living by knitting unwound the yarn from the ball until she found in the centre of the ball there was an old piece of newspaper. She opened it and read an advertisement which announced that she had become heiress to a large property, and that fragment of a newspaper lifted her from pauperism to affluence. And I do not know but as the thread of time unrolls and unwinds a little further, through the silent yet speaking newspaper may be found the vast inheritance of the world's redemption.

"Jesus shall reign where'er the Sun
Does his successive journeys run,
His kingdom stretch from shore to shore
Till suns shall rise and and set no more."

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

SYLPH SOMERS.

[Dr. Cecil Gilbart, influenced by Dr. Priestley's philosophy, becomes a materialist, and the death of his wife and only child intensifies his unbelief. Owen Oliver, a Welsh wagoner, one day discovers lying on the highway a lady, over whom her child stands weeping. He conveys them in his wagon to the outskirts of Chester, but cannot find out their names or anything else about them. During a bull-baiting in the city, an infuriated bull breaks away from the ring, and rushing along the streets, severely injures the lady, who is conveyed to Dr. Gilbart's house, and remains as a patient under his roof several weeks, and subsequently dies. Acting upon information derived from a mutilated letter, the doctor makes inquiries in Ireland, as to the family of the deceased lady, Mrs. Somers, and her child Sylph, but unsuccessfully. Sylph grows in beauty and intelligence, but her nature is chilled by the cold materialism of the doctor. In the midst of great mental distress she hears John Wesley preach, and finds in God's love a relief for her malady. A young gentleman named Miles Rossiter is injured by a gunpowder explosion, and becomes a patient of Dr. Gilbart. His convalescence is cheered by Sylph's musical gifts, and before his departure he finds in her powerful forces of attraction.]

Rossiter's Inward Conflict—Dr. Gilbart Shakes his Faith in Romanism—His Reluctant Departure—Sylph Renews her Argument with the Doctor—Dr. Gilbart Presides at a Seditious Meeting—Aldermanic Eloquence.

THE admiration of Miles Rossiter, Dr. Gilbart's guest and patient, for Sylph Somers, was not all of a sublimated and transcendental character; he was conscious of an emotion as pure, but yet of a more sublunary nature. The love which draws a young man blissfully and irresistibly toward a woman who meets his ideal of female loveliness and moral excellence was upon him; and this produced within him, as a prospective young priest, a strange and tumultuous mental and moral struggle.

But not only was Miles Rossiter borne into a world of conflicting emotions and experiences by the presence of Sylph. Evening conversations with Doctor Gilbart drew him into a region of thought and sentiment utterly at variance with his preconceptions from early training. The era was an one of great political movement and social change. Continental Europe was seething and surging in those tides of popular unrest and disquietude, which eventuated in the first French revolution. The initiatory throes of that political earthquake, which, in its after-paroxysms, shook to its foundations the established order of things in Europe, were being felt from Scandinavia to the Calabrias, and from Madrid to Moscow.

Doctor Gilbart, with a large belief in human perfectibility, blindly imagined that the world's regeneration was at hand; and that soon a millennium of liberty and peace would come; not from spiritual forces, however, but from political upheaval; and from the abundance of his heart he poured forth into the ear of Miles his glowing anticipations.

Doctor Gilbart, then, discoursed before young Rossiter of human rights, intellectual freedom, and personal liberty; of the old oppressions of the world, political and ecclesiastical, as in their last gasp and dying; and expressed his joy: "Since, with tyrannous hands, they had long held down the masses to a condition of servitude, both of body and soul, that was worse than death."

"You descend to the level of the brute," he would say to Miles, "whenever you suppress, or allow to be suppressed, either in yourself or others, any of the forces that constitute your manhood.

"We are on the verge of an age, my young friend, which shall substitute the light of instructed reason for blind submission to authority; equal laws for class legislation; justice for privilege; friendly association for selfish competition; and collective thought for individual thought in the social organism."

Doctor Gilbart's anticipations were premature; but Miles Rossiter felt their truth; and, while they won his cordial assent to principles totally opposed to his convictions entertained from boyhood, they served to draw him powerfully toward Doctor Gilbart, and by a double band; gratitude for his great professional services to him, and the reception from him of ideas that enlarged his mental vision and enriched his thought. He felt himself, in fact, as entered into a new world, of which he had never dreamed.

It is no wonder, therefore, when the time came for his departure from the home of his new-found benefactor and friend, that the young man was very reluctant to leave. It called him to turn his back upon a sort of earthly paradise, and to confront a dark and uncongenial world; but the separation was to be endured, though when the hour for it struck, he felt it to be the saddest of all his previous history.

When Sylph came to bid him farewell, all unconscious of the emotions she had inspired—for Miles had felt bound by his position as an intending priest, neither by look nor whisper to declare his passion—the young man lingered in the room up to the last moment, as though held by a fascination from which he could not break away. When he took her hand for a final adieu, he let it fall from his grasp with an unconscious sigh; and then, tearing himself from her presence, he hurriedly passed into the street.

Dr. Gilbart accompanied him to the coach office for London. On the way, often did Miles pray that the coach would start before he reached it; and when he actually set out upon his distant journey, many times during the day did his thoughts fondly revert to Chester, and to those beloved ones there whom he had left behind him.

After Miles's departure Sylph and the doctor renewed the controversy about Wesley which had been interrupted by the disastrous explosion in the city, and which had made the young man their patient. Sylph, however, seemed to herself to make no great impression upon the doctor's unbelief; and yet she was prevailing more than she supposed. While Doctor Gilbart outwardly maintained that Christianity was little more than a sublime and glorious phantasy, he could not but inwardly acknowledge, at the same time, that it must be more than a dream.

The strongest argument, however, upon Sylph's side was herself. Doctor Gilbart could not but see the marvellous change which her faith in God and His Christ had wrought upon her. It had brought to her, he saw, a satisfying gladness which he himself would fain experience; and had given touches of beauty to her character which he was forced to confess within himself no mere earthly power could produce.

Although Doctor Gilbart, in his reserve as her senior, would not make known to Sylph the inner working of his thoughts, he would not interfere with her religious liberty. She asked him would he allow her to attend the services in the Methodist chapel. "Certainly," was his reply, "I will do nothing to hinder your happiness; but still, Sylph, I must impose one condition." "What is it?" she asked. "This," he answered, "that without first consulting me you will not join their so-called 'classes.' They are a vulgar lot that form them, and I do not wish you to identify yourself with them."

"I would feel it an honor to be numbered with the humblest of God's people," was her reply; "and, father, you do not know the power of true religion to refine the coarsest mind. I will, however, for the present accept your condition; and I thank you for the privilege."

Doctor Gilbart was right in his idea as to the social class which, for the most part, the great "Methodist revival," in its early days, laid hold upon. As in the first Christian churches "not many wise, not many noble were called." Miss Somers's advent, therefore, among the despised religionists, was hailed as an important event; and from her social position and high culture she was soon much courted and deferred to. And her influence was altogether beneficial.

John Wesley's great principle of church association was a truly wise and noble one, namely, that every professing Christian should undertake some adapted work. Sylph, therefore, had very soon sphere of Christian labor allotted to her: visitin the sick poor, and at times the criminals in t city prison.

Having much of what has been called "the e thusiasm of humanity," it was not long until Syl became a well-known character in Chester; she ding the light of truth and love into many wretched home. Some laughed at her "Metho ism;" but the subjects of her gentle ministratio would have kissed her very feet. Everywhere s was welcomed and esteemed.

A poor weaver, a Welshman, of which natio ality there were many in Chester, being of a poet turn of mind, once said, that "her entrance in his humble abode was, in truth, as the coming sweet summer, or rather of summers" (Somers he explained, "a whole lot of them together; f sure the music of her voice excels the lark, and for her winsome face it is more gladdening tha the dancing sunshine; and her glossy curls are, my eyes, more golden than the rays of morning the radiant month of June." While Sylph labore in this manner, Doctor Gilbart, however, witho her knowledge, was busy in another sphere, and a manner which led to very serious and far-reac ing consequences.

The political atmosphere was just now in a ve critical state in Chester. "The upholders things as they are" were almost in a panic fro the revolutionary excesses in Paris and throughou the continent; and the yclept "friends of progress were, on the other hand, all expectant and jubilan The one party was, therefore, in a condition mind to enforce penalty upon any unguarded wor or act; and the other was just in the disposition afford them the opportunity; for which they ha not long to wait.

Doctor Gilbart, whose advanced sentiments we well-known, was looked upon as a black sheep the old school of politicians; but as "a goo angel" by their antagonists. These latter resolve to hold a meeting in the city, to advocate their a vanced ideas; and Doctor Gilbart, in an unguar ed moment, consented to take the chair. We thu describe his consent, for while very firm in h opinions, yet, for professional reasons, he ha avoided publicity; but having given his promise h would not withdraw it.

At the meeting the doctor spoke calmly and ca tiously, but his position was compromised by th injudicious conduct of another—a man, a visit to the city, who, carried away by his oratorica fervor, used words that bordered, as the law the stood, upon sedition. Doctor Gilbart tried t check him, but failed. He then rose to expres his dissent from the phrases which had been u tered, and waved his hand for silence; but his ges ture was misunderstood, and his sentences wer altogether lost and drowned amid the thunders c applause which followed, loud and long, the speec of the reckless revolutionist. The doctor hoped however, that the objectionable words spoke by this declaimer were either unnoticed or not we heard in the noise and excitement of the immens crowd before him; but he was mistaken. Ther were those present—hired for the purpose—wh were jealously on the watch for any expression that would give a handle for prosecution, and th sentiments that had been uttered were outspoke enough to excite the displeasure of an official min far less overbearing and prejudiced than that t which the objectionable phrases, in the presen case, were eventually reported.

A secret meeting of the leading "friends o order," as they styled themselves, was soon held and the case of Doctor Gilbart was earnestly de bated.

"It is a shame—it is more than that; it is prodigious peril to the general safety," said Alder man Gowtie, "that such a leading man as Docto Gilbart should give his countenance to opinions that assail the very foundations of society; fo these men aim at nothing less than at bringing to the ground our hale and sturdy corporations— I use the words, of course, gentlemen, in a muni cipal sense. Think how deplorable, how appall ing and horrible it would be if these our imnorial rights and special privileges were to slip n our fingers.

No, we meet as Britons, gentlemen, to defend vested rights and ancient customs; and if it es to the worst, who will even mount the ch and scale the ramparts, and not give way nch to those wretched levellers."

t this burst of eloquence from the worthy rman, there were vociferous shouts, and a ous clapping of hands, and a stamping of feet made the walls of the old Council Chamber again. One gentleman, however, volunteered ay that since the words complained of were not ken, as he understood, by Dr. Gilbart himself, by another at the meeting, perhaps it would be air to hold him accountable for them.

ut from this plea there was a general dissent; upon this ground, that since Dr. Gilbart had, is own accord, taken the chair at the assembly question, he was legally responsible for what spoken at it; and especially as there was no lence to show that Dr. Gilbart had protested inst the treasonable and seditious language t had been uttered.

THE STATE OF THE WORLD.

Relation to the Second Coming of Christ. By Rev. Charles H. Hamilton.

e Rise of Popular Power—Communism—The lumbering Spirit—Completion of the Times of ne Gentiles—Revival of the Roman Empire—he Awakened Interest in Prophecy—The emporary Sealing of the Book—The Clay-ron Toes—Interest in Palestine—Its Coming estoration—Anti-Semitism—The Approach-ng Hebrew Ordeal—Conversion of the Jews—he Sacred Ruins.

HAT we live in days of great and increasing erest is recognized by others as well as by stu-its of prophecy. Thoughtful men of every de of opinion and wholly uninfluenced by reli-us or spiritual considerations, have not failed to ice with concern the loosening of the bands of iety which is gradually, yet surely and visibly, operation. Statesmen, politicians, and writers the press, men who are accustomed to watch h a keen eye the course of events and the causes which they are influenced, have marked the dual process of disintegration that is at work. e reins of the government of the world are slip-g from the hands of the hereditary holders, and people are insisting on their right to govern mselves.

RISE OF POPULAR POWER.

Signs of the growing power of the people may marked in every direction. There is but one te in Europe in which the sovereign rules with-at least the semblance of constitutional govern-nt, and this is in itself a tacit admission of the ht of the people to share the throne. But the y will come when the people will elect to reign ne. The spirit of democracy is the spirit of age; it is increasing with silent but rapid wth; its apostles are preaching the gospel of l-handed revolution in every nation in Europe. e colossal empire of Russia, with its gigantic litary despotism, finds how hard it is to contend th the unseen foe that dares to strike at the rone. A vast network of Communism is spread er every kingdom of the continent, and has even ached the shores of Great Britain, and the lead-s of revolution only wait their opportunity to eep away every form of sovereign and constitu-nal government.

The fires of revolution that were lighted up in 48 and then only quelled by military force, and torrents of blood, have never been wholly sub-ed. The embers of Red Republicanism are nouldering still, and it is probable that when the xt great Continental disturbance occurs, they ill again start into life and wrap Europe in a gen-al conflagration.

The chart of prophecy guides us to the conclu-on that the latter days of this world's troubled story will be a season of popular rule; that the ays of monarchy are numbered, and that un-owned Republicanism, under the headship of the Antichrist, will be the last phase of human govern-ment in the days when He shall come "Whose right it is" to reign. Sad and humiliating as is this prospect, the one cheering sign to the hearts of God's children is found in the prophetic words of Christ, that such a condition of things is to be in glory. Instead of letting their hearts sink within them in discouragement and despair, He has bid-den them "Lift up their heads, for their redemp-tion draweth nigh." The very darkness of the hour gives promise of the near approach of the glory that is to be revealed, for the darkest hour of night is that which precedes the dawn. And even now their eyes are turned with longing to the Eastern skies and the bright and morning star, that shall come as the harbinger of everlasting day.

It is the concurrent testimony of the ablest stu-dents of prophetic Scripture, that the "times of the Gentiles" and the grant of universal dominion made to Nebuchadnezzar, and the four heathen empires of which he was the golden head, are fast approaching their completion.

The revived Roman empire, under the dictator-ship of Antichrist, with his ten vassal kings (ruling at first as sovereigns and then as crownless lieu-tenants), will be the last development of earthly power that shall give place to the heavenly king-dom of God's own Son—the "Stone cut out with-out hands" that shall smite it with a sudden and utter destruction. Just when Satan's triumph ap-pears complete; when the Man of Sin has accepted the sovereignty of the world for which the Man Christ Jesus refused to do homage to the tempter in the days of His flesh; when the world, that rejected Christ coming in His Father's name, has received Antichrist coming in his own name, and worshipped his image and received the brand of his mark in their foreheads; in the very hour when the triumph of evil seems secure, shall utter and overwhelming desolation overtake God's adversa-ries, and He shall "set His king upon His holy hill of Zion."

AWAKENED INTEREST IN PROPHECY.

This approaching climax and final fulfilment of God's purposes in relation to man and the world in which he dwells, marked by the termination of Gentile rule, the restoration of Israel to the first place among the nations, and the visible manifesta-tion of Christ as King upon a restored earth, is now the intelligent expectation of thousands. Nothing more surely marks the advent of the lat-ter days than this awakened interest in the study of prophecy. That this anticipation of coming events should not be strongly awakened until the events themselves are near at hand, is in close analogy with the history of past times.

The book of prophecy is a sealed book to the Church of God for a season; it may be even for ages as far as any general interest in the events which it predicts is concerned. But God does not intend it to remain a volume of insoluble mysteries for ever; it is only sealed until the time of fulfil-ment draws nigh. The prophecies of Jeremiah, foretelling the precise duration of the captivity in Babylon, had been uttered nearly seventy years before the mind of Daniel was powerfully directed to a consideration of them. It was within but two or three years of the termination of the captivity, that the Spirit of God led him to a study of the scroll which contained the writings of Jeremiah, and then he understood that the number of the years appointed for the desolation of Jerusalem was on the verge of accomplishment.

And Daniel himself, pre-eminently the prophet of the latter days, who pictures in such striking outline the history of earth's four great empires, the reign of Antichrist, and the setting up of God's throne over the kingdoms of the world, was direct-ed by God to shut up the vision, as many days should elapse before its fulfilment (Daniel 8: 26). He was bidden to "seal the book, to the time of the end" (Daniel 12: 4), thereby intimating that in the latter days of the age, when the dispensation of grace was drawing to a close, the book should be unsealed to the minds of God's servants, and that they should be guided by it to a right understand-ing of the signs of the times. The book of Reve-lation has been given by Jesus Christ as a com-panion, and, in many respects, a key to the inter-pretation of the former prophecy. A special bless-ing is promised to such as make it their careful study, and although much of its contents may probably remain hidden until near the very end, familiarity with its predictions will help us at once to recognize the signs as they appear.

That we are approaching the end of the age, if not at this moment living in its latter days, is the reverent conviction of many of God's children. Certainly no days since the days of the Flood ever represented so accurately the description of the last days of this dispensation given in the prophecy of Daniel as indicating the "time of the end." Days, like our own, of gigantic discovery in every field of science, in which we can speak our thoughts at lightning speed across a Continent and distance is annihilated by the railroad track, and the light of day is flashed at midnight over our great cities, surely no time since the beginning of the world ever so fitly answered to the period when "men should run to and fro, and knowledge be in-creased." And the Holy Ghost is now leading the hearts of thousands of God's servants to a con-templation of the signs of the latter days, and a more earnest looking for and expectation of their coming King.

THE BOOK NO LONGER CLOSED.

The book of prophecy is no longer an unsealed book. Christians are everywhere searching its pages of hidden truth, and thus gaining an intelli-gent knowledge of the broad outlines of prophetic teaching, of which the Word of God, read in the light of history, is in a great measure itself the key. May it lead them to greater preparedness in heart and life for the glory that shall soon be revealed, and so teach them to pray with deeper meaning the oft-repeated prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

There are not wanting signs, in many directions, to show how events are shaping themselves in readiness for the fulfilment of the prophecies of the latter days. God has made known to us that the last great earthly empire shall appear under the guise of a ten-kingdomed confederacy; and that its constitution, though outwardly strong and power-ful, shall contain within it elements of inherent weakness that will tend to its utter and overwhelm-ing destruction. This is signified by the mingled iron and clay of the ten toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image. At the beginning of the century nothing seemed more distantly improbable than that such a phenomenon should arise.

The iron heel of military despotism was firmly planted on the necks of the nations; and every at-tempt at the development of popular power was kept in check or summarily crushed. But the revolutionary disturbance which convulsed Europe about the year 1848, and shook every throne to its foundation, placed a power in the hands of the peo-ple which they have never wholly lost. The revo-lution was, indeed, subdued, and the empire of the sword again asserted its sway. Nevertheless, that period marked a distinct era in the history of Europe—from that time may be traced the rapid growth of constitutional government. And with the single exception of the Colossus of the North, the autocratic rulers of the nations have been con-tent to admit the people to a share in their sover-eign rights. The progress of this tendency is sufficiently remarkable even in Great Britain, protected as it is by its insular position from the great wave of revolution which swept over the kingdoms of the Continent.

Every successive Reform Bill has been instru-mental in placing a larger share of sovereign power in the hands of the people. It needs no deep pro-phetic foresight to perceive how this political trans-formation is preparing the way for the conditions under which the predicted kingdoms will arise, and the peculiar character that will be stamped upon them. At present these conditions can only be traced in the western division of the Roman em-pire. But we may reasonably conjecture that when the five kingdoms of the eastern division shall be reconstituted, the influence of western institu-tions will be powerfully reflected upon them, and the same character of government will prevail,

CURRENT EVENTS.

The United States Senate Finally Adjourned on Saturday, October 29th, having been in session three weeks. The President's nominations, with only one important exception, were confirmed. They were only such as were rendered necessary by vacancies, and those that the late President had decided upon, prior to his assassination. The exception referred to occasioned the only protracted contest of the session. It was the nomination of Clifford Statham to be Postmaster at Lynchburg, Va. The present incumbent is removed for cause, and there appears to have been no question raised as to the propriety of that step. But the President's nominee is a supporter of Senator Mahone, and it is understood that he is pledged to work for the success of the allied forces of Republicans and Readjusters. The opposition to his nomination was prompted by a desire to convince the citizens of Virginia at this critical juncture, that Senator Mahone could not control the State patronage, and it was openly stated that 10,000 votes in the Virginia election would depend on the success or failure of the nomination. The contest in the Senate lasted over three days, and then the nomination was, with the consent of the Republicans, laid aside and the Senate adjourned.

Mr. Windom's Scheme of Civil Service Reform has been made public. The ex-Secretary said recently that the subject was frequently discussed between the late President and himself, and though both were aware that a comprehensive scheme would require careful legislation, yet they believed a plan might be devised to relieve the pressure at Washington, and to prevent candidates incurring expenses which were often almost ruinous to themselves. The plan to accomplish this object was not completed when the President was shot, but during President Garfield's illness Mr. Windom perfected his plan on the lines the President had indicated, intending to submit it to him when he recovered. The plan, as now published by Mr. Windom, proposes to allot to the States respectively, as the law requires, the number of appointments to which they would be severally entitled in the Treasury Department; then to appoint a carefully selected committee of three in each State, whose duty it should be to meet once a year, at some convenient place in the State, and before whom any one desiring to enter the Government service should have the right to present himself or herself for examination, such examination to be practical and relate to the character, experience, and capacity of the applicant, and to the duties of the position to which appointment is desired, said committee to prepare a list, graduated according to merit, of those who pass the examination, and forward the papers to the head of the department at Washington. Persons should be selected from those highest on the list, and only to be sent for when the State of which they are residents should be entitled to appointments. In making these selections, soldiers, or their widows or children, should have the preference.

Ex-Governor Morgan, Nominated by the President as Secretary of the Treasury, and unanimously confirmed by the Senate, felt it his duty to decline the office. He telegraphed to the President that his age and the engrossing character of the duties of the Treasury Department compelled him to decline its acceptance. On Thursday the President nominated Charles J. Folger, Chief Judge of the New York Court of Appeals, to be Secretary of the Treasury, and the nomination was promptly confirmed. Judge Folger is sixty-three years of age, having been born at Nantucket, Mass., in 1818. In 1830 the family removed to New York State, and the future judge was graduated with high honors at Hobart College. From 1861 to 1869 he was a State Senator. In 1869 he was appointed United States sub-treasurer of New York, and the following year was elected Judge of the Court of Appeals. On the death of Chief Judge Church in 1880, Governor Cornell appointed him to fill the vacancy; an appointment confirmed last election by a plurality of 44,160. The nomination to the Treasury is cordially approved both by Republicans and Democrats.

Postmaster-General James was Nominated by President Arthur to be his own successor, and the nomination was confirmed by the Senate. It is believed, however, that General James has been induced with considerable difficulty to continue in office, and only on condition that he shall be allowed to retire after the disposal of the Star Route cases. It was necessary that he should be re-nominated, because the term of office of the Postmaster-General expires one month after the term of the President who appoints him, and therefore the legality of Mr. James's acts might be challenged if a new nomination were not made. The President has made no nomination to fill the office of Attorney-General, and has exerted considerable pressure on Mr. MacVeagh to induce him to remain. This, like Mr. James's position, is chiefly on account of the Star Route prosecutions. There is some probability of their failure, and the President is desirous that the men who had the credit of initiating them should have the responsibility of completing them. In the event of Mr. MacVeagh positively refusing to hold the office, it is reported that the Solicitor-General will proceed, and Mr. MacVeagh be retained by a special fee.

Assistant Postmaster-General Tyner has Tendered his resignation, and in reply to an inquiry as to the causes which induced the President to request it, Mr. James wrote him that the demand was not based upon any reflection upon his "personal or official integrity." Judge Tyner claims that he was always opposed to "expeditions," and very rarely ordered or consented to them; and he thinks that the sixteen months of his term in the office of Postmaster-General was freer from unnecessary expenditure than any similar period of late years. Regarding the report on Star Service that he made to Judge Key, after his return from the Pacific coast in 1879, he says he made the investigation upon Key's written order, submitted the report to him, and called his attention to what he believed to be unnecessary service and to the remedies which he proposed for the evils of the Star Route system. Mr. Key directed that the report should be filed as a private paper and not published.

A Letter of Instructions from Mr. Blaine to our Minister in London in reference to the Panama Canal has been published. It defines very clearly the attitude of the Government on this important question. It respectfully affirms the right and intention of our government to guarantee the neutrality of the canal against all Powers, and takes the ground that we should resent any individual or joint step on the part of any nation or nations to interfere in the matter. Mr. Blaine also contends that the canal would be practically a part of our coast line, and declares that in the event of a war in which either the United States or Colombia might be a party, the passage of armed vessels of hostile nations through the canal would be no more admissible than would be the passage of their armies over our Pacific railroads. He furthermore gives notice that the United States will insist upon her rights to take all needful precautions against the possibility of the isthmus transit being used offensively against our interests upon the land or the sea. The letter has caused considerable discussion in Europe.

The Appeal of the Michigan Relief Committee just issued, explains the situation of the sufferers. Fifteen thousand people have lost all their possessions. So far $460,000 have been received for their assistance, and sufficient clothing to last them through the winter. But the supply of money and food will be exhausted in a few weeks, and in order to prevent this large number of persons being permanently pauperized, funds must be raised to supply them with tools and seed, besides means for their support through the winter.

Seventy-three Miles of Country are now under water owing to the breaks in the Mississippi levees. A telegram from Quincy, Ill., dated October 29th, says: "The height of the water in the Mississippi here reached nineteen feet above low water at four o'clock this afternoon, being twenty-one inches above the highest record since the great flood of 1851. This is the fifteenth day since the water reached the danger line, and the rise has been constant during all that time. The 'Sny' levee, south of this city, protecting about a hundred and twenty thousand acres of rich lands, broke near the south end ten days ago, and at the middle on Thursday night. The upper half still held until three o'clock this morning, when it gave way, completing the inundation of the entire district. By this break a farming region, extending thirty-eight miles south from Quincy, and varying from three to nine miles in width, is entirely flooded. On the Missouri side, opposite, the destruction is complete from Lagrange. Ten miles north to the Palmyra bluffs, seventeen miles south of and back into the country, a distance of three to six miles, everything is under water. The track of the Keokuk and St. Louis Railway, along the west bank of the river, is mainly under water from Keokuk to Louisiana, Mo., a distance of seventy-three miles." The destruction of property cannot be estimated, but it must be many hundred thousand dollars. Happily the loss of life is less than might have been expected. As yet only two deaths have been reported.

The Summer School of Christian Philosophy, the enterprise initiated by Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., which we have already described, has assumed permanent shape under the title of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy. On Thursday last a meeting was held at which a constitution and by-laws were adopted. The Rev. Dr. Deems presided. Monthly meetings are to be held throughout the year, and a public lecture will be delivered quarterly. The lectures delivered last summer, and all papers read at the meetings of the Institute are to be published in a Review, to be issued quarterly. A charter will be asked for at the next session of the Legislature. At the meeting on Thursday Dr. E. C. Man read a paper on "The Errors of Materialistic Physiology" which was discussed by the members.

The Garfield Fund.—The Total Amount of the fund for Mrs. Garfield and her children, which is now closed, is $361,791.72. The United States Trust Company has paid $361,770.75 of this for $311,000 United States 4 per cent registered bonds. Mrs. Garfield has written to Colonel Rockwell requesting him to announce in some public manner her purpose to cause to be published an account of the life and an appropriate collection of the literary remains of General Garfield.

A Clergyman Assaulted by a Nihilist in New York.—Dr. S. Irenæus Prime relates the following incident which occurred recently: "Two hours ago I was in a car on the Elevated Railroad that comes down Sixth Avenue in the City of New York. Two decent-looking men sat immediately in front of me, on one of the cross-seats in the middle of the car. They had the appearance of respectable mechanics. Neither of them was in liquor. They spoke occasionally, without turning their faces toward each other. At length one of them said, loud enough for me to hear him distinctly, 'I am a Nihilist.' My first impulse, on hearing this remark, was to leave my seat for another, as the nearness to such a person was offensive, and a sort of foreboding of evil took possession of me. After a few moments' reflection, I turned partly around and looked away. I was not aware of showing any feeling of contempt, nor of giving the men the slightest reason to suppose that I was aware of their presence. The train stopped at a station; both of them rose quickly; one of them struck me with the flat of his hand, and the other said, with an oath, 'You ought to have your old neck broke.' Then they passed rapidly out of the door and upon the platform. I turned to look after them, and the one who struck the blow was shaking his fist at me as he saw me through the window." This act of brutality is characteristic of Nihilism. It transforms men into brutes.

A Husband's Conversion in Answer to his wife's prayers was the subject of a letter sent to the Fulton Street prayer-meeting last week. The writer had asked for prayer on behalf of her husband some time ago. She promised that she would renew her entreaties at the Mercy Seat and add fasting to prayer. There seemed no indication whatever at the time that the husband had the slightest concern about his soul. A strange minister came that way and preached the Gospel. The husband appears to have received blessing, for he came to his wife one night in terrible earnestness declaring that he must be a Christian. He was soon upon his knees in prayer, and his wife, whose faith was weaker than it had ever been until this happy event, knelt with him. He found peace and joy through believing, and is now an active, earnest Christian seeking the salvation of others.

An Eye Turned to Stone was Recently Removed by a skilful oculist, who showed it to a reporter on a Western journal. The ossified portion was as large as a silver quarter and twice as thick. The patient told him that 25 years ago, while chopping in the woods in Jefferson Co., Wis., he injured one of his eyes. It became inflamed, but after a year's time healed, remaining, however, totally blind. He was not troubled with it any more until a year or more ago, when it again became very painful, and felt as though there were a strong pressure behind it. The other eye, in sympathy with the injured member, began to fail also. The oculist removed the eye, and was astonished to find that petrifaction had set in, and the choroid had turned to stone. There are only two cases of the kind on record. But in spiritual matters we know of many to whom such a calamity appears to have happened. Not only such as the apostle Paul writes of (Rom. 11 : 25), on whom blindness in part has fallen, but others who have hearts of stone alienated from the life of God because of the blindness of their hearts (Eph. 4 : 18).

A Fight Between Two Snakes is Described in a letter to a contemporary by a lady who has interested herself in studying herbs said to be poison antidotes. While walking in the woods on St. John's Island, S. C., she heard the spring of a rattlesnake, and, turning to look for him, saw him engaged in fierce combat with a handsome black snake of the non-venomous species. The fight was fierce, and the black snake was struck twice by his venomous enemy. Each time he retreated to the bushes, but returned in a few moments to renew the encounter. At the third attack the black snake seized the rattlesnake by the back of the neck, and, as the latter flung himself out, in an effort to shake off his enemy, the black snake coiled around him with a rapidity that dazzled her, and then he gradually drew himself in tight coils up and up, until he was coiled about the neck and upper part of the rattlesnake. For a moment he rested thus, then, like a flash of light he stretched himself out, in the act literally tearing his venemous enemy to pieces. The fight must have lasted twenty minutes, perhaps longer; but the black snake was the complete victor, and the lady was assured by a man who was much in the woods and had witnessed similar battles, that in almost all cases the non-venomous was conqueror over the venomous one. The incident suggests many lessons, but principally the one that when defeated the snake applied instantly to the antidote and received cure and renewed strength. So, in our conflicts with the evil one, we are encouraged to apply to Jesus, in whose hands is the antidote to the guilt and power of sin.

A Burglar's Tool-chest was Discovered in a curious place by a jailer at Leadville, Col., lately. A man was arrested on suspicion of being concerned in a burglary, and confined in the Leadville jail, but was discharged for lack of evidence. The jailer, however, was convinced of his guilt, and induced him, after much persuasion, to make a confession to him on the day of his discharge. To the jailer's surprise, the prisoner, who had a wooden leg of very substantial size, unscrewed it, and revealed in a hollow place, dexterously cut, which made the leg a kind of tube, a complete set of burglar's tools, which he carried about with him as he limped along begging from door to door. He is not the first man who has used a misfortune as a cover for villainy, though there are not many so ingenious as he in this bad direction.

A Man Whose Hair Turned White in One night recently, related to a newspaper reporter the cause of the sudden change. It appears that he learned that an oil well was on fire not far from his residence in Pennsylvania. He was curious to see the grand, yet terrible sight, and bent his steps in that direction. Soon after he arrived, the burning oil made its first irruption over the sides of the tank. A general rush was made to avoid the seething stream. It floated down the hillside and burnt a saw mill and several other buildings in its course. It also set fire to another tank, and the visitor crossed a stream to see the first outbreak of the fire there. As he did so he slipped and fell into a mud-hole, which, like a quicksand, held him fast, and the more he struggled the firmer he was held. He shouted for help, but the roar of the fire drowned his cries. He lay still for a few minutes hoping that some one might pass and see him, but no one came. Suddenly he heard the warning cry of the second overflow, and to his horror saw the fiery steam approaching him. He made a last desperate struggle, and then he knew no more until he awakened in a friend's house. His position had been seen and he was rescued just as he fainted, and when the burning torrent was only a few feet away. His life was saved, but in those few minutes of terror his hair had turned white. If men could only realize, as this man did, how near they stand to a worse fate even than his with what eagerness would they seek the salvation offered them through Jesus!

A Golden Cucuyo, a Curious South American beetle kept as a curiosity in a collection in New York city, died last week. It was one of four or five specimens in the North. These insects are regarded with superstitious awe by the women of South America, and the few that are caught are fastened in tiny fetters of gold and worn as ornaments. A gold or gold and jewelled band is passed around the breast, to which is attached a slender gold chain about four inches long which ends in a long pin. This pin is thrust into a bouquet of flowers on the shoulder or on the hat, and the beetle is left to ramble the length of the chain. The cucuyo is a fire-beetle, a single specimen giving out light enough in a dark room to enable one to read a newspaper. They are capable of living without food for a great length of time. The idea of wearing a living creature as an ornament has something unnatural in it, but those who have observed the kind of ornaments worn by fashionable people are not surprised at it. People disposed to cultivate such a taste should read what Isaiah said of it in his day (Isa. 3 ; 18-24).

WHOLE-HEARTED RELIGION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear Me for ever, for the good of them, and of their children after them."—JER. 32 : 39.

Where True Godliness Begins—The Heart First—The Way Second—A Paradox—I. Unitedness of Heart—It is Naturally Divided—Must be United—For Acceptance—For Sincerity—For Intensity of Life—For Consecration—To Receive Blessing—It is the Gift of God—II. Consistency of Walk—Unity of Heart Essential to Truth of Life—To Progress—To Usefulness—To Assurance—III. Stedfastness of Principle—Standing all Tests—Persecution—Prosperity—Old Age—IV. Personal Blessedness—V. A Relative Blessing—"For Their Children After Them."

THOSE of you who were present last Lord's-day morning will remember my sermon upon "Mongrel Religion," in which I dealt with those who feared the Lord and served other gods. Their heart was divided, therefore they were found faulty. They had, as the Hebrew puts it, a heart and a heart—a heart that went this way and a heart that went the other way, and so as a matter of fact they became, as the prophet said, as "a silly dove that hath no heart." The discourse of this morning is intended to exhibit whole-hearted religion, which is the opposite of the sad mixture which we have so lately denounced. We wish to look upon persons of Caleb's stamp, who followed the Lord fully; in whom by the grace of God the divided heart has become united; so that with their whole heart they serve the Lord their God.

Our text is an extract from Jeremiah's copy of the covenant of grace. The Lord promises to Israel, "They shall be my people, and I will be their God." And in the fortieth verse he says, "And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put My fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from Me." This, then, is the covenant of grace which God has made with His people, and it is highly suggestive that the first blessing of it relates to the heart; for God when He begins with men does not begin with the outward way, but with the inward spirit. He puts it, "I will give them one heart and one way:" the way is second, the heart comes first. Understand, then, that in all true godliness we must BEGIN WITH HEART-WORK.

It is no use hoping to polish the outside until by degrees you enlighten the interior; nay, but the light must first be placed within, and then, as it shines through, spots on the exterior will be discovered, and will all the more readily be cleansed away. God works not to the centre, but in the centre, and then from the centre into the outer life.

In reference to the heart, one of the earliest works of divine grace is to unite it in one. Strange to say, I should be equally truthful if I said that one of the first works of grace is to break the heart; but so paradoxical is man that when his heart is unbroken it is divided, and when his heart is broken, then, for the first time, it is united; for a broken heart in every fragment of it mourns over sin, and cries out for mercy. Every shattered particle of a contrite spirit is united in one desire to be reconciled to God. There is no union of the heart with itself till it is broken for sin and from sin. Early in the morning of grace the man comes to himself, and so is restored to the unity of his manhood.

It is of this unitedness of heart that I shall speak first, and then I shall go on to those other covenant blessings which come after it, according to the text. These are placed after it in order to show its great value, since it is the first step to exceedingly precious blessings.

First, then, we will consider unitedness of heart—"I will give them one heart;" secondly, the blessing which immediately arises out of it, consistency of walk—"I will give them one way." From these two come the third blessing, stedfastness of principle—"that they may fear Me for ever;" and consequent upon all this comes personal blessedness—"for the good of them;" and attendant upon that favor, relative benediction—"and for the good of their children after them." Our programme is very extensive, may the Spirit of God help us to fill it up.

I. We begin, then, at the beginning, with unitedness of the heart.

Our first statement under this head shall be that

THE HEART IS NATURALLY DIVIDED.

Sin is confusion, and at its entrance it created a Babel, or a confusion, within the heart of man. Until man sinned his nature was one and undivided; but the fall broke him, and destroyed his unity. Within him now there are many voices, many imaginations, and many devices. Within him there is strife and contention, wars and fightings, which come of his lusts, which struggle with each other, and with his understanding. Observe the contest which is constantly visible between his conscience and his affections. His affections choose that which is evil, while his conscience approves that which is right. The desires go after that which appears to be pleasant, but the judgment warns the mind of its folly; hence a controversy between the two powers of the soul.

Frequently, too, there is a very great division between a man's inward knowledge and his outward conduct. Men are often wise in the head and foolish in the hand: they know the right and do the wrong. The law of God is read in their hearing and written upon their memories, and yet it is forgotten in their lives. They are men of great discernment in theory, and yet in their actions they put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter; darkness for light and light for darkness. They sin against the light: "they love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." Often and often the man is as right as justice herself in his opinions, and clear as the day in his information; and yet he gropes as the blind, and stumbles at noonday as in the night. His knowledge goes one way, and his will another; he knows the consequences of sin, and therefore fears; he perceives the pleasurableness or profit of sin, and therefore presumes.

Man is a puzzle, and none can put him together but He that made him at the first. He is a self-contradiction, a house divided against itself, a mystery of iniquity, a maze of folly, a mass of perversity, obstinacy, and contention. Sin has made the heart to be so inwardly divided as to be like the troubled sea which cannot rest; or like a cage of unclean birds, every one fighting its fellow; or like a den of wild beasts, which cease not to rend each other. When man cast off the yoke of the one God he fell under bondage to gods many, and lords many, who struggle for supremacy and make the one kingdom into many rival principalities: since sin became natural to man, it became natural that man's heart should be divided. But there is the point; and hence the covenant promise, "I will give them one heart." For, dear friends, in the matter of godliness, if our heart be not whole and entire in following after God we cannot meet with acceptance. God never did and never will receive the homage of a divided heart. Alexander, when Darius proposed that the two great monarchs should divide the world, replied that there was only room for one sun in the heavens. What his ambition affirmed that God declareth from the necessity of the case. Since one God fills all things there is no room for another. It is not possible for a heart to be given up to falsehood and yet to be under the power of truth. It is idle to attempt to serve two such masters as holiness and iniquity. God cannot smile upon an unhallowed compromise, and allow men to bow in the house of Rimmon and yet worship in His holy temple. God will have all or nothing; He will have us only, wholly, altogether, and always His, or else He will have nothing to do with us.

It was once proposed to the Roman senate to set up the image of Christ in the Pantheon among the gods, but when they were informed that He would not agree that any worship should be mingled with His own the senate straightway refused Him a shrine. In this they acted in a manner consistent with itself; but those are altogether inexcusable "who swear by the Lord and swear by Malcham." We provoke the Lord to jealousy when we offer Him a corner in our souls and allow our vain thoughts to lodge within us. Errors can lie down like sheep in a field, but no error can lie side by side with the lordly lion of the truth. There is no god but God. Jehovah, He is the God! There is one Mediator between God and man—the man Christ Jesus. Whatsoever a man setteth up in his heart as the object of his affections in opposition to God is a vain, a vile, a vicious thing, and that man cannot be accepted of the Lord.

We have seen that it must be united for acceptance, we now note that it must be united for sincerity: a divided heart is a false heart. Where there is no unity of heart there is no truth in the spirit. Tell me that thou lovest the world, and I will tell thee that the love of the world is enmity to God. Declare that thou wilt serve Belial ever so little, and I know that thy service of Christ is but Judas' service—mercenary, temporary, traitorous. Sincerity does not open the front door to Christ and the back gate to the devil.

Our heart must be united, next, for

INTENSITY OF LIFE.

True religion needs the soul to be ever at a fervent heat. "The kingdom of heaven," saith our Lord, "suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." None climb the hill whereon the New Jerusalem is built except such as go on hands and knees, and laying aside every weight give themselves wholly to the divine ascent. The pilgrim who hopes to reach the better land and makes a pleasure trip of it is under a mistake: it is hard travelling, and requires ardor and perseverance. It is so in every good word and work. A lazy prayer requests a denial, and shall have it. Half-hearted praise is an insult to God, and everything in religion that is not done with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our strength, is a sin, however much it may look like a virtue.

The heart must be united to be consecrated. Will God be served with broken cups and cracked flagons, and shall His altars be polluted with torn and mangled sacrifices? All the things in heaven and earth which the Lord acknowledges as consecrated things are dedicated to Him and to Him alone. God will not account that to be consecrated to Himself which is used by another. Brethren, we must be wholly consecrated unto the Lord, or we cannot be consecrated to Him at all. We are unconsecrated, we are polluted, we are as things accursed, if we are divided in heart.

Once more, we must have our heart united, or else none of the blessings which are to follow in covenant order can possibly reach us. For, look, "I will give them one heart," and then it follows, "one way;"—no man will have a consistent, uniform way while he has a divided heart. Read next, "That they shall fear Me forever;" but no man will fear God forever unless fear has taken possession of his whole heart. The convert may profess to follow the Lord for awhile, but he will soon turn aside; he who does not begin with his whole heart will soon tire of the race. "For ever" is a long day, and requires our whole soul to hold on and to hold out. The Lord also promises that this shall be "for the good of them, and of their children after them;" but those who give God a part of their heart, neither win a blessing for themselves nor for their posterity; they are not among the seed that God has blessed, neither can they be.

GOD-GIVEN.

So I leave the first head when I have noticed that according to the text God will give His chosen this unified heart: "I will give them one heart." Ah, we shall never obtain this blessing otherwise than as a free gift of God's grace. Teachers may put holy thoughts into our heads, but they cannot alter our hearts. We may unite our thoughts in some system of divinity, but we can never unite our desires upon the Divinity Himself except we experience a work of grace upon our souls. The one Lord must make our heart one. He who once made the heart must make it anew to make it one. "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all."

But none of these seven ones would ever be ours unless it were added, "But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ," and that grace must make our heart one. This the Lord does in part by enlightenment through the light of His Holy Spirit. He shows us the worthlessness and deceptiveness of everything that would attract our hearts away from Jesus and from our God; and when we see the evil of the rival, we give our heart entirely to Him whom we worship. The Lord works this also by a process more thorough still; for He weans us from all idolatrous loves.

Disease and death are summoned to shoot their fatal arrows at our dearest ones before we will give God the whole of our hearts. It is hard to love the creature much and yet not too much; it is a great thing to love our beloved ones in Christ, and in subordination to Christ. Many a mother has had to lose child after child because she had stirred the jealousy of the best Beloved one by dividing her heart between Him and her little ones. Many a man in business has fallen from wealth and prosperity because God saw that his heart went astray after his possessions. Doubtless many have had eloquence, talent, and gifts of various kinds, and they doted upon these things until it has been needful to remove them to unite their hearts upon God, and so they have been laid aside by sickness, or the mind has lost its vigor, or the voice has failed, and the gift has become a plague rather than a comfort; and thus their heart has lost its idol, and has turned unto the Lord.

II. We now advance to the second blessing of the covenant here mentioned, which is CONSISTENCY OF WALK.

"I will give them one way." When the heart is united the man lives for a single object, and that alone. Running in one direction, striving for one purpose, he keeps to the one way which leads to heaven. As Christ is our one life, so is He our one way.

Without this unity there can be no truth in a man's life. If he spins by day, and unravels at night, he is acting out a falsehood. If he runs to the right while men look at him, but trudges back again to the old post as soon as men's eyes are taken from him, his life is an equivocation, which is but a fine word for a lie. It is a dreadful thing for a man's word to be a lie, but for a man's whole life to be a lie is still more horrible. We may have much more of the liar about us than we dream of: let us see to it, and pray God that, like Nathanael, we may have no guile in us.

We may patch up our life with bits of religion, and remnants of profession, till it becomes like the beggar's coat of which no man knows the original: such a garment may be fit for a beggar, but shall we wear it? The seamless garment of truth, woven from the top throughout, adorns a Christian, but motley raiment proves a man a fool. Unless we follow the Lord with one heart, and one way, we shall be found to be liars after all; and if all liars have their portion in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death, what will be his lot whose life was false to itself and false to God? Inconsistency of behavior shows that truth is little set by in the heart.

We must, dear friends, have one walk, or else our life will make no progress. He who travels in two opposite directions will find himself no forwarder. How is it that some professors are at much the same place as they occupied twenty years ago? Years have made them more gray, but not more gracious. At night they fastened up their boat in a little creek of the river, and when the tide ran out they waited and waited until close to the end of its running, and then they went down a little way with the tide; very soon the stream ceased to turn, and so they drifted back with the flood, and hitched up near the same muddy shore as before. Like a pendulum they travel far but get no farther. Growth, progress, advancement—none of these can they know, for they are double-minded, and so run to and fro in the earth and wear themselves out with vanity.

I do not say that we can always make apparent progress at the same rate, for powerful under-currents affect our life, and a man may be doing much who is successfully overcoming adverse influences. When a fierce wind is blowing a captain may know that he will be driven on shore if he does not steam right into the teeth of the hurricane: if he does this is he not making the surest real progress if he manages to keep where he is and avoid the fatal danger? I say, then, that if we do not seem to advance we may nevertheless, in the judgment of God be making true progress if we resist the mighty impulses which would otherwise hurry us on to destruction: but if we have two ways and steer this way and that way and every way by turns, with the view of pleasing men and making things easy all round, we cannot speed toward the desired haven.

We must choose and keep to one way, or we cannot attain to usefulness. What influence has a double-minded man? If a man speak for God to-day, and so lives to-morrow that he virtually speaks for the devil, what power has he over those around him? How can he lead who has no way of his own? If your actions play fast and loose with truth; if your life is of a chequer-work of black and white; if you are everything by turns and nothing long, what force for good can you possibly exert? Consistency and unity of life are necessary to usefulness.

And I am sure it is necessary for anything like assurance. The best of believers may through holy anxiety question their own state; but the man who has two ways may well sing:—

"'Tis a point I long to know,
Oft it causes anxious thought;
Do I love the Lord or no?
Am I His or am I not?"

O you who are inconsistent in life, I must make bold to tell you that many of your friends are even more in doubt about you than you are about yourself. 'Tis a point we also long to know; for we cannot tell whether you love the Lord or no, whether you are His or not. Sometimes we see happy signs about you, and our charity hopeth all things; but when we see you again falling into evil ways, we are distressed, and even our charity weeps over you. How can we be assured of your change of heart when we see so little change of life? What a pity to lead such a life that it puzzles those who love you best to form any judgment as to your condition. O ye who blow hot and cold, ye are strange beings; you seem to the common observer to be too good for hell, and not good enough for heaven. You cannot be divided at last, and therefore you may rest assured that the powers of evil will seize you as their own.

No person can come to any true personal assurance while his life is of a double character. But if I know that I have one heart, and that my heart belongs to my Lord, and that I have one way, a way of obedience to Him, then may I be assured that I am His. If I cannot make such progress as I would, yet if I follow my Lord and keep my face steadfastly set toward Jerusalem, then I know where I am, and what I am, and whither I am going. Holiness of life proves our faith, and faith ensures our salvation, and salvation begets joy, and peace, and confidence. "Hereby we know that we love Him if we keep His commandments."

III. Briefly we notice, in the third place, the next covenant blessing,

STEADFASTNESS OF PRINCIPLE.

"That they may fear Me for ever." Get the heart and the way right, and then the spiritual force of the fear of God will abide in us in all days to come. Notice the basis of true religion—it is the fear of God: it is not said that they shall join a church and make a profession, and speak holy words for ever; but that "They may fear Me for ever." O brothers and sisters, our religion must have the Lord in the very heart of it. We must be in constant contact with God and possess in our souls the true fear of God; for as this is the beginning of wisdom so is it only the security of perseverance. When God has given us a true spiritual fear of Him it will abide all tests. Outward religion depends upon the excitement which created it; but the fear of the Lord lives on when all around it is frost-bitten. What happens to many converts? The revivalists have gone, and they have gone too. But if God has given us one heart to love and obey Him, and His fear is in us, we do not depend upon the mental thermometer.

Persecution comes. Christians are ridiculed in the workshop, they are pointed out in the street, and an opprobrious name is hooted at them; now we shall know who are God's elect and who are not. Persecution acts as a winnowing fan, and those who are light as chaff are driven away by its blast; but those who are true corn remain and are purified. Careless of man's esteem, the truly God-fearing man with one heart holds on his one way and fears the Lord for ever.

Then, perhaps, comes a more serious test, the trial of prosperity. A man grows rich, he rises into another class of society. If he is not a real Christian he will forsake the Lord, but if he be a true-born heir of the kingdom he will fear the Lord for ever, and consecrate his substance to Him. A heart wholly given to God will stand the wear and tear of life in all conditions, whether in honor or in contempt. Poverty is a severe test to many, and I have known numbers of professors forsake the house of God because, as they said, their clothes were not fit to come in; but that is a poor excuse; I fear their hearts were not fit to come in. The fear of God will make the godly man swallow his pride and follow Christ in rags; he will bear a famine of bread and a famine of water, but he cannot endure a famine of the Word of God.

With some of you old age is creeping on; but I rejoice to know that your grace is not decaying. You are becoming deaf, sight is failing you, and your limbs are trembling; but you can still hear the voice of the Lord, and behold the beauties of His Word, and run in the ways of His statutes. If God has given the young man one heart and one way, he will fear God for ever, and will not forsake the Lord when infirmities multiply upon him. He will bring forth fruit in old age, to show that the Lord is upright. If our soul is wholly Christ's, we can never go back unto perdition: "Who shall separate us from the love of God?" The Lord has cast such cords of love about us that He holds us fast. Oh what a mercy it is to have within us a fear of God, which is not to last for a period of years, but for ever!

IV. Very hurriedly I mention the next thing, which is

PERSONAL BLESSEDNESS,

"for the good of men." Where God gives us one heart and one way, and steadfast principle, it must be for our good in the highest sense. Tell me who are the happiest Christians. They will be found to be whole-hearted Christians. When heart and life are divided happiness leaks through the crack. We must be steady in the pursuit of righteousness if we would abide in the enjoyment of peace. Brothers, if you want to know the sweetness of religion you must know the depth of it. The foam upon the top of the sacred cup is often bitter, but at the bottom lies the essence of sweetness.

I will not say, drink deep or drink not at all, but I will say this, that those who are content with superficial godliness have no idea of the delights which dwell in the deep places of communion with God. Plunge into the river of life; let body, soul, and spirit be immersed into its floods, and you shall swim in joy unspeakable. Lose sight of the shores of worldliness and you shall see God's wonders in the deeps. In intense devotion to the Lord you will find the rare jewel satisfaction.

This shall be for your good every way—for your guidance in business, for your direction in devotion, for the good of your mind here, for the good of your spirit hereafter. To be endowed by grace with one heart and one way is to be rendered fit to live and fit to die. I am sure if you read the biographies of men, if they are fairly written, you will find that the good, the true, the great, the noble, were single-minded. Those who have the clearest sight of God are the pure in heart and the undivided in heart; and those who enjoy a heaven below are those whose hearts and lives are engrossed with heavenly things. The blessed life is that of fervent love and thorough consecration. Do these things abound among you, brethren?

I cannot help fearing that there are professing Christians who never knew what it was to give their hearts perfectly to God's work, or to the love of Jesus. When these people come to the hour of trouble they are dispirited and rebellious; would it be so if they were perfectly resigned to God's will? These people are often short of spiritual comforts; would they be short of them if they had made a clean and clear surrender to their God? I believe they would not. Men who will not eat are starved and weak, and many a disease finds soil within them through the weakness of their constitution; but those who feed on Christ, the Bread of Heaven, are nourished and strong, and are preserved from a thousand ills by that fact. O God the Holy Spirit, I cannot talk to Christ's servants as I wish to do, but Thou canst move them now to aspire after a complete giving up of themselves to Thee, for this shall be for their good!

V. The last is

"And for their children after them." Whole-hearted Christians are usually blessed with a posterity of a like kind. Consecrated men and women live to see their children following in their steps. When sons and daughters forsake the ways of godliness do you wonder when you spy out the home life of their parents? If religion is a sham, do you expect frank young men to respect it? If the father was hollow-hearted in his profession, will not the children despise it? The genuine, thoroughbred Christian is often hated, but he is never the object of contempt. Men may ridicule him, and say that he is a fool, but they cannot help admitting that he is happy, and the wiser sort among them wish that they were such fools themselves. Be thorough and true, and your family will respect your faith.

The almost inevitable consequence of respect in a child toward his parent is a desire to imitate him. It is not always so, but as a rule it is so: if the parents live unto God in a thorough-hearted way, their sons and daughters aspire to the same thing. They see the beauty of religion at home around the fireside, and their conscience being quickened they are led to pray to God that they may have the like piety, so that when they themselves commence a household they may enjoy the like happiness. Certainly if any of you are the children of eminently godly parents, and are living in sin, your parents' lives condemn you. Are they in heaven? Dare you go to their grave, and sit upon the grassy hillock, and think of how you are living? It will force tears to your eyes to contrast yourself with them. You way well tremble to think that you neglect your mother's Saviour, that you forget your father's God. It will go hard with those who leap into hell fire, over a father's prayers and a mother's entreaties; yet some seem desperately resolved on such suicide. I hope these are comparatively few, and that still it is true, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Blessings temporal and spiritual come upon households where the heads of the family are completely consecrated to God. Try it! try it! I will be bound that you will find it profitable. If at the last great day you shall find that consecration to Christ is an error, I will be willing to bear the blame for ever. I am not afraid that any one among you will ever censure me for having excited you into a zeal too fervent, or a life too devoted. Brothers, I am afraid of those of you who go ankle deep into religion and never venture further; I am afraid lest you should by-and-by return to the shore; but as for you who plunge into the centre of the stream, and find waters to swim in, I have no fears; you shall be borne onward by a current ever increasing in strength, till in the ocean of eternal love you lose yourselves in heaven above. I can wish you no greater blessing than that the Holy Spirit may make you whole-hearted, consistent, persistent, ardent, established, and persevering in the things of God. On you and on your household my heart pronounces this benediction—the Lord give you one heart and one way that you may fear Him for ever. Amen.

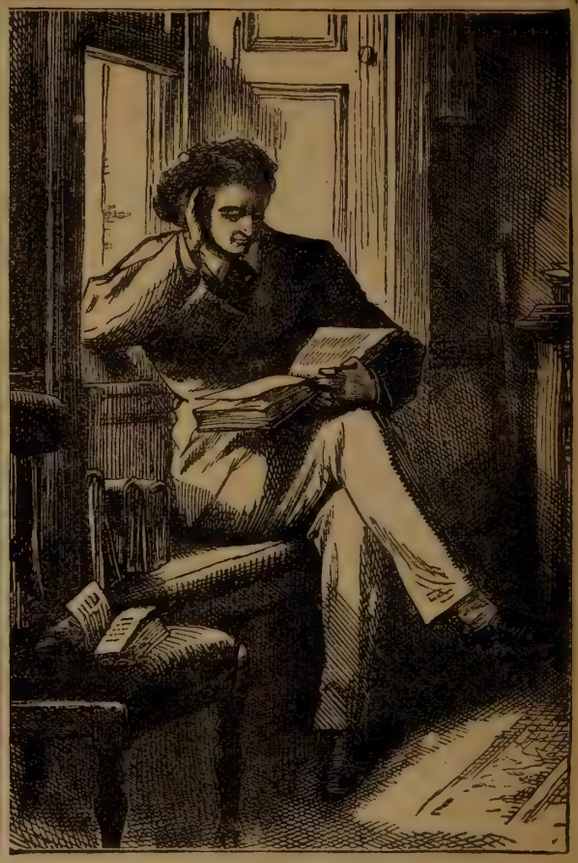
Marion Wilson's Hymn.



Harold Grey's Study.

MARION WILSON'S HYMN.

DR. MAYNE was a medical man of high reputation and large practice. He had, during his University days, imbibed infidel opinions, and had become a materialist. He scouted the notion of an immortal soul and a personal God. As to the Bible, he marvelled how any decently educated man could bring himself to believe such a pack of worn-out fables as he described it to be. He was, however, too much of a gentleman to obtrude his ideas where he knew they would be unwelcome, and usually passed over any reference to religion on the part of his patients with a smile half benevolent and half contemptuous. But his opinions were well known among his associates and the young men who studied under his care. Among the latter was a young man named Morris, the son of pious parents, who was, fast becoming under Dr. Mayne's leading a sceptic and a scoffer.

One of the doctor's patients was Mrs. Wilson, an old lady, who for many years had been unable to leave her room, but whose mental faculties, even at the advanced age of eighty-six, were clear and strong as ever. Her grand-daughter Marion, who lived with her, had all her quickness of perception and vigor of intellect, besides a certain power of expression which was entirely her own.

She had had many a talk with young Morris, whom Dr. Mayne had introduced to them, about his scepticism, and on one occasion had pointedly asked him if he did not consider that a case like her grandmother's ought to shake his confidence in his arguments. "If, as you say, spiritual and mental activity is always determined by physical conditions, how comes it to pass that when weakness and suffering are greatest my grandmamma's mind is most active, and that my sister whom you visited in her last illness seemed stronger and clearer in faculty as she passed away than we had ever known her before."

"The truth is," replied the young man, "we require to restate our definition of matter." "That is certain," said Marian; "if you so define matter as to make it capable of producing, by molecular combination, the intellect of Newton, the sublimity of Milton, the piety of saints, and the heroism of martyrs, then all I can say is that your wonderful definition will be equal to some of the exigencies of its inventors."

So saying she turned to the instrument which was her daily comfort and delight, and said, "Now, sir, tell me if you ever knew any one made as happy by infidel philosophy as this makes us," and she sang, with great sweetness and expressiveness, the noble hymn,

"Jesus, lover of my soul, Let me to Thy bosom fly—"

accompanying herself with some considerable skill, so that it seemed as if the very instrument were inspired with the same deep joy that lit up her countenance and thrilled in every tone of her voice. Repeating her question at the close of the hymn, she said, "Now tell me, have you ever known any approach to the joy which that hymn expresses, produced by any of the theories with which you are so charmed?"

Young Morris, whose intellect was not of the strongest, was silenced by this direct question. His scepticism was only second-hand, the result of Dr. Mayne's teaching, and the scientific theories about which he discoursed glibly he did not thoroughly understand. Moreover the hymn had called up memories which were more potent with him than theories. They were memories of his pious mother, whose voice he had listened to many a time as she sang that same hymn at evening prayer. He might have referred to his teacher or to books for arguments to meet arguments, but to that hymn he could find no defence.

He left the house with strange emotions. He seemed to himself a child again at his mother's knee, and trembled to think where he had drifted. Dr. Mayne afterwards had in him an attentive listener on matters pertaining to his profession, but on questions of religion the young man preferred listening to other teachers, and not the least influential of these was the music he might always hear at the Wilson home.

HAROLD GREY'S STUDY.

"I FIND life a terrible bore," said Harold Grey, as he and a college friend a few years older than himself strolled together one summer morning. "There seems nothing new in it; it reminds me of a labyrinth I explored last summer. There must have been a hundred paths in it pleasant enough to saunter on, but they led nowhere. I was told there was a beautiful arbor somewhere in the ground, with fountains playing—a most delightful, secluded retreat where one might rest and fancy oneself in Paradise, but I could not find it. I tried many roads, but they seemed to turn into each other, and I always arrived at the place I started from. I fancied often I heard the plash of the fountains, and I started on the direction where the sound seemed to be, but I never saw them, for the path always curved off and I was as far away as ever, and when I gave up the search in disgust I found it pretty hard to find my way out. I tell you, Reginald, my life seems just like that. There seems no good in it. It leads nowhere."

"Ah, you see you had not the clue to the labyrinth," said his companion. "If you had have possessed that, you might have found your paradise. It will be a bad thing, Harold, if you do not obtain the clue to your life."

"Yes, I suppose, then, I should die of weariness, but the question I ask myself about that is, first, is there a paradise in life, and then, if there is, where can I get the clue?"

"Very pertinent questions to ask yourself," said Reginald. "What replies do you get from the oracle?"

"At first they were misleading," said Harold, "latterly they have been as enigmatical as oracles have the reputation of giving."

"Have you asked our old college friends, the philosophers?"

"Yes, Aristotle, and Plato, and Bacon; but somehow the light they give is a sort of will-o'-the-wisp, very unsatisfactory in its results."

"You know what I did three years ago, Harold," said Reginald, "for, as you remember, I wrote to tell you of it, and you replied you were sorry I had fallen into a delusion. But since I became a Christian my experience has not been so unsatisfactory as yours appears to have been. Excuse me if, in spite of your injunction not to talk cant, I suggest that having tried other guides unsuccessfully you should follow mine."

"I do not like the road, nor the people who travel on it, and I do not see that the goal is exactly the kind I aspire to," said Harold. "To be dressed in a white robe and to be always playing on a harp and singing praises to God is not my idea of happiness."

"No, I am aware of that. I do not promise that you will find what you are seeking for. But I do promise that you will find something that will satisfy you, and that is more than you have yet been able to find, according to your own account. Let me urge you to make a trial. There is a book which you may read through in one evening, written by a man with whom you must be in sympathy, for his experience was very much like yours, but he persevered until he did find satisfaction. Will you read his narrative?"

"Gladly," said Harold.

"His name was Coheleth, and he wrote the book that is included in the Bible under the title of Ecclesiastes. Read that carefully. Do not worry yourself as you read it about the difficulties over which you stumbled years ago, as to the science of the Book of Genesis, Joshua commanding the sun to stand still, and the mystery of the Trinity. But read the book alone and see what will come of it."

The young men separated, and Harold Grey entered his own room. He found a long-neglected copy of the Bible, and sitting down in his favorite seat in a windowed recess, he commenced the study of that wonderful book. His friend had shown much wisdom in advising him. "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," was a burden that was so in harmony with his own sentiments that his attention was chained from the outset. Chapter after chapter he read with deep interest until he reached the conclusion, and learned how the weary, jaded seeker after the supreme good of life found it where he had least expected. Not only the supreme good of this life did he discover, but he was able to contemplate the utter wreck of manhood, with its darkened windows and its broken bowl, and trembling hands with equanimity, because he had faith in a future beyond the grave.

That evening's study by his open window was the beginning of a new life for Harold Grey. The clue had been placed in his hands. He was learning the alphabet of faith. Step by step from that point by the teaching of the Holy Spirit he was led to Jesus, the Light of the world, and in a life of Christian usefulness he found the peace which the world cannot give nor take away.

The Obstinate Captain.

THE OBSTINATE CAPTAIN.

OUR illustration represents a scene that took place recently on the British coast when the French ship Panthieu went ashore near Penzance. The wreck was seen from the shore, and a crowd of brave men soon gathered to attempt the rescue of those on board. The sea was running so high that no boat could reach the vessel, but by means of the Marazion rocket apparatus a line was thrown across her deck. This the crew did not haul in, but made fast to the vessel. No lives were saved by it, but after a time the sea calmed, and then the Penzance lifeboat was got out; but on her nearing the ship, the crew, although in imminent peril, took no notice, the captain apparently forbidding them to leave, or even throw a line to the lifeboat. Meanwhile the vessel struck the rocks with every wave and it was seen that it must soon break up. In vain the lifeboat's crew entreated; they were warned off, and had to leave; but seeing the loss of life that must ensue, the coxswain determined to return, and this time was so far successful that five of the crew jumped off and were picked up.

The captain still remained obstinate, and at length a coast guardsman, named Gould, volunteered for the perilous duty of going out to the wreck along the rocket-line, taking with him a letter from the French Consul, urging the captain to leave. In the presence of hundreds of intensely excited spectators, Gould steadily made his way, being often under the water for several seconds, and imminently in danger of being washed off. The captain was watching him from the bridge, but, when under the bows, would lend no aid, and, the furious sea breaking over him, Gould was washed away, and it was feared he must perish. Happily, however, he regained the rope, and climbed with the aid of the line up the ship's side. Still the captain shook his head, and by gestures intimated his resolve to go down with the ship.

Gould then took his perilous way back to the shore, having risked his life for nothing. He fought his way through the seething waters which every moment threatened to engulf him, but at last, more dead than alive, he was dragged ashore by his comrades who ventured out to meet him. Then those on shore raised a shout of joy that the brave man's life was safe, even though he had failed in his purpose.

Attention was then directed, again to the ship, having for some time been diverted to Gould's heroic effort, and it was seen that the vessel was fast breaking up, the masts fell over the side, the stern, on which the captain was standing, was broken off, and it was supposed he had sunk, but presently he was seen among the wreckage, and mounted to the foreyard, the sail of which somewhat sheltered him.

The Coastguard fired two more rockets, and, one line falling close to the captain, he seized it, but even then seemed irresolute whether to save himself or perish with the ship. After a quarter of an hour, however, the love of life constrained him to fasten the rope around him, and he was dragged ashore. Within an hour nothing was to be seen of the vessel but a few floating spars. Then the captain recognized how narrow had been his escape from a watery grave, and in broken words thanked those who had tried to save him in spite of himself.

He was a type of many whom the servants of Christ are endeavoring to rescue from eternal death, but who resist all pleading until death stretches forth its hand to seize them. Unhappily, then, for many it is too late, and they perish as they have lived.

Every day some event speaks to men in trumpet tones of the uncertainty of life. Old and young pass away into eternity from our side, and we know that in any case a few years will terminate our existence here. But an eternity of happiness has been purchased for us by the death of Jesus, yet how many reject the blood-bought gift and cleave like the obstinate captain to the wrecked vessel of the world.

Singing on a Sinking Ship.—When the Teuton went down on August 30th, with more than two hundred lives, in South African waters, a small number only survived the disaster to tell the story. Among them is Mr. John Cooper, an emigrant, who in a letter to the superintendent of a Sunday-school in England, speaks most pathetically of the loss of his wife and five children. He had obeyed the call to assist at the pumps, and when he got back to where his family were standing, they gathered around him, and "my daughter Alice," he says, "commenced singing the hymn 'Abide with me,' in which we all joined, and endeavored to cheer one another. All at once the ship gave a sudden plunge, bow first, and carried us all down under water. We all went down together, my wife and children in my embrace, just as we were standing; but we were soon separated by the force of the waves, and I saw them no more. Giving myself up at last I took in as much water as I could, so as to die as quickly as possible; but I distinctly remember lifting my hands in the attitude of prayer, and saying, 'Father, Thy will be done.' I rose to the surface, and caught hold of some of the wreckage, from which I was afterward taken by a boat, and after twelve hours' sailing, I arrived at Simon's Bay alive, but all alone, deprived of those most dear to me." I can testify to the worth of religion in the hour of danger and in the face of death, and I am sure that by and by I shall join my dear wife and children, when life's voyage is over, in Heaven.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

An Interrupted Day-dream.

ROLAND SEFTON'S wife stood by the window, a half-smile playing about her lips; but her whole attention so absorbed by the spectacle beneath her that she did not see or hear Phebe until she was standing beside her, looking down also on the excited crowd.

"Phebe!" she exclaimed, "you here again? Then can you tell me, are the good people of Riversborough gone mad? or is it possible there is an election going on, of which I have heard nothing? Nothing less than an election could rouse them to such a pitch of excitement."

"Have you heard nothing of what they say?" asked Phebe.

"There is such a Babel," she answered; "of course I hear my husband's name. It would be just like him if he got himself elected member for Riversborough without telling me anything about it till it was over. He loves surprises; and I—why, I hate to be surprised."

"But he is gone!" said Phebe.

"Yes, he told me he was going to London," she went on; "but if it is no election scene, what is it, Phebe? Why are all the people gathered here in such excitement?"

"Shall I tell you plainly?" asked Phebe, looking steadily into Felicita's dark, inscrutable eyes.

"Tell me the simple truth," she replied, somewhat haughtily; "if any human being can tell it."

"Then the bank has stopped payment," answered Phebe. "Poor Mr. Acton has been found dead in bed this morning; and Mr. Sefton is gone away, nobody knows where. It is the May fair to-day, and all the people are coming in from the country. There's been a run on the bank, till they are forced to stop payment. That is what brings the crowd here."

Felicita dropped the curtain which she had been holding back with her hand, and stepped back a pace or two from the window. But her face scarcely changed; she listened calmly and collectedly, as if Phebe was speaking of some persons she hardly knew.

"My husband will come back immediately," she said. "Is not Mr. Clifford there?"

"Yes," said Phebe.

"Are you telling me all?" asked Felicita.

"No," she answered; "Mr. Clifford says he has been robbed. Securities worth nearly ten thousand pounds are missing. He must have found it out already."

"Whom does he suspect?" she asked again imperiously; "he does not dare suspect my husband?"

Phebe replied only by a mute gesture. She had never had any secret to conceal before, and she did not see that she had betrayed herself by the words she had uttered. The deep gloom on her bright young face struck Felicita for the first time.

"Do you think it was Roland?" she asked.

Again the same dumb, hopeless gesture answered the question. Phebe could not bring her lips to shape a word of accusation against him. It was agony to her to feel her idol disgraced and cast down from its high pedestal; yet she had not learned any way of concealing or misrepresenting the truth.

"You know he did it," said Felicita.

"Yes, I know it," she whispered.

For a minute or two Felicita stood, with her white hands resting on Phebe's shoulders, gazing into her mournful face with keen, questioning eyes. Then, with a rapid flush of crimson, betraying a strong and painful heart-throb, which suffused her face for an instant and left it paler than before, she pressed her lips on the girl's sunburnt forehead.

"Tell nobody else," she murmured; "keep the secret for his sake and mine."

Before Phebe could reply she turned away, and, with a steady, unfaltering step, went back to her study and locked herself in.

Felicita's study was so quiet a room, quite remote from the street, that it was almost a wonder the noise of the crowd had reached her. But this morning there had been a pleasanter tumult of excitement in her own brain, which had prevented her from falling into an absorbed reverie, such as she usually indulged in, and rendered her peculiarly susceptible to outward influences. All her senses had been awake to-day.

On her desk lay the two volumes of a new book, handsomely got up, with pages yet uncut as it had come from the publishers. A dozen times she had looked at the title-page, as if unable to convince herself of the reality, and read her own name—Felicita Riversdale Sefton. It was the first time her name as an author had been published, though for the last three years she had from time to time written anonymously for magazines. This was her own book; thought out, written, revised, and completed in her chosen solitude and secrecy. No one knew of it; possibly Roland suspected something, but he had not ventured to make any inquiries, and she had no reason to believe that he even suspected its existence. It was simply altogether her own, no other mind had any part or share in it.

There was something like rapture in her delight. The book was a good book, she was sure of it. She had not succeeded in making it as perfect as her ideal, but she had not signally failed. It did in a fair degree represent her inmost thoughts and fancies. Yet she could not feel quite sure that the two volumes were real; and the letter from the publisher, a friendly and pleasant letter enough, seemed necessary to vouch for them. She read and re-read it. The little room seemed too small and close for her. She opened the window to let in the white daylight, undisguised by the faint green tint of the glass, and she leaned out to breathe the fresh sweet air of the spring morning. Life was very pleasurable to her to-day.

There were golden gleams too upon the future. She would no longer be the unknown wife of a country banker, moving in a narrow sphere, which was altogether painful to her in its provincial philistinism. It was a sphere to which she had descended in girlish ignorance. Her uncle, Lord Riversdale, had been willing to let his portionless niece marry this prosperous young banker, who was madly in love with her, and a little gentle pressure had been brought to bear on the girl of eighteen, who had been placed by her father's death in a position of dependence. Since then a smouldering fire of ambition and of dissatisfaction with her lot had been lurking unsuspected under her cold and self-absorbed manner.

But her thoughts turned with more tenderness than usual toward her husband. She had aroused in him also a restless spirit of ambition, though in him it was for her sake, not his own. He wished to restore her if possible to the position she had sacrificed for him; and Felicita knew it. Her heart beating faster with her success was softened toward him; and tears suffused her dark eyes for an instant as she thought of his astonishment and exultation.

The children were at play in the garden below her, and their merry voices greeted her ear pleasantly. The one human being who really dwelt in her inmost heart was her boy Felix, her first-born child. Hilda was an unnecessary supplement to the page of her maternal love. But for Felix she dreamed day-dreams of extravagant aspiration; no lot on earth seemed too high or too good for him. He was a handsome boy, the very image of her father, the late Lord Riversdale, and now as she gazed down on him, her eyes slightly dewed with tears, he looked up to her window. She kissed her hand to him, and the boy waved his little cap toward her with almost passionate gesticulations of delight. Felix would be a great man some day; this book of hers was a stone in the foundation of his fame as well as of her own.

It was upon this mood of exultation, a rare mood for Felicita, that the cry and roar from the street had broken. With a half-smile at herself, the thought flashed across her mind that it was like a shout of applause and admiration; such as might greet Felix some day when he had proved himself a leader of men. But it aroused her dormant curiosity, and she had condescended to be drawn by it to the window of the drawing-room overlooking Whitefriars Road, in order to ascertain its cause.

The crowd filling the street was deeply in earnest, and the aim of those who were fighting their way through it was plainly the bank offices in the floor below her. The sole idea that occurred to her, for she was utterly ignorant of her husband's business, was that some unexpected crisis in the borough had arisen, and its people were coming to Roland Sefton as their leading townsman. When Phebe found her she was quietly studying the crowd and its various features, that she might describe a throng from memory, whenever a need should arise for it.

Felicita regained her luxurious little study, and sat down before her desk, on which the new volumes lay, with more outward calm than her face and movements had manifested before she left it. The transient glow of triumph had died away from her face, and the happy tears from her eyes. She closed the casement to shut out the bright, clear sunlight, and the merry voices of her children, before she sat down to think.

For a little while she had been burning incense to herself; but the treacherous fire was gone out, and the sweet, bewildering, intoxicating vapors were scattered to the winds. The recollection of her short-lived folly made her shiver as if a cold breath had passed over her.

Not for a moment did she doubt Roland's guilt. There was such a certainty of it lying behind Phebe's sorrowful eyes as she whispered "I know it," that Felicita had not cared to ask how she knew it. She did not trouble herself with details. The one fact was there: her husband had absconded. A dreamy panorama of their past life flitted across her brain—his passionate love for her, which had never cooled, though it had failed to meet with a response from her; his insatiable desire to make her life more full of pomp and luxury and display, than that of her cousins at Riversdale; his constant thraldom to her, which had ministered only to her pride and coldness. His queen he had called her. It was all over now. His extraordinary absence was against any hope that he could clear himself. Her husband had brought fatal and indelible disgrace upon his name, the name he had given to her, and their children.

Her name! This morning, and for many days to come, it would be advertised as the author of the new book, which was to have been one of her stepping-stones to fame. She had grasped at fame, and her hand had closed upon infamy. There was no fear now that she would remain among the crowd of the unknown. As the wife of a fraudulent banker she would be only too well and too widely talked of.

Why had she let her own full name be published? She had yielded, though with some reluctance, to the business-like policy of her publisher, who had sought to catch the public eye by it; for her father, Lord Riversdale was hardly yet forgotten as an author. A vague sentiment of loyalty to her husband had caused her to add her married name. She hated to see the two blazoned together on the title-page.

Sick at heart, she sat for hours, brooding over what would happen if Roland was arrested. The assizes held twice a year at Riversborough had been to her, as to many people of her position, an occasion of pleasurable excitement. The judges' lodgings were in the next house to the Old Bank, and for the few days the judges were Roland Sefton's neighbors there had been a friendly interchange of civilities. An assize ball was still held, though it was falling into some neglect and disrepute. Whenever any cause of special local interest took place she had commanded the best seat in the court, and had obsequious attention paid to her. She had learned well the aspect of the place, and the mode of procedure. But hitherto her recollections of a court of justice were all agreeable; and her impressions those of a superior being looking down from above on the miseries and crimes of another race.

How different was the vision that branded itself on her brain this morning! She saw her husband standing at the dock instead of some coarse, ignorant, brutish criminal; the stern gravity of the judge; the flippant curiosity of the barristers not connected with the case; and the cruel eagerness of his fellow-townsmen to get good places to hear and see him. It would make a holiday for all who could get within the walls.

She could have written almost word for word the report of the trial as it would appear in the two papers published in Riversborough. She could foretell how lavish would be the use of the words "felon" and "convict;" and she would be that felon and convict's wife.

Oh, this intolerable burden of disgrace! To be borne through the long, long years of life; and not by herself alone, but by her children. They had come into a miserable heritage. What became of the families of notorious criminals? She could believe that the poor did not suffer from so cruel a notoriety, being quickly lost in the oblivious waters of poverty and distress, amid refuges and workhouses. But what would become of her? She must go away into endless exile, with her two little children, and live where there was no chance of being recognized. This was what her husband's sin had done for her.

"God help me! God deliver me!" she moaned with white lips. But she did not pray for him. In the first moments of anguish the spirit flies to that which lies at the very core. While Roland's mother and Phebe were weeping together and praying for him, Felicita was crying for help and deliverance for herself.

THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 13. Lev. 23: 33-44. Golden Text Ps. 10, 3: 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE feast of tabernacles, unlike the Passover and the feast of Pentecost, has never yet realized its antitype. "Christ our Passover" (1 Cor. 5: 7) is known to every believer; "Christ the firstfruits" (1 Cor. 15: 23), the first instalment of the resurrection, the pledge of those "firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb" which have attained unto the resurrection of the dead (Rev. 14: 4; Phil. 3: 11; Luke 20: 35), is declared unto us, and we know Him as such in the present dispensation. But the feast of tabernacles, called also "the feast of ingathering" (Ex. 23: 16; 34: 22) points on to millennial glory, when that prophecy shall be realized, "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away" (Rev. 21: 3, 4).

The Lord ordained that the Passover should be kept in the first month, because deliverance from the condemnation and power of sin is the beginning of all things to the true Israelite; the Pentecost was dependent on the growth of the fruits of the earth. Christ is only the Firstfruits in our souls when the winter death of our self life has yielded to the resurrection power of a new life, His life within us; then spring succeeds winter, life comes out of death, and Christ can also present us as firstfruits "faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy" (Jude 24). But the feast of tabernacles was to be kept in the seventh month. Seven is the perfect number, the fulness of the time must elapse, the fruits of the earth must have reached perfection, and therefore we gather that the millennium, the world's expected Sabbath, the ingathering of the great harvest, the outcome of the foregoing six thousand years, is the antitype of the feast of tabernacles, preceded by the beginning of the Jewish civil year, and indicates a new era in our experience.

In the book of Zechariah, immediately following upon the terrible description of the final struggle at Jerusalem, "the battle of that great day of God Almighty" (Rev. 16: 12) the prophet goes on to say that "every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles," and he declares that those who come not up shall have no rain. The Lord will have gathered in His harvest, and He would lead all His people to rejoice with Him: and it shall be holy joy, nothing shall then be secular. It is now our privilege that whether we eat or drink or whatsoever we do, to do all to the glory of God (1 Cor. 10: 31); but then this privilege will become a common practice. "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses [the smallest things] HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD: and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah [the commonest things] shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts, and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them and settle therein" (Zec. 14: 16-21).

It is most significantly added, "And in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts." Canaan signifies "a merchant or a trader," the Lord Jesus drove out the buyers and the sellers from the temple, and said, "Make not My Father's house an house of merchandize" (John 2: 16). Then men will no more serve God for what they can get; so much service for so much joy or peace, or power; the Canaanite will no more enter into the house of the Lord, and they shall offer unto the Lord a pure offering. In our day the spirt of Canaan is sadly prevalent, the cry of many a praying heart is in the spirit of barter, forgetting that God is a King who can give but cannot sell.

Before the feast of tabernacles could be celebrated, the day of atonement must take place. On the first day of the month there was to be a solemn blowing of trumpets and the day was to be set apart as a holy day; no work was to be done (Lev. 23: 24). On the tenth day was the day of atonement which we considered in last Sunday's lesson. On this day again, no work was to be done; it was a fast day for the confession and purification of sin. Five days later, i.e., on the fifteenth day, "shall be the feast of tabernacles for seven days unto the Lord. On the first day shall be an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein." No work may precede atonement, God's work must stand alone, no man can have a part therein. But when we stand before Him as those whose sins have been laid on Jesus, borne away by Him who was the divine scapegoat, we as "workers together with Him" may serve our God, only servile work is forbidden. "Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty" (Gal. 5: 13), the law under which we are called to be is "the perfect law of liberty" (James 1: 25); it is the freedom of a willing service, a privilege, not an obligation, not of constraint.

There is a wonderful rest about this feast of tabernacles; the fruit of the land was all gathered in, there was no pressure of needful work in the field to distract the worshippers, the sin of the people was borne away by the scapegoat, consciences were set at rest, and the people could offer unto the Lord free and unhindered worship. But they must be pilgrims and strangers upon earth. They were commanded to take boughs of the trees, of goodly trees, palm trees, thick trees, and willows of the brook," and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days. . . . Ye shall dwell in booths seven days: all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths; that your generation may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths when I brought them out of the land of Egypt." Blessed be God "here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. 13: 14), and the nearer we get to Him the more we prize simplicity in our lives, and the privilege of sitting loose to the slavery of worldly conformity; that which the world expects of us, says of us, thinks of us, becomes more and more unimportant, the booth life, the tent life, transient, easily changed, with few requirements, becomes more and more the type of our own.

There was a singularity about the offerings made to God during the days of this feast. The principal was the burnt offering which was to diminish daily by one young bullock until the seventh day, when seven bullocks were to be offered. As seven is the perfect number, it would seem to signify that nothing less that our All is worthy of this feast of the Lord. Anything above our All, i.e., anything which may have been left out when we gave our All, but nothing under. Thirteen bullocks were to be offered the first day, twelve the second, and so forth. But fourteen lambs each day, i.e., twice seven, the perfected number repeated. Each of these offerings must be accompanied with its meat offering, and drink offering, the former always mingled with oil, and the strong wine of the latter (Num. 28: 7), to be poured unto the Lord." The sin offering in the feast of tabernacles was always one kid of goats with his meat offering and his drink offering. All this is preciously significant (Num. 29: 12-34). When all is clear between our souls and God, although we cannot say we have no sin, and we cannot be independent of Christ as the sin-offering, yet our intercourse with Him is not so much to obtain pardon as to remain in the attitude of continually offering up ourselves to Him, or rather remaining offered up, living sacrifices, always upon the altar; free from sin, free from self, free from the world, to serve Him.

The children of Israel were commanded to appear three times in the year before God, and this command is twice spoken (Ex. 23: 17; 34: 23), "Thou shalt keep the feast of unleavened bread. . . . And the feast of harvest; the first fruits of thy labors, which thou hast sown in the field: and the feast of ingathering, which is in the end of the year (i.e., agricultural year) when thou hast gathered in thy labors out of the field" (ver. 15, 16). The soul, which has been preserved from the destroying angel by the blood of the Passover Lamb, who has ventured to place the blood outside the door where friend and foe, man, angel, and devil could see it, which has eaten the flesh of the Lamb, and imbibed His nature—such a soul alone is in a position to appear a second time before God; not now to be saved, for he is that already, not to plead for mercy, for he stands ever before the mercy seat in the very presence of his God; no, he comes to offer, to present the firstfruits, the first and best of what he has to give, in token that all belongs to Him to whom he offers.

And in measure as we live in the spirit of these two first feasts will the feast of tabernacles become to us a blessed reality. Just as they who had houses yet dwelt in booths and they who were accepted still offered sacrifice, so will our hearts become unlimited in devotion, and the words of our golden text will be a ceaseless song, Bless the Lord, O, my soul, and forget not all His benefits. Dwelling in God, in His thoughts, in the atmosphere where He dwells, in His ever-realized presence, will become our life more and more, and He dwelling in us, finding nothing in us to grieve or repulse Him. And this little foretaste in time will prepare us for that greater feast of tabernacles in the heavenly Jerusalem. Some among us may perhaps live through the time of trouble which seems to be approaching us with rapid steps, and may yet see the predicted celebration of the feast of tabernacles with which will be yearly held at Jerusalem in the coming millennium. In any case, Lord teach us more the true spirit of pilgrims and strangers, and lead us to live here as knowing that earth is not our rest.

A Noble Greek Christian was One of a Band of men who during the disturbances in the Turkish provinces fell into the hands of the Mohammedans. As they were one by one led out to execution, the question was put to each, "Ghiaour (infidel), wilt thou save thy soul by following God and the prophet?" The answer from each was, "No, Effendim;" and the executioner did his work. But there was one young man so noble and so handsome that they paused, then reluctantly put the question; and he answered, "No." "Go back, Ghiaour," they said, "and think over your refusal for an hour." He did so; and, when again brought forth, he again gave the same answer. Still loth to take so fine a life they offered him a third and last chance for repentance: "What now, young Ghiaour," they said, when he was again brought before them; "wilt thou accept the terms, and live?" "By God's help never," he replied; and met a martyr's death.

The New Irish Land Court is Already Overwhelmed with business. In spite of the prohibition the League issued against applications being made to the court, thirty thousand applications have been received for arbitration. From County Mayo alone, where the League was most powerful, over a thousand applications have come. It is evident therefore that the suppression of the League has given courage to many farmers who were supposed to be its enthusiastic supporters to set it at defiance. This fact shows that the government in abandoning Ireland for so long a time to the rule of the League, were extremely culpable and that had they interfered earlier for the protection of the people the country might have been spared many of the results of the tyranny of the League.

Father Sheehy, and Mr. Healy, Mr. Parnell's secretary, sailed on Saturday for this country, where they propose lecturing, and it may be supposed making an appeal for funds. It would be well if they brought with them a statement of the purposes to which the large sums already contributed have been applied. It will also be well that our citizens consider, before contributing, how far their money is likely to benefit the Irish people. The League orders that no rent shall be paid, that is recommends people to break their bargains, which is dishonest. Its policy is separation from England, which is unreasonable, because that country could not afford to have a hostile government at its own doors. The objects and mode of operation are alike unworthy of support.' Irish orators may gloss over both, but the plain facts are that the League is working for a dishonest purpose, which it endeavors to achieve by cowardly assassination, by incendiarism, by intimidation, and by gross cruelty to animals. American citizens cannot in honor indorse such an organization.

The Results of the German Elections have not yet been fully reported, but enough is known to make it evident that Prince Bismarck has suffered a decisive defeat. In Germany the politicians are not divided, as in other countries, into two great parties, but there are some six or seven minor factions, no one of which has a majority in the Reichstag. Prince Bismarck has hitherto contrived with some adroitness to combine these parties so as to secure the realization of his projects. But latterly the supporters of the Chancellor, who have been called the Conservatives, have been opposed by other parties, who have formed an anti-Bismarck alliance and have been called Progressists. In all parts of Germany, and especially in Berlin, the Conservatives have been defeated. Bismarck's son was defeated by a majority of over 5000. The Jew baiting chaplain, Herr Stocker, is also deprived of his seat. The result is regarded as a triumph for popular government, as the only bond of sympathy between the various factions that make up the Progressist party is opposition to the dictatorship of the Chancellor.

Anxiety as to the Proceedings of the French Legislature, which met on Friday for the first time since the elections, is felt throughout Europe. The Chambers are now really Republican ; Legitimists, Orleanists, and Bonapartists being an insignificant minority. The campaign in Africa will be the question on which the test will come. Should the deputies express approval of the seizure of Tunis and the warlike policy of the government a general feeling of uneasiness will be produced. It will be evident in that case that the policy of the Republic will be a disturbing element in European affairs, and the meeting of the Emperors of Russia, Germany, Austria and Italy will acquire a significance of an ominous character.

Three British Statesmen have Given During the past week distinct warnings to Ireland that the present repressive policy will be continued so long as there is occasion for it. Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Chamberlain, and Sir William Harcourt, have all spoken publicly in the same tenor. Sir William Harcourt, speaking at Glasgow on October 26th, said that both the late and the present governments were reluctant to proceed at an early stage against the Land League because it was not desirable to suppress what pretended to be a constitutional agitation, especially if connected with a real grievance, but when such an agitation avowed illegal ends no government would fail to be supported in any and all measures it might take for the safety of society. The task, he said, was difficult and painful, but the government, having set its hands to the plough, they might rely upon its not turning back.

The Boer Legislature has Ratified the Convention with Great Britain. The announcement causes general relief, for it would have been a matter for regret if the war had been renewed. That there was danger of this result was evident from the fact that the withdrawal of the British troops was suspended and the forces remaining in the country were being concentrated for effective operation. The motion recording its acceptance of the Convention declared, that the Volksraad, relied upon the promise of the British to modify the terms of the settlement if in its working it should be found impracticable, and on that condition alone agreed to ratify the Convention. It is understood that the Convention has been signed more with a view to give it a trial than in reliance upon it as a finality.

The Visit of the King and Queen of Italy to the Austrian capital has been celebrated with the utmost magnificence. The streets and public buildings were decorated, grand banquets given, and reviews of troops held in honor of the regal visitors. It is long since so much enthusiasm has been witnessed in Vienna, and it is the more remarkable because so few years have passed since the two nations were at war.

The Great Landslide in Switzerland. — A touching account is given in the Journal of Geneva of some religious services in connection with the recent destruction of the village of Elm, in Switzerland, which was overwhelmed by the falling rocks from the mountain overhead, and over two hundred perished. Seated on a bank were the poor widows and other bereaved women. The village pastor was succeeded by another from a distance, in the course of whose touching though brief address " the thunders of the mountain broke out afresh, and were resounded from afar, clouds of dust rising along the passage of the tumbling rocks to the plain, and ascending toward heaven like the smoke of altars from above a gigantic tomb."

Infidelity in Germany.—A Traveller to Leipzig says, that the present religious state of that city, is very low, although the city is so great in population, so cultured, and in all respects so important. " There are only seven churches in the place, and all of these are but poorly attended. Allowing even for their being all filled, there is evidently not provision for more than a very few thousands of a church-going population. I think I am correct in stating that there is no such thing as a Sunday-school in connection with any of the city churches. The great mass of the people are apparently sunk in secularism, are indifferent to religious matters, and look upon a man who is pious as a strange and amusing phenomenon. There are, indeed, private efforts in the direction of Christian work, but such workers are a very small band." This shows how in Protestant Germany, as well as Popish countries, the way is being prepared for the Latter-Day infidel apostacy, when the nations will worship an anti-Christian monarch, and receive his mark in their foreheads and hands, as foretold in Rev. 13.

A Millionaire Posing as a Beggar.—An English journal relates the following amusing incident of Baron James de Rothschild, the famous banker. It appears that one day at dinner he perceived that the artist Delacroix, who was his guest, was looking at him in a peculiarly searching manner. The Baron asked the reason, and Delacroix responded that, having for some time been vainly searching for a head such as he would like to copy for a prominent beggar in his new picture, he was suddenly struck with the idea that his host would make a splendid model. The Baron, who was fond of art, consented to sit, and next morning appeared in the studio of the painter, who dressed him in rags, placed a tall staff in his hand, and put him into a mendicant's posture. In this attitude he was discovered by a young pupil of the painter's, who congratulated his master at having at last found exactly what he wanted. Not for a moment doubting that the model had just been begging at the porch of some church, the young man slipped a twenty-franc piece into the model's hand. Rothschild kept the money, thanking the giver by a look, and the young man went his way. He was, as the banker soon found out from Delacroix, without fortune, and obliged to give lessons in order to eke out his living. Some time later the youth received a letter saying that the twenty francs, which he, prompted by a generous impulse, had given to a man in appearance a beggar, was lying at his disposal with interest in Rothschild's office. The young painter called there and received the amount of 10,000 francs ($2000).

Mr. Francis Murphy's Campaign in the Cause of Gospel Temperance in Great Britain was formally inaugurated on October 9th, in Bolton. His first audience numbered nearly five thousand persons, completely filling the Temperance Hall, and there were hundreds who were quite unable to gain admission. Large anticipations of blessing are cherished by many of the foremost members of the various Churches, who have long been praying that great good might accompany Mr. Murphy's earnest efforts. As a result of the orator's first address nearly one thousand persons signed the pledge, and donned the Blue Ribbon. The work is now in full operation, and the tide of beneficent influence is rapidly rising.

Cetewayo's Concertina has been Forwarded to him by the Blue Ribbon army in England. As mentioned in our issue of July 21st, Mr. Noble undertook that the captive Zulu King's desire for a concertina should be gratified. At a recent meeting of the army in London the instrument was placed in charge of Dr. Hole, of Capetown, who was returning to South Africa, and who promised to present it to his sable majesty.

A Buddhist Priest, in Ceylon, Came in Contact with a missionary, and in their interviews they frequently spoke of Christianity. The Buddhist listened, chiefly that he might find arguments to refute the religion thus obtruded on his notice. He made no objection, however, to reading the Epistle to the Romans in Singhalese. The first chapter astonished him as holding up to his view sins common among his countrymen, and even, alas ! among the Buddhist priests. " But the words in the second chapter, about that law which is written in the heart, came home to the Buddhist presently. ' Do you ever,' inquired his friend, ' feel anything make you unhappy when you have done what you know to be wrong ?' ' Yes, I do ; it makes me very miserable.' ' Do you find that you have any power over this which troubles you —that you can drive it away ?' ' No ; I have tried, but I can't drive it away.' The Buddhist priest then went away in deep thought, and in a few days came back to the missionary, saying, ' Is there any peace to the conscience, and pardon of sin, in the Christian religion ? I have been trying and trying according to Buddhism, but there is no pardon and no peace.' Then God's messenger delivered God's message. ' Emmanuel—God with us,' was the substance of that message. The glad tidings reached the listener's soul : ' From this day,' said he, ' I am a Christian.' "

DR. A. W. THOROLD. the Bishop of Rochester, Eng., who recently visited America.

Bishop of Rochester, England.

Speech at the Temperance Breakfast in New York—Birth and Family—Work in a Destitute Parish—An Aristocratic Sphere—The Episcopate—Temperance Work—An Instance of Episcopal Courage—Dr. Thorold on Divine Providence.

THE earnest yet humorous address delivered by Dr. Thorold in New York on Tuesday, October 11th, at the breakfast given by the Executive Committee of the Church Temperance Society in welcome of Mr. R. Graham, the eminent worker in the cause of temperance, has won for the Bishop the cordial good-will of American citizens. There was a prevalent impression that bishops, and especially English bishops, are a very unapproachable sort of people. But Dr. Thorold's geniality and humor have done something toward removing that impression, and we have realized that a bishop, without losing any of the dignity that befits his office, may yet be very friendly and sociable in disposition.

In the course of the Bishop of Rochester's remarks on that occasion he said: "This is the fifth time I have visited America, and I have always stumbled on an anniversary. The last time I was here—four years ago, at Boston—it was the anniversary of Bunker Hill. I listened to one of your great orators, Mr. Wendell Phillips. He seemed to have Bunker Hill on the brain. I then had something in my mind. As I could not say it then, I will now. When your country is as old as mine it will have more anniversaries and will be able to take less notice of them.

"To-day the anniversary is that of the Yorktown surrender. My grandfather was for many years a member of the House of Commons. I have the pleasure of saying that he was one of the seven men in the House who voted against the American war. I do not claim to be a sensible man myself, but I do claim to be the grandson of a sensible man.

"The other day I stood in the most affecting spot I have ever seen in your country—Independence Hall in Philadelphia. It seemed to be the cradle of a great nation. Though I can never wish I was anything but an Englishman, I can understand from my deepest soul the feeling which inspires you to the love of your glorious liberty. We are met here to-day in order to do something for the moral liberty of the nation.

"I see two watches before me, one American, the other English. I hope you will not be offended if I observe that my watch is five hours ahead of your watch. In the matter of time, at least, we are ahead of America; and we are ahead of America in having started our society before you did yours.

"Abstainers and non-abstainers should work together on a perfectly equal basis. I am an abstainer. I desire neither pity nor praise. The first thing to do is to secure the millions. In Rochester the society has four missionaries, who visit the police courts and the jails. You must get at the clergy; trust Graham for that. You must get at the mothers. It seems that to-day are the children. I never saw the children so loved, so much at the front, and so triumphantly victorious as they are in America. Therefore it is necessary to get at the mothers."

Since the delivery of the address from which the above remarks are taken, there has been a desire manifested to know more of the English prelate who has shown so marked an appreciation of America as to visit us five times, and who is not afraid or ashamed to place his name on record as a firm and vigorous friend of the temperance cause. The following details of his career will therefore be read with interest.

Anthony Wilson Thorold was born in June, 1825. He is the son of a Lincolnshire clergyman, the late Rev. Edward Thorold, rector of Hougham-cum-Marston, and cousin to Sir John Thorold, Bart., of Syston. The Thorolds are a very ancient English, or rather Danish family, who were notable before the Norman Conquest.

Dr. Thorold was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, and took his M.A. degree in the year 1850. In due time he entered Holy Orders; and having for some years devoted himself to the work of the ministry in connection with the Established Church, filling various minor posts, in the year 1857 he was appointed by the Queen rector of St. Giles' in the Fields, where, for ten years, he faithfully and successfully labored.

The deplorable amount of sin, misery, destitution, and squalid wretchedness which is invariably to be found in large cities, and which is especially prevalent in the London parish known as St. Giles's, impresses those who have witnessed it with the enormous weight of responsibility with which the rector of such a parish must find himself surrounded. No sooner, however, had Dr. Thorold been instituted to the living, than he entered with heart and soul upon the discharge of the onerous duties which lay before him. He secured the valuable assistance and co-operation of most earnest and hard-working curates, and with them labored among the poor and afflicted for their spiritual and temporal welfare. When he was led to resign, in consequence of ill-health, he carried with him the hearty sympathy of his parishioners, while the schools, parochial charities, and the various organizations throughout the parish were in a state of the highest possible efficiency.

After a short interval of rest, in 1867 Mr. Thorold became incumbent of Curzon Chapel, in the west end of London. As will readily be imagined, the duties in this new sphere, although highly important, were nevertheless far less onerous than those associated with the parish of St. Giles's, but among the aristocratic and wealthy citizens Dr. Thorold's ministry proved highly successful, as it had done among the poor denizens of the courts and wretched tenements of St. Giles's, and was regularly attended by a large and influential congregation.

As a preacher he undoubtedly excelled. His style was thoughtful and instructive to a remarkable degree, though its chief features were perfect ease and artlessness of manner, without the faintest shade of affectation—so that, in estimating the success which attended his labors, and the influence which he exerted, it is necessary to bear in mind the effect of his zeal, close study, and an intense appreciation of the reality of those great truths which he was commissioned to proclaim in Christ's name.

In the year 1869 Mr. Thorold was appointed by the Queen to the vicarage of St. Pancras, London, a sphere of vast Christian usefulness which had for many years been ably filled by Canon Champneys. Here Dr. Thorold labored with great earnestness to provide additional spiritual provision for the careless and indifferent, while the success of his week evening "mission services" will long be remembered and gratefully appreciated even by many who resided beyond the parish.

In the year 1877 Dr. Thorold was appointed Bishop of Rochester, in succession to the Right Rev. Dr. Claughton, who was translated to the new Bishopric of St. Albans. At that time Dr. Thorold had attained a wide reputation by the indefatigable zeal and energy he had displayed in three London parishes, the parishioners of which were widely separated from each other in social position and pecuniary resources. He had labored among the poorest of the poor; among the affluent, and among the middle class, and in each sphere he had done effective work in the cause of Christ. In addition to the usual work of a vicar, he had filled the office of Rural Dean, as also the position of Examining Chaplain to His Grace the Archbishop of York. He was likewise a Canon of York Minster.

Hitherto, however, the new Bishop had not been very extensively known as an author; but among his published works may be mentioned "The Presence of Christ," written during a time of ill-health, a few essays on "Married Life," "Sketches of a Visit to Moscow," and also an admirably written manual on "The Loss of Friends."

The appointment of Dr. Thorold to the see of Rochester was received with general acceptance on all hands. Although, strictly speaking, no party man, or the champion of any parti[cular] school of theology, his views, nevertheless, [have] been clearly defined in the course of his ord[inary] pulpit ministrations. Generally speaking he [is] regarded as belonging to the "Low Church" "Evangelical" party. Hence it was confid[ently] anticipated that from him the vagaries of Trac[tar]ianism would meet with firm and uncompromi[sing] opposition.

The ancient diocese of Rochester, of which Thorold is the ninety-eighth bishop, is comp[osed] of three fragments of unequal size, taken [from] London, Winchester, and Rochester.

The gravity of the case, and the urgent will be seen from the following statistics. A p[opu]lation of 1,500,000 souls is ecclesiastically div[ided] into no more than 300 parishes, with only [the] clergymen. Throughout the diocese there are [no] less than 41 country parishes with under 600 in[hab]itants, the average population of each parish b[eing] about 5000, while each clergyman has an ave[rage] charge of over 2000 souls. In 1877 there was [a] parish of 33,000 inhabitants, one of 30,000, tw[o] 25,000, three of 20,000, eight of 15,000, seven[teen] of 10,000, forty-four of 7000, and thirty-two of 5[000].

On the subject of lay help the Bishop holds [very] decided views; and in an important pastoral l[etter] which he issued, he states: "Lay help in a dio[cese] such as ours cannot too soon be considered [and] organized on a definite plan. Organization, if [not] too complex and rigid, just doubles wor[k's] power. It is certain that not a few laymen pos[sess] in a remarkable degree gifts of facile and [effi]cient teaching, which should be of vast help to [the] Church; it is still more certain that if we are [to] throw the Gospel net in any adequate way over [the] masses of our urban population, other hands [be]sides clergymen's, must cast it into the sea, [and] then bring it to land. It is now far too late in [the] day to discuss the propriety of lay agency. [The] exigencies of the Church's duty and the good se[nse] of Christians settled that long ago."

TEMPERANCE WORK.

The Bishop is an earnest advocate of the temp[er]ance cause. His work in St. Giles's parish [con]vinced him that intoxicating liquor is the chief [and] most prolific cause of pauperism and the miser[y of] the poor. He set himself to combat the tra[ffic], but was met at the outset by the conscientious [ob]jection that in moderately using wines himself, [he] was actually encouraging the traffic he denoun[ced], and was also setting an example opposed to [his] teaching. Without a moment's hesitation he [at once] continued his use of wine, and was able in urg[ing] his poor parishioners to abstain, to say, I also [am] a total abstainer.

On the occasion of the opening of "The Mag[pie] Coffee Tavern," London Street, Greenwich, [the] lordship pointed out the terrible evils of intemp[er]ance, remarking that he is himself a total ab[s]tainer, and was able to do much more work w[ith]out intoxicating stimulants of any kind. Refer[ring] to the subject of "Coffee Taverns," he said it w[as] necessary for the working-man to have some p[lace] where he could go for the purpose of enjoy[ing] social conversation on the various topics of the [day] with his fellow-man. "To suppose that work[ing] men generally sought the society of the pub[lic] house simply for the sake of the drink was a g[reat] mistake. On the contrary, they were only too g[lad] to go for the sake of the talk, and only in pro[por]tion as such places increased where the work[ing] classes could enjoy the advantages of rational [re]creation, coupled with innocuous beverages, co[uld] they hope to crush out the demon of intemperan[ce]; for it could not be denied that the society of [the] club was as necessary for the working-man as [for] the gentleman." As an instance of Dr. Thorold

the way he dealt with a parish in his diocese [may] be quoted. The vicar of the parish died, and [it] was necessary for the Bishop to appoint a s[uc]cessor. The late vicar was an extreme ritual[ist], and the services could scarcely be distinguish[ed] from those of the Church of Rome. The follow[ing] Sunday Dr. Thorold himself preached in [the] church, and stated that he had appointed the R[ev.] E. F. Alexander, who was formerly one of his [cu] rates at St. Pancras, to succeed the late Rev. P. C. Adams in the vicarage.

The Bishop said: "It cannot be desirable that e parishioners of St. Paul's should be kept in spense about a matter which must cause them en anxiety, and therefore I have felt it right at e first opportunity to come here myself and tell u my mind. Possibly it will not greatly surprise u to hear, though I fear it will disturb some of u, that whatever is illegal in the ritual of this urch will have to be discontinued, though, in its gnity and heartiness, and its devoutness and its evating service of song, I trust it may continue stirring and as impressive as ever. Bound by my nsecration vows to use such authority as I have God's Word, and as is committed to me by the dinances of the realm, I cannot hesitate as to my ty in personally interposing, when suitable oc- sion offers, distinctly and emphatically to pre- nt a continued violation of the law."

The London Morning Post said that "much nsternation was produced by the announcement the Bishop, and some of the female members of e congregation gave audible vent to their feel- gs of grief. At the conclusion of the sermon, d as the Bishop walked to the vicarage to dis- be, some Ritualists in the congregation indicated eir dissatisfaction at the threatened change in a anner that could not be mistaken."

AS AN AUTHOR,

e Bishop of Rochester is probably best known by s work on "The Presence of Christ," written dur- g a period of sickness, and full of the hallowing fluence that sickness often brings. The follow- g passage from its pages will indicate the prac- cal character of Dr. Thorold's teaching. On ie subject of Divine Providence, Dr. Thorold ays: "The way of God's providence cannot be nown by outward marks or evidences; if it tarry e must wait for it, though sooner or later it will e made manifest to the obedient and childlike eart. At some times, and under some circum- ances, indeed, God's will seems to flash upon s; and we have nothing to do but to follow it. ut our difficulty is not at all where God works ndependently of us; it is where He works with s and we with Him; where events are apparently s much our own bringing about as His, and where n the use of means, at the best imperfect and un- eliable, we seem sometimes to take all pains only o go wrong. What rules are there in such a case, eyond diligence, and patience, and obedience, and rayer? Surely none.

"Diligence in consulting friends and in procur- ng information, and in weighing our case on all ides. Patience, for half our mistakes in life come rom being in a hurry, and we are just as likely o go wrong if we rush on in advance of God's rovidence, as if we lag idly behind it. Obedi- nce, for to be willing to do God's will is the real rux of the matter. Too often we consult Him, going with the multitude of our idols, and then ve are taken captive in the toils of our own heart, nd we deliberately pray ourselves into our mistake. Then prayer, honest, humble, simple, persevering rayer; and we can do no more. But God knows his as well as we do; and He who hath promised visdom to them that ask it until the time comes will give peace, and when the time comes will give lirection. Anything is more possible than that God should not guide the meek in judgment. Nothing is more sure than that when we have done our best He will acknowledge and bless it. His promise is, 'I will guide thee with mine eye' (Ps. 32 : 8). The mere glance of the eye or the expres- sion of a feature in the face of one we love and un- derstand is quite sufficient to indicate his wish and to express his mind; so will it ever be between God and His people, if Divine Providence guides all who wish to be guided; yet it must not be held responsible for the mistakes of those who love their own way."

LITTLE LIZZIE'S MISSION.

A Temperance Story.

"If they wouldn't let him have it;" said Mrs. Leslie, weeping; "oh, if they wouldn't sell him liquor, there'd be no trouble. He's one of the best men when he doesn't drink. He never brings liquor into the house; and he tries hard, I know, to keep sober, but he cannot pass Jenks's tavern." Mrs. Leslie was talking with a sympathizing neighbor, who responded by saying, "It's a downright shame!"

While this conversation was going on a little girl, not over ten years old, sat listening attentively. After a while she went quietly from the room, and took her way, unobserved by her mother, down the road. There was a purpose in her mind; she had started on a mission. "Oh, if they wouldn't sell him liquor!" Those earnest words of her mother had filled her thoughts. If Mr. Jenks wouldn't sell her father drink, there would be no more trouble. How simple the remedy! She would go to Mr. Jenks, and ask him not to let her father have any more liquor, and all would be well again.

The tavern kept by Jenks—the laziest man in Milanville—stood nearly a quarter of a mile from the tenement occupied by the Leslies. Toward this point, under the hot sun, Lizzie made her way, her mind so filled with its purpose that she was unconscious of heat or fatigue. Not long before, a traveller alighted at the door. After giving directions to have his horse fed, he entered the bar-room, and walked to where Jenks stood behind the bar.

"Have something to drink?" inquired the landlord. "I'll take a glass of water, if you please." Jenks could not hide the indifference at once felt toward the stranger. Very deliberately he set a pitcher and a glass upon the counter, and then turned partly away. The stranger poured out a full tumbler of water, and drank it off with an air of satisfaction. "Good water, that of yours, landlord," said he, as he laid the price of a glass of beer by the side of the emptied tumbler. "Is it?" said Jenks, somewhat uncourteously. "I call it good water, don't you?" "Never drink water by itself." As Jenks said this, he winked to one of his customers, who was lounging on the bar. "In fact it's so long since I drank any water, that I forget how it tastes. Don't you, Leslie?"

The man to whom this was addressed was not so far lost to shame as Jenks. He blushed and looked confused as he replied:

"It might be better for some of us if we had not lost our relish for pure water."

"A true word spoken, my friend!" said the stranger, turning to the man, whose swollen visage and patched, threadbare garments too plainly told the story of his life. "Water, pure water, bright water! is my motto. Its attendants are health, thrift, and happiness. It takes not away the children's bread, nor the toiling wife's garments."

At this moment a child stepped into the bar-room. She glanced neither to the right nor left, but walked up to the landlord, lifted to him her sweet young face, and said, in tones that thrilled every heart but his, "Please, Mr. Jenks, don't sell papa any more liquor!"

"Off home with you this instant!" exclaimed Jenks. As he spoke he advanced toward the child with his uplifted hand in a threatening attitude. "Please don't, Mr. Jenks," persisted the child, not moving nor taking her eyes from the landlord's countenance. "Mother says he's kind and good to us all when he does not drink."

"Off, I say!" shouted Jenks, now maddened beyond self-control, and his hand was about to descend upon the little one, when the stranger caught her in his hands, exclaiming as he did so, with deep emotion, "God bless the child! No, no, precious one!" he added, "don't fear him. Plead for your father, plead for your home. Your petition must prevail! He cannot say nay to the little ones, whose angels do always behold the face of their Father in heaven. God bless the child!" added the stranger, in a choking voice. "O that the father, for whom she has come on this touching errand, were present now! If there were anything of manhood yet left in his nature, this would awaken it from palsied sleep."

"Papa! oh, papa!" now cried the child, stretching forth her hand. In the next moment she was clinging to the breast of her father, who, with his arms clasped tightly around her, stood weeping and mingling his tears with those now raining from the little one's eyes. Jenks stood subdued and bewildered, his state of mental confusion scarcely enabling him to comprehend the full import of the scene; the stranger looked on wonderingly, yet deeply affected. Quietly, and with moist eyes, the two or three drinking customers, who had been lounging on the bar, went stealthily out; and the landlord, the stranger, the father and his child were left the only inmates of the room.

"Come, Lizzie dear, this is no place for us," said Leslie, breaking the dead silence. "We'll go home." And the unhappy inebriate took his child by the hand, and led her toward the door. But the little one held back. "Wait, papa, wait," she said; "he hasn't promised yet. Oh, I wish he would promise!" "Promise her in heaven's name!" said the stranger. "Promise!" said Leslie, in a stern and solemn voice, as he turned and fixed his eyes on the landlord. "If I do promise, I keep it!" returned the landlord, in a threatening tone. "Then for heaven's sake promise," exclaimed Leslie, in a half-despairing voice; "promise, and I'm safe." "Be it so, then!" Jenks spoke with an angry emphasis. "God be thanked!" murmured the poor drunkard, "there is hope for me yet."

Hardly had the mother of Lizzie missed her child, ere she entered leading her father by the hand. "Oh, mother!" she exclaimed, with a joy-lit countenance and a voice of exultation, "Mr. Jenks has promised." "Promised what?" "That he would never sell me another glass of liquor," said her husband. A pair of thin white hands were clasped together; tearless eyes looked their thankfulness to heaven.

A year afterward a stranger came that way, and stopped at the same old tavern. As before, Jenks was behind his well-filled bar, and drinking customers came and went in numbers. Jenks did not recognize him until he called for water, and drank a full tumbler of the pure liquor with a hearty zest; then he knew him, but he feigned to be ignorant of his identity. The stranger made no reference to the scene he had witnessed there a twelvemonth before, but lingered in the bar-room most of the day, closely observing every one who came there to drink. Leslie was not among the number. "What has become of the man and the little girl that I saw here the last time I was at Milanville?" said the stranger, speaking at last to Jenks.

"Gone to Jericho, for all I care," was the landlord's rude answer, as he turned away. "Do you see that little white cottage away off there, just at the edge of the wood?" said one of the customers. "Two tall poplars stand in the front. The man you asked for lives there. And what is more, if he keeps on the way he has begun the cottage will be his own in another year." "Ah! I see; well, did Leslie, as you call him, ever try to get a drink here since the landlord promised never to let him have another drink?" "Twice to my knowledge." "And he refused him?" "Yes; he kept his promise. That saved poor Leslie. Jenks would have been glad to keep Leslie's custom—for it's worth having—and he actually handed him the bottle one day, when Leslie asked for it, but he suddenly withdrew it, and drove Leslie from the bar-room, threatening, at the same time, to horsewhip him if he ever set foot over his threshold again, and tempt him to break his promise," to which must be added the fact that Jenks had called for "a curse" upon himself if he sold Leslie any more drink, and he was superstitious lest irreparable evil should befall him if he violated his word.

"Poor drunkards!" mused the stranger, as he rode past the neat cottage of the reformed man, a couple of hours afterward. "As the case now stands, you are only saved as by fire. All law, all protection is on the side of those who are engaged in enticing you into sin and destroying you body and soul. Can it be a Christian country in which I live, and such things darken the very sun at noonday?"

EIGHT texts, and all of them the same. The strangest thing in the history of American and European journalism is that during the past few months it has been discussing the question of eternal punishment. The question of Turko-Russian contest, the question of silver currency, the question as to President Hayes's policy with the South—all submerged by the question, "Is there a hell?"

It makes but very little difference what De Witt Talmage thinks about this, for it is only a little while ago he began to breathe, and in a little while he will stop breathing. It makes but little difference what Dean Stanley, or Canon Farrar, or Mr. Frothingham thinks about this, for they have never been into the eternal world, and can give no personal experience. The Roman Catholic Church in all its synods and through all its popedoms has declared its belief in a place of future retribution, but that does not necessarily settle it for me. The Methodist, Baptist, Episcopalian, Presbyterian churches have adopted this theory in their creeds, but that does not authoritatively settle it for me.

This morning I appeal, not to human authority or human opinion, but to that one Being who only can tell me now whether there is a hell. That Being is God. I reject every opinion except that on which is written, "Thus saith the Lord." I put one "Thus saith the Lord" against all the sermons, all the disquisitions, all the books of all the ages. "Thus saith the Lord." "Thus saith the Lord."

You see, my friends, I start on the assumption that the Bible is true. If you deny it is true, some other Sabbath I will argue that matter, but not this morning. As common-sense men you know that in making any argument on any secular or religious subject, there must be some some common ground where we shall start together. It would be as silly for me to try to prove to you, who reject the truth of the Bible, that there is a place of future retribution, as it would be for me to discuss fraud and crime and their penalties with a man who denies Blackstone and the statutes of the State of New York. Our common-sense tells us that there must be some common ground where we can start.

Now, in passing, I have to ask those who reject the Bible some questions. "Is there a God?" "Yes," you say. "Is He good?" "Yes," you say. Now, I ask you, is it not reasonable that a good God should give us a revelation of some kind? Is it not reasonable to suppose that such a Being, starting our race in this world, would give them some guide, some directory, some written help? "Of course," you say, "that's so." Well, then, which is it? The Vedas, the Talmud, the writings of Confucius, the Koran of the Mohammedans, or the Bible? Which is God's revelation to man?

If you will show me a book which seems to be a more reasonable and a better revelation from God than the Bible, I am willing to accept it. I like anything new and unique. By the constitution of my nature I prefer the new to the old. If you can hand me up a book this morning that seems to be a better revelation from God than the Bible, I will take it and I will preach from it. Is there a man in this house who denies everything?

IT IS EASY TO DENY.

You tell me that the Turko-Russian war is nearly over. I may deny there has ever been such a war. Moreover, I may deny, for the sake of argument a moment, that there are any such places as Russia and Turkey.

"But," say you, "you will admit that there are such places as Moscow and Constantinople?" No; I never saw them. "But," you say, "you must have seen the submarine telegrams in all the newspapers, coming from the seat of war?" Yes, but those telegrams were not sworn to, and I do not know but that all those newspapers and all those telegraphers may have made a conspiracy to deceive me. In other words,

I MAY DENY EVERYTHING.

"Well," you say, "that is foolish." I admit it; but you are doing in regard to the Bible just what I am now doing in regard to geography. You deny the geography of the eternal world, and I for the minute deny the geography of Europe.

Good-by, my brother. I have no time this morning to talk to you who reject the Bible. Some other Sabbath I will see you. I must turn now to those who believe the Bible to be true. Eternal Spirit of Almighty God, fall upon us now, while with fingers of dust we turn the sacred leaves, and with lips of ashes recite the most stupendous truths that ever shook the human soul.

Now if we are honest men we will come to this subject as we would in the midst of a great freshet if at midnight we were on the Erie express train and were to say to the conductor, "Conductor, do you think any of the bridges are down to-night?"—with something of the feeling I had after our last lifeboat had been crushed to pieces in the midst of the ocean cyclone, when I said to the officer, "Officer, do you think we will ever get to New York?" He shook his head, as much as to say, "Don't ask me."

I have no sympathy with the flippant discussion of this truth, nor with that manner on the part of a preacher which seems to say, "You impenitent people will be lost, and you deserve it!" I feel that I am a sinner, and because of the million transgressions of my heart and life I must perish unless some one can show me a way out from under the condemnation. The platform on which I now stand may be two or three feet higher than the pew in which you sit; but I realize that I am not raised the thousandth part of an inch above the level on which we must all stand in judgment before God.

I do not know how people can joke about this subject, and yet it is the subject of more puns, more caricatures, more jokes in your stores and offices and shops than any other subject. Why do they not joke about the broken bridge at Ashtabula? or the Atlantic steamer going down off Mars Head with five hundred passengers? or about the Indian famine? or about the earthquake that crushed Lisbon? There is more fun in all those subjects than in this. Let us come to this subject not as critics, not as cavillers, not in a polemic spirit. Let us come to it as

A QUESTION OF PERSONAL SAFETY.

Let us empty ourselves of all previous impressions, and, without any disposition to twist things, or explain them away, find out what is the announcement of the only authority on this subject that is worth so much as a pin.

I. In the first place, I group together all those passages which represent the suffering of the lost by fire. In Matthew 13:41-2, it is said, "The Son of man shall send forth His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Can you not explain it away? Oh, yes. I could make these angels fairies; I could represent this fire as only something looking like fire; I could represent this furnace as a casket with a crimson lining; but what is the use of explaining away a furnace of fire when God says there is one? What is the use of an imprisoned criminal trying to explain away the existence of such a place as a prison?

But you say,

"ISN'T THERE SOME MISTAKE

about it?" If there is, then the Almighty Christ made the mistake, for the passage I quoted is part of His sermon, I appeal to Paul on this subject. He was no coward. Instead of his trembling before governments, governments trembled before him. A small invalid, but the most magnificent man of the ages. What does he say? He says to the Thessalonians, "The Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be revealed from heaven with mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those who know not God." I appeal to St. John the inspired. In one place he says of the lost, "They shall be tormented with fire and brimstone." In another place he says, "The adulterers, the sorcerers, and all liars shall have their place in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone." And in another place he says, "They shall both be cast alive into the lake of fire."

The last book of the Bible closes with a dark scroll on the sky. What is it? Smoke. Where there is no fire there is no smoke. "The smoke of their torment ascendeth for ever and ever." "But," you say, "were not they men who wrote this?" Yes, but they were inspired men. If you do not want to take even inspired men, then I go back to Christ again, and as my first quotation on this subject was from Christ, so my last quotation under this head shall be from Christ, as He says, "Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire."

"But," you say,

"ISN'T THIS FIGURATIVE?"

I am not opposed to saying it may be figurative, but I know very well that if it is not fire it is something as severe as fire. Christ and His apostles were not lacking in illustrative power, and when they say a thing is morning, I know it is as bright as it can be; and when they say anything is prison, I know it is a galling thraldom; and when they say anything is fire, I know it is torment unmitigated. I often hear people explain these fiery representations of Scripture as metaphor, and as soon as they make metaphor out of them, they seem to think they have soothed the whole subject.

No; if there be a mental state as sharp and severe as fire, it might as well be fire. Christ and His apostles use the figure of fire, and I know from that there is nothing more painful or more agonizing. But if you want some other figure take it. Say it is a penitentiary, iron-bolted, iron-barred, iron-locked, the doors opening in and not out. I will not dispute with you. If you will, say it is a maelstrom which dashes and breaks to pieces and swallows down all those that come within the sweep of its foaming circles. I will not dispute with you. If you prefer those human similes, take them. I prefer God's comparison, because I know God is right and human comparisons may be wrong.

GOD SAYS IT IS FIRE, and a furnace of fire.

Besides that, my brother, I do not know that it is figurative. It may be literal. The Bible sixteen times says it is fire. You say, "I don't believe it, and I won't believe it." Then be consistent, and pitch your Bible into the stove, or throw it into the East River. Thomas Paine was consistent in denying the doctrine of eternal punishment, for he rejected the whole Bible, although in his last moments he howled with so much terror that his nurse fled from the room. He was consistent nevertheless. Voltaire was consistent in rejecting the doctrines of future punishment, because he rejected the whole Bible, although he did not seem to be so very well persuaded of the non-existence of perdition, for when his friend wrote to him, "I have found out for sure that there is no hell," Voltaire replied, "I congratulate you; I am not so fortunate as you are." But still he was tolerably consistent, for as well as he could he rejected the whole Bible.

But, my brother, you have a Bible in your hand, you have a Bible in your bedroom, you have a Bible in your nursery, you have a Bible in your parlor. Your children have Bibles, and all these Bibles say that there is a world of fire for those who do not escape on a certain condition which I shall in a few moments mention. Now, overboard with your Bible, or overboard with your unbelief. Keeping both your Bible and your unbelief you stultify yourself beyond all other possibility of stultification.

* This sermon, which has never before been published in The Christian Herald, was received with a great deal of satisfaction at the time it was preached.

II. The next thing I have to do is to group all those passages which show against sin and the sinner, and hence the possibility of such a place as I have spoken of. Out of a hundred of our sermons, ninety-eight of them are on the love of God, the mercy of God, the kindness of God, and if we preach two sermons, out of the one hundred, in regard to the indignation of God, we are styled "sulphuric." Our American preaching needs to be reconstructed as to this doctrine of God's indignation. So recreant are we, the American clergy, on this subject, that the vast majority of you people here to-day do not know that the Bible speaks of the wrath of God as truly as of the love of God. Not because God has more wrath than mercy, but because He knew the world would be slow to believe it.

We have not enough backbone of moral courage to preach the whole Bible. So we go on preaching a one-sided God, with a character which we would despise in ourselves. Do you ever get angry? Suppose a ruffian should knock your little girl into the gutter—would you smile about it? would you reward him for it? Suppose, passing down the street, you saw three or four masons, with hods of brick on their shoulders, going up a long ladder, and some one should come to the foot of the ladder and hurl it away, and the three or four masons should dash down and lose their lives—would you smile about it? would you reward him for it? No. There are a hundred things in your life that excite your indignation, and if you are never aroused in that way it is because you are imbecile.

Yet, what do men say of God? Why, that the whole race can go on defying Him, breaking His laws, murdering His only-begotten Son, striking in the face the Lord Almighty, and He will smile on them through all eternity. Bible-holders, I want you to recognize the fact that God in the Bible more often speaks of His indignation than He does of His mercy. Twenty-eight times does the Bible speak of the love of God. Sixty-one times does it speak of His wrath and His indignation. Here is Cruden's "Concordance." I brought it along with the passages all collated. I will lay it at the foot of the pulpit. It is an expensive book, and some of you may not have it or be able to get it. I lay it at the foot of the pulpit, and you can for yourselves at the close of the service.

Oh, can we preach the whole Bible without preaching the indignation of God as well as the love of God? I will recite to you some of the passages which show the Lord's indignation, and hence the possibility of such a place as I am speaking of. In Thessalonians: "Taking vengeance on them that know not God." In Revelation: "They shall drink of the wine of the wrath of Almighty God, poured without mixture into the cup of His indignation." The figure, you see, is a pitcher and a bowl. Into the pitcher are compressed the clusters that have grown under the hot sun of indignation; and then the wine, seething, bubbling, is poured out from the pitcher into the bowl, and the lost soul, putting trembling hands to that bowl, presses it to the lips and drinks the draught until all the contents are drained (Rev. 14).

You do not like the figure? It is not mine. "Thus saith the Lord. They shall drink of the wine of the wrath of Almighty God, poured without mixture into the cup of His indignation."

In another place the Bible says, "The children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness." In other words, the darkness of the Mamartine dungeon, the darkness of Egypt. All the darknesses of the earth are not thick enough to symbolize it, and so the Bible seeks for something beyond all these darknesses. "The children of the kingdom shall be cast out into and over that abyss we are all suspended, unless we escape on one condition, to be mentioned at a later point. It is too early to mention it.

What does a man want to know of a life-raft when he is sure of no shipwreck? Not persuaded yet? Revelation: "The wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God." Not yet persuaded that there is a wrath-side as well as a love-side to the Almighty?—and this passage perhaps you have never heard quoted: "And the people shall be as burnings of lime; as thorns cut up shall they be burned up in the fire. Hear, ye that are afar off, what I have done, and ye that are near acknowledge my might." Not yet persuaded? I quote once more Isaiah, sixty-third chapter: "I will tread them in my wrath and trample them in my fury, and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment."

Does that quotation irritate you with me? I did not say it. "Thus saith the Lord." Not persuaded with what Samuel says, and Micah says, and Daniel says, and Jeremiah says, and Ezekiel says, and Paul says, and Christ says, and Jehovah says? Not persuaded? Then I shall have to leave you to be persuaded by your own experience, when the truth of God's burnished throne shall flame on you. The fact is that all the Bible-holders in this audience by this time, through the influence of the Holy Spirit, are persuaded that there is a hell. How long shall it last? I will answer that question to-morrow night. How do you accord this with the love and mercy of God? I will answer that question to-morrow night. What do you think of the theories of Canon Farrar and Dean Stanley, and Mr. Frothingham? I will answer that question to-morrow night.

This morning I have nothing to do with objections. I will simply state to you that God, fifty-six times, in the plainest, most unmistakable, stupendous, and overwhelming way, declares that there is a hell. It is burning now. It has been burning a long while. Yea, I will go further, and say there is a possibility, ay, there is a probability, that there are some in this house to-day who will spend eternity in the lost world. Nothing but the hand of an outraged, defied, insulted, long-suffering, indignant, omnipotent God keeps this whole audience this moment from sliding like one avalanche into it. O God, what a crisis!

III. Has not the time come for me to tell this people that, though there is a hell,

THERE IS NO NEED THAT ANY ONE SHOULD GO THERE?

I am going to announce to you that five or ten may escape—yea, a hundred—yea, a THOUSAND—yea, ALL. You say, "Tell me, just now." Oh, I do not want to break on you the glad tidings too suddenly. I want to tell you that there is no more need that you to to that world than that you should leap into the geysers of California, or the crater of Cotopaxi. Tell the people, gentlemen of the press, tell them that I said there was no reason that anybody should go there; that if any one goes there he is a suicide of his immortal soul.

I turn to the same old book and I find out that the Son of Mary, who was the Son of God, the darling of heaven, the champion of the ages, by some called Lord, by some called Jesus, by others called Christ, but this morning by us called by the three blessed titles, Lord Jesus Christ, by one magnificent stroke made it possible for us all to be saved. He not only told us that there was a hell, but He went into it. He walked down the fiery steeps. He stepped off the bottom rung of the long ladder of despair. He descended into hell. He put His foot on the coal of the furnace.

He explored the darkest den of eternal midnight, and then He came forth lacerated and scarified, and bleeding, and mauled by the hands of infernal excruciation, to cry out to all the ages, "I have paid the price for all those who would make Me their substitute. By my piled-up groans, by my omnipotent agony, I demand the rescue of all those who will give up sin, and trust in me." Mercy! mercy! mercy! But how am I to get it? Cheap. It will not cost you as much as a loaf of bread. Only a penny? No, no. Escape from hell, and all the harps and mansions and thrones and sunlit fields of heaven besides in the bargain, "without money and without price."

Now, I ask you as common-sense men and women, if one has a choice between heaven and hell, and he may escape the one, and he may win the other, and he refuses to do so—I ask you, as men and women of common-sense, if he does not deserve to be lost? He does. You know he does. Oh, by the free salvation of Christ, by the voices of the eternal groan which we have heard this morning, I beg all this audience to flee the wrath to come. Do not, my friend, make it a controversy between you and me; it is a controversy between you and God. Do not go away talking of what I said; go away talking of what God said.

My dear brother, my dear sister, you may shuffle this whole subject off your attention, but that does not change the fact.

YOUR IMPENITENT COURSE is as certainly leading you to that last world as Fulton Street leads to Fulton Ferry; as certainly as Montague Street leads to Wall Street Ferry; as certainly as Atlantic Street leads to South Ferry. You are on the road to hell! Turn around, and start on the road to heaven. Oh, it seems as if my pulses never beat so swiftly as they do this minute, and it is in emotion lest some of you be lost!

My heart seems as if it would break. God knows that I have never prayed over any sermon as I have prayed over this, and yet how powerless I am to make you see things as you will see them on your dying bed—as you will see them when the front gate of eternity swings open upon your amazed spirit. With one more quotation I will leave this whole subject between you and God's arousing, convicting, converting Spirit: "Who of us can dwell with devouring fire? Who of us can dwell with everlasting burning?" Who? Who?

Dr. Talmage, in his Friday Evening Talk last week, made the following remarks: "One of the most conspicuous matters of the week is the halting of justice at the door of technicality. The assassin of President Garfield has his case adjourned and adjourned and adjourned, with the hope that the nation's sorrow may be somewhat forgotten before the jury has the case submitted to them. Meanwhile men of twisted brain, commonly called cranks, are lingering about the White House with pistols, wanting to see the new President, evidently under the impression that murder is safer than it was. Now a crank is a crooked thing, made to turn; but if swift justice had been dealt out these cranks would not be so apt to turn that way. Nearly seven weeks that President Garfield has been dead has the law lingered, and perhaps it will linger seven weeks more.

"The greatest encouragement to crime in the United States to-day is the strong probability of escape for the criminal. The first thing in this country that needs to be hung is technicality, when it stands in the way of common justice. The impression is abroad that a man may commit almost any crime with impunity if he can get skilful counsel. If only one juryman in Guiteau's trial may be tampered with, righteousness is defeated. So far from having any feeling of revenge toward the assassin, if it were safe I would open the window and let the wasp fly away; but every day that Guiteau lives helps the cause of assassination. Leniency to him is cruelty to society. The most conspicuous crime of the nineteenth century must have the most conspicuous chastisement."

A Bishop's Golden Wedding.—Bishop Jesse T. Peck and wife, of Syracuse, celebrated their golden wedding last Thursday. The Bishop said that several years ago he expressed a desire that while willing to acquiesce in the dispensations of God's providence, he might live to see four personal privileges realized. One of these was that he might live to be seventy years of age. That desire was gratified four years ago. The celebration of the fiftieth anniversary saw the consummation of his third wish, and he hoped to live until next July, when he will have seen fifty years of itinerancy in the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Bishop presented his wife with a gold wedding ring, which, he remarked, he had not given her on their wedding day because he did not believe in the custom, and, he laughingly added, possibly because he would not have been able to purchase one.

SYLPH SOMERS.

The Discussion in the Council — Dr. Gilbart Arrested—Lodged in Chester Jail—John Howard's Description of the Prison—Sylph Somers' Visit to a Sick Man—Discovery of Owen Oliver —Resolved to Question the Doctor on the Mystery of her Mother's Death.

UNDER a conviction of Dr. Gilbart's innocence, one member of the board, not so large a sharer in the public purse, and therefore jealous of Mr. Aloe, suggested that it would be better to condone Dr. Gilbart, who had been an offender only once, and attack the actual speaker of the words that were accounted so dangerous. But he was at once met by the remark that his proposal was impracticable, since this man had that morning left the city.

There was also present at this exciting conference a Doctor Bolus. One would think he ought to have had some generous feeling toward a brother professional man, and have been jealous of his personal freedom. But Dr. Bolus was of a coarse and vulgar nature, while Dr. Gilbart was a gentleman; and a man of the former stamp is always spiteful toward one of more refinement than himself; he instinctively feels his inferiority, and it nettles his self-love. Besides, Dr. Bolus, though a certified practitioner, had but little scientific culture; Dr. Gilbart, therefore, would not meet him as an equal, and Dr. Bolus naturally but most manifestly resented this.

Above all, he was chagrined and incensed at Dr. Gilbart's gratuitous services, given so largely to the poor. "This stuck-up aristocrat robs me—downright robs me," he often had said; "depriving me of my chances of patients and fees."

Moreover, if Dr. Gilbart could be got, for a time, out of the way, and be put in "durance vile," it was Dr. Bolus's belief that it would greatly help to extend his own practice in the city. "He is my chief competitor," he inwardly soliloquized, "and doctors, just now, are rather scarce in Chester. If Gilbart, therefore, be thrust aside for a while, the impotent folk must have recourse to me."

It would not do, however, for this piqued and unscrupulous Dr. Bolus to reveal the secret workings of his thoughts; he therefore masked his selfish and unprincipled designs under a grave concern for the honor of the medical profession.

"It is monstrous, that this man should compromise and disgrace the 'faculty,' by his advocacy of what I can regard as nothing less than downright French Jacobitism! What does he mean, I ask?" and Dr. Bolus made a theatrical start—"What does he mean, I ask? Is it to set up in our streets the guillotine?"

At this inquiry, spoken rather dramatically and loudly, there was a blank look of horror upon the faces of all present; observing which Dr. Bolus felt encouraged to deepen the sensation by a more awful question still:

"Shall we let our hands hang down, I want to know, and look on listlessly until our very gutters, as in Paris, run blood? No, gentlemen and fellow-citizens, before this terrible consummation comes, let us incarcerate this revolutionary and dangerous man, and put such crimes beyond his power."

"But if you put Dr. Gilbart in jail," said a timid and sickly-looking individual, whose life had often been eked out by the doctor's skill, "what will the city of Chester do?" And then forgetting at the moment Dr. Bolus's presence, he added, "There is no one to take Dr. Gilbart's place, for, as for the other medical men in the town, I would not intrust one of them with the life even of my cat."

Observing the eyes of all at the council board turn with a scared expression toward Dr. Bolus, he became at once conscious of the very gross breach of good manners he had been guilty of, and was filled with nervous confusion, a state of mental disquietude that was not improved by seeing the hot flush of passion which had mounted to the cheeks of Dr. Bolus, and who seemed as though he could not restrain himself from some act of personal violence. Cowed and trembling, the fragile town councillor sat down very low in his seat as though "crushed."

In this way, through a series of untoward jostles and jars, Dr. Gilbart's delinquency was discussed, the members of the Municipal Council Board wounding each other's self-love and burgher pride —sometimes unawares and sometimes wittingly—which circumstance, of course, did not serve to promote their sense of justice and good feeling; so that the upshot was, a writ was issued for Dr. Gilbart's apprehension.

Not long afterward, when on his way to a patient, he was tapped on the shoulder by a bailiff in the street. The warrant held forth as a justification for this was an incomprehensible surprise to Dr. Gilbart, and ran counter to all his conceptions of the rights and liberties of an Englishman. Dr. Gilbart, however, was a law-abiding and law-respecting man; he therefore silently and quietly submitted to the tipstaff, and turned with him toward the city prison, yet fully satisfied within himself that some strange and stupid mistake had been made, and that his detention would be only of the briefest duration.

The jail of Chester at the present day is healthy, large, and convenient—worthy of Christian civilization—but it was otherwise at the period before us. Outside the city walls there is an ancient castle, built in feudal times; and it was the lower part of this edifice, exceedingly gloomy and unhealthful, which was set apart for the durance of prisoners.

The following description of this underground jail is taken from the report of the world-renowned philanthropist, John Howard, as contained in his book upon the prisons of England:

"During the day the prisoners have admission to a little yard, surrounded on all sides by a lofty wall, through which the air has no fresh and vivifying current, and into which never enter the gladdening and purifying rays of the sun, and from which no glimpse of blossom or tree is possible. The apartments at night, of those incarcerated, are cells, seven and a half feet by three and a half, ranged on one side of a chill and dank subterranean gallery; and in each cell, very often, are lodged together three or four criminals." As if to make these living tombs still more horrible, "they are pitched over three or four times a year." This helps to keep out damp, and to keep down fetid smells; but it creates an oppressive odor, and clothes the walls with a funereal gloom. To make existence possible, air has to be conveyed from without; but before it reaches the prisoners "it has to traverse three passages, namely, through the narrow windows of an adjacent room; then down through a grating in the floor of this room; thence along the subterranean gallery; and finally through a small grating above the door of each cell, when it has lost more than half of its life-giving power."

One has a sensation of smothering from merely reading this description; how must it have been then with the wretches who were forced to inhabit these stifling and suffocating dens? And let it be borne in mind that this exquisite torture was inflicted, not in Mohammedan Turkey, but in Christian Britain, and not much longer ago than half a century.

Such a place of imprisonment doomed the individuals thrust into it to a species of misery like that known to those who died in the Black Hole of Calcutta. A few hours of agony sufficed to end the lives of those who perished there; but death only came to the relief of prisoners in Chester City Jail after a protracted and long season of wretchedness. It was as though a system of slow torture was invented, nicely adjusted, to surely kill, but only after long drawn out pain.

Doctor Gilbart was fully aware of the dreadful imprisonment to which he was being led; still, he calmly fronted it; a crowd, some hooting and some pitying, following him. He had been more than once down to those fearful dungeons, mercifully giving his professional services to some sick criminal in the grasp of death; not to save his life, indeed—he knew, in such a place, to do that would be impossible—but to mitigate his sufferings and ease his passage to the grave. Many times he had pressed upon the authorities the need of a reform in the treatment of their prisoners, but in the lethargic and benumbed condition of the public conscience his efforts were without effect.

The governor of the castle received him kindly and courteously, knowing him well, and respecting him for his deeds of mercy. He expressed his sincere regret at his arrest, and at the wretched quarters which, in the discharge of his duty, he must assign him. As the doctor was conducted down the long flight of stone steps which led to his prison, and at last reached the subterranean passage which has been mentioned, and saw here and there, in the dim light, the yellow and haggard faces of his fellow-captives, the lines of Dante in the "Inferno" came up irresistibly before his mind.

> "No light, but rather darkness visible, > Serves only to discover sights of woe."

The cell appointed for his nightly repose was the last in the range, and he was to have the whole of it; the governor, to accommodate him, turning out three other prisoners, and allotting them a cell elsewhere; but what a contrast was even the best cell to his pleasant home in the Rows within the city! The narrowness, gloom, and foulness of the one, from the very law of association only served to bring out yet the more before his thoughts the brightness and joyousness, "the sweetness and light" of the other.

Doctor Gilbart was conscious of no crime to justify this tyrannous invasion of his personal liberty; rather was he conscious of real good-will to others, and of a desire for a wider extension of freedom and happiness to his fellow-men. His fate seemed strangely hard and cruel. And with a gloomy mind and burdened heart he sat down upon the pallet in his little cell to ponder the dark and seemingly insoluble problem of human life and history — a thing apparently destitute of moral order, and which seemed to his scepticism but as a tale told by an idiot, "full of sound and fury signifying nothing."

On the day of Dr. Gilbart's arrest Sylph had been busy in her accustomed visits to the poor, especially to the sick. She had been to several of her old friends, and was thinking of returning home when an old woman informed her of a sick man—not a resident of the town—who, it was feared, was not very far from death, and asked Sylph to see him. "You need not be afraid, miss," she added; "I know him to have been a decent, quiet-living man; and a call from you I'm certain will do him a power of good and please him."

"If he's a stranger in the town," asked Sylph "how are you able, Kitty, to give so good a character of him? It's rather venturesome to do so."

"Oh," said Kitty, "he isn't a stranger, miss not by any manner o' means—I didn't mean to say that. He hasn't lived in the town, miss, but twice every week has seen him in it. He's one, you know, of them big wagon-men, that comes from the country regularly to Chester."

When Sylph, from the directions given by Kitty, found out the house where the sick man lay, and entered the room, she saw he was advanced in years and gray-headed. His features, though originally massive and manly, were worn and wan, his breathing hard and low, and he sighed heavily at intervals.

"I hope my coming will not displease you, sir," said Sylph; "but a neighbor—Kitty Price—told me there was one here unwell, and asked me to pay you a visit, hoping I could be of service to you."

The sick man, during the first part of Sylph's little speech, seemed to take no notice; indeed he had not turned his head or even his eyes at her entrance; but at her closing words of "service to you" he looked languidly at her, and feebly said, "Service to me—it's little service I beg. I only wish to die, since he's got the start afore me 'on the road.'"

"Who is he?" inquired Sylph, with sympathy.

With a surprised look the individual questioned said, "Who is he? Not know him? Why, he's the one that each day gladdened me by his honest face and cheery tone; and no bother of long speeches. But he's gone; ay! he's dead and gone! Is gone down to his dark, cold grave; and in this world I shall never see him no more—no, never no more!" And the sick man sadly moved his head to and fro on the pillow, while the tears rolled down his cheek.

"I trust he is gone to a better world," said Sylph.

"Not a doubt of it," said the invalid; "not a doubt of it; and that's the reason why I wish to die, for I know that as much as I miss him, as much does he miss me, and longs for my coming. Oh, David, brother David," he cried, his eyes strained toward the ceiling, "if there be a shining way up to the golden city, as they say there is, be sure, old fellow, to meet me on the road for your brave and kindly greeting of 'Morra;' for since I've ceased to hear it, it's been to me a dreary, lonely world."

"They tell me you have been a wagoner," said Sylph, amused and yet touched by the old man's grotesque grief. "I feel a deep interest in men of your occupation, sir," she continued; "for I have a child's recollection of a great kindness shown long ago by a wagoner to me and my dear mother."

"On what road was it, miss?" inquired the man.

"I am not sure," was Sylph's reply; "but from some things I recollect, I think it must have been the road between Wrexham and Chester."

Upon this the sick wagoner gave a sudden turn in his bed, and said vehemently, "Why, that's David's road and mine, no other; for forty years—ay, for forty year, no less—we travelled it day by day. Can you remember, miss, anything that happened?"

"Not much," answered Sylph; "but I know the man I speak of came to where I was weeping near my poor mother, who had fallen into a dead faint; which, when he saw, he hastened to his wagon, climbed into it, and fetched some wine, which, applied to her lips in drops by my tiny fingers, brought her back to life."

THE STATE OF THE WORLD.

Its Relation to the Second Coming of Christ. By Rev. Charles H. Hamilton.

THE LANDS OF BIBLE HISTORY.

ANOTHER point of interest in connection with the fulfilment of prophecy is the increasing attention that has been drawn of late to the lands comprised in the eastern division of the old Roman empire, famous as the lands of Bible history. Once the seat of knowledge and power, the cradle of the world's wisdom, they have now, for hundreds of years, fallen into decay, in God's judgment upon their sins; and the seat of civilization and power has been transferred to the kingdoms of the West. But the Word of God clearly intimates to us that the power of these kingdoms shall again be revived, and even already are they coming into greater prominence.

Egypt, which has been for centuries the basest of the kingdoms and tributary to the Turk, is now, in all but name, an independent kingdom, and is daily showing signs of returning life and prosperity. Its situation, as custodian of the great water-way connecting Europe with the Asiatic seas, will at once tend to develop its material resources, and give it a commanding influence in any crisis that may arrive, in which the sovereignty of eastern lands may be involved. It is but forty years since the power of Egypt was felt almost at the gates of Constantinople, when Ibrahim Pasha overran Syria and Palestine, and led his victorious troops across the Euphrates. And though his career was checked, mainly through the action of the British fleet, this triumphant march suggested to the minds of many what a power Egypt might yet exercise, under an able ruler, in the solution of the Eastern problem.

The land of Syria, too, has been attracting a considerable share of public notice in recent years. Few can doubt that this, the richest province of the Porte's Asiatic dominions, will soon fall from the feeble grasp of Turkey; and that it will then form a separate government, and regain much of its ancient importance. If Egypt possesses the great water-way to India and China, it is equally true that Syria constitutes the great high road to the remote lands of the East. And should the Euphratean line of railway, so often projected, become a reality, it is not hard to conceive how enormously this would tend to develop the wealth and prosperity of the countries through which it will pass.

Even now, under the corrupt and repressive reign of the Porte, whose pashas systematically enrich themselves at the expense of the subject populations, Damascus, Bagdad, and Aleppo are cities of considerable trade. Under an enlightened rule, and with this contemplated means of transit between the east and west, they would unquestionably become flourishing emporiums of commercial traffic. That both Egypt and Syria will yet become strong and powerful kingdoms is clearly predicted in the Word of God. It is generally conceded by the students of prophetic Scripture, that the rulers of these two countries are signified by the kings of the north and south (relatively so, as regards their position in respect to the Holy Land), and that they will be strong enough to contend with the Antichrist, in the great struggle for the possession of Jerusalem and its holy places in the latter days.

But paramount above the interest felt in the future of other lands of Scripture is that which attaches to

THE FUTURE OF PALESTINE.

If the "times of the Gentiles are well-nigh accomplished, it follows that the time is at hand when Jerusalem shall no more be trodden down under the heel of the infidel. No truth is more demonstrated in God's Word than that the Jews, now scattered to the four winds of heaven, shall be gathered again, and that it shall be the will of the nations to plant them in their own land. Improbable as this may seem, impossible to the judgment of unbelief, yet is it not within the power of God, who put it in the hearts of Cyrus and Darius to restore His despised people to the land of their inheritance, to accomplish His purposes of restoration in a similar manner again? More unlikely things have happened than that the nations, when Palestine shall fall from the dead hand of the Turk, should actively promote the restoration of the Jews to their own land. Not, indeed, from any disposition to favor that despised race, but in mutual distrust and jealousy of the power which so rich a prize would confer upon any nation who should succeed to the dead man's inheritance.

Yet, although the Crescent shall wane and disappear, the Cross shall not be immediately lifted up at Jerusalem. Israel shall be restored in unbelief; and the sorest part of her discipline for her sins, and the rejection of God and His Christ, is yet to come. Not till she has passed through unexampled woes; not till she has accepted Antichrist as Messiah, and in worshipping his image has relapsed into that fearful sin of idolatry from which she has for so many ages been so remarkably preserved; not till then shall she accept the crucified Nazarene as her King. It is when Jerusalem shall be again encompassed with armies, and her sons helpless to defend themselves from the oppressor, that the Redeemer shall appear upon Mount Sion, for their deliverance and glory. Then shall they "look upon Him whom they have pierced, and mourn because of Him;" and then shall the legend of the Cross be fulfilled, when Jesus of Nazareth is hailed the King of the Jews.

THE RETURN OF THE JEWS.

It is a well-ascertained fact that the hearts of the Jewish people are being powerfully turned at this present time toward the land of their inheritance. The repeopling of Palestine is going on silently; every year many Jews are returning thither, and settling down in its deserted homes, though not as yet in numbers large enough to attract public attention. The penal laws, which once prevented the Jews from acquiring landed property in Palestine, have in recent years been rescinded, by a decree of the Porte. As a consequence of this permission to obtain a legal right to the possession of land, building companies have been formed in many parts of the country; and the purchase of extensive tracts by wealthy Israelites has been in contemplation. The revival of the persecution of the Jews in many of the kingdoms of the continent is another significant fact that may exercise an important influence upon their ingathering to their own land. God has, no doubt, permitted this spirit of persecution to arise, to loosen their attachment to the homes of their adoption in Gentile lands, and thereby quicken their desires for a return to Palestine.

Until lately the Jews were exempted from the conditions of military service in the dominions of the Czar: but this obligation is now rendered compulsory for all who dwell in the vast empire of the north. This liability to serve in the "armies of the alien," coupled with the cruel, inhuman treatment to which they are subjected, involving not merely the loss of property, but (in several instances) of life itself, has occasioned the exodus of at least 60,000 Jews from Russia. These are now domiciled in Turkey—finding the infidel Mahometan a kindlier friend than the Christian gentile; but this can but prove

A TEMPORARY RESTING-PLACE.

We have been interested by reading in the daily press of the contemplated offer of an asylum by the King of Spain to these exiled Jews: a touching act of reparation for the barbarous treatment which their forefathers received in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. But as God is preparing the hearts of Israel for a return to their ancient homes, He can as easily prepare the way for that return. When the crumbling fabric of the Ottoman empire falls to pieces—and every day we see the hastening process of decay—the great stumbling block to the return of His people will be taken out of their path. Events may precipitate the drying-up of the mystic Euphrates; and then we may expect to see the Jewish nations speedily gathered within the borders of Canaan.

THE "TIME OF JACOB'S TROUBLE."

It is, indeed, sad to think of the time of trial which awaits them there—"the time of Jacob's trouble," as it is significantly termed in the language of prophetic Scripture (Jeremiah 30:7). They have now, on their own confession, wholly abandoned the expectation of their Redeemer-Messiah, to which they clung so resolutely in the darkest hours of their national history. They will thus be prepared to receive the Antichrist as their Messiah, and, under the influence of his deceitful promises of protection, to make a league of friendship with him; as they did, to their bitter shame and hurt, with Antiochus, his great forerunner and type. Yet this, the darkest era of their history, will be the prelude to their latter-day glory, when the Redeemer shall return to Mount Zion, and set up His kingdom in the tabernacle of David.

It is not a little remarkable that so strong an interest should now be manifested in the land of Israel. Every part of that land, which was once, and shall yet be again, the "glory of the nations," will soon have been accurately surveyed. Her waste places have been visited by Christian travellers; her buried palaces, even the very foundations of her beautiful temple, are now being disentombed from the dust of ages in which they have so long lain, neglected and forgotten. Surely "the time to favor Zion, yea, the set time"—seems to be come! "Thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof." God hasten the time when He shall "establish, and make Jerusalem a praise in the earth;" when thither "the people shall be gathered together, and the nations to serve the Lord!"

The Chinese Widow and her Crops.—At the recent Christian Conference at Clifton, England, Mr. Soltau told an interesting story of a Chinese widow, whose husband had left her some land on which to grow rice. It is the custom for relatives, under such circumstances, to help a widow, but they refused, as she was a Christian. Some Christian Chinese men, who had carried him and others on their journey to the place where this widow resided, knowing of her condition, although fatigued with their walk, set to work to spread the mud over the widow's fields, for want of which the crops were suffering. The widow, who trusted in God, was rejoiced, and said, "God had sent some one to help her." The relatives were astonished, and said, "This must be a good religion." This was practical Christianity. We want more who will "spread mud" for their fellow-Christians.

CURRENT EVENTS.

United States Treasurer Gilfillan Submitted on Friday last his annual report. Even the most sanguine believers in our national prosperity will be astonished at the magnitude of the figures required to denote the advance of the year now closed. This surplus of revenue over expenditure for the year amounts to the enormous sum of one hundred million dollars, and the revenue increased $27,000,000 over that of last year. Over $90,000,000 was used in reducing the public debt. The stock of gold and silver in the Treasury has risen to $269,000,000. Apart from the greenbacks, the liabilities of the Treasury, which are payable on demand, are less than its assets by over $146,000,000. It is probable that so wonderful a statement has never before been presented by any government financier in the world. The question will now come up for consideration, whether it is best to relieve the people of some of the burdens of taxation and allow the public debt to remain at its present amount, or to continue the process of redemption and thus decrease the annual charge for interest. That question is likely to be one of the most prominent in the next session of Congress. It is certain that the small traders and the poorer ranks of professional men find the cost of living increasingly difficult to meet. The common necessaries of life are now twenty-five per cent higher than they were a year ago, while wages have not increased. It may therefore be that Congress will decide to remit taxes rather than continue the rapid diminution of the debt.

A Suggestion as to the National Banks is made by Mr. Gilfillan in his statement, which deals with the main difficulty that obstructed the Refunding bill passed by the last Congress. This was the possibility of the banks suddenly withdrawing their issues of notes and so curtailing the supply of currency as to disorganize business. The Treasurer states his conviction that "the power now possessed by the national banks of throwing up their circulation at will is wrong in principle, unnecessary, and dangerous.. Under a sound system of currency," the Treasurer says, "the circulation can be reduced only by the act of the holders in presenting it for redemption. Under the present system the issuers can suddenly and arbitrarily contract it to any extent; and it may be for their interest to do this when there is a legitimate demand for all the currency in circulation, or even more. There may be—in fact often is—a profit to the bank in withdrawing and selling their bonds when the circulation is already deficient. A bank, having issued circulating notes, should be held responsible for them until they are redeemed or it goes out of business."

The Proceedings in the Star Route Cases commenced on Thursday, November 3d. The defendants were represented by six eminent lawyers, who challenged on technical grounds the mode of procedure adopted by the Government. The argument was to the effect that there was no authority in any statute for proceeding by information instead of by indictment, except in cases of minor offences; such as violations of the revenue laws, and that there had not been in eighty years an attempt to do so under the common law in the prosecution of a great crime. Should this plea be pronounced good in law, it is thought that the prosecution will collapse, because the statute of limitations is held by many lawyers a good defence against any proceedings that might be instituted at the present time.

The Mormon Policy to which the Late President pledged himself in his inaugural address aroused against him the active hostility of the Mormons in Utah and the neighboring infected Territories. The Tribune publishes a letter from Salt Lake City, in which the writer reports that upon the night of September 19th, when the entire Gentile community was plunged into the deepest grief, Mormons openly expressed their joy upon the streets. The writer says that in the ward in which he lives every house inhabited by Gentiles was heavily draped, while not a single dwelling of Mormons displayed a badge of mourning. The leaders, however, were too wily to outrage the nation by a public declaration of their feelings. There were therefore memorial services in the Tabernacle as well as in the Gentile churches. Two female Mormon missionaries, one of them a plural wife of ex-Mayor Wells, the other a Mormon doctress, who are now travelling in the States, have written home to the Mormon papers: "We are compelled to believe that President Arthur will not be any more kindly disposed toward the Saints than Garfield was; so now nothing remains for us but to trust in God for help." This blasphemous implication that God approves of Mormonism proceeds from ignorance and hypocrisy.

One of the Most Remarkable Achievements rendered possible by the use of modern machinery was exhibited at the Cotton Exposition at Atlanta, Ga., on Governor's Day. By previous arrangement two complete suits of clothes were manufactured from growing cotton, all the processes being finished within twelve hours. A large crowd watched the skilful workmen. The gathering, ginning, picking, carding, spinning, weaving, and dyeing were successively completed with great rapidity and perfection, and at 12.55 o'clock in the afternoon the cloth went to the tailor. That evening at 7 o'clock Governor Bigelow of Connecticut, arrayed in one of the suits, was receiving a delegation from the Atlanta University at the residence of Director-General Kimball, while Governor Colquitt was wearing the other at the Executive Mansion.

The Disastrous Bank Failure which has Occurred at Newark, N. J., has caused considerable uneasiness in business circles there and in other cities. On Monday, October 31st, the Mechanics' National Bank of that city was closed, and a notice affixed to the doors stated that the step had been taken in consequence of statements affecting the bank made by the cashier to the Board of Directors, which were undergoing investigation. The statements were made the previous day, and were to the effect that over two million dollars had been abstracted from the funds of the bank without the knowledge or consent of the directors. Oscar L. Baldwin, the cashier, confessed that during the past eight years he had been lending money to the firm of C. Nugent & Co., and alleged that that firm were now indebted to the bank in the sum of $2,246,000. The bank books did not show the transaction, because the money having been lent on the cashier's sole responsibility, he had falsified the books to conceal the loans. The falsification was made in the account of the bank with its New York agent, who, according to the books, held money belonging to the Newark Bank to the amount of $2,000,000, while in reality the Newark bank owed to the New York bank $300,000. The reason the confession was made was that detection appeared inevitable. The district bank examiner was about to overhaul the affairs of the bank, and the devices the cashier had invented to deceive him failed. Mr. Baldwin admitted that on the occasion of the last examination he committed forgery to escape detection. He forged a letter from the assistant cashier of the New York bank, which purported to be an indorsement of Baldwin's statement. Mr. Baldwin was arrested immediately; he has been in the employment of the bank from his boyhood, and was implicitly trusted. His statement as to the way the money was lost, is not generally credited. It is believed that a part of the money was lent to Nugent, and that the remainder was lost by Baldwin in Wall Street in frantic efforts to retrieve his position by speculation.

A Shocking Steamboat Disaster Occurred a Rock Island, Ill., on Friday, October 28th. The steamer Jennie Gilchrist, having on board about fifteen passengers and a crew of sixteen men, left Rock Island with a barge and a flat boat in tow. Half an hour after starting it was found that the machinery controlling the wheel was broken and the steamer was carried by the swollen river rapidly toward the pier of a bridge, upon which it struck. The boiler heads were broken in by the concussion and the steam poured out and scalded many persons. The steamer then sank in twenty feet of water. The captain, when the accident to the machinery occurred, urged the passengers to take refuge on the barge in tow, and about twelve persons did so. These were rescued by a steamer which answered the signals of distress. Two engineers and three of the crew were also picked up as the steamer sank, but it is feared that all the passengers not on the barge must have been drowned. The saddest part of the account are the following particulars, sent by a newspaper correspondent, who says, "The steamer was unfit for her work, was heavily laden, and most of the crew were drunk. Furthermore, she was merely a freight boat and not licensed to carry passengers. The accident was entirely due to carelessness and liquor. There was a good deal of whiskey in the cargo, and some of it was tapped before the steamer left the wharf." An investigation of this charge is in order.

The Senate Committee Charged with the Duty of considering the question of a new bankruptcy law is making a thorough investigation of the difficult subject. Fifty thousand circulars of inquiry have been distributed throughout the country, a copy being sent to each register in bankruptcy under the old law, to every United States Circuit and District Judge, to every Judge of the Supreme Court or Court of Appeals in any State, to the most eminent lawyers in every city of importance to the national banks in every city, as well as to private bankers and to representative merchants and manufacturers. A digest of the opinions and suggestions thus obtained has been prepared for the use of the committee. We may hope that after so thorough and elaborate an investigation a really efficient measure will be introduced. The committee has a clear field, for it is notorious that a satisfactory bankruptcy law which relieves honest but unfortunate men, and does not facilitate the operations of rogues, does not exist in any country in the world.

A Successful Season is Anticipated by th Young Men's Christian Association of New York. As an evidence that the hope is well grounded, the following statistics for the month of October may be quoted: 415 new members added, 777 enrolled in the aggregate in the evening classes; 20,800 attendance in general; 3698 in the library, 8190 in the reading-room, 2700 in the gymnasium, 2300 at the religious meetings and Bible classes. Large accessions have been made to the library within a few months.

A Letter Found in a Room in Brooklyn where a young man committed suicide on Friday, October 28th, deserves more attention than such documents usually do. It explains the motives which prompted the writer to commit the fatal act. Addressing his brother, the young man wrote; "No doubt you will be surprised at what I have done. I wrote and told you what I would do unless I got money somewhere, so I will stick up to my word in a very short time. I am twenty-four years old to-day. Probably you will see me before you do this letter. I am very sorry to think of committing the horrible deed I am about to do, but I think it best to be out of the way, and I hope you all will think of me and why I have done what I have. I have been very unhappy for the last four months, and I can stand it no longer. . . . I was engaged to marry, was to be married in a short time. But poor girl she will be disappointed. It will almost break her poor heart when she hears the news. She is such a lovely and good girl." It is plain from this letter that discouragement at not obtaining employment produced despair which ended in suicide. How bitter such despair is only those know who have been in like circumstances. We can all pity him and wish that in his darkness he had possessed those consolations which religion is specially adapted to supply. If he had exercised faith in God despair could not have so controlled him.

A Christian Gentleman had Occasion to be thankful for a disappointment lately in connection with the failure of the Mechanics' National Bank at Newark, N. J. A prominent commercial lawyer in New York states that a client of his—a Presbyterian—was desirous of buying some of the shares of the Newark bank a few weeks ago, but was unable to obtain them at a satisfactory price. The latter fact was unknown to the counsel when he heard of the suspension of the bank, and he says that, remembering the desire of his client, he recalled the words of the Psalmist, "He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their souls" (Ps. 106 : 15). The client appeared for congratulations later in the day, on the ground that he had not paid 180 for the shares he desired, although he should have bought them if he could have done so at a little lower price. Had he had done so he would now have had to pay $100 per share toward making up the deficiency. The would-be purchaser is a firm believer in the guidance of God in business matters, and his experience in this case confirms his belief.

A Policeman's Statement of his Belief in inherent depravity made in New York last week is curiously suggestive. He had been arresting a man whom he found destroying the drinking cups attached to the fountains in one of the parks. "What did the man say in defence of himself?" asked his interlocutor. "Say?" said the policeman; "he said nothing. They never say anything. They can't help themselves. The mischief is in them, and has to come out. We caught one of them not long ago jabbing the beaks and wings and toe nails off the delicately carved birds in the panels of the bridge at the Central Park terrace, and he did not say anything either. What could he say?" The policeman from his own observation had arrived at a conclusion identical with a much controverted scriptural doctrine. The silence of the culprit, too, was strangely illustrative of what we are told will characterize sinners at the bar of God (Matt. 22 : 12).

The Admission of Dakota Territory into the Union as a State is announced as probable. It appears that several Senators have pledged themselves to support the proposal in the next Congress. Recently collected statistics show that Dakota has more inhabitants than had several of the newer States at the time of their admission. According to the official enumeration of June, 1880, the population of the Territory was 135,180. The immigration during the last six months of 1880 was unusually large, and Governor Ordway, in his report, said: "This wonderfully rapid extension of railroad facilities and improving river communications has aided to settle up the Territory beyond the most sanguine expectations of the earliest inhabitants, adding, as I believe, 15,000 new settlers since the enumeration was completed, making the aggregate of white population at the present time 150,000." Probably a fair estimate of the population at the present time would be from 165,000 to 170,000. Among the plans under discussion on the subject is one to divide the Territory on the line of the forty-sixth parallel and erect the southern portion into a State. Such a division would cut the Territory into two nearly equal parts, each containing about 75,000 square miles, or about the same area as the State of Nebraska. The southern half contains nearly three fourths of the population of the entire Territory, or from 110,000 to 120,000 inhabitants, and is the most attractive to immigrants.

A Prayer at Sea Instantaneously Answered. —A clergyman relates the following incident which occurred on board the steamer Britannica during a recent transatlantic voyage. It was Sunday, only one day's sail from New York. At the conclusion of divine service the following verse was being sung:

"Eternal Father! strong to save,
Whose arm hath bound the restless wave,
Who bidd'st the mighty ocean deep
Its own appointed limits keep,
Oh! hear us when we cry to Thee
For those in peril on the sea!"

"At the very moment we were singing this metrical prayer," says the clergyman, "an ocean steamship darted out of the fog and crossed our bow, so near that an orange might have been thrown upon her deck, and shot on again into the mists."

The ships were going at high rate of speed, and it was a question of "a collision at sea," determined by the twenty or thirty seconds needed to reach the track of the stranger. Had our ship been her own length ahead she must have received the blow in her side, as she must have given the blow had the other ship been as much behind.

Another Saloon-keeper has been Fined Under the Civil Damage Act. A woman in Brooklyn sued the owner of the saloon in which her husband purchased the liquor which was transforming him into an inhuman monster. As the defendant did not appear the case was given to the jury to assess damages. It was in evidence that plaintiff's husband had spent all his earnings in defendant's liquor store, leaving his family destitute. Plaintiff's daughter, a girl of nineteen, testified that she warned the proprietor not to supply her father with any more liquor, but the proprietor replied that he would let him have all he could pay for. The jury gave a verdict of $600 to the plaintiff.

An Effort to Establish a Young Men's Christian Association for colored men is being made in New York. At a meeting held in the Academy of Music on November 3d, Dr. Deems, Dr. S. Irenæus Prime, Dr. Bevan, and other well-known clergymen advocated the scheme, and Mr. Samuel Morley, the English philanthropist, offered $500 toward the fund, and promised on his return to England to obtain subscriptions from his friends. One hundred thousand dollars is the sum it is proposed to raise.

An Incident in the Life of President Garfield as related by himself shows how slight things may be used by God to turn the whole current of a man's life. A contemporary relates that the late President, addressing some young people, urged them to make the most of the smallest things and the humblest occasions, because they were likely to shape one's whole life and destiny, and used this illustration from his own experience: "I might say that the wearing of a certain pair of stockings led to a complete change in my own career. I had made one trip as a boy on a canal-boat, and was expecting to leave home for another trip. But I accidentally injured my foot in chopping wood. The blue dye in the yarn of my home-made socks poisoned the wound, and I was kept at home. Then a revival of religion broke out in the neighborhood. I was thus kept within its influence, and was converted. New desires and purposes then took possession of me, and I determined to seek an education that I might live more usefully for Christ. You can never know when these providential turning-points in your life are at hand; so seek to improve each passing day."

WELCOME! WELCOME!

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the people, when they knew it, followed him: and he received them, and spake unto them of the kingdom of God, and healed them that had need of healing."—LUKE 9 : 11.

The Following Multitude—A Cordial Welcome—I. The Fact—The Welcome of Jesus—To All Comers at all Times—An Inconvenient Time—The Apostolic Conference Turned into a Camp-meeting—No Put-offs, with Jesus—Sinners Do That—When There is No Revival—When There has been Grievous Sin—All Sorts of Comers—The Unprepared—The Poor—The Diseased—The Young—Incident of a London Boy—The Old—The Sinful—To All a Hearty Welcome—II. An Encouragement—The Same Sort of People He used to Receive—The Same Saviour—Plenty of Provision—His Reputation Already Gone—Expects Ingratitude—III. A Lesson—Welcome Strangers—Seven People Saved by a Smile—A Luminous Light Buoy—A Grand Verse.

MY subject has been suggested to me by the rendering of this passage given in the Revised Version, where we read: "But the multitudes perceiving it, followed Him; and he welcomed them." The difference lies, you see, between the words "He received them" and "He welcomed them." The new version is an instructive improvement, of which we will at once make evangelical use.

Our Lord kept open house as long as He was here. It might always have been said of Him, "This man receiveth and welcometh sinners." His motto was, "Whosoever will, let him come." If any desired to come nearer than being mere hearers, and would join the band of disciples, He was always ready to receive them. If many did not enter into the closest intimacy of His heart it was because they were themselves unable to come, and not because He shut them out. Publicans and sinners drew near unto Him; the very look of him was an invitation, his finger beckoned, his eye persuaded, his outstretched arms entreated, His whole self attracted all men unto Him.

At the door of His love there lay no growling dog of morose suspicion, neither had He placed there the porter of stern rebuke, but the door was set wide open, and over the portal was written the words, "Come and welcome." That is the subject of this morning's discourse, my earnest desire being that some who have been afraid to approach Him may be induced to come at once by learning how freely He welcomes all comers.

First, we shall dwell upon the fact that

JESUS WELCOMES ALL

who come to Him; secondly, we shall use it as an encouragement to all seeking souls; and, thirdly, we shall employ it as a lesson, teaching those of us who are His disciples how to treat those who desire to see Jesus.

I. First, may the Holy Spirit help us while we dwell upon the fact that Jesus welcomed those who sought Him.

We observe, first, that our Lord received all comers at all times. The time mentioned in our text was the most inconvenient possible. He was seeking rest for His disciples, who had gone through the various towns and villages preaching and working miracles; they were a good deal elated at their success, and it was needful that they should have a little quiet retirement to think matters over, and to come down into a calm state of mind. Moreover, they were weary; for they were so thronged by the people that they had not time even for needful refreshment, and rest was, therefore, absolutely requisite, lest these few men, who were in fact the hope of the church and of the world, should die of exhaustion. The Master put them into a ship that they might sail away and find retirement in a desert place.

A great sorrow was on them also, for John had been beheaded, and it was meet that they should solace their grief by a short retirement. At this time, too, our blessed Lord desired obscurity; for Herod was inquiring for him; and even when that delightful king was in his best mood he was not one whose near acquaintance any one would wish to cultivate. He might, perhaps, have listened to Jesus as he listened to John; but he would have sought his life as soon as he had gratified his curiosity, or another Herodias would have goaded him on to murder the faithful preacher who made the palace too hot for the wanton. Our Lord's time was not yet come, either to be exhibited in a royal court, or to be slain as a royal victim, and therefore he sought a desert place for a little while. It was most inconvenient, therefore, to be followed by so great a crowd. Were the workers to have no rest? Could there be no retirement afforded, especially at a time when it was so necessary? Is it not wonderful that under such circumstances our blessed Lord should welcome the insatiable throng?

I think, too, that the Master desired just then to hold a conference with His apostles as to the work they had done, and the future which was opening up before them. Peradventure He willed to set apart a season for special prayer with them. Before any great effort, we read that He retired to pray, and so, depend upon it, after any great enterprise He would again seek private prayer. It would naturally occur to Him to rake in the good seed which the twelve had so successfully scattered. But peace and rest He must not have, for the multitudes are on the beach before He can set foot thereon. The apostolic conference was broken in upon, and turned into

A GREAT CAMP-MEETING.

The Master and His disciples are not allowed to get alone even to hold high and solemn discourse upon the affairs of His kingdom; but here come the crowds, pell-mell, crushing one upon another, and the Master and His little band find themselves the centre of a great mass of people. Rest or quiet or holy discourse are out of the question; preaching, healing, and feeding must fill up every moment till the day is far spent.

Our Lord welcomed the throng with a gracious air; full of tenderness, He smiled upon them as a captain smiles upon his soldiers at the muster. He did not lose His patience with them, nor chide them for their ill-manners; but just as if He had asked them to come, and had sent forth His heralds to summon them, He stood ready to receive them. It is wonderful that He did not say, "Go your way for this time; when I have a more convenient season I will send for you." I have heard those words somewhere, but they were not used by our Lord; they were used by one at the door of whose conscience the gracious Lord had been knocking. If there are any put-offs, they are not on Christ's side, but on ours.

Let me put the truth before some of you here who as yet are unsaved. Peradventure, I address some who have outlived revivals. You remember precious seasons when the power of God was present to heal men, and many were to your knowledge healed. You sat side by side with some who sought and found salvation in Christ; you did not seek and you did not find; or if, perhaps, you exhibited some emotion, yet your search after Christ was very faint and dilatory, and consequently you did not meet with Him to the joy and peace of your spirit.

Now that the revival is over, and the flood-tide of grace seems to have ebbed out, you have come, like the dying year, to a time when the harvest is past and the summer is ended, and you are not saved. Around you blow the fallen leaves, and you yourself do fade as a leaf, but you are not saved. Opportunities of blessing have been plentiful with you, but you are not saved. You are now at the close of the day, and your sun is going down, but you are not saved. Even yet there is hope, for our Lord's welcome is a long and lasting one. If you be drawn by invisible cords to seek the Saviour, yield to those gentle drawings, for Jesus received men even down to the shutting of the gate. It may be late, but it is not too late.

It may be, dear friend, that you think the present would be a very improper time to come to Christ, because you have so lately been plunging into a fearful sin. You say, "Would you have me black-hearted to Christ?" Yes, I would have you fly to Him at once, even as the manslayer darted off to the city of refuge with the blood of the slain still warm upon His hand. Do you put it to me as a question suggested by a sort of moral decency—Must I not let an interval pass over me in which I may in a measure wash out the recollection of my present sin? No! I tell thee, no. I rather dread than desire such a false washing as the mere lapse of time can give. Time cannot alter wrong, or make sin less heinous; and if it pacifies the conscience it is an evil peace, a false peace, a peace to be abhorred.

GO BLACK-HANDED TO CHRIST,

My hearer, I will not try to describe your sin of last night, nor will I make a guess at what you propose to do in sin before to-morrow's sun has risen; but I will beseech you, as you are, to arise and seek the Saviour. Poor prodigal brother, quit the husks and the swine-trough; quit them now, and without so much as tarrying to wash your hands, go home to your Father, who will wash you and make you white as snow. Tarry for nothing. Delay is your greatest danger.

The same truth will now be set in another light by a second remark. Our Lord received all sorts of comers. They were a motley throng, and I fear that few, if any, of them were actuated by any high or exalted motive. No doubt some came to hear, and others came to see, but many came for what they could get. They followed after Jesus because they were sick, and He could heal them. "Ah me!" I have heard it said by awakened ones, "I am afraid, if I came to Christ, I should come from a selfish motive." Dismiss that fear, which at bottom is self-righteous; what to your house for but to seek an alms? To gain something is the only motive with which a poor sinner can come to Christ. Our fear of hell, or dread of sin, or hope of pardon, must drive or draw us to Christ; in any case our motive must be to receive at His hands. I confess that I at first came to Christ only and solely for what I could get out of Him.

"It is a low motive," says one. So it may be, but it is a powerful motive for all that. At any rate, Christ exhorts us to come unto Him for rest and for salvation, and I do not remember a single exhortation to ideal, disinterested love. The Lord Jesus welcomed the multitudes though they came from low motives, and so will He welcome us if we do but come to Him. If what we come for is something for ourselves, if we come to Him that sin may be forgiven, and that we may be made the children of God, our motives will not be disgusting to Christ, but He will welcome us.

Among those who came to Christ there must have been all sorts of people; but the bulk of them had hurried to Him hastily and unprepared. They came afoot, it is said, running. They had not had time to prepare themselves with any kind of decent apparel. As they ran scampering through the villages, each one gathered others at his heels, and they came helter-skelter, a most promiscuous throng. They were not dressed for solemn worship; but there they were, and the Saviour welcomed them. I wonder how long a man would need to spend in preparing himself for coming to Christ. When he had done it all, what would it be worth? Preparation for coming to Christ is simply this: If you are empty you are prepared to be filled; if you are sick you are prepared to be healed; if you are sinful you are prepared to be forgiven; but all other preparation is quite out of the question. They were a most unprepared lot of people; but Jesus welcomed them.

Most of them might have been objected to by our Lord if He had chosen to do so, for various reasons—the most of them on account of their poverty. They had not even a crust among them. They had come away in such a hurry that they had not brought a day's food with them, and if they came to Christ they must be fed by Him within a few hours, or else drop from sheer starvation. They were a hungry herd—what some fine folks call the mob, the canaille; but Jesus welcomed them, and never said a syllable about their bare backs and empty pockets. How squeamish some of His servants are; but their Master had no such proud ways about Him.

I heard one say the other day that he could not attend a place of worship because he had not clothes that were fit to come in. I wonder what sort of garments the Lord Jesus would object to in a coming sinner! I am afraid if He were to see some of you He would hardly think that you are dressed fit for public worship, for you are too smart by half; but I do not believe that He ever rejected a man or woman because of their patched or unfashionable garments. What cared He for court dress, and full dress, and all that nonsense? Our Lord was no flatterer of wealthy lords and handsome ladies. So, then, none of you can plead poverty. If you have not a penny to bless yourselves with, Christ will bless you without money and without price.

Many of the multitude might have been rejected on account of disease, for into the crowd the lepers came — disagreeable neighbors anywhere. They certainly had no right to mingle with healthy people, but they did so, for they had hopes of being healed. Men and women were there who labored under defiling disorders, for which, according to the Jewish law, they ought to have been shut up in a separate house; yet when the crowd came to Christ these poor souls came in among the rest, and there is no instance of the Lord's ever sorting them out and saying to any one, "I cannot receive you, for you are a leper." What a melancholy sight the Master must have seen when He went out into the streets, and they there laid the sick in their beds. He always walked in the midst of a great hospital, among the most horrible diseases, yet never once did He turn any case away. O poor souls, sick souls, come to Jesus at once, for my blessed Master will welcome you all, whoever you may be.

Neither did our Lord ever reject one person on account of youth. His disciples thought that such a preacher as He was ought never to be listened to except by persons of intellect, or at least of ripe years, who could appreciate what He would say; and when the mothers brought the children the disciples were much displeased with them; but our Master welcomed the young, saying, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Dear boys and girls, Jesus will not put you by to wait till you are older, but He will welcome you just as you are. Ah, how sweetly Jesus is doing this to my knowledge with many little folks.

I heard last week of a poor boy who used to live near my house. A meeting is held by some of our friends in a cottage, and this boy came one night, and said,

"PLEASE, SIR, MAY I COME IN?"

The good man of the house answered, "You may if you will wash your face and hands." "That I will do, sir," he said; and he soon returned and took his seat. He was an attentive hearer and a devout worshipper. Though only twelve years old he loved the prayer-meeting, and was always there. One evening he said to the leader of the meeting, "Please, sir, may I pray?" and this poor child then poured out his heart before God with such sweetness that he impressed all who listened to him. One night as he went out of the room he shook hands with the good man of the house and said, "Good-by, sir; perhaps we may not meet again till we meet in heaven." His words seem prophetic now, for before the next meeting a brewer's dray passed over him, and his sweet young spirit ascended to Jesus, whom he loved so well. What a joy to know that this poor child is now beholding the face of our Father who is in heaven.

I am right glad to say that we are continually receiving boys and girls into the church. Child-piety is no rarity among us; we find it no cause of difficulty, but a well-spring of delight. Dear children, do not be afraid to come because you are so little, for Jesus has told the big people that except they receive Him as little children they shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. He said also, "They that seek me early shall find me." Come to Him at once.

There were some in the throng, too, whom Jesus might have rejected because they were too old. Here they come! They can scarcely see their way; they limp, they use crutches, they are deaf, and their limbs are very feeble. Surely, when these poor old souls come to Jesus, He might say to them, "What am I to do with you worn-out old creatures? Go and spend the rest of your days where you spent the first part of them! How dare you think of coming to Me when you are bald-headed, feeble, lame, and blind? How can you be soldiers of the cross?" Glory be to His name, our great Captain enlists old men, makes friends with old women, and delights to magnify the greatness of His grace in the salvation of the most infirm.

"Well," say you, "I can understand His receiving both young and old; but surely sin must have led Him to refuse a comer." It was not so. Those who came to Christ were often very sinful; but He received sinners. Did you ever notice that the last person He spoke to before He died was the thief on the cross, and the first person He spoke to when He rose again was Mary Magdalene, out of whom He had cast seven devils? My Lord delights to draw near to the guiltiest of the guilty, to blot out their iniquities, and to receive them into His heart of love; so that I come back to what I said before: our Lord receives all sorts of comers.

Once more: our Lord receives all with a hearty welcome. He did not merely allow the people to come near, tolerating their presence, but "he welcomed them." When He saw that they were like sheep without a shepherd His heart was stirred within Him, and He at once laid Himself out to do them good. The sight of their need aroused His compassion; the deep fountains of His infinite love were broken up at once, and flooded His whole nature, so that "he was moved with compassion." He proved that He welcomed them by the deeds that He wrought for them. He taught them concerning the kingdom; He healed those that had need of healing; and He fed the whole five thousand. It is just so now. My blessed Master is glad to receive sinners, and this without a single exception on any ground, or for any reason whatever; for, "Him that cometh to me," saith He, "I will in no wise cast out." This is the blessed fact.

II. Now I come to use this as

AN ENCOURAGEMENT.

If Jesus Christ when He was here on earth welcomed all that came at all hours, then He will welcome you, my friend, if you come to Him now; for the circumstances are just the same. You are the same sort of person as those whom Jesus used to welcome. They were good-for-nothing bodies; they were persons that were full of need, and could not possibly bring a price with which to purchase His favor. Are you not just like them? Are you a very special sinner? I am sure I could find another special sinner like you whom Jesus has received. I will not go into detail; but I will venture to ask you, Are you a thief?

"The dying thief rejoiced to see
In Christ salvation full and free."

Have you been unchaste? David was an adulterer and was pardoned; and Jesus forgave a woman that was a sinner, who therefore loved Him much. The untruthful, the unclean, the ungodly are the sort of people that Jesus came to seek and save.

And then there is the same Saviour. Jesus Christ is the same gracious Pardoner as He was in the days of His flesh. "Why," say you, "He is in heaven." Yes, but I never knew anybody to lose anything by going to heaven: it is all the other way. Jesus has not lost His tenderness nor His compassion, nor His delight in blessing the sons of men. He is the same Saviour in glory that He was in His humiliation. I invite you to come, dear friend, though you are suffering from the same unfitness as these people were. Come just as you are, and come with the same expectation as they did; for they expected Him to work wonders for them, and He did so. Jesus is in the same mind as when He would not condemn the guilty woman, and when He prayed for His murderers; He is still bent upon the one errand of saving men; He still welcomes sinners. Since, then, you are under the same conditions, come, and expect the same result from your coming.

Sometimes people are not welcome because they come when you have not enough to feed them with. The good housewife murmurs, "I wish they had come some other day." It is never so with our Master. He has abundant provision; yet there is room, ay, and yet there is food. There is enough in Christ Jesus for all that ever will come to Him for salvation. All that the Father giveth Him shall come, and there is not one that shall come whom He will send away because there is not due provision made for him. That reason cannot possibly exist when Jesus Himself in all His fulness is the covenant provision.

Sometimes a host may not welcome an applicant because it would be dangerous to his reputation to entertain him. We should none of us be eager to entertain a thief or a burglar or a murderer in hiding from justice, nor would vagabonds and tramps be our chosen guests, for it would lower our esteem among men. As for our Lord Jesus, His reputation is gone long ago: "He made himself of no reputation," that He might welcome the disreputable to His house and heart. They sneeringly spread it about the streets, "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." Yes, His reputation was gone among the Pharisees; but He has a new reputation now, and His great glory is that He cleanses the chief of sinners, and makes them heirs of God. O my trembling hearer, you need not be afraid.

Sometimes a man who has been hospitable has been known to grow weary of it; for he says, "These people come and eat and drink, and then abuse me." Jesus has never been hardened by this; His house is open, and His table is furnished still. He foreknew our ill-manners, and He has not been surprised by the conduct of any of His guests. He knew they were unworthy; He did not entertain one of them because they deserved it; He did it all because He is infinitely gracious, and delights to do good to the unthankful and to the evil. This is why He keeps His house open still, that those who are ready to perish may come, that the worthless and undeserving may come and participate in the bounties of His grace.

Thus I have labored to encourage you. O that the Spirit of God may give effect to my words.

III. Thirdly, we use our text as

A LESSON.

Dear friends, if Jesus Christ welcomes all that come to Him, let all of us who are His followers imitate His example, and give a warm welcome to those who seek the Lord. Whatever their motive is, whenever we see people coming to the worship of God, and especially when we see them a little impressed, let us welcome them heartily. It is a grievous sin when strangers come in and find themselves stared at as if they were wild beasts; nobody offers them a seat; they may stand till they drop, but nobody cares an atom about them, and they may come again, and go in and out for the month together, and never a word is spoken to them. I pray you, do not so; but, on the contrary, look out personally for individuals, and try to win them for Jesus.

SEVEN PEOPLE SAVED BY A SMILE.

It is a pretty story. A clergyman passes by a window on his way to church. A baby was being dandled there, and he smiled at the baby, and the baby at him. Another time he passed; the baby was there again, and once more he smiled. Soon baby was taken to the window at the hour when he usually passed. They did not know who the gentleman was; but one day two of the older children followed to see where he went on a Sunday. They followed him to church, and as he preached in a winning way, they told their father and mother, who felt interest enough in their baby's friend to wish to go. Thus in a short time a godless family that had previously neglected the worship of God was brought to the Saviour because the minister smiled at the baby. I never heard of anybody getting to heaven through frowning at the baby, or at any one else.

Certain wonderfully good persons go through the world as if they were commissioned to impress everybody with the awful solemnity of religion; they resemble a winter's night without a moon; nobody seems attracted, nor even impressed, by them except in the direction of dislike. I saw a life-buoy the other day covered with luminous paint. How bright it seemed, how suitable to be cast upon the dark sea to help a drowning man! An ordinary life-buoy he would never see, but this is so bright and luminous that a man must see it. Give me a soul-winner bright with holy joy, for he will be seen by the sorrowing soul, and his help will be accepted. Cover your lives with the luminous paint of cheerfulness, compounded of joy and peace through believing. Smile Christ into mourners' hearts by God's grace. It can be done if the Holy Sprit will only give you a lesson.

Jesus welcomed them; let us warmly welcome all comers. Do not seem to say to them, "You want to be saved, do you?" "Yes." "You had better mind what you are about; you know there are a great many hypocrites. I am not sure of your sincerity. Do you really want to be saved?" If the seeker cries, "Oh, sir, what must I do to be saved?" do not answer with icy words, "Do not be so excited. Be calm, and let me lay the Gospel before you in a clear, didactic manner, for fear you should be deceived. I hope it is all right with you, and that these desires are not mere natural excitement, but are the fruit of the Spirit. Still it is my duty to be faithful and put you to the test." Why, my dear friend, if you had been in a right state of heart you would have led that man into the kingdom of heaven before you had got half through those cautious remarks. Give him a loving, hearty welcome, and not a cold, suspicious searching. Say, "Do you want to be saved?" "Yes." "Then come and welcome; believe in the Lord Jesus and He is yours. You want Jesus Christ, do you?" "Yes." "Come along; He waits to be gracious; He is here present; and all you have to do is to trust in Him."

"But some are so poor that if they are received into the church they will be of no service to it; they will rather be dependent upon its charity than helpful to its funds." Yes, but these are the sort of people that our Lord used to welcome, and why should not we? It will be an evil day for any church when it despises any class of men. There will come a curse upon a church that looks to men's garments and purses, and values them according to the guinea stamp. This will never do. Is he a man? Then he has an immortal soul about him. Does he seek the Saviour? Christ bids us encourage him. Is he a sinner? Christ can cleanse him. Is he troubled about his sin? Jesus can give him rest. Let us help him, however loathsome his past life may have been, and however little he may be able to do in return.

If any one here wishes to find mercy and cannot find it, I would during the last minute of my discourse try to welcome him. Friend, thou sayest, "How can I be saved?" Have you ever heard the Gospel, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved?" "Yes," say you, "but I do not think I believe aright." Listen. Here is

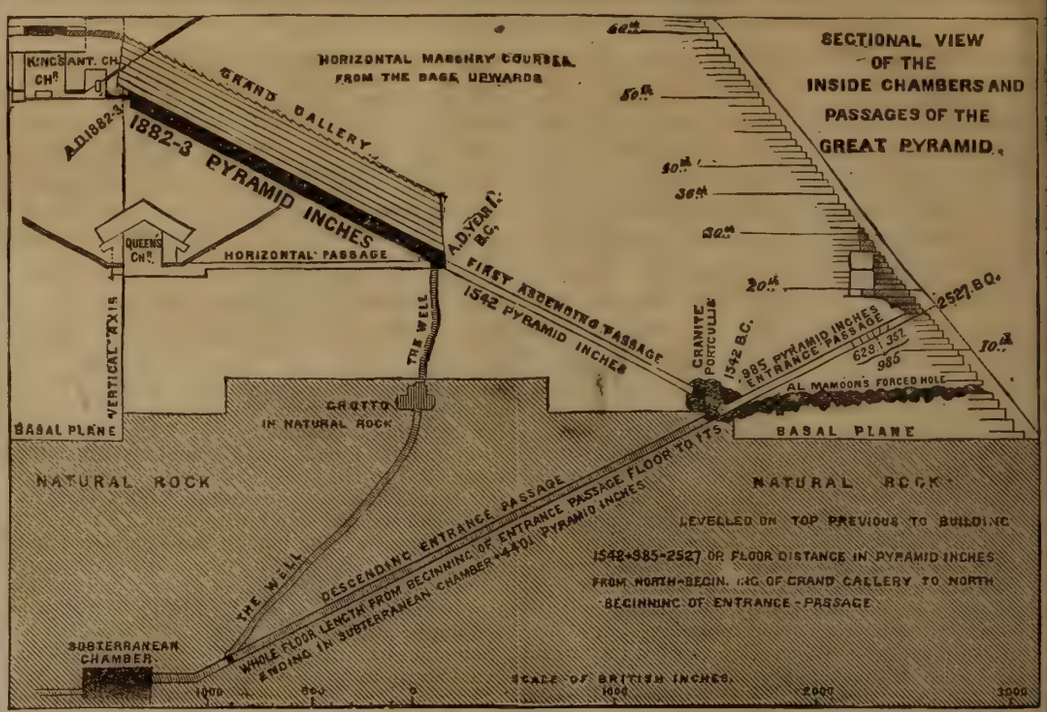
A VERSE FOR YOU.

Get out your New Testament. Look out John 5 · 24. Turn it down. Turn it down, and read it when you get home. I beg all of you who have not found the Saviour to mark that passage: read it carefully, and keep on reading it over and over again for an hour. Read it over ten thousand times, if need be, for I want you to find salvation through it. I know this text will save any man living, God blessing it to him. Here it is:

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."

What a grand verse! Is there anything in it about believing aright? Not a syllable. Only let a man truly believe and he "hath" (it is not said "shall have")—he has now "everlasting life." Mark that—not a life that will die out in a quarter of a year if he does not mind—no, but "hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." Suck at that text, poor soul; salvation lies in it. Believe in Jesus and you are saved. May God help you to believe it by His blessed Spirit, and you shall live unto Him henceforth and forever. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Mark 6: 7-44.].



THE GREAT PYRAMID PROPHECY ABOUT A.D. 1882-83.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

The Commencement of the Latter-Day Time of Trouble—Views of Professor Piazzi Smyth—Astronomer-Royal for Scotland — Rev. Dr. Seiss, of Philadelphia—Other Authorities.

THE Great Pyramid of Egypt is one of the acknowledged seven wonders of the world. This pyramid is supposed to have been built about the year 2170 before Christ, and consists of an enormous solid mass of stones, covering an exactly square space of ground, which is 763 feet wide on each of the four sides of its base—about 13 acres. Each of its four sides gradually slants upward until they reach their highest summit, which constitutes the apex of the pyramid, at a height of 486 feet from the earth. This is much higher than St. Paul's Cathedral, London, which is only 370 feet in height. No building in the world equals it in height or size. (See Illustration above.)

In the very heart and centre of this gigantic mass of stone there is an interior chamber, called the King's Chamber, 412 inches long, 206 inches broad, and 230 inches high—that is to say, about 11¼ yards in length, 6 yards wide, and 6½ yards high. This chamber is reached from the outside by a long narrow passage, which is between 3 and 4 feet wide, and which is clearly marked on the accompanying sectional diagram of the inside of the pyramid.

This passage from the outside first goes downward for 985 inches, and this portion of it is called, for the sake of distinction, the Entrance Passage. The passage then proceeds upward for 1542 inches further, which portion is termed the First Ascending Passage. The passage then suddenly becomes about seven times higher, for it increases in height from 47 inches to 339 inches, and consequently from this point onward it is called the Grand Gallery for a distance of 1882 or 1883 inches, at the end of which the passage abruptly decreases in height from 339 inches to 43 inches, i.e., about 3½ feet, so that a man has to stoop very much to creep onward. This very low exit-passage leading out of the Grand Gallery continues for 52 inches, and then comes what is termed the Antechamber, which is 116 inches long, 65 inches broad, and 149 inches wide. After this, the passage becomes narrower and lower for a distance of 100 inches, and then enters at once into the capacious King's Chamber, inside which there stands a granite coffer (see the sectional diagram).

The view maintained by Professor Piazzi Smyth, Astronomer-Royal for Scotland, and by the learned Dr. Seiss, of Philadelphia, and some other eminent writers, is that the pyramid was constructed by Jewish architects, who (whether consciously or unconsciously) erected it according to a divinely-inspired plan, and that the length of its interior passages in inches figuratively represents periods of an equal number of years. Therefore THE LENGTH OF THE GRAND GALLERY AS 1882-3 INCHES PREFIGURES AND REPRESENTS THE LENGTH OF THE CHRISTIAN DISPENSATION as 1882-3 YEARS, and the succeeding low exit passage represents the ensuing Time of Trouble and Distress of Nations accompanying the Second Advent of Christ, and the considerable Depopulation of the Earth, which will not be fully repaired until more than a generation has elapsed after Christ's Advent and the commencement of His personal reign over the nations of this earth for 1000 years.

It is an extraordinary fact that this Pyramid Prophecy of the Time of Trouble to commence about A.D. 1882-3 mainly agrees with certain chronological prophecies in Daniel and Revelation. For example, the 1260 years (Daniel 12 : 7 ; Revelation 11 : 2), which is universally allowed to be the measurement of the Mohammedan as well as the Papal Antichrist, has been calculated by many to commence in A.D. 622, the starting-point of the Mohammedan calendar, and therefore to end in 1882, by which time some tremendous blow will be inflicted on Mohammedanism and the Turkish Empire (the mystic Euphrates), which is the principal stronghold and bulwark of the temporal power of Mohammedanism.

Then again the 1335 years (Dan. 12 : 12), starting in 555-8, have been calculated to end about 1890 to 1893, as the close of this dispensation ; and if so, the final seven years (Antichrist's covenant-week with the Jews—Dan. 9 : 27) will commence about 1883-6. The epoch of 1882-3 may be either the commencement of the final seven years or the final decade of ten years, as the latter day time of trouble. For great wars and revolutions must take place during the two or three years preceding the final Seven Years in order to accomplish the following events : the transmutation of the existing nineteen countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire into exactly ten confederated kingdoms under ten kings ; the subsequent rise of an eleventh Little Horn or Sovereign over a little kingdom (Dan. 7 : 24 ; 8 : 9) in the regions of Greece or Syria, who will be a Napoleon (Revelation 9 : 11) ; his "waxing exceeding great toward the South and toward the East, and toward the pleasant land" (Palestine), and his becoming king of Syria (king of the north), and his making a seven years' covenant with the Jews, which commences the final seven years (Dan. 8 : 9 ; 11 : 21 ; 9 : 27). The ten kingdoms are expected to be—1. Britain, separated from Ireland ; 2. France, extended to the Rhine ; 3. Spain, with Portugal added to it ; 4. Italy ; 5. Austria ; 6. Bulgaria ; 7. Egypt ; 8. Greece ; 9. Syria ; 10. Thracian Turkey.

After the time of trouble and distress of nations, which commences about A.D. 1882-3, and ends about 1890-3, has run its course, there will ensue the 1000 years of the millennium, according to Revelation 20 ; and it is noticeable that there are, in round numbers, nearly 1010 inches (prefiguring the few years of trouble, and the subsequent millennial 1000 years) from the end of the 1883 inches of the Grand Gallery to the top of the King's Chamber, if a line be carried straight on as far as it can go, from the Grand Gallery through the Antechamber and the King's Chamber (travelling over the Coffer) and running to the top of the terminating wall of the King's Chamber. (See sectional diagram showing the King's Chamber.)

A MOTHER'S LAST INJUNCTION.

IN a city office one busy day a young man was seated examining invoices and checking accounts. He was the junior partner in an enterprising firm whose transactions were of a very extensive character. He had entered the warehouse as an office boy, and had worked his way up to his position as junior partner by sheer industry and business capacity. Presently he pushed aside his books, saying, "I do not know how it is, but I cannot concentrate my thoughts to-day ; I have a presentiment of coming trouble. But presentiments are delusive in nine cases out of ten, and this is probably one of the nine. I will go on 'Change for half an hour and try to shake it off."

So saying, he rose from his desk and turned to the door. As he did so a telegraph messenger entered and placed an envelope in his hands. He opened it hastily and read a message from his sister in a distant State. It was short, but to him very distressing. It said, "Come immediately ; our mother is dangerously sick." Theodore Yates loved his widowed mother very dearly, and he staggered into a chair overwhelmed by the shock his sister's message inflicted. But prompt action was necessary, and his business habits in a few minutes came to his aid. Leaving brief directions as to his department and correspondence, he walked quickly into his partner's office, and in a few words told the sad news and explained the necessity for his absence. In a short time he was on the cars speeding at express rate to the home of his childhood.

As he travelled he had leisure to think. Could it be possible, he asked himself, that his mother was dying? He had always paid her a visit once a year, and at his last visit some six months before she was looking strong and well. Since then no intimation of failing health had reached him until that startling message arrived. This must be some sudden illness which had come upon her, and knowing well the pain it would inflict, his sister would not have so telegraphed unless there were real cause for alarm. Fast as he travelled, the hours he passed on the cars seemed weeks to the anxious man, and when at last he reached his destination, he hurried with impetuous steps to the old home.

His sister's face, as she admitted him, bore that solemn look we are accustomed to see on the faces of those in the presence of death. She shook her head in response to her brother's anxious query, and beckoned him to follow her to her mother's chamber. There lay the form both loved so well, and on the face of the sufferer were signs of approaching dissolution that could not be misunderstood. Mrs. Yates was dying, slowly but surely, and not all the skill of experienced physicians could save save her. At the sight of her stalwart son, whose coming she had for many hours been eagerly expecting, a bright glad light came into her eyes, and though too feeble to embrace him, her face showed the joy his presence brought.

A Mother's Last Injunction.

"I have sent for you, my son," the dying lady said, "to take a last farewell and to ask you to carry out my last injunction." Theodore uttered some broken words implying that he could not give up hope, but his mother interrupted him. "No," she said, "there is no hope of recovery; I know I am dying; and except that I must leave my children, I have no regret at leaving the world, for I know that beyond the grave a home awaits me, as our Saviour promised, where I shall be forever with my Lord." The hearts of both her listeners, wrung as they were with sorrow, could not but admit that Mrs. Yates was right; she had but a few hours to live.

After a few moments she said, "I wanted to speak to you about my jewels," and in obedience to a gesture her daughter left the room and presently returned with an antique case which she laid on the bed. When it was opened it revealed a set of costly gems, among which a splendid necklace of opals and diamonds shone resplendent. "You have never seen these before," Mrs. Yates said to her son. "They have been kept securely hidden, for I could not bear the sight of them. They were near costing me the salvation of my soul. Your father gave them to me soon after we were married, and I never was so proud of anything in my life. I would go to balls and parties and the theatre, for these jewels attracted attention, and I loved to be noticed. They held me to my worldly life, and when I tried to give my heart to the Saviour they formed a barrier which only His love enabled me to surmount. I want these jewels sold, and the proceeds given to the cause of Christ. I intrust that commission to you, my son, and I know you will fulfil it."

The young man, who had sunk into a chair as his mother spoke, and had buried his face in his hands to hide his grief, rose and gave the promise. Before morning Mrs. Yates died, and after the last sad rites were performed the young man returned to the city bearing with him the jewels which were laid as a trophy at the feet of the Saviour.

"I Belong to Death's Master," was the Expression of a Christian woman lately, who at length died of internal cancer. She was attended by a Roman Catholic nurse, who was very much astonished at the calm patience and peace of the poor sufferer. A lady called to see her one day. The door was opened by the nurse. "How is Mrs. Bristow to-day?" inquired the visitor. "She is very ill, sir," was the reply. The nurse then gave the following details: "Last night she was seized with violent pain and I thought she was dying. I said to her, 'You are dying; shall I send for a clergyman to prepare you for death?' 'Oh, no,' she said, 'I want no minister, for I am ready to die at any moment.' 'But,' I said, 'are you not afraid to die?' 'No, indeed, not a bit,' she replied. 'Tell me why you are not afraid to die, when you have not been prepared by your clergyman, nor received the rites of your church?' I said. 'Because,' she replied, joyously, 'I belong to death's Master. I am a poor sinner saved by grace, and His blood has washed away my sin, and secured me a title to glory.'"

MY COMPANY.

By Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

I HAVE read of one who dreamed a dream when in great distress of mind about religion. He thought he stood in the outer court of heaven, and he saw a glorious host marching up, singing sweet hymns, and bearing the banners of victory; and they passed by him through the gate, and when they vanished he heard in the distance sweet strains of music.

"Who are they?" he asked.

"They are the goodly fellowship of the prophets, who have gone to be with God."

And he heaved a deep sigh as he said, "Alas, I am not one of them, and never shall be, and I cannot enter there."

By and by there came another band equally lovely in appearance, and equally triumphant, and robed in white. They passed within the portals, and again were shouts of welcome heard within.

"Who are they?"

"They are the goodly fellowship of the apostles."

"Alas," he said, "I belong not to that fellowship and I cannot enter there."

He still waited and lingered, in the hope that he might yet go in; but the next multitude did not encourage him, for they were the noble army of martyrs. He could not go with them, nor wave their palm branches. He waited still and saw that the next was a company of godly ministers and officers of Christian churches; but he could not go with them.

At last, as he walked, he saw a larger host than all the rest put together, marching and singing most melodiously, and in front walked the woman that was a sinner; and the thief that died upon the cross hard by the Saviour; and he looked long, and saw there such as Manasseh and the like; and when they entered he could see who they were, and he thought:

"There will be no shouting about them."

But to his astonishment it seemed as if all heaven was rent with seven-fold shouts as they passed in. And the Angels said to him:

"These are they that are mighty sinners, saved by mighty grace"

And then he said:

"Blessed be God! I can go with them."

And so he awoke.

Gospel Cars on the Railroads is a Suggestion made by a Christian business man who spends much of his time in travelling. He pleads that as the railroad companies provide a car for smokers they might also provide a car in which those who desired might spend the time on their journey in the worship of God. Conductor Harris, of the Old Colony Railroad, in a letter to the Boston Journal avers that the suggestion is a practicable one. He writes: "There are hundreds of Christian men, who delight in the worship of God, who spend from six to twelve hours per week on the railroad between home and business. Now why not utilize this time to the glory of God? What a fitting it would be for the business of the day. Instead of card tables have an organ or piano, have the seats arranged facing the centre of the car. Instead of spittoons have a carpet; instead of cards have Bibles and Gospel song books. I venture twenty years railroad experience that it is practicable."

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

The Senior Partner.

LONG as the daylight lasts in May, it was after nightfall when Felicita left her study and went down to the drawing-room, more elegantly and expensively furnished for her than the drawing-room at Riversdale had been. Its extravagant display seemed to strike upon her suddenly as she entered it. Phebe was gone home, and Madame had retired to her own room, having given up the expectation of seeing Felicita that day. Mr. Clifford, the servant told her, was still in the bank, with his lawyer, for whom he had telegraphed to London. Felicita sent him a message that if he was not too busy she wished to see him for a few minutes.

Mr. Clifford almost immediately appeared, and Felicita saw him for the first time. She had always heard him called old; but he was a strong, erect, stern-looking man of sixty, with keen, cold eyes that could not be avoided. Felicita did not seek to avoid them. She looked as steadily at him as he did at her. There were traces of tears on her face, but there was no tremor or weakness about her. They exchanged a few civil words as calmly as if they were ordinary acquaintances.

"Tell me briefly what has happened," she said to him, when he had taken a seat near to her.

"Briefly?" he repeated. "Well! I find myself robbed of securities worth nearly eight thousand pounds; private securities, bond and scrip, left in custody only, not belonging to the firm. No one but Acton or Roland could have access to them. Acton has eluded me; but if Roland is found he must take the consequences."

"And what are those?" asked Felicita.

"I shall prosecute him as I would prosecute a common thief or burglar," answered Mr. Clifford. "His crime is more dishonorable and cowardly."

"Is it not cruel to say this to me?" she asked, yet in a tranquil tone which startled him.

"Cruel!" he repeated again; "I have not been in the habit of choosing words. You asked me a question, and I gave you the answer that was in my mind. I never forgive. Those who pass over crimes make themselves partakers in those crimes. Roland has robbed not only me, but half a dozen poor persons, to whom such a loss is ruin. Would it be right to let such a man escape justice?"

"You think he has gone away on purpose?" she said.

"He has absconded," answered Mr. Clifford, "and the matter is already in the hands of the police. A description of him has been telegraphed to every police-station in the kingdom. If he is not out of it he can barely escape now."

Felicita's pale face could not grow paler, but she shivered perceptibly.

"I am telling you bluntly," he said, "because I believe it is best to know the worst at once. It is terrible to have it falling drop by drop. You have courage and strength; I see it. Take an old man's word for it, it is better to know all in its naked ugliness, than have it brought to light bit by bit. There is not the shadow of a doubt of Roland's crime. You do not believe him innocent yourself?"

"No," she replied, in a low, yet steady voice, "no. I must tell the truth. I cannot comfort myself with the belief that he is innocent."

Mr. Clifford's keen eyes were fastened upon Felicita with admiration. Here was a woman, young and pallid with grief and dread, who neither tried to move him by prayers and floods of tears, nor shrank from acknowledging the truth, however painful. He had never seen her before, though the costly set of jewels she was wearing had been his own gift to her on her wedding. He recognized them with pleasure, and looked more attentively at her beautiful but gloomy face. When he spoke again it was in a manner less harsh and abrupt than it had been before.

"I am not going to ask you any questions about Roland," he said; "you have a right, the best right in the world, to screen him, and aid him in escaping from the just consequences of his folly and crime."

"You might ask me," she interrupted, "and I should tell you the simple truth. I do so now when I say I know nothing about him. He told me he was going to London. But is it not possible that poor Acton alone was guilty?"

Mr. Clifford shook his head in reply. For a few minutes he paced up and down the floor, and then placed himself at the back of Felicita, with his hand upon her chair, as if to support him. In a glass opposite she could see the reflection of his face, gray and agitated, with closed eyes and quivering lips—a face that looked ten years older than that which she had seen when he entered the room. She felt the chair shaken by his trembling hand.

"I will tell you," he said in a voice which he strove to render steady. "I did not spare my own son when he had defrauded Roland's father. Though Sefton would not prosecute him, I left him to reap the harvest of his deed to the full; and it was worse than the penalty the law would have exacted. He perished, disgraced and forsaken, of starvation, in Paris, the city of pleasures and of crimes. They told me that my son was little more than a living skeleton when he was found, so slowly had the end come. If I did not spare him, can I relent toward Roland? The justice I demand is, in comparison, mercy for him."

As he finished speaking he opened his eyes and saw those of Felicita fastened on the reflection of his face in the mirror. He turned away, and in a minute or two resumed his seat, and spoke again in his ordinary abrupt tone.

"What will you do?" he asked.

"I cannot tell yet," she answered; "I must wait till suspense is over. If Roland comes back, or is brought back," she faltered, "then I must decide what to do. I shall keep to myself till then. Is there anything I can do?"

"Could you go to your uncle, Lord Riversdale?" suggested Mr. Clifford.

"No, no," she cried, "I will not ask any help from him. He arranged my marriage for me, and he will feel this disgrace keenly. I will keep out of their way; they shall not be compelled to forbid me their society."

"But to-morrow you had better go away for the day," he answered; "there will be people coming and going, who will disturb you. There will be a rigorous search made. There is a detective now with my lawyer, who is looking through the papers in the bank. The police have taken possession of Acton's lodgings."

"I have nowhere to go," she replied, "and I cannot show my face out of doors. Madame and the children shall go to Phebe Marlowe; but I must bear it as well as I can."

"Well," he said, after a brief pause, "I will make it as easy as I can for you. You are thinking me a hard man? Yes, I have grown hard. I was soft enough once. But if I forgave any sinner now I should do my boy, who is dead, an awful injustice. I would not pass over his sin, and I dare not pass over any other. I know I shall pursue Roland until his death or mine; my son's fate cries out for it. But I'm not a hard man toward innocent sufferers, like you and his poor mother. Try to think of me as your friend; nay, even Roland's friend, for what would a few years' penal servitude be compared with my boy's death? Shake hands with me before I go."

The small delicate hand she offered him was icy cold, though her face was still calm and her eyes clear and dry. He was himself more moved and agitated than she appeared to be. The mention of his son always shook him to the very centre of his soul; yet he had not been able to resist uttering the words that had passed his lips during this painful interview with Roland's young wife. Unshed tears were burning under his eyelids. But if it had not been for that deathlike hand he might have imagined her almost unmoved.

Felicita was down-stairs before Madame the next morning, and had ordered the carriage to be ready to take her and the children to Upfold Farm directly after breakfast. It was so rare an incident for their mother to be present at the breakfast-table that Felix and Hilda felt as if it were a holiday. Madame was pale and sad, and for the first time Felicita thought of her as being a sufferer by Roland's crime. Her husband's mother had been little more to her than a superior housekeeper, who had been faithfully attached to her and her children. The homely, gentle, domestic foreigner, from a humble Swiss home, had looked up to her young aristocratic daughter-in-law as a being from a higher sphere. But now the downcast, sorrowful face of the elder woman touched Felicita's sympathy.

"Mother!" she said, as soon as the children had run away to get ready for their drive. She had never before called Madame "mother," and a startled look, almost of delight, crossed Madame's sad face.

"My daughter!" she cried, running to Felicita's side and throwing her arms timidly about her, "he is sure to come back soon—to-day, I think. Oh yes, he will be here when we return! You do well to stay to meet him; and I should be glad to be here but for the children. Yes, the little ones must be out of the way. They must not see their father's house searched; they must never know how he is suspected. Acton did say it was all his fault; his fault and—"

But here Madame paused for an instant, for had not Acton said it was Felicita's fault more than any one's?

"Phebe heard him," she went on hastily; "and if it is not his fault, why did he kill himself? Oh, it is an ill-fortune that my son went to London that day! It would all be right if he were here; but he is sure to come to-day and explain it all; and the bank will be opened again. So be of good comfort, my daughter; for God is present with us, and with my son also."

It was a sorrowful day at the Upfold Farm in spite of the children's unconscious mirthfulness. Old Marlowe locked himself into his workshop, and would see none of them, taking his meals there in sullen anger. Phebe's heart was almost broken with listening to Madame's earnest asseverations of her son's perfect innocence, and her eager hopes to find him when she reached home. It was nearly impossible to her to keep the oppressive secret, which seemed crushing her into deception and misery, and her own muteness appeared to herself more condemnatory than any words could be. But Madame did not notice her silence, and her grief was only natural.

Phebe's tears fell like balm on Madame's aching heart. Felicita had not wept; but this young girl, and her abandonment to passionate bursts of tears, who needed consoling herself, was a consolation to the poor mother. They knelt together in Phebe's little bedroom, while the children were playing on the wide uplands around them, and they prayed silently, if heavy sobs and sighs could be called silence; but they prayed together, and for her son; and Madame returned home comforted and hopeful.

It had been a day of fierce trial to Felicita. She had not formed any idea of how searching would be the investigation of the places where any of her husband's papers might be found. Her own study was not exempt from the prying eyes of the detectives. This room, sacred to her, which Roland himself never entered without permission, was ransacked, and forever desecrated in her eyes. This official meddling with her books and her papers could never be forgotten. The pleasant place was made an abomination to her.

The bank was reopened the next morning at the accustomed hour, for a very short investigation by Mr. Clifford and the experienced advisers summoned from London to assist him proved that the revenues of the firm were almost as good as ever. The panic had been caused by the vague rumor afloat of some mysterious complicity in crime between the absent partner and the clerk who had committed suicide. It was, therefore, considered necessary for the prosperous re-establishment of the bank to put forth a cautiously worded circular, in which Mr. Clifford's return was made the reason for the absence on a long journey of Roland Sefton, whose disappearance had to be accounted for. By the time he was arrested and brought to trial the confidence of the bank's customers in its stability would in some measure be regained.

There was thus a good deal of conjecture and of contradictory opinion abroad in Riversborough concerning Roland Sefton, which continued to be the town's talk for some weeks. Even Madame began to believe in a half bewildered manner that her son had gone on a journey of business connected with the bank, though she could not account for his total silence. Sometimes she wondered if he and Felicita could have had some fatal quarrel, which had driven him away from home in a paroxysm of passionate disappointment and bitterness. Felicita's coldness and indifference might have done it. With this thought, and the hope of his return some day, she turned for relief to the discharge of her household duties, and to the companionship of the children, who knew nothing except that their father was gone away on a journey, and might come back any day.

Neither Madame nor the children knew that whenever they left the house they were followed by a detective, and every movement was closely watched. But Felicita was conscious of it by some delicate sensitiveness of her imaginative temperament. She refused to quit the house except in the evening, when she rambled about the garden, and felt the fresh air from the river breathing against her ofter aching temples. Even then she fancied an eye upon her—an unsleeping, unblinking eye; the unwearying vigilance of justice on the watch for a criminal.

It was a positive pain to her when reviews of her book appeared in various papers, and were forwarded to her with congratulatory letters from her publishers. She was living far enough from London to be easily persuaded, without much vanity, that her name was upon everybody's lips there. She read the reviews, but with a sick heart, and the words were forgotten, as soon as she put them away; but the Riversborough papers, which had been very guarded in their statements about the death of Acton and the events of the Old Bank, took up the book with what appeared to her fulsome and offensive enthusiasm.

It had never occurred to her that local criticism was certain to follow the appearance of a local writer; and she shrank from it with morbid and exaggerated disgust. Even if all had been well, if Roland had been beside her, their notices would have been well-nigh intolerable to her. She could not have endured being stared at and pointed out in the streets of her own little town. But now Fame had come to her with broken wings and cracked trumpet; and she shuddered at the sound of her own name harshly proclaimed through it.

It even became evident that Roland Sefton had succeeded in getting away out of the country. The police were at fault; and as no one in his own home knew how to communicate with him, no clew had been discovered by close surveillance of their movements. Such vigilance could be kept up only for a few months at the longest, and as the summer drew toward the end it ceased.

THE YEAR OF JUBILEE.

S. S. Lesson for November 20th, Lev. 25 : 1–17. Golden Text, Ps. 89 : 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE are about to consider in our lesson for today the sabbaths or periods of rest which the Lord commanded to His ancient people. Work was at first laid as a curse upon mankind. God said to Adam in the day of his sin, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; . . . In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" (Gen. 3 : 17–19). The Lord Jesus, when He came on earth to take upon Himself the consequences of the fall of man, sanctified labor by the work of His own hands, and in the example and teaching of Paul, labor is most strongly enforced. "If any man would not work, neither should he eat" (2 Thess. 3 : 10).

Nevertheless, the end of God's work is rest, which implies satisfaction. "On the seventh day (the day of perfection) God ended His work which He had made; and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made" (Gen. 2 : 2). It was only when imperfection became perfection that God could rest; it is only when we learn to cease from our own works as God did from His, that we enter into His rest (Heb. 4 : 10). The end of God's work upon us, His children, is that we may learn to rest in Him, and that He may rest in us, that there may be mutual satisfaction. Worry, distress, agitation, struggling, all cease where there is the rest of satisfaction.

Besides the typical teaching for ourselves, we cannot but notice the fatherly care of our God for His people in His institutions for them. He ordained that when they should be come into the land which He had given them, the land should "keep a sabbath unto the Lord." During six years they might sow, and reap, and labor, but on the seventh year there was to be neither sowing, nor reaping, nor labor. Here was an antidote to avarice. He taught them this: "It is but lost labor that ye haste to rise up early, and so late take rest, and eat the bread of carefulness; for so He giveth His beloved sleep" (Ps. 127 : 3 P.B.V.).

Then also for the health of man and of animals, what a boon! How often, for want of taking things quietly and allowing time for rest, the brain of a man of business or of a Christian worker has become so enfeebled that a year of absolute mental inaction has become an imperative necessity; and how often has God been obliged to suspend altogether the usefulness of Christian workers, because they have not learned to keep sabbath, and to know that the time of rest, i.e., of communing with God, the "sabbath for the Lord" is really of far more importance than all their active labor. It is true sabbath-keeping which gives stamina to work, and which exercises us in a life of faith.

The children of Israel were allowed, in the sabbatical year, to eat of the fruit which grew of itself, but not to harvest it. "That which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed: for it is a year of rest unto the land. And the sabbath of the land shall be meat for you; for thee, and for thy servant, and for thy maid, and for thy hired servant, and for thy stranger that sojourneth with thee, and for thy cattle, and for the beasts that are in thy land shall all the increase thereof be for meat." But many difficulties might have arisen from such an arrangement. For instance, the people could not go out into the field in all weathers to gather corn enough for food, and a few weeks after the corn was ripe it would rot upon the ground if it were not harvested, and the field-mice would eat it, and the birds devour it. So the Lord made a precious provision that the sixth year should be one of especial blessing, which should "bring forth fruit for three years," i.e., for the sixth year, the seventh or sabbatical year, and the eighth year. "And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in ye shall eat of the old store." What a lesson for us of the power of God, and how easily He can dispense with man's labor!

After seven sabbath years, that is after forty-nine years, "Then thou shalt cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month; in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet to sound throughout all your land. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you, and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family." Oh, what a burst of joy must there have been! families reunited, poor men made rich, servants released again. When Jesus comes to reign, and the world has reached its sabbath, when the six thousand years of sin, labor, oppression, sorrow, and death have run their course, and the blessed millennium dawns, then, under the immediate rule of Christ Himself, all bonds shall be broken, all oppression at an end. "Upon Mount Zion shall be deliverance, and there shall be holiness, and the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions" (Ob. 17).

But even now, coming as the anointed One, God's Christ, He says: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me because He hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord," i.e., the year of jubilee, the year of going free (Luke 4 : 18, 19). Blessed be our God, no power of the enemy can prevail since Jesus has conquered him; there is no need for us to remain subject to that which Jesus has vanquished; "Sin shall have no dominion over you" (Rom. 6 : 14), for the year of jubilee is come; we need be slaves to long-formed, inveterate habits no longer, for the year of jubilee is come. Sickness, and even death, are subject to Him; why then be slaves to fears and apprehensions?

Among the children of Israel all things were regulated with a view to the year of jubilee; no sale of land could take place without the condition that it should go free in the year of jubilee, and the price was counted accordingly; it could not be mortgaged and forfeited for the price of the mortgage; it was the gift of God, and His gifts, as well as His calling, are without repentance. "The land shall not be sold for ever, for the land is mine." However poor a man might have become, and however unable to redeem his land, still, in the year of jubilee it must return into his possession. The law of house property, if it were situated in unwalled villages, was the same as the land law: in the year of jubilee every house which had been sold returned to its first owner. But a house in a walled city, which was not redeemed in the first year after it was sold, remained the possession of the buyer, and should not go out in the jubilee. God did not watch over the property already surrounded with man's defences, as He did over that which lay unprotected save by Him. Lord, teach us this lesson of trust!

The cities of the Levites, and the houses within them, might be redeemed at any time, but in all cases they must go free in the year of jubilee; their land, however, might never be sold, "for it is their perpetual possession." This was the immediate gift of God, while the houses were built by the hand of man, a precious token that God abides by the gifts which He has given us, and never withdraws them; if we are true Levites, we are losers only by the works of our own hands. There was intense love and mercy in the law regarding servants. An Israelite might hire one of his poor brethren as a yearly hired servant, but never as a slave; and in any case he must let him go free in the year of jubilee; then he must depart, he and his family, and return to his own family and his own possessions. "For unto me the children of Israel are servants; they are my servants whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: I am the Lord your God."

Did the children of Israel keep these sabbaths unto the Lord? While the bondage of ceaseless labor was hard upon the necks of the heathen, did they see the children of Israel at rest every sabbath day, at rest every sabbath year, and in all the jubilance of freedom and restored possession every fiftieth year? and did they see that this people could afford all this ceasing from hard labor, and yet receive more increase in the fruits of the earth than they, because the Lord cared for them? Surely God meant that by this fact the heathen should be convinced of the immediate intervention of God, and of His care for His people? Alas, no! Even before the death of Moses, he prophesied, in God's name, that if they would not hearken unto Him, and do His commandments, He would bring many judgments upon them, and He said, "Your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths as long as it lieth desolate, and ye shall be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest and enjoy her sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it" (Lev. 26 : 34, 35). In the sad history of Judah's captivity this prophecy was fulfilled; it lasted "until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for, as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years" (2 Chron. 36 : 21). From this we gather that for four hundred and ninety years the sabbaths had not been kept. Now let us learn, by the grace of God, to enter into a true life of sabbath, for only so can the blessing of God make our lives fruitful.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The First Decision of the New Irish Land Court has been against the landowners. A tenant named McAtavey, who has spent four years in this country, applied to the court. He rents ten acres, for which he paid rent equivalent to $44. Several witnesses were called to prove that the holding was too highly rented, one swearing that the tenant's right in it was worth nothing, others that it was worth about £5. The agent on the estate, however, swore that McAtavey had refused £100 for his holding and wanted £150. Some tenants swore that the land was bad and would hardly support a family. The agent swore it was light and sandy soil, capable of bearing good crops if properly farmed. Thus the issue was joined. The commissioners resolved to visit the holding, and then give their decision. They therefore drove there the next day, and the neighboring tenants gathered and followed curiously at their heels as they went from field to field testing the soil, examining the gathered crops, and asking questions of the agent, the tenant, and all who were concerned. The land appeared to be in a wretched condition, badly drained, and really incapable of being made very valuable. Returning in the afternoon the commission sat to hear further evidence, but nothing important was elicited. When the testimony was finished, the commission decided to reduce the rent to a sum equivalent to $31.50.

The Release of One Member of Parliament imprisoned in Kilmainham jail, Ireland, is announced. Mr. Sexton, M.P., was released on a medical certificate stating that further confinement would endanger his life. He drove unattended to his lodgings. He is suffering from a complication of diseases, including spinal irritation and gastric disturbance. He has been ordered abroad at the earliest moment when he can be removed. He is at present unable to travel. There are no conditions attached to his release. During the eighteen days of his imprisonment he was confined to his bed, and for seven days was in absolute solitude. Mr. Sexton speaks in the highest terms of the treatment he received from all the officials in Kilmainham Jail.

Great Satisfaction has been Expressed in England at the order of President Arthur for saluting the British flag at Yorktown. The International Arbitration and Peace Association of London passed a resolution recording its gratification. Such an incident, the resolution says, is unparalleled in history, and must ever remain of deep international interest. It regards the act as mighty and significant testimony to the oblivion of all animosities resulting from the War of Independence, and as an emphatic expression of the brotherly love existing between England and America.

The British Parliament is Expected to Assemble on January 19th. Its first business will be to consider the proposed alteration of the rules of the House of Commons to prevent the possibility of the dilatory and vexatious tactics of the Irish party being renewed. It is also reported that the Government will introduce a bill under which Mr. Bradlaugh, the infidel member, may take his seat.

The Chinese Students Withdrawn From America are already turning their knowledge acquired here, to good account. It is announced that they are to be employed on the telegraph line being built between Tien-Tsin and Shanghai, China, which, it is expected, will be finished by the end of the year.

The Discovery of More Plots in Russia Indicates the increased vigilance of the police and also the untiring resolution of the Nihilists. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Telegraph says: "I have trustworthy information that the police have made an important capture. Suspicions having been directed to inmates of a house in a respectable quarter of the city, the police surrounded the place at night, burst open the doors, and seized a man and a woman who were preparing dangerous explosives. Socialist pamphlets were found in the rooms. The man is a student in the School of Mines. It is stated that the Czar has lately received many threatening missives. Five employes in the Czar's palace at Gatchina have been arrested, and one of them has revealed a plot to repeat at Gatchina the Winter Palace explosion, when an attempt was made to kill the late Czar.

The Commercial Treaty Between France and England has again been under diplomatic discussion, but so far unsuccessfully. The British commissioners having the subject in charge left Paris on Saturday. A correspondent there cables: "There will be no treaty. The French offers have been officially noted, but they fall far short of the point at which a compromise might be entertained. The principal differences are relative to cotton. Neither on the English nor on the French side has a real spirit of conciliation been shown. Both sides have been trying to strike each other in the dark. It is manifest that a treaty is further than ever from being concluded."

A Revolt Against Turkish Rule is Reported from Arabia. A cablegram from Constantinople says: "There is much anxiety in Constantinople about affairs in Arabia. Rumors are current that the Sheriff of Mecca has declared himself Khalif and has liberated Midhat Pacha. It appears sure, however, that certain tribes in the vicinity of Mecca are in revolt. The Sheriff is suspected of connivance at the movement. The Turkish commander has been instructed to arrest him if necessary." It would appear that on all hands the mystic Euphrates is threatened. Asiatic and European enemies threaten her, while she is tottering and almost ready to fall to pieces through her own corruption.

A Jewish Colony in Palestine is About to be settled. The London Record says: "A united Jewish colony is to be formed in the district of Gilead and Moab, the Sultan of Turkey having granted one million and a half acres of land for this purpose, in consideration of a large amount of money to be advanced by Jewish capitalists. The new colony is to be subject to a prince of Jewish race and religion, though tributary to the Porte. It has been also affirmed that within the last few years a wealthy Jew has lent some thirty million dollars to the Turkish Government on the security of the land of Palestine, so that there is reason to conclude that the whole of the Promised Land may erelong again be recognized as the rightful property of the Jews, and populated by them.

A Conservative Reaction is Noticed in Great Britain. The Liberals, Mr. Gladstone's supporters, have been defeated in the municipal elections in many cases. This does not affect the Premier's Parliamentary majority, but is regarded as an indication of the current of popular opinion. The success of the Conservatives is especially observable in towns where the Irish reside in large numbers. It is remarkable that the Irish should oppose Mr. Gladstone, who has made greater concessions to them than the Conservatives were willing to grant.

England and the Pope.—Rumors have been circulated that direct communications were taking place between the Pope of Rome and the British Government, in which Mr. Gladstone undertook to propose to the Parliament the grant of concessions to the Romish Church if the Pope would exercise his authority toward the pacification of Ireland. These rumors are denied by the London Times, which says: "The Ministry has given no encouragement whatever to opening the question of the establishment of direct relations with the Vatican. As far as is apparent there is no reason to depart from the existing state of things, even if the Vatican took the initiative in the matter. The proposal to appeal to the spiritual authority of the Pope in order that the Government may indirectly control the conduct of our Catholic fellow-citizens, which could be the only object of the re-establishment of relations with the Vatican, is not one that can be popular with any class of Englishmen, or which can have any chance of practical success."

Preparations for Rebuilding Solomon's Temple are said by newspaper correspondents in Jerusalem to be in progress. They report that the Turkish Sultan has issued imperative orders to the Turkish governor at Jerusalem to commence at once the work of clearing the site of Solomon's Temple, desecrated for so many centuries by the Moslem religion. This is stated to be a direct result of the representations made by the reigning Imperial Austrian family. The alms of the pilgrims are in future to be applied to the clearing of the ground upon Mount Moriah, and this may be taken as an indication of the earnest intentions of the Sublime Porte in the matter. This circumstance, when taken in connection with the marvellous exodus of Jews into Spain and other places adjacent to the Great Sea, notably Turkey, where upward of 60,000 Israelites recently found refuge from serious persecution, may, with solid grounds, be accepted by all students of prophecy as an evidence that the "time to favor Sion, yea, the set time is come."

The Hat on the Marble Bust.—On the Occasion of a banquet at the Mansion House, the official residence of the Lord Mayor of London, as the guests filed down a corridor, which was adorned by the busts of certain eminent men, the late Sir Charles Reed stopped opposite one, on which some one had placed a hat, and removed it, and laid it on the ground. On being gently remonstrated with for this seemingly discourteous action by some one behind, he replied that that was the bust of his father, whom he revered, and he would not see it dishonored by being made a hat-peg. Some time afterward Mr. Peabody, the philanthropic American millionaire, called on him, told him he was witness of the incident, and that it had excited his curiosity as to the man whose reverence for his father extended to his marble image. Mr. Peabody was at the time looking out for men of character in whom he might have enough confidence to make them trustees of his fund for the benefit of the poor. The incident of the hat pleased him, and he made inquiries about Sir Charles Reed, which fully satisfied him that Sir Charles was such a one as he desired as trustee. The honor was offered and accepted, and from that day forward the two men, so alike in soul and aim, worked together for the benefit of the poor. What should be the feelings of God's children when they witness the discourtesies so often paid to their Heavenly Father's Name, His House, and Word, and Day!

Position in the Community—Public Benefactions—Private Charity—Ancestry—Commercial Eminence—Politics—Temperance Work—Home Mission Work.

MR. SAMUEL MORLEY, who is now visiting this country, is a celebrated English merchant and manufacturer. But widely as is the firm of which he is the head known, his personal character as a Christian philanthropist is still more widely celebrated. No name among English laymen of to-day occupies a higher position in the esteem of the Christian community for generous and enlightened munificence than does the name of Samuel Morley, the member of Parliament for Bristol. Blessed of God in the possession of large and rapidly increasing wealth, he has continued to use it under the controlling power of Christian principle, and in private charity and public munificence the greater part of his income is expended. Much of it has been absorbed in gifts to public purposes. Only recently he gave $25,000 toward purchasing Exeter Hall, the building now occupied by the London Young Men's Christian Association. If in any locality of Great Britain a small band of Christians see opportunities of winning souls for Jesus, yet are too poor to build a church where the Gospel may be preached, an application to Samuel Morley is sure to extract a liberal donation from him; and many a church burdened with debt, and its energies crippled by the necessary effort to pay interest, has been relieved by

HIS MUNIFICENCE.

In private charity, too, his discriminating benevolence has been largely exercised. There are many tradesmen who to-day are in comfortable circumstances, who are largely indebted to Samuel Morley for their position and good name. He has been known in times of commercial pressure not only to forego his own claims upon a debtor, but to advance money without interest or security to enable him to tide over the crisis of his affairs. Once satisfied of the integrity of an unfortunate man, and convinced that to aid him will be an act of Christian charity, and Samuel Morley gives or lends with no grudging hand. Many a hoary-headed Christian whom the vicissitudes of trade have involved in difficulties, has been seen on his knees thanking God with a heart full of gratitude and eyes suffused with tears, that through Samuel Morley's aid he has been saved from bankruptcy and the Church of Christ from reproach through his financial collapse. The extent of such benefactions is of course unknown, but a London accountant said recently that in the exercise of his profession he had found instances of Mr. Morley's private generosity which aggregated a sum incredible by persons who could not test its truth.

Another form in which Mr. Morley has been able to do a beneficent work has been in the charity schools. Mr. Morley's face is well known in every institution where orphans and friendless children are congregated. He delights in taking boys into his house of business, when their education is completed, and they are looking forward to a struggle in the world, unaided, with some apprehension. There they are carefully watched to see what kind of talent they develope, and some are placed in the manufactory, others in the warehouse in London, and others in the office, according as the bent of their minds suggests, and in each department a career honorable and prosperous is open to them. Thus, throughout Great Britain and the colonies may be found men engaged in commercial pursuits respected and prosperous, who owe, under God's blessing, all they have and are, to Samuel Morley's aid and wise Christian counsels given at the critical time when they were entering upon life orphaned and friendless. Such are some of the ways in which the princely income Mr. Morley derives from his business is made to work for the cause of Christ and the welfare of men.

Samuel Morley is descended from the Morlais, an ancient Huguenot family who, before the massacre of St. Bartholomew, being exiled from France, settled in England. There they engaged in a humble way in the manufacture of hosiery, and with frugality managed to earn a livelihood. They had gone to England because there they could enjoy religious liberty, not to make money. But the sterling honesty, the intelligence, and skill of these French stocking makers began to have an effect in the trade. Their productions were sought after because they were reliable, and very soon their prosperity was established. The occupation was continued by their descendants. About the close of the last century one of them, John Morley, was well known as a manufacturer of hosiery on a large scale. He had three sons, of whom Samuel was the youngest.

Samuel Morley was born in 1809 in Hackney, a suburb of London. He is now the head of the firm whose transactions are with every civilized nation on the face of the earth. In all the countries of Europe, in the cities of America, in India, and in South Africa, wherever a dry goods store is established, there may be seen, with more or less frequency, the famous initials J. & R. M. on boxes and bales, which indicate that the goods encased are the manufacture of the eminent firm of J. & R. Morley, of London, which was the original style of the firm. Samuel Morley was educated at a private school, and was early introduced into the business. He married the daughter of a Christian friend of his father, Samuel Hope, Esq., of Liverpool. The union has been blessed by the birth of eight children, of whom one of the daughters is married to Mr. Wilbraham Taylor, an earnest Christian gentleman, well known in England.

But liberal pecuniary gifts do not comprise the whole of Mr. Morley's conception of his duty toward God and his fellow-men. He has occupied and honorably discharged the duties of many responsible offices in connection with philanthropic enterprises, and others of a more distinctly religious character in connection with the Congregationalist denomination, to which he belongs. In 1855 he accepted the office of treasurer of the Home Missionary Society, and so energetically and systematically did he labor, that in one year the income of the society rose from $80,000 to $120,000, mainly through his exertions. During the period that he held this office, Mr. Morley personally journeyed through Great Britain, speaking at all the meetings wherever held for the furtherance of the interests of the society.

IN POLITICS.

In politics Mr. Morley has been an energetic supporter of the party of which Mr. Gladstone is now the head. With Mr. Cobden, Mr. John Bright, and other eminent Liberals, he has taken an active part in the campaigns of his time, prominent among which was the anti-Corn Law agitation, which, on account of the relief it promised to the poorer classes, enlisted Mr. Morley's sincere sympathies.

In 1855 much indignation was expressed at the lamentable disclosures of official incompetency during the Crimean war, when British soldiers were sent to undergo all the rigors of a Russian winter without proper clothing or protection. Mr. Morley, while acting as chairman at a public meeting, made a speech, in which he declared that "the aristocracy had as much right to share in the government as any other class, but only as they exhibited the sterling qualities of honesty and efficiency. The hideous disclosure of mismanagement, which the history of the war had revealed, forced upon them the all-important question, How are we to be governed? Let them go to any of the public departments, and if they chanced to meet the head of it without his intelligent underling at his elbow to cram him, they would too often find him displaying an amount of ignorance, incompetence, and superciliousness, which was actually eating into the heart of the country, and undermining its greatness."

On the

question Mr. Morley has often spoken out in a fearless style. A paper read by him at the Temperance Congress at Exeter Hall on August 6th, 1862, was printed, under the title of "The Drinking Usages of the Commercial Room," and attracted much attention. It gives the following graphic description of commercial travellers taking their dinner at an hotel:

"It is four o'clock, or half-past; the soup and fish are on the table, dinner is announced, an eight or ten sit down to the repast. The oldest i the house occupies the head of the table, and i called President; the last comer doing the dutie of the Vice-chair. The President, after consult ing 'Mr. Vice and gentlemen,' orders in tw bottles of sherry, which, somehow or other, man age to disappear before the fish is removed; i game succeed the joints, port is consideerd a prope accompaniment.

"In the absence of game, port is brought in with the cheese, when Mr. President very kindly chal lenges his friends to a 'round robin'; and if th party be a jovial one, it not unfrequently happens that before the cloth is withdrawn the usual pin is consumed; and as commercial men are very loyal, and must toast the Queen,-and as they have had a good dinner, some one (generally the Presi dent), feeling on good terms with himself and with all the world, proposes that they shall have an extra bottle, and this extra bottle is sometimes followed by one or two more. After 'the Queen, such toasts as 'Absent Friends,' 'Wives and Sweethearts,' 'Success to Trade,' etc., are given. On Sunday it is not unusual to sit at the table from four t ll seven or eight o'clock.

"We have said enough, without commenting on the drinking, smoking, card and billiard playing in the evening, to show the evil of such customs. We maintain that these habits of drinking, whatever may be urged to the contrary, unfit men for business, and that they are fearfully injurious to drinkers themselves, to their employers, to their families, and to others; and numerous instances attesting the truth of this could be collected."

In July, 1865, Mr. Morley took his seat in the House of Commons as one of the members for Nottingham. Unfortunately, he and the other Liberal candidate, Mr. Paget, became unseated upon an election petition by the Conservatives, as the Liberal committee and electioneering agents had acted indiscreetly in some matters; but both Mr. Morley and Mr. Paget were entirely exonerated by the committee of the House of Commons from all blame. Mr. Gladstone also spoke in the highest terms of Mr. Morley in this matter.

Mr. Morley bore the disappointment resignedly, in a Christian spirit, and awaited his Master's pleasure, knowing that He is the most fitting judge of the time when we can best serve His all-wise purposes.

Two years afterward, in December, 1868, Mr. Morley was

and has represented that city in Parliament up to the present time. His liberality and his efforts to promote the welfare of the working classes have won for him the esteem of the inhabitants. As a successful merchant of integrity and high standing he won the confidence of the powerful and influential mercantile class.

At the opening meeting of the Bristol Operatives' Liberal Association in Colston Hall, Bristol, he addressed an audience of some 6000 persons with a proper manly feeling. He told his hearers that he had been from his youth connected with trade, and for some thirty or thirty-five years actively engaged in commerce; and declared his confidence in the perseverance, industry, and integrity of the mercantile and working classes as one of the sources, under Providence, of England's prosperity and a guarantee of its liberties.

Mr. Morley has taken an active part in the British Parliament in the discussions on the questions of bankruptcy, imprisonment for debt, and municipal reform, and has always maintained the character of a consistent, although not an extreme Liberal.

As a specimen of Mr. Morley's munificence, we may mention that he once offered £500 ($2500) each toward the erection of twelve chapels in London, and after their erection he again offered £500 each for twelve more chapels, making a total of £12,000 ($60,000).

He also gave £6000 ($30,000) toward the Congregational Memorial Hall, in Farringdon Street, London, built upon the site of the old Fleet Prison, where Nonconformists used to be imprisoned; but, though himself a Congregationalist,

"It is over fifteen months now, Bob. I remember the evening as if it was yesterday—I came in somewhat stupid; but not quite so bad as usual, and I mind well how I was struck with the look of the place; it was all so clean and light; the fire burning clear, as I do like to see; the hearth swept; the kettle singing on the hob and her in the chimney-corner, in a clean cotton gown, all so tidy and sweet-looking, stitching away at my old jacket.

"I stood looking in a bit at the door. I could not help thinking how nice it all was, and what a difference to the place I had just left, with its stench of smoke and beer, and the noise of the fellows, and jokes not over-decent, and such like. Then I looked at Polly's face, and it struck me like all at once how pale it was to what it had used to be only a year or two back, and I did not feel altogether right in myself, Bob, I'll assure you.

"So I walked in, and my wife, instead of just looking up and then down again at her work, as she had used to do, got up and came to meet me; and, said she, 'I am glad you are early to-night, Dick; could you take a bit of supper, for I have something in the house can be done in a minute?' Then she took my cap I'd flung on the table and hung it up, and shut the door I had left open behind me, and—'It is cold to-night,' she said again, all so pleasant and quiet; and then, though I had made her no answer, she set about getting the supper, talking of this and that, as if I had been the most steady-going and the best fellow in the world. When all was ready she poured out some warm water in a bowl, and said she, 'Dick, will you just wash your hands a bit?—you'll enjoy your supper the more.'

"So I did, and I washed my face, too, and brushed myself before I sat down, feeling about as small and shamefaced as ever I did in my life. The supper, too, done to a turn, and hot and good, just as if I had deserved it. So different, too, to what things were used to be—I could not make out what it was all about, and almost wished she had not done it, so queer did it make me look. But presently I spoke, and said I, 'Mary, is there no beer?'

"'No, Richard, dear, I have given it up,' she said; 'but you will try some coffee—that I like better, and it does not make me heavy of mornings like the beer does.' With that she poured out two cups of steaming coffee, and, in truth, I was glad enough, for my head was queer, and I was dry enough; but still I did not altogether like the way. I thought to myself, This is what the teetotal folks have been telling her to do; I fancied it was to catch me, as it were. Seeing me hesitating, said she, 'Dick, if you would rather have beer I will get it for you; but I made this on purpose, and it is a cold night.'

"That finished me, Bob; I could as soon have taken poison as beer after that. 'Don't, Polly,' said I, 'don't'—for I felt I should break down altogether and make a fool of myself. I took the coffee, and I thought I had never tasted anything to equal it; for Polly can make coffee, and no mistake.

"You may think, Bob, when I went to bed that night I did not sleep directly. I lay thinking of the past, and made a hundred good resolutions for the future. But the next evening I broke them all; for the fellows would not hear of me not joining them; and I said to myself—by way, of course, for disappointing my wife—that no doubt it was only a trick of hers, and that she would be as cross as ever that night. So I stayed, and never went near home till Jinks told me it was just on the stroke of twelve; and if they did not carry me home, Bob, it was because they were all worse than I was.

"I was not so far gone, though, but I could see and mark it all—so comfortable and quiet and bright, and she sitting at work just as if it had been early in the evening—no black hearth, nor cold supper, to make one feel how miserable she had been. And she fastened the doors, and lighted me up stairs, and set all I wanted without a cross word; and oh, Bob, I believe if she had scolded me, it would have made me comfortable to what I felt at her kindness.

"I could not stand it, Foster. I tried—more shame to me—hard; for I thought of the laughter of the lot I had kept in with so long; but it would not do. Every day I felt more and more ashamed to enter my own doors, where all was as nice and as pleasant as if I had been the best of men. She was right, and I was wrong, and I could not help owning it.

"Then of evenings I would find she had borrowed a paper, and be ready to talk over the pieces she had read, and to ask me about them. I began to think the public-house was not the only place for a pleasant evening; and I would call myself a fool for going, and yet I went; for you know, Bob, we do not like to be beaten, even for our own good.

"But Mary never said a word—only kept on just the same, until at last I felt I should go crazy if I fought against myself any longer; and one night, right in the midst of Naylor's song, and the laughing of the rest, I said to myself, All the jeers of this lot could not make me feel as I shall sneaking into home to-night to meet that kind, patient wife of mine; and up I got as bold as brass, and I said, 'Good-night all,' and made for the door. 'Are you ill?' calls one. 'Are you coming back?' cries another. 'Nay, I am well,' I says, 'and I am not coming back.'

"But I came to you, as you know, Master Foster, that very night and signed. I went on home, and as sober as you are, and without a word I laid the paper on her lap. She looked at it, and then she jumped up and put her arms round my neck. Her eyes were full of tears, and she said, 'God bless you, dear Dick! and bless them that turned you to it.' 'Then,' says I, 'Mary, He'll bless yourself; for it is you that has done it, and no other.'

"Here she is, Bob, and with some of her coffee that she means to treat you to. Yes, Polly, I have told your secret; but you need not blush—it's a pity but more of the women learned it."

"Ay, indeed," returned his neighbor, "man may be the head; but, after all, 'tis the neck turns the head, Dick, and 'tis a sorry case that it should too often be awry."

How Nine Castaways Were Saved is Related by a British journal. Some time ago nine Austrians were cast away on the Island of St. Kilda, on the north-west coast of Scotland, beyond the Hebrides. They had no way of escape; vessels rarely came that way; and they had no means of communicating with the outside world. At the suggestion of one of the party, a tourist, and who knew the direction of the ocean currents, two letters were prepared, which were inclosed in bottles and flung out on the ocean. The currents bore them away, and erelong one of them was washed by the waves on to the Scottish mainland, and discovered and transmitted to the British Government. Not long afterward the castaways were surprised one morning by the appearance of a strange ship. It was a British steamship, which had come to take off the wrecked mariners and the tourist, in response to the petition which they had sent forth upon the restless, aimless waves. Had a sceptic, in the habit of scoffing at prayer, been among the castaways, he might consistently have ridiculed the device for communicating with the land. But it brought help, and so do the prayers we offer, reach the ears of Him who never refuses those who call upon Him in spirit and in truth.

Hunting has been Prohibited in Ireland by a number of tenants. On November 3d, when the Kilkenny hounds met at Killeen cover, a party of farmers assembled and told the hunting party that they would not allow them to pursue their sport over their farms. Many gentlemen left the field, and the hounds were taken back to their kennels. This indicates how the Land League agitation has inspired the tenants with audacity and the landlords with timidity.

THE TEN PLAGUES OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN:

THE PLAGUE NARCOTIC.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Delivered Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 13, 1881.*

"I will at this time send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people." —EXODUS 9 : 14.

UPON the cleanest, the most fertile, the richest, and the wisest nation of the ancient world, the ten plagues dropped. Plague the first: The River Nile, which was the source of Egyptian fertility and an object of worship, was incarnadined, and rolled its crimson currents amid a horror-stricken population, the reservoir and the costly water-works putrid with destroyed animal life. Plague the second: The frogs innumerable, croaking in the marshes of the Nile, move up and take possession of the homes of a nation which dressed in white and was fastidious for cleanliness, and the storks, the vultures, and the cranes swooping upon their prey. Plague the third: The gnats and mosquitoes buzzed and bit, and stung the people into wild delirium. Plague the fourth: The gadflies became intolerable, or the beetle, an imitation of which you often see on a gentleman's finger, cut in the shape of scarabæus, or Egyptian beetle.

Plague the fifth: Distemper seized upon the cattle until they went bellowing with pain, and epizooty upon the horses, and trichina upon the swine. Plague the sixth: Carbuncles and elephantiasis inflamed the skin of multitudes. Plague the seventh: Hailstorms, with their icy hammers, smote the earth, and at a season of the year when the cattle were all grazing in the fields and hence were unsheltered from the pelting. Plague the eighth: Locusts, which, according to naturalists, march in companies and regiments and battalions, commanded by captains and colonels and generals, marched across the land until every green thing in orchard and vineyard and garden was destroyed. Plague the ninth: Darkness dropped on all the land and it was as black at twelve o'clock at noon as at twelve o'clock at night. Plague the tenth: In every Egyptian home, the oldest, whether on the mother's lap or seated at the table, took on the last pallor and expired.

Draw a curtain over every home in Egypt. These ten Egyptian plagues have all passed off the earth, but our modern cities have their ten plagues, blasting, destructive and deathful, and it is my object in a series of Sabbath morning discourses to describe them.

The first plague that I shall mention is the plague narcotic. In all ages the world has sought out some flower or herb or weed to stimulate its lethargy or to compose its grief. A drug called was widely used among the ancient Greeks and the ancient Egyptians for narcotic purposes. The Theban women knew how to compound it. You had but to chew the leaves and your sadness was whelmed with hilarity. But nepenthe passed out from the consideration of the world.

Next came

which is made from Indian hemp. It is manufactured from the flowers at the top, or workmen in leathern clothing walk through the fields of hemp and the exudation from the hemp adheres to the leathern garments, and then this exudation is scraped off and prepared with aromatics and becomes an intoxicant for the people. Whole nations have been stimulated, narcotized, and made imbecile with this accursed hasheesh. The visions kindled by that drug are said to be gorgeous and magnificent beyond all description; but it finally takes down body, mind, and soul in horrible death.

I knew one of the most brilliant men of his day. Whether he appeared in magazine or in book, in newspaper column, he was an enchantment. He could, in the course of an hour's conversation, produce more wit and strange information than any man I ever talked with; but he chewed hasheesh. He did so first as a matter of curiosity, to see whether the powers ascribed to it really belonged to it. He put his hand into the cockatrice's den to see whether it would bite, and he found out to his complete undoing. His father, who was a minister of the Gospel, prayed for him and counselled him, and obtained for him the best medical prescription of the best physicians in New York, Philadelphia, Paris, London, Edinburgh, and Berlin. He said he could not stop. A large circle of friends put their wits together to try to rescue him but he went on down. First, his body gave way in pangs and convulsions of suffering; then his mind gave way, and he became a raving maniac; then his immortal soul went, blaspheming God, into a starless eternity. He was only about thirty years of age. Behold the ravages of the Persian and Egyptian weed called hasheesh.

demands emphatic recognition. It is made, as you know, from the white poppy. It is not a new discovery. We read of it three hundred years before Christ; but it was not until the seventeenth century that it began its death march, passing out from the medicinal and the curative, and by smoking and mastication becoming the scourge of nations. In the year 1861 there were imported into this country 107,000 pounds of opium, but last year 533,000 pounds of opium. It is estimated that in the year 1876 there were in this country 225,000 opium consumers; but I saw a statistic yesterday that said there are probably now in the United States at least 500,000 opium-consumers. The fact is appalling.

Do not think that they are merely barbaric fanatics who go down under that stroke. Read the great De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium Eater." He says for the first ten years it gave him the keys of paradise; but it takes his own powerful pen to describe the horrors consequent. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, after conquering the world with his pen, was conquered by opium. The most magnetic and brilliant lawyer of this century fell a victim to its stroke, and there are thousands of men and women—but more women than men—who are being bound, body, mind, and soul, to this terrific habit.

There is a great mystery about some families. You do not know why they do not get on. The opium habit is so stealthy, so deceitful, and so deathful. You can cure a hundred drunkards easier than you can cure one opium-eater. I have heard of cases of reformation, but I never saw any. I hope there are cases of genuine reformation. I have seen men who for forty years had been the victims of strong drink thoroughly reformed; but the opium-eaters that I have seen go on and go down. Their cry in the last hour of life is not for God, nor for prayer, nor for the Bible, but for opium. Perhaps there are only two persons outside the household who know what is the matter—the physician and the pastor; the physician called in for physical relief, the pastor called in for spiritual relief; but they both fail. The physician acknowledges his defeat. The minister of religion acknowledges his defeat, for it seems as if the Lord does not answer prayer for opium-eaters.

Oh man! oh woman! are you tampering with this habit? have you just begun? are you, for the assuagement of physical distresses or mental trouble, making this a regular resource? I beg you stop. The ecstasies at the start will not pay for the horrors at the last. The paradise is followed too soon by the pandemonium. Morphia is a blessing from God for the relief of sudden pang or acute dementia, but was never intended for prolonged use. And what is the peculiar sadness of it is, it comes to people in their weak moments. De Quincey says, "I took it for rhe Coleridge says, "I took it for insomni lessness." What do you take it for? sake, do not take it too long.

What is remarkable, they are going c the highest and the wealthiest classes, the most fashionable circles of New Brooklyn—going down by hundreds an sands. Over 20,000 opium-eaters in Chic 20,000 opium-eaters in St. Louis. In proportion, that would make over 70,0 York and Brooklyn. I could name three eminent clergymen ied of cancer in the mouth, and in every case ysician said it was tobacco. There has been a clergyman whose tombstone was all covered th eulogy, which ought to have had the epitaph, "Killed by too much caven-

Some of them smoke until the room is and their spirits are blue, and the world is and everything is blue. Time was when God passed by such sins, but it becomes now the duty of the American clergy who indulge in this narcotic to repent.

How can a man preach temperance to the people when he is himself indulging in an appetite like that? I have seen a cuspadore in a pulpit where the minister should drop his cud before he gets up to read, "Blessed are the pure in heart," and to read about "rolling sin as a sweet morsel under the tongue"! and in Leviticus to read about the unclean animals that chew the cud. I have known Presbyteries and General Assemblies and General Synods where there was a room set apart for the ministers to smoke in.

Oh, it is a sorry spectacle, a consecrated man, a holy man of God looking around for something, which you take to be looking for a larger field of usefulness. He is not looking for that at all. He is only looking for some place where he can discharge a mouthful of tobacco juice! I am glad the Methodist Church of the United States, in nearly all their conferences, have passed resolutions against this habit, and it is time we had an anti-tobacco reform in the Presbyterian Church, and the Episcopal Church, and the Baptist Church, and the Congregational Church.

About sixty years ago a young man graduated from Andover Theological Seminary into the ministry. He went straight to the front. He had an eloquence and personal magnetism before which nothing could stand; but he was soon thrown into the insane asylum for twenty years, and the doctor said it was tobacco that sent him there. According to the custom then in vogue, he was allowed a small portion of tobacco every day. After he had been there nearly twenty years, walking the floor one day he had a sudden return of reason, and he realized what was the matter. He threw the plug of tobacco through the iron grates and said: "What brought me here? what keeps me here? why am I here? Tobacco! Tobacco! O God! help, help, and I'll never use it again." He was restored. He was brought forth. For ten years he successfully preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and then went into a blissful immortality.

There are ministers of religion to-day indulging in narcotics, dying by inches, and they do not know what is the matter with them. I might in a word give

MY OWN EXPERIENCE.

It took ten cigars to make a sermon. I got very nervous. One day I awakened to the outrage I was inflicting upon myself. I was about to change settlements, and a generous wholesale tobacconist in Philadelphia said if I would only come to Philadelphia he would, all the rest of my life, provide me with cigars free of charge. I said to myself, If in these war times, when cigars are so costly and my salary is small, I smoke more than I ought to, what would I do if I had gratuitous and illimitable supply? And then and there, twenty years ago, I quit once and forever. It made a new man of me, and though I have since then done as much hard work as any one, I think I have had the best health God ever blessed a man with.

A minister of religion cannot afford to smoke. Put into my hand the moneys wasted in tobacco in Brooklyn, and I will support three orphan asylums as grand and as beautiful as that to which you have this last week been contributing. Put into my hand the moneys wasted in tobacco in the United States of America, and I will clothe, feed, and shelter all the suffering poor on this continent. The American Church gives $1,000,000 a year for the evangelization of the heathen, and American Christians spend $5,000,000 in tobacco.

Now, I stand this morning not only in the presence of my God, to whom I must give an account for what I say to-day, but I stand in the presence of a great multitude of young men who are forming their habits. Between seventeen and twenty-three there are tens of thousands of young men damaging themselves irretrievably by tobacco. You either use very good tobacco or cheap tobacco. If you use cheap tobacco, I want to tell you why it is cheap. It is a mixture of burdock, lampblack, sawdust, coltsfoot, plantain-leaves, fuller's earth, lime, salt, alum, and a little tobacco. You cannot afford, my young brother, to take such a mess as that between your lips. If, on the other hand, you use costly tobacco, let me say, I do not think you can afford it. You take that which you expend and will expend, if you keep the habit all your life, and put it aside, and it will buy you a farm to make you comfortable in the afternoon of life.

A merchant of New York gave this testimony: "In early life I smoked six cigars a day at six and a half cents each—they averaged that. I thought to myself one day, 'I'll just put aside all the money I am consuming in cigars, and all I would consume if I kept on in the habit, and I will see what it will come to by compound interest." And he gives this tremendous statistic: "Last July completed thirty-nine years since by the grace of God I was emancipated from the filthy habit, and the saving amounted to the enormous sum of $29,102.03 by compound interest. We lived in the city, but the children, who had learned something of the enjoyment of country life from their annual visits to their grandparents, longed for a home among the green fields. I found a very pleasant place in the country for sale. The cigar money now came into requisition, and I found it amounted to a sufficient sum to purchase the place, and it is mine. Now, boys, you take your choice, smoking without a home, or a home without smoking."

Listen to that, young man, and take another thing into consideration, and that is, vast amounts of property are destroyed every year indirectly by this habit. An agent of an insurance company says: "One half our losses come from and the cigar." One young man threw away his cigar in one of the cities, and with it he threw away three millions of dollars' worth of the property of others that blazed up from that spark. Harpers' splendid printing establishment years ago was destroyed by a plumber who having lighted his pipe threw the match away, and it fell into a pot of camphene. The whole building was in flames. Five blocks went down. Two thousand employés thrown out of work, and more than a million dollars of property destroyed. But I am speaking of higher values to-day. Better destroy a whole city of stores than destroy one man.

Oh, my young friends, if you will excuse the idiom, I will say,

STOP BEFORE YOU BEGIN.

Here is a serfdom which has a shackle that it is almost impossible to break. Gigantic intellects that could overcome every other bad habit have been flung of this and kept down. Some one is seeking to persuade a man from the habit. The reply was, "Ask me to do anything under the canopy of heaven but this. This I cannot give up, and won't give up, though it take seven years off my life."

I must have a word also with all those of my friends whom it does not hurt, who can stop any time they want to, and who can smoke most expensive cigars. My Christian brother, what is your influence in the matter? How much can you afford to deny yourself for the good of others? It was a great mystery to many people why Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, wore a cravat, but no collar. Some people thought it was an absurd eccentricity. Ah no! This was the secret. Many years before, he was talking with an inebriate and telling him that his habit was unnecessary, and the inebriate retorted upon him and said: "We do a great many things that are not necessary. It is not necessary for you to wear that collar." "Well," said Governor Briggs, "I never will wear a collar again if you won't drink." "Agreed," said the inebriate. Governor Briggs never wore a collar. They both kept their bargain for twenty years. They kept it to the death. That is the reason Governor Briggs did not wear a collar. That is the Gospel of the Son of God. Self-denial for the good and the rescue of others.

Oh, my brother, we might by little effort now and then save a man. By how little or by how much self-denial are we willing to be influenced? I stop at this point, because I have no more time to pursue the subject, although I have much more to say upon it. I stop at this point, by throwing all the passions of my soul into one prayer: God help us!

SYLPH SOMERS.

The Mysterious Pocketbook—Sylph Alarmed to Find Dr. Gilbart Absent—The Doctor's Valet Tells of his Master's Arrest—Sylph Visits the Old Jail, but is Repulsed.

UPON hearing Sylph's statement the sick man raised himself in the bed, and peered searchingly into Sylph's face. "May I ask you your name, miss?" he inquired,

"Miss Somers Gilbart," was the reply.

"Oh, I don't mean that," he said; "I mean your first—your Christian name, miss; what comes, you know, before Somers."

"When I was little they called me Silp," was the answer; "but of late years I have gone by the name of Sylph."

"It's her—it's her—the very one," said the invalid to himself, excitedly. "Silp! Yes, I remember it well. That was the very identical name that the little babbie of a girl gave herself. Well, I never!" Then turning to Sylph, he exclaimed, "Thanks be to God, I have come upon you at last. Many's the long year I wondered, and wondered, and wondered what had become of you and the lady. Sure, I am the very one, miss"—and he smiled as he spoke—"that got the wine, as ye tell of; and it was me that made ye put it to yer mother's lips, as ye say—for she was that far gone that she hadn't the power even to sip it."

Then examining Sylph from head to foot, he said, admiringly, "What a fine, braw young lady you've grown, miss! So tall and handsome!" Sylph blushed at this open praise of her beauty; but soon another emotion took possession of her, for the aged wagoner went on to ask after her mother. "I hope she's alive and well, miss," he said. "Of course fourteen or fifteen year has made a change in her; but she's what one may call a young lady yet, miss; and you put me this moment greatly in mind of what she was when I had the good luck to see her."

Sylph of late had got to seldom think of her mother, though for years at first her yearning mind and loving heart used to go out toward her with a child's dreamy and somewhat mystical conception. Now the wagoner's words touched the tender and sacred reminiscence of her soul, and bursting into tears, she exclaimed, "My mother—ah!—I have never known a mother in Chester. Alas! the day we parted from you on the road from Wrexham she met with an accident that made me an orphan."

Then, upon relating what has been told the reader concerning this catastrophe, with a hungering desire for some direct and distinct intelligence of the long-lost mother, Sylph besought the old wagoner to give her every detail of the incident upon the Wrexham road that he could remember.

"I cannot tell you much about her, miss," said Owen Oliver. "And, indeed, to be plain with you, that isn't my fault. With a Welshman's curiosity, I tried all I could to know everything; but the lady had no notion of gratifying me. She cleverly trigged and dodged my questions, miss, and at last gave me the slip altogether."

"Oh dear!" cried Sylph, in great distress, "how unfortunate and needless was her caution. Her secret and the secret of my birth, I fear, are lost forever. Oh, sir, do think over the matter, and see if you cannot give me some information."

Owen gave his suppliant the particulars which we have previously recorded. The most valuable piece of news that Sylph obtained was this: That an old pocketbook and half a letter had been picked up on the highway by his brother David, "near the spot, as he judged, where Sylph and her mother had been come upon by himself," and which he knew had been preserved by David, acting upon an "old saw" of his, and one a great favorite with him, and which he often quoted, 'Keep a thing for seven year, and you'll find some use for it.'"

"Where is that pocketbook?" eagerly inquired Sylph. "I'm not sure, miss," was the answer. "David, you know, is dead—ay, is dead—is dead and gone; dead and gone. Never no more to meet me, and say 'Morra,'" said Owen, sadly tolling out the knell of his own sorely felt but oddly expressed bereavement.

"We neither of us made Chester our home; and I am only here as laid up with a quare weakness that's come over me. But David's widow lives, though she has left Wrexham for her friend's place, far away in Wales, and now that I think of it, I shouldn't at all wonder but that she has the little article you ask for; for in her foolish woman's way all is dear to her, no matter what, that wanst belonged to David. Anyhow, when I get back to Wrexham, miss, I'll be sure to send and see about it."

On her way home Sylph communed within herself upon the mystery which hung around her mother's history. She had not learned much concerning her from Owen, yet far more she felt than ever Dr. Gilbart had communicated to her; and ignorantly supposing that what Owen had told her was known, and no doubt much more than this, to her father (so called), somewhat bitter thoughts arose in her mind against him. "It is a shame," said Sylph. "It is more than a shame; it is a cruelty and a wrong that all this has not been long ago told me. Dr. Gilbart" (in her bitterness of heart she did not call him father)—"Dr. Gilbart has never talked with me about my mother. It has not been just or right of him. What, I wonder, can have been his motive for his secrecy? It is true he has been very kind to me; yet I cannot help thinking it has been a cruel injustice to keep me in such total ignorance of my darling mother. When I see Dr. Gilbart I will insist upon knowing all about my poor, long lost-mother!"

After this resolve, as Sylph passed along the streets she fancied that a more than ordinary amount of public observation was directed toward her; and that the expressions of affection and gratitude she heard from the accustomed recipients of her bounty, whom she happened to meet, were unusually warm and demonstrative.

Preoccupied with her purpose of knowing all about her mother, she did not much reflect upon this, however. Nor was it suggested to her that any special circumstance had occurred to excite this public interest and sympathy. But soliloquizing upon the Doctor's reserve she passed on, and at last arrived at her destination.

When Sylph Somers arrived home, with her mind full of uneasy thoughts, she found that Doctor Gilbart was not in, and, indeed, had not been in the house for some hours. "And I know he ought to have been home before this, miss," said the maid, "from directions he gave me in the morning." She therefore went to the doctor's little sitting-room, and feeling her need of a strength beyond her own, earnestly asked help of her heavenly Father. She did not seek in vain, for she arose from her knees, "clad in the panoply of God."

Hugh, the doctor's valet, was the first of the household to learn of his master's arrest. He had been sent on an errand to a tradesman, a couple of streets off; and in the shop heard the astounding intelligence. Hugh—his Welsh fire easily set aflame—forgot altogether what he was sent for; and leaving behind him on the counter the article which had just been tied up in a parcel, he rushed back to his master's dwelling, and driving past the maid who opened the door, he dashed without ceremony into Sylph's presence; his eyes almost starting from his head, and his lips pale and quivering. "Oh, Miss Sylph! Miss Sylph! Oh, Miss Sylph, how'll I ever be able to tell it? Oh, miss! Oh Miss Sylph! was there ever heard such bad news? Would you believe it, miss—Oh, would you believe it! the doctor, miss——"

But observing the dreadful effect upon Sylph of this extraordinary introduction to his news, Hugh stopped short. He had a great regard and respect for Sylph, and would almost do anything rather than give her pain. Since, then, his news was sure to do this, and very grievously do it, as evinced to him by her frightened look, he would withhold it; and more than this, since the few words he had already spoken had so sorely disturbed would mercifully keep silent altogether remainder; the absurd fellow not perceiving to act thus was the surest way to augment his young mistress's mental agony.

"As your mistress in this house, Hugh mand you," she said, "to inform me at what has befallen Doctor Gilbart. Acc your own words something more than serious and alarming has happened, and I I must know it immediately!"

Tears filled Sylph's eyes as she thu Any soreness of mind toward Doctor which she had felt a short time ago, was a lost and swallowed up in her deep love fo love now awakened to its full force by th apprehension she was under respecting hi

This was only a ruse on the part of Hug from his young mistress's presence; but not permitted thus easily to escape. His were too bungling and his manner too ma indicative of deception to delude Sylph.

The color mounting to her cheek from i tion, and assuming her sternest manner, sl "I will have no falsehood or equivocation, You know you are not speaking truthfully have come to the knowledge of some mis your master, and I again, as your mistres mand you to acquaint me with it. Simple Hugh mistook Sylph's flush of an recovered courage and nerve. So, after a glance at her, he said, with a pleasant smile "Heaven's blessin's on you, Miss Sylph I'm right glad I waited and vexed you. Ay yer come to yourself, miss, sure, it's plain seen from your rosy cheeks, miss, and your look. Aye, be me word, I think ye can b tidings now. Oh, w we do! what'll we do?" and Hugh wru hands, and glanced upward, and bowed h together in the tumult of his feelings.

This news, at last given by Hugh, was cer serious, and it explained to Sylph the stir a the people in the streets which she had no but it was not so dreadful as she feared, for H extraordinary manner gave her to conclud some appalling accident had overtaken Docto bart. What had occurred was painful enou hear, and she did not halt a moment in mak resolve to hasten to the castle to see Docto bart and learn from his own lips the reason arrest.

Sylph, in her visits of mercy, had occasio visited the old jail, and she did not doubt but the officials, knowing her, would at once admi to see him whom she treated and loved father.

In this, however, she was disappointed. tor Gilbart was a political prisoner, and at an of great social excitement and panic, to which added municipal suspicion and jealousy. He when Sylph, somewhat breathless from haste, sented her plea to the governor of the prison, he informed her "that he was sorry to say that Doctor Gilbart's case was considered a very serious one, so that unless she could obtain special leave from the magistrates he could not permit her to see him."

"Did it rest upon my sole authority, Miss Gilbart," he added, "I would give you access to the doctor most willingly, but I am under responsibility to others, you see, and must do what I consider prudent."

"What would you advise me to do, sir?" asked Sylph; "where must I go for the right of admission you require? for I know absolutely nothing of these business matters."

"I think your best plan, Miss Gilbart, will be to apply to the mayor," was the answer, and Sylph, in obedience to the direction, immediately hurried back to the city and to the residence of the mayor.

SOME OF THE SIGNS OF THE LAST TIMES.

By Dionysius.

A Very Ancient Doctrine—A Cardinal Element of the Christian Creed—Eastern Problems—The Aggressive Policy of Russia—The Joint Occupation of the "Holy Places"—The Limits of the Holy Territory—The Energy of Evil—An Age of Monstrosities—The Days of Noah—A Practical and Avowed Atheism—The Application of Force—Mystic Dates and Numbers—The Probable Intention of Their Employment.

THE doctrine of another and better dispensation for the world, and consequently of "the last times" of this present dispensation, is a necessary part of both Hebrew and Christian theology, if, for the moment, we may consider these as in any degree separate or distinct systems. It is also a very ancient doctrine indeed, for, on the authority of St. Jude, Enoch, the seventh in line of descent from Adam, prophesied to the reckless sons of wickedness that a day of judgment awaited them in "the last time" (Jude 10 : 14, 18).

Daniel the prophet speaks to us, in several places, of "the time of the end," and "the end of the days." Micah and the other prophets also proclaim the coming of "the last days," days of deliverance to the people of God, yet of awful condemnation to those who have rejected Him. Several important chapters and prophecies of the New Testament are specially devoted to a consideration of "the last times," which indeed is a very cardinal element of the Christian's creed, and one to be more than ever remembered by him in periods of great discouragement and trial, such as those through which the Church is now passing. If the Christian man did not believe that the Judge of all the earth could not do otherwise than right, he would despair of any good, and lose his hope altogether.

There are many tremendous tokens of evil around us, and the long-suffering of God is, alas, being misinterpreted by a great multitude of people. Losing sight of man's free agency, such folk appear to think that if God had existence, He would, by arbitrary interference, put a stop to the all-prevailing wickedness. St. Peter says they "wilfully forget" the history of the flood, and, while indulging in all sorts of lusts, mock at their own fears, and at the fears of others, saying, "Where is the promise of His coming? for, from the day that the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as from the beginning of the creation" (2 Peter 3 : 4).

But this very attitude of the men of the last days is itself one of the "signs of the times," since it was predicted 2000 years before; and all those abounding evils and abounding signs, which seem to confirm the wicked in their wickedness, confirm the righteous in their faith. In one sense, the godly are patient with the patience of God, not willing that any should perish. In another sense they are eager for the world's restitution, and so cry, "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

EASTERN PROBLEMS.

Turning our eyes toward the eastern horizon, many tokens of the fast-approaching crisis of the end meet our gaze. We see signs in the "political heavens" above, and on the "subjective earth" beneath; blood and fire and vapor of smoke. Conspicuously prominent in those eastern heavens is a "great dragon" power; not, as of old, the "great red dragon" of Rome, awaiting the advent of the God-man with the intention of devouring him (Revelation 12 : 3), but the "great green dragon" of "Ros Meshech and Tubal" (Ezekiel 37 and 38; Revelation 16 : 13, 14; 20 : 2, 8), the claimant of eastern Rome's dominion, making itself ready to dispute with the saints of God for the possession of that kingdom which is so soon to be set up in the land of Israel.

The new Cæsar (Czar) has spoken his word. There is to be no retrogression in Russian schemes of ambition. The Sclave crusade is to be preached and pursued more actively than ever. Ignatieff, the statesman charged with stimulating the Sclavic outbreak in Bulgaria, which resulted in the last Russo-Turkish war, is placed at the head of affairs, and an active propaganda of Pansclavonianism is almost certain to follow his promotion. Indeed, a new pamphlet with that very object in view has been already announced by advertisement in the Russian paper, the Golos, in May last, as follows: "The glorious history of Tsargrad (Constantinople), with an account of the many prophecies concerning it, including one declaring that the time will come when Mecca and Medina will fall into ruins, and that this shall be brought about by a Christian Tsar named Alexander III." Here is, indeed, "a sign of the times," not only for the people who are looking for the coming of their Lord, but, likewise, for certain statesmen, who are entrusted with the care of mighty interests in those regions.

THE OCCUPATION OF THE "HOLY PLACES."

Another sign in the eastern sky, of no little significance, is the joint, though jealous, occupation of the Holy Places at Jerusalem by the Frank, the Sclave, and the Moslem powers. Each one of these lays claim to the dominion of old Rome, and if either of the capital cities of Rome or Constantinople had formed the bone of contention, the jealousy would have seemed only natural; but why should they contend for supremacy at Jerusalem? No answer can be given to this question apart from the explanations afforded by the Apocalypse of St. John, and which point to Palestine as the seat of the next great empire. The two last Sclavo-Turkish wars have in their results furnished wonderful indications of this "Kingdom of the Stone" being close at hand.

At the conclusion of the Crimean war, the chief, if not the solitary result obtained was, by some mysterious providence, the emancipation of Palestine and the circumjacent regions. Those Holy Lands were, by a special firman, then declared free to colonization, and placed under the joint protection of the Great Powers. The termination of the more recent conflict was also signalized by another stage being accomplished in the redemption of that land which is destined to become the centre of Christ's kingdom, and the joy, once more, of the whole earth. This time a British Protectorate over the extensive and important peninsula of Asia Minor was established, with the island of Cyprus as its point, of rest, as a check to the threatened further advances of Russia in that direction.

THE LIMITS OF THE HOLY TERRITORY.

When God called Abraham, and assigned to him the fatherhood of a great and mighty seed, He allocated a region of the earth's surface for their ultimate occupation. The limits of the holy territory were accurately defined, and two great rivers designated as its principal boundaries. "To thee and to thy seed will I give this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates" (Genesis 15 : 18). Such was the promise, and is it not a striking sign of the times that the two natural boundaries so indicated should have come suddenly into prominence in our days and after a sleep of centuries of neglect and indifference? A practical discernment of the wants of a time close at hand has prompted our engineers to single out the river of Egypt and the river of Mesopotamia as the two natural highways par excellence for that extended intercourse between the far East and the far West which is now seen to be inevitable. The land between these two highways is the Land of Promise—the inheritance of the saints. Surely in all these facts one must discern great "signs of the times."

But the acquisition by Britain of predominant influence over these two highways, and this, too, under the guidance of a Christian Prime Minister, yet of Hebrew origin and of Hebrew sympathies (so representing in himself, as it were, both the literal and spiritual Israel), is certainly the greatest sign of all those lately displayed in the Eastern sky. Nevertheless, it is a sign which was evidently not discerned at the time by a multitude of Englishmen, who, it is to be hoped, are growing wiser as the events on which the late Lord Beaconsfield based his policy become more and more developed. The Moslem power is visibly decaying. The mystic river Euphrates is becoming dry in its own bed. A successor to the Moslem inheritance must be found. Some of the sons of Britain seem to favor the ambitious claims of the kings from the North, while others, more discerning, would preserve the future for those "kings from the East," or sun rising, who, by the decrees of heaven, are one day to enter into possession.

THE ENERGY OF EVIL.

Many prophecies in the Divine Book attribute phenomenal events of the last days to the quickened action of the "Evil One," manifested through human instrumentalities. In that chief of prophecies, 2 Thessalonians 2, the "man of sin," in the days preceding our Lord's second coming, is declared to be the direct offspring of "the energy of Satan." In another prophecy, addressed to the peoples of the Roman world, the figurative "earth and sea," they are warned to expect woes, for that the devil would operate specifically upon them, having great wrath, because of there being but a short time left in the which to carry on his evil work (Revelation 12 : 12). Further, the state of confederation, which would represent in the aggregate the evils of man's great rebellion and apostacy, is represented as ascending "out of the bottomless pit" (Revelation 11 : 7; 17 : 8), and its government, or chief, as possessing "the power, the throne, and the great authority of the Dragon, or Satan" (Revelation 13 : 2).

A vast enterprise of mischief, both individual and collective, is plainly indicated in these several declarations. Can I possibly err in saying that the active operation of Satan on the modern world has not only been privately felt, but publicly admitted by many great thinkers and writers for some time past? The proofs are abundant that we live in and no wonder, seeing how completely godliness has given place to licentiousness, whether of belief or of conduct. Satan never had such opportunities for action, at least, since the flood; for without God, what possible defence remains to man against his approaches? Let Carlyle give an answer to this question, for I have found one in his writings exceedingly appropriate: "The five unsatiated senses will remain, the sixth insatiable sense (of vanity); the whole demonic nature of man will remain, hurled forth to rage blindly, without rule or rein, savage itself, yet with all the tools and weapons of civilization, a spectacle new in history."

As the divine restraints of religion and of heaven's laws are one by one removed, the powers of darkness break forth afresh, and occupy our land with every species of noxious evil. Vice is not only existing, it is rampant. Men are not content with committing wrong, but they must advertize and propagate it. Commenting on some of the more flagrant outrages of our time, the Times, in a leading article, thus acknowledged in a manner the fulfilment of the divine predictions: "It looks like the reappearance of the mighty powers of wickedness that ravaged the earth, decimated its population, and threw back civilization itself at some former epochs." Surely the Church may, with united voice and desire, pray that line of the Lord's prayer, as given in the revised version, "Deliver us from the evil one."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the Elections in New York State was anticipated this year with unusual curiosity, for many reasons. The exclusion of Tammany Hall from the State Convention made the estimate of the Democratic vote uncertain, and the attitude of the Stalwarts rendered any forecast of the Republican vote a matter of conjecture. Another element of doubt existed with respect to the Legislature. The black list published in the daily journals, of the Albany legislators who opposed the Street-cleaning bill, had its effect at the time, but no one knew whether the voters would allow it to influence them at the polls. It was, therefore, a doubtful contest, in which party lines afforded no means of estimating the result. The slowness with which the returns came in, showed how thoroughly both parties were disorganized, and what an unusual amount of scratching had been done. It became evident, as the votes were counted, that the personal character of the candidates had exercised more weight with the voters than their party affiliation, and that the Street-cleaning bill had not been forgotten. In both Houses of the State Legislature the Democrats now have a majority—in the State Senate a majority of two, and in the Assembly of six. The Republicans carried the State ticket with one exception, that of General James W. Husted, who was nominated for State Treasurer, but who ran behind the ticket and was beaten by his Democratic rival, Robert A. Maxwell. General Carr, the Republican candidate for Secretary of State, ran ahead of the ticket and had a majority of 12,180. In Brooklyn the result is very important. There, as in other places lately, the struggle lay not so much between parties as between the people and the machine. The Democratic Boss was defeated, and Mr. Seth Low, the anti-machine candidate for the mayoralty, was elected, many Democrats voting for the Republican candidate.

In Virginia, the Republican and Readjuster coalition carried the State by a majority at present said to be 10,000, electing the Governor and carrying the Legislature. Massachusetts, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Kansas went Republican by large majorities. In Pennsylvania the revolt against Boss rule attained unexpected proportions. With a ticket of acknowledged inferiority and opposed to unexceptionable candidates, the Wolfe party polled nearly 50,000 votes. The Republican plurality was 7539. In Wisconsin a large temperance vote was cast, reducing the Republican majority to small proportions. Democratic gains were made in Connecticut and New Jersey.

The Lesson the Elections Teach was Commented upon by Dr. Talmage in his Friday evening talk last week. He said: "In our day we are showing what intelligent and independent voting may do. You notice that in the State of New York the split ticket has been elected. Let the political parties learn that voters are determined to look beyond parties to the men nominated. A few wire-pullers cannot get together in a bar-room caucus, with whiskey and badgering, to decide the fate of city and nation. Be no more under the delusion that voters will read no further than the party badge at the top of the ticket. Beginning to read at the top, they will read all the way through, and they will scratch out what they think ought to be scratched out, and interline what they think ought to be interlined."

The Temperance Vote in Wisconsin has Surprised all parties. It is stated at 25,000. In 1879 only 400 votes were polled for the temperance candidate for Governor, and last year it was so small that the reports classed it with the scattering votes, and temperance and scattering together were under 1700. For some time it was thought that the loss of temperance votes had caused the defeat of the Republican ticket, but late reports place the Republican plurality at 7500.

President Arthur has Issued a Proclamation appointing Thursday, November 24th, as a day of Thanksgiving. The President says: "It has long been the pious custom of our people with the closing of the year to look back upon the blessings brought to them in the changing course of the seasons, and to return solemn thanks to the all-giving Source from whom they flow. And although at this period, when the falling leaf admonishes us that the time of our sacred duty is at hand, our nation still lies in the shadow of a great bereavement, and the mourning which has filled our hearts still finds its sorrowful expression toward the God before whom we but lately bowed in grief and supplication, yet the countless benefits which have showered upon us during the past twelve months call for our fervent gratitude, and make it fitting that we should rejoice with thankfulness that the Lord in His infinite mercy has most signally favored our country and our people. Peace without and prosperity within have been vouchsafed to us. No pestilence has visited our shores; the abundant privileges of freedom which our fathers left us in their wisdom are still our increasing heritage; and if in parts of our vast domain some affliction has visited our brethren in their forest homes, yet even this calamity has been tempered and in a manner sanctified by the generous compassion for the sufferers which has been called forth throughout the land. For all these things it is meet that the voice of the nation should go up to God in devout homage."

The Refunding Scheme Operated by Mr. Windom is now, according to a report from Washington, fully realized. The total amount of the bonds continued at 3½ per cent is $579,560,050, and the total cost to the Government was about $10,000. Mr. Windom claims that his refunding operations result in a much greater saving to the Government than would have been effected by the refunding measures of the last Congress, as the bill passed by Congress appropriated one quarter of one per cent for expenses of refunding, which, he asserts, would have amounted to $1,448,900, as against less than $10,000 by his plan.

A Reception was Accorded at Cooper Union, New York, on Thursday last, to the two Irish Land Leaguers recently let out of jail by the clemency of the British Government. Tickets were sold at one dollar each, and the hall was well filled. Father Sheehy, the released Romish priest, made the principal speech. He said the Land act had been passed by Parliament and had become a law, but he regarded it "as the most deadly of all the forms of English tyranny ever presented under English law," a statement a little inconsistent with the fact that Irishmen under this act of tyranny are obtaining reductions of rent of thirty per cent and upward. Father Sheehy said further: "An instance of the intention of the English Premier in obtaining the passage of the Land act was found in the arrest of Parnell, who selected 3000 of the most flagrant cases of excessive rent with which to test the act." This is a new version of the story. Mr. Parnell expressly stated that the instances he selected to test the act were the least flagrant, and he gave plausible reasons for the selection of such cases. "Down with landlordism," the speaker said in conclusion. It was "the irreconcilable foe of every national endeavor. The law and logic of the Land League is 'No rent,' and this policy will eventually strangle 'landlordism.'" The priest's prophecy time will test; but "the law and the logic of the League" are capable of present examination. Judged by the acts and statements of its leaders, candid people will find no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that it is as illogical as it is lawless.

The Proceedings in the Star Route Cases collapsed on Thursday last. Judge Cox, of the Criminal Court of the District of Columbia, rendered a decision striking from the files of the court the information for conspiracy. The decision was based on technical grounds, and does not pronounce on the merits of the case. It turned on the exact meaning of the word "infamous." The Judge held that the crimes charged were "infamous" under the statutes and legal decisions touching the subject, and that under the Constitution proceedings could not be begun by information in cases where crimes of an infamous nature were charged, but must proceed by indictment of a Grand Jury. Mr. Cook, the special Assistant District Attorney, at the close of Judge Cox's decision, volunteered an explanation of the mode of procedure adopted, in which he said that up to the time of General Garfield's assassination it had been intended to proceed by indictment, but that afterward in the suspension of business which occurred, there was a delay in the proceedings, and the adjournment of the Grand Jury rendered the information the only course practicable. It is stated that the Government will go on with the prosecution on one or two cases which are not barred by the statute of limitation, but those cases are not so flagrant as those covered by the statute.

Mrs. Garfield has Written to Mr. Cyrus W. Field a letter acknowledging the national subscription for herself and her family, in which she says: "Your letter of October 26th is received, giving me the final statement regarding the fund for General Garfield's family so kindly supervised by you. As I have heretofore made only a verbal acknowledgment, I now wish formally to communicate to you, and through you to all who have contributed to it, my thanks for this generous testimonial, as an expression of the high esteem in which my husband was held and as a tribute to his memory. My children join me in this gratitude, and in the desire that as we accept this trust in their father's name we may be able to use it in a way worthy of him and satisfactory to those by whom it has been bestowed." Mrs. Garfield has also written to the chairman of the Committee of the National Garfield Memorial Hospital, expressing approval of the plan, and adds that she will contribute to the project.

The Fire Record of the Past Week has been very disastrous. A telegram from Reading, Pa., says that on November 11th the Orphans' Home at Womelsdorf, worth $20,000, was totally destroyed. On the same day a fire broke out at Old Orchard Beach, Me., which spread rapidly and destroyed six hotels. At Woodstock, N. B., the greater part of the town is laid in ashes. The fire was first seen at the Mechanics' Institute, from which a high wind carried the flames to the adjoining buildings, and before the conflagration was under control over forty buildings and three churches were burned.

Two Little Girls in a State of Intoxication were found in a gutter in Philadelphia on November 7th, by a policeman. They were too much stupefied to give any account of themselves, but another little girl who had been playing with them told who they were, and said their ages were respectively eleven and thirteen. She said they had all been playing on the lot, when, finding they had thirty cents among them, they procured a bottle, and one of them went into a tavern and bought ten cents' worth of whiskey. They drank this, and then had it filled twice again in two more taverns. Two questions are suggested by this instance of degradation: How did the children get this depraved taste? and has the great State of Pennsylvania no law which will punish the men who would supply children with spirits?

The Woman's National Christian Temperance Union has been holding a National Convention at Washington, D. C. Two hundred and thirty-three officers and delegates, representing thirty States and Territories, attended the Convention. The meetings were held in Foundry Church, and were well attended. The subject of female suffrage, which had been before previous Conventions, was again brought up. It was thought by many delegates that if women were allowed to vote the grand goal of prohibition would be attained, and that therefore female suffrage was a legitimate accompaniment to direct temperance work. On the other hand, some ladies present contended that the efforts of the original organization were being directed into new channels, and that combining the suffrage question with that of temperance would divide and weaken the organization. The controversy was warm, and it has been reported that a few members seceded to form a separate association. Finally a resolution was adopted by a large majority leaving each State to take independent action in relation to the woman's ballot. The plan of work for the coming year adopted by the Convention includes a recommendation for the circulation of a petition to Congress asking a constitutional amendment for the suppression of the liquor traffic in the United States. Several years, it is supposed, may be consumed in this preliminary work, but the ladies are enthusiastic and hopeful of final success.

An Editor's Opinion of the Best Book for business men was given lately in the New York Tribune. A correspondent, just commencing business, wrote to that journal stating some of the difficulties he met with, and asking, "Are there any books that will help me? What are some of the best books for a young business man?" In the course of his reply the editor said: "The best single treatise is the New Testament; next to this is the Book of Proverbs of Solomon. The best business man we have ever known memorized the entire Book of Proverbs at twenty-two—carrying the American Tract Society's ten-cent edition in his vest-pocket, and committing a half-dozen verses daily; and when he became an employer gave a copy of the book to every employé, with a friendly inscription commending it as an admirable business guide."

A Deputation from the Methodist Conference in Ireland has arrived in this country charged with the duty of appealing for aid for the Irish Methodist Churches. The deputation consists of Revs. John Ker, William Crook, and Oliver McCutcheon, who have issued an address explaining the grounds on which they solicit assistance. It appears that notwithstanding the financial depression in Ireland, and the consequent loss of income, not a single society or congregation has been abandoned since the union in 1878, and the last official census of the country shows that while other denominations, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, have declined in numbers, Methodism has increased. There is, however, now no possibility of continuing the evangelical agencies of the church without foreign assistance, and rather than relinquish any of them at a time when the contest with Romanism is so severe, it has been decided to appeal to American liberality, and the deputation was sent to present the case to the Methodists of this country.

The Sudden Collapse of Two Tenement houses in New York, on Wednesday, November 9th, caused the death of eight persons and serious injuries to eight others. The buildings—very old ones—had been reported unsafe, and notices would have been served on the inmates the day before the accident, but for that day being election day, and a legal holiday. There was no warning of the approaching fall of the houses. It was seven o'clock in the morning; some of the inmates had not left their beds, others were at breakfast, while others happily were absent from their homes. A passer-by says: "Those outside saw the building sway and settle. They saw bits fall out of the outer walls, and windows break, and slate drop from the eaves. Then after a little pause everything gave way, and with a mighty crash walls, partitions, floors, and ceilings fell in one chaotic heap. Shrieks of alarm and hoarse shouts of command had been heard through the confused noise of the breaking down; but after the crash there was an instant of silence, and then a long, shuddering, piercing wail in a woman's voice. Then all was still. Eight souls had passed into eternity." A company of firemen were soon at the scene of the disaster and commenced the perilous work of rescuing the entombed people. They were in some cases guided by fragments of clothing visible among the debris, and in others by the cries of the sufferers.

A startling sight was that of a child held aloft by a woman's arm. Her body was buried in the rubbish, leaving the one arm, which still grasped the child, exposed. It was two hours before she could be extricated from the mass of timber and soil under which she lay. During the whole time she was conscious and spoke occasionally to the men at work for her liberation. It is supposed that there were twenty people in the buildings when they fell, of whom only four escaped alive and without injury. A new story was not long ago added to the crazy structure, and at the coroner's inquest some explanation will be required as to why the Buildings Department passed the plans.

A Letter the Venerable Poet, John G. Whittier, wrote last month to a child, deserves notice as an evidence which young people may study with advantage of the kind of reminiscences which at the age of seventy-four a great man cherishes with most pleasure. Speaking of his boyhood, the grand old man says: "Neither change nor loss had then made me realize the uncertainty of all earthly things. I felt secure in my mother's love, and dreamed of losing nothing and gaining much. Looking back now, my chief satisfaction is that I loved and obeyed my parents, and tried to make them happy by trying to be good. That I did not succeed in all respects, that I fell very far short of my good intentions, was a frequent cause of sorrow. I had at that time a very great thirst for knowledge and little means to gratify it. The beauty of outward nature early impressed me; and the moral and spiritual beauty of the holy lives I read of in the Bible and other good books also affected me with a sense of my own falling short and longing for a better state. With every good wish for thee, I am thy sincere friend, John G. Whittier."

A Significant Reason for Using Bright Colors was given in a letter an old lady wrote to Gen. Garfield's mother lately. The writer was ninety years of age, and her letter was one of condolence, and with it was a quilt of the log-cabin pattern. She said she had thought to take black and white for the squares, but she thought of the Scripture, "When I bring a cloud over the earth, my bow shall be seen in the cloud," and so she took bright colors, though she modestly said she would not compare her work with the rainbow.

A Noted Freethinker Last Week Gave to a reporter his views on the tendency of free thought, which is the name by which it is attempted to veil scepticism, and give it a veneer of respectability. Rev. O. B. Frothingham, who is now in New York, where he formerly lectured for a long time as a leader among freethinkers, being asked why he abruptly discontinued his teaching said: "One fact began to loom up before my mental vision in a disquieting way—that the drift of free-thought teaching was unquestionably toward a dead materialism, which I have abhorred as deeply as any evangelical clergyman I know. The men who would become leaders in the free-thought movement do not stop where I stop; they had no training for the work of 'restoring,' in which light I regard much of my work. But the men whom I saw coming upon the stage were destroyers who tore down with no thought of building up; there seemed to be no limit to their destructive mania and no discrimination in their work. Their notion seemed to be to make a clean sweep of every existing creed; they apparently knew not and cared not whether anything in the shape of belief should arise from the ashes of the world's creeds." Evangelical Christians perceived long ago what Mr. Frothingham now admits. We can but hope that having learned so much, he may be still further enlightened, and that the Holy Spirit may show him the only safe way of commencing the constructive work he desires (1 Cor. 3 : 11).

WITHOUT CHRIST—NOTHING.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Without Me ye can do nothing." JOHN 15 : 5.

A Divine Utterance—Union Essential to Fruit-Bearing—What is in the Declaration—I. An Aspiration of Hope—For the Fruits of Holiness—For Conversion of Others—For a Blessing to the World—II. A Shudder of Fear—A Terrible Possibility—Intermittent Union—A Fire in a Marseilles Hotel—III. A Vision of Total Failure—Outward Signs of Christ's Absence—In the Doctrine—A Converted Jew in a London Church—Bread Without Flour—Modern Lives of Christ—Compliment and Critiques—Christ in the Spirit—In Actual Presence—Talking and Doing—IV. A Voice of Wisdom—To be Acknowledged—Prayer, Faith, and Submission—V. A Song of Content—A New England Lunatic—"Let Him Try."

THIS is not the language of a man of ordinary mould. No saint, no prophet, no apostle would ever have addressed a company of faithful men, and have said to them, "Without me ye can do nothing." Had Jesus Christ been, as some say, a good man, and nothing more, such language as this would have been unseemly and inconsistent. Among the virtues of a perfect man we must certainly reckon modesty, but this from a mere man would have been shamelessly immodest. It is impossible to conceive that Jesus of Nazareth, had he not been more than man, could ever have uttered the sentence, "Without Me ye can do nothing."

My brethren, I hear in this sentence the voice of that Divine Person without whom was not anything made that was made. The majesty of the words reveals the Godhead of Him that uttered them. The "I am" comes out in the personal word "Me," and the claim of all power unveils the Omnipotent. These words mean Godhead or nothing. The spirit in which we listen to this language is that of adoration. Let us bow our heads in solemn worship, and so unite with the multitude before the throne who ascribe power and dominion and might to Him that sitteth upon the throne and to the Lamb.

Our text is only another form of the fourth verse: "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye except ye abide in Me." I am, therefore, going to address myself to you who profess to know and love the Lord, and are anxious to glorify His name, and I have to remind you that union to Christ is essential; for only as you are one with Him, and continue to be so, can you bring forth the fruits which prove you to be truly His.

I. Reading again this solemn sentence, "Without Me ye can do nothing," it first excites in me

AN ASPIRATION OF HOPE.

There is something to be done, our religion is to have a grand practical outcome. I have been thinking of Christ as the vine, and of the myriads of branches in Him, and my heart has hoped for great things. From such a root what a vintage must come! Being branches in Him, what fruit we must produce! There can be nothing scanty or poverty-stricken in the fruitage of a vine so full of sap. Fruit of the best quality, fruit in the utmost abundance, fruit unrivalled, must be borne by such a vine.

That word "do" has music in it. Yes, brethren, Jesus went about doing good and, being in Him, we shall do good. Everything about Him is efficient, practical—in a word, fruit-bearing; and being joined to Him much will yet be done by us. We have been saved by the almighty grace of God apart from all doings of our own, and now that we are saved we long to do something in return: we feel a high ambition to be of some use and service to our great Lord and Master. The text, even though there be a negative in it, yet raises in our soul the hope that ere we go hence and be no more we may even here on earth do something for Christ.

Beloved, there is the ambition and hope before us of doing something in the way of glorifying God by bringing forth the fruits of holiness, peace, and love. We would adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. By pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by love unfeigned, by every good and holy work, we would show forth the praises of our God. For none of these things are we equal in and of ourselves, and yet by faith we say with Paul, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." We may be adorned with plentiful clusters, we may cause the Saviour to have joy in us that our joy may be full: great possibilities are before us.

We aspire not only to produce fruit in ourselves, but to bear much fruit in the conversion of others, even as Paul desired concerning the Romans, that he might have fruit among them. In this matter we can do nothing whatever alone; but being united unto Christ we bring forth increase unto the Lord. Our Lord Jesus said, "The works that I do shall ye do also, and greater works than these shall ye do, because I go unto the Father." Brethren, a hope springs up in our bosom that we may each one of us bring many souls to Jesus. Not because we have any power in ourselves, but because we are united to Jesus we joyfully hope to bring forth fruit in the way of leading others to the knowledge of the gospel.

My soul takes fire of hope, and I say to myself, If it be so, all these branches, and all alive, how much fruit of further blessing will ripen for this poor world. Men shall be blessed in us because we are blessed in Christ. What must be the influence of ten thousand godly examples? What must be the influence upon our country of thousands of Christian men and women practically advancing love, peace, justice, virtue, holiness! And if each one is seeking to bring others to Christ what numerous conversions there must be, and how largely must the Church of God be increased. Do you not know that if there were only ten thousand real Christians in the world, yet if each one of these brought one other to Christ every year it would not need twenty years to accomplish the conversion of the entire population of the globe? This is a simple sum in arithmetic which any schoolboy can work out.

Beloved friends in Christ, have you not strong desires to see some such consummation? Do you not long to take a share in the high enterprise of winning the world to Christ? Oh, ye that are young and full of spirits, do you not long to press to the front of this great crusade? Our souls pine to see the knowledge of the Lord covering the earth as the waters cover the sea. It is glad tidings to us that, joined unto Christ, we can do something in this great business, something upon which the Lord will smile, something which shall redound to the glory of His name. We are not condemned to inaction; we are not denied the joy of service, the superior blessedness of giving and of doing; the Lord hath chosen us and ordained us to go and bring forth fruit, fruit that shall remain. This is the aspiration which rises in our soul; the Lord grant that we may see it take actual form in our lives.

II. But now, in the second place, there passes through my heart

A SHUDDER OF FEAR.

Albeit I glow and burn with strong desire, and rise upon the wing of a mighty ambition to do something great for Christ, yet I read the text, and a sudden trembling takes hold upon me. "Without Me:"—it is possible, then, that I may be without Christ, and so may be utterly incapacitated for all good. Come, friends, I want you to feel, even though it cast a cold chill over you, that you may possibly be "without Christ." I would have you feel it in the very marrow of your bones, yea, in the centre of your hearts. You profess to be in Christ; but are you so? The large majority of those to whom I speak this morning are visible members of the visible Church of Christ; but what if you should not be so in Him as to bring forth fruit?

I will put the thought another way—What if you should be in Christ, and not so in Him as to abide in Him? It appears from our Lord's words that some branches in Him are cast forth and are withered. "If a man abide not in Me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered." Some who are called by His name, and reckoned among His disciples, whose names are heard whenever the muster-roll of the Church is read, yet do not continue in Him. My hearer, what if it should happen that you are only in Christ on a Sunday, but in the world all the week? What if you are only in Christ at the communion table, or at the prayer-meeting, or at certain periods of devotion? What if you are off and on with Christ? What if you play fast and loose with the Lord? What if you are an outside saint and an inside devil? Ah me, what will come of such conduct as this?

One year when I was travelling toward my usual winter resting-place I halted at Marseilles, and there was overtaken by great pain. In my room in the hotel I found it cold, and so I asked for a fire. I was sitting in a very desponding mood, when suddenly the tears came to my eyes, as if smitten with a great sorrow. I shall never forget the thoughts which stirred my heart. The porter came in to light the fire. He had in his hand a bundle of twigs. I called to him to let me look at it. He was about to push it into the stove as fuel with which to kindle the fire.

As I took the bundle into my hand, I found it was made of vine branches—branches that had been cut off now that the pruning time was come. Ah me, I thought, will this be my portion? Here I am, away from home, unable to bear fruit, as I love to do. Shall I end with this as my portion? Shall I be gathered for the fire? Those vine shoots were parts of a good vine, no doubt—branches that once looked fair and green; but now they were fuel for the flame. They had been cut off and cast off as useless things, and then men gathered them and tied them in bundles, and they were ignobly thrust into the fire! What a picture! There goes a bundle of ministers into the fire! There is a bundle of elders! There's another bundle of deacons, a bundle of church members, a bundle of Sunday-school teachers! "Men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." Dear brothers and sisters, shall this be the lot of any of us who have named the name of Christ? Well did I say a shudder may go through us as we listen to those words, "without Me."

III. Having come so far in our second head, under the third I behold

A VISION OF TOTAL FAILURE.

"Without Me," says the text, "ye can do nothing"—ye can produce nothing. The visible Church of Christ has tried this experiment a great many times already, and always with the same result. Separated from Christ, His church can do nothing which she was formed to do. She is sent into the world upon a high enterprise, with noble aims before her, and grand forces at her disposal; but if she could cease from communion with Christ she would become wholly incapable.

Now what are the outward signs of any community being apart from Christ? Answer, first, It may be seen in a ministry without Christ in its doctrine. This we have seen ourselves. Woe worth the day that it is so! History tells us that not only in the Romish Church and the Anglican Church, but among the Nonconformist churches, Christ has been at times forgotten. Not only among Unitarians, but among Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, all round, Jesus has been dishonored. Attempts have been made to do something without Christ as the truth to be preached. Ah me, what folly it is! They preach up intellectualism, and hope that this will be the great power of God; but it is not. "Surely," say they, "novelties of thought and refinement of speech will attract and win! The preachers aspire to be leaders of thought; will they not command the multitude and charm the intelligent? Add music and architecture, and what is to hinder success?" Many a young minister has given up his whole mind to this—to try and be exceedingly refined and intellectual; and what has he done with these showy means? The sum total is expressed in the text—"Nothing:" "Without Me ye can do nothing."

What emptiness this folly has created; when the pulpit is without Christ the pews are soon without people. I knew a chapel where an eminent divine was to be heard for years. A converted Jew coming to London to visit a friend, set out on Sunday morning to find a place of Christian worship, and he chanced to enter the chapel of this eminent divine. When he came back he said that he feared he had made a mistake; he had turned into a building which he hoped was a Christian place of assembly; but as he had not heard the name of Jesus all the morning, he thought perhaps he had fallen in with some other religionists. I fear that many modern sermons might just as fairly have been delivered in a Mahometan mosque as in a Christian church. We have too many preachers of whom we might complain, "they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him."

Christianity without Christ is a strange thing indeed. And what comes of it where it is held up to the people? Why, by-and-by there are not enough people to support the ministry; empty benches are plentiful, and the thing gets pretty nearly wound up. Blessed be God for it! I am heartily glad that without Christ these pretended ministers cannot prosper. Leave Christ out of the preaching and you shall do nothing. Only advertise it all over London, Mr. Baker, that you are making bread without flour; put it in every paper, "Bread without flour;" and you may soon shut up your shop, for your customers will hurry off to other tradesmen. Somehow there is a strange prejudice in people's minds in favor of bread made of flour, and there is also an unaccountable prejudice in the human mind which makes men think that if there be a gospel it must have Christ in it.

Further, without acknowledging always the absolute supremacy of Christ we shall do nothing. Jesus is much complimented nowadays; but He is not submitted to as absolute Lord. I hear many pretty things about Christ from men who reject His gospel. "Lives of Christ" we have in any quantity. Oh for one which would set Him forth in His glory as God, as Head of the Church and Lord of all! I should greatly like to see a "Life of Christ" written by one who knew Him by communion with Him and by reverently sitting at His feet. Most of the pretty things about Jesus which I read nowadays seem to have been written by persons who have seen Him through a telescope at a great distance, and know Him "according to Matthew," but not according to personal fellowship. Oh for a "Life of Christ" by Samuel Rutherford or George Herbert, or by some other sweet spirit to whom the ever-blessed One is as a familiar friend!

DOCTRINES OUT OF DATE.

Certain modern praises of Jesus are written upon the theory that, on the whole, the Saviour has given us a religion that is tolerably suited to the enlightenment of the nineteenth century, and may be allowed to last a little longer. Jesus is commended by these critics, and somewhat admired as preferable to most teachers; but He is by no means to be blindly followed. It is fortunate for Jesus that He commends Himself to the "best thought" and ripest culture of the period; for, if He had not done so, these wise gentlemen would have exposed Him as being behind the times. Of course they have every now and then to rectify certain of His dogmas, especially such as justification by faith, or atonement, or the doctrine of election—these are old-fashioned things, which belong to an older and less enlightened period, and therefore they adapt them by tearing out their real meaning.

The doctrines of grace, according to the infallible critics of the period, are out of date—nobody believes them now, and so they settle off old-fashioned believers as non-existent. Christ is rectified and squared, and His garment without seam is taken off, and He is dressed out in proper style, as by a West-End clothier; then He is introduced to us as a remarkable teacher, and we are advised to accept Him as far as He goes. For the present the wise ones tolerate Jesus; but there is no telling what is to come: the progress of this age is so astonishing that it is just possible we shall before long leave Christ and Christianity behind.

Now, what will come of this foolish wisdom? Nothing but delusions, mischief, infidelity, anarchy, and all manner of imaginable and unimaginable ills. The world hates Christ and must hate Him; if it would boldly denounce Christ it would be to us a more hopeful sign than its deceitful Judas kiss. We keep simply to this—the Lord hath said it, and we care not who approves or disapproves. Jesus is God and Head of the Church, and we must do what He bids us, and say what He tells us; if we fail in this, nothing of good will come of it. If the Church gets back to her loyalty, she shall see what her Lord will do; but without Christ as absolute Lord, infallible Teacher, and honored King, all must be failure even to the end.

Go a little further: you may have sound doctrine, and yet do nothing unless you have Christ in your spirit. I have known all the doctrines of grace to be unmistakably preached, and yet there have been no conversions; for this reason, that they were not expected and scarcely desired. In former years many orthodox preachers thought it to be their sole duty to comfort and confirm the godly few who by dint of great perseverance found out the holes and corners in which they prophesied. These brethren spoke of sinners as of people whom God might possibly gather in if He thought fit to do so; but they did not care much whether He did so or not. As to weeping over sinners as Christ wept over Jerusalem; as to venturing to invite them to Christ as the Lord did when He stretched out His hands all the day long; as to lamenting with Jeremiah over a perishing people, they had no sympathy with such emotions, and feared that they savored of Arminianism.

Both preacher and congregation were cased in a hard shell, and lived as if their own salvation was the sole design of their existence. If anybody did grow zealous and seek conversions, straightway they said he was indiscreet, or conceited. When a church falls into this condition it is, as to its spirit, "without Christ." What comes of it? Some of you know by your own observation what does come of it. The comfortable corporation exists and grows for a little while, but it comes to nothing in the long run; and so it must; there can be no fruit-bearing where there is not the spirit of Christ as well as the doctrine of Christ. Except the spirit of the Lord rests upon you, causing you to agonize for the salvation of men even as Jesus did, ye can do nothing.

But above all things we must have Christ with us in the power of

HIS ACTUAL PRESENCE.

Do we think of this—"Without Me ye can do nothing?" We are going out this afternoon to teach the young; shall we be quite sure to take Christ with us? or on the road shall we suddenly stop and say, "I am without my Master, and I must not dare to go another step?" The abiding consciousness of the love of Christ in our soul is the essential element of our strength.

Power to change the human will, power to enlighten the intellect as to the things of God, and to influence the mind as to repentance and faith, must come entirely from the Most High. Do we feel that? or do we put our thoughts together for an address, and say, "Now, that is a strong point, and that will produce effect;" and do we rest there? If so, we can do nothing at all.

We have, then, before us a vision of total failure if we attempt in any way to do without Christ. He says, "Without Me ye can do nothing;" it is in the doing that the failure is most conspicuous. You may talk a good deal without Him; you may hold congresses, and conferences, and conventions; but doing is another matter. Without Jesus you can talk any quantity; but without Him you can do nothing. The most eloquent discourse without Him will be all a bottle of smoke. You shall lay your plans, and arrange your machinery, and start your schemes; but without the Lord you will do nothing. Immeasurable cloudland of proposals and not a spot of solid doing large enough for a dove's foot to rest on—such shall be the end of all! You may have all the money that generosity can lavish, all the learning that your universities can supply, and all the oratory that the most gifted can lay at your feet; but "without Me," saith Christ, "ye can do nothing."

FUSS, FLARE, FIREWORKS, AND FAILURE; that is the end of it. "Without Me ye can do nothing."

Let me repeat those words again, "Do nothing." "Do nothing," and the world dying around us! Africa in darkness! China perishing! Hindostan sunk in superstition, and a church which can do nothing! No bread to be handed out to the hungry, and the multitude fainting and dying! The rock to be smitten and the water of life to leap out for the thirsty, but not a drop forthcoming, because Jesus is not there. The age shall advance in discovery, and men of science shall do their little best, but you shall do "nothing" without Christ, absolutely nothing! You shall not proceed a single inch upon your toilsome way, though you row till the oars snap with the strain; you shall be drifted back by winds and currents unless you take Jesus into the ship.

Remember that all the while the great Husbandman is watching you, for His eye is on every vine-branch. He sees that you are producing no grapes, and He is coming round with that sharp knife of His, cutting here and there! What must become of you who produce nothing? It makes one's very soul to curdle within him to think that we should live to do nothing. Yet I fear that thousands of Christians get no further than this; they are not immoral, dishonest, or profane; but they do nothing. They think of what they would like to do, and they plan and they propose; but they do nothing. There are buds in plenty, but not a single grape is produced and all because they do not get into that vital, overflowing, effectual communion with Christ which would fill them with life and constrain them to bring forth fruit unto the glory of God. There is a vision, then, of the failure all along the line if we try to do without Christ.

IV. But now, fourthly, I hear

a still small voice, which speaks out of the text, and says to us who are in Christ, let us acknowledge this. Down on your knees, bow your mouths in the dust and say, "Lord, it is true: without Thee we can do nothing, nothing whatever that is good and acceptable in the sight of God. We have not ability of ourselves to think anything of ourselves, but our ability is of God." Now, do not speak thus, as if you paid a compliment which orthodoxy requires you to make; but from the deeps of your soul, smitten with an absolute self-despair, own the truth unto God. "To will is present with me, but how to perform that which I would I find not." Lord, I am a good-for-nothing do-nothing, a fruitless, barren, dry, rotten branch without Thee, and this I feel in my inmost soul. Be not far from me, but quicken me by Thy presence.

Next, let us pray. If without Christ we can do nothing, let us cry to Him that we may never be without Him. Let us with strong crying and tears entreat His abiding presence. He comes to those who seek Him; let us never cease seeking. In conscious fellowship with Him, let us plead that the fellowship should be unbroken evermore. Let us pray that we may be so knit and joined to Jesus that we may be one spirit with Him, never to be separated from Him again.

Next, let us personally cleave to Jesus. Let us not attempt a life of separation; for that were to seek the living among the dead. Do not let us depart from Him for a single minute. Would you like to be caught at any one second of your life in a condition in which you could do nothing? I must confess I should not like to be in that state—incapable of defence against my enemies, or of service for my Lord. May you never be in such a state that you would be a do-nothing, with opportunities afforded and yet without strength to utilize them! If you are divided from Christ you are divided from the possibility of doing good; cling therefore, to the Saviour with your whole might and let nothing take you off from Him; no not for an hour.

Heartily submit yourselves, also, dear friends, to the Lord's headship and leadership, and ask to do everything in His style and way. He will not be with you unless you accept Him as your Master. There must be no quarrel about supremacy, but you must yield yourself up absolutely to Him, to be, to do, or to suffer, according to His will. When it is wholly so He will be with you, and you shall do everything that is required of you. Wonderful things will the Lord perform through you when once He is your all in all. Will we not have it so?

V. And now, lastly. While I was listening to my text as a child puts a shell to its ear and listens till it hears the deep sea rolling in its windings, I heard within my text

A SONG OF CONTENT.

"Without Me ye can do nothing." My heart said, "Lord, what is there that I want to do without Thee?" There is no pain in this thought to me. "Without Me ye can do nothing." Be it so. Brethren, are you not all agreed? Do you wish to have it altered, any of you that love His dear name? I am sure you do not; for suppose, dear friends, we could do something without Christ then He would not have the glory of it. Who wishes that? There would be little crowns for our poor little heads, for we should have done something without Him; but now there is one great crown for that dear head which once was girt with thorns; for all His saints put together cannot do anything without Him.

I feel so glad that without Christ we can do nothing, because I fear that if the Church could do something without Christ she would try to live without Him. If she could teach and school and bring the children to salvation without Christ, I am afraid Christ would never go into a Sunday-school again. If we could preach successfully without Jesus, I suspect that the Lord Jesus Christ would seldom stand on high among the people again. If our Christian literature could bless men without Christ, I am afraid we should set the printing-press going and never think about the crucified One in the matter.

"Without Me ye can do nothing." As I listened to the song within these words I began to laugh; I wonder if you will laugh too. I thought of those who are going to destroy the orthodox doctrine from off the face of the earth. How they boast of the decline and death of old-fashioned evangelism. I have read once or twice that I am the race is all dying out. To this I demur; I am willing to be esteemed last in merit, but not last as ending the race. There are many others who are steadfast in the faith. They say our old theology is decaying, and that nobody believes it. It is all a lie; but wise men say so, and therefore we are bound to consider ourselves obsolete and extinct. We are, in their esteem, as much out of date as antediluvians would be could they walk our streets.

Yes, they are going to quench our coal and blot us out from Israel. Newspapers and reviews and the general intelligence of the age all join to dance upon our graves. "Without Me ye can do nothing;" if this be true of apostles, much more of opposers! If His friends can do nothing without Him, I am sure His foes can do nothing against Him. If they that follow His steps and lie in His bosom can do nothing without Him, I am sure His adversaries cannot, and so I laughed at their laughter and smiled at their confusion.

I laughed, too, because I recollected a story of a New England service when the pastor one afternoon was preaching in his own solemn way, and the good people were listening or sleeping, as their minds inclined. It was a substantial edifice wherein they assembled, fit to outlive an earthquake. All went on peacefully in the meeting-house that afternoon till suddenly a lunatic started up, denounced the minister, and declared that he would at once pull down the meeting house about their ears. Taking hold of one of the pillars of the gallery, this newly-announced Samson repeated his threatening. Everybody rose; the women were ready to faint; the men began to rush to the door, and there was danger that the people would be trodden on as they rushed down the aisles. There was about to be a great tumult; no one could see the end of it; when suddenly one cool brother sitting near the pulpit produced a calm by a single sentence. "Let him try!" was the stern sarcasm which hushed the tempest. Even so to-day the enemy is about to disprove the Gospel and crush out the doctrines of grace. Are you distressed, alarmed, astounded? So far from that, my reply to the adversary's boast that he will pull down the pillars of our Zion is this only—Let him try! Amen.

John Holt's Quandary.

A Letter from a Dead Father.

THE FALL AND RECOVERY OF JOHN HOLT.

A Temperance Story.

JOHN HOLT was a gentleman farmer who lived on a beautiful estate which he had inherited from his father, in the West of Yorkshire, England. Both father and son were fine specimens of sturdy Yorkshire independence and thoroughness. They knew practically all the ins and outs of farming, and were proud of being able to buy the best stock which the best markets could boast. On all matters requiring uncommon shrewdness and penetration their opinion was quoted by their neighbors as of unquestionable authority. When the old man died, the regret of all who knew him was mingled with no little satisfaction that the qualities which had secured for him so much respect were largely possessed by his only son.

John Holt was proud of his ancestry, and especially proud to be regarded as the worthy successor of such a father. The place of honor which that father had so long filled as the chairman of different local organizations, and as one of the largest land-proprietors in the district, not connected with the aristocracy, was now cheerfully accorded to the son. And for some time John Holt kept up the traditions of the fine old house for a large-hearted hospitality and an almost unequalled welcome to troops of friends.

But gradually a change came over the house. Though he had become more and more jovial on market days, it seemed as if he had begun to care less about the society of the more reputable and thoughtful of his neighbors than formerly. By and by there was often a heavy look about his eyes and a want of attention to matters of dress and appearance, that those who observed him closely could not help noticing.

The farm-laborers were not long in finding out that they were not so carefully looked after as they used to be, and with the exception of one or two who had learned from their Bibles to despise mere eye-service, they began to go about their work with a slack hand. It thus came to pass that a careful observer could soon discern, in garden and field and stock, marks of unmistakable deterioration. Mr. Holt's wife, too, had now a careworn and anxious look.

Unlike his forefathers, not one of whom had ever left the land of their birth, her husband often spent several weeks together in Paris, where, along with drinkers and gamblers, he sowed the seeds which yielded an abundant harvest. After a few months of this reckless living he found it necessary to mortgage his estate heavily, and in a little while the large sum which he was thus able to command was all gone.

Perhaps this loss, humiliating though it was, was the very best thing that, under the circumstances, could have happened to John Holt. Of all the ills of life, there was none which seemed to him half so bad as debt, and he could not bear the thought of being pointed at by whispering neighbors as a man who could not pay his way.

One autumnal day, after preparing for the hunt, in which his father and grandfather had all their lives taken part, he paused before leaving the house, and said to his wife, with a look of great wretchedness, "I'll tell you what, Mary, I think I won't go to-day. I'd rather shoot myself than meet Sir Edward, after borrowing money of him; and there are plenty besides him who know by this time that I'm hard up. I never thought it would come to this."

As Mr. Holt uttered these words the tears burst from his eyes, and his wife, seeing that he was utterly broken down, led him into the drawing-room, and without one word of reproach tried to comfort him. In the course of two hours more, another bitter ingredient was added to his cup. It was pay day. The laborers came trooping to the back door as usual for their weekly wages, but Smith, the head gardener, had returned from the bank with a polite message to the effect that as Mr. Holt's account was already overdrawn, no further advance could be made to him. The thought of those poor laborers who had been accustomed to look up to him as one of the truest gentlemen in the neighborhood, being kept out of their money, even for a few hours, was to him simply heart-rending. But there was no avoiding it now. The crisis had come. The storm descended and beat upon the fabric of John Holt's pride, and it fell, and great was the fall of it.

For several days he wandered about in a state of such distraction that his wife greatly feared he would commit suicide. In an incredibly short time his hair turned gray, though he was not yet forty, his gait became tremulous and uncertain, and he had every appearance of a broken-down man. Taking pity upon his wretchedness, a brother-in-law, knowing that he would never be able to hold up his head in Yorkshire again, offered to supply him with funds to go to America, offering also a letter of introduction to the Governor of one of the Western States. Having gladly accepted the offer, John Holt and his wife erelong took a sad farewell of the home of which they had been so proud, and, after a long voyage, reached their destination.

Going direct to the gentleman to whom the letter of introduction was addressed, Mr. Holt, with the utmost frankness, told him the whole history of his fall and disgrace, calling his wrong-doing by its worst name, and declaring himself ready to do the very humblest work, by which he could get an honest living.

Fortunately for him, the gentleman to whom he was guided was a man of God, who had no faith in any kind of reformation which was not the outcome of a new heart and a right spirit. "Well," said the hospitable American, "you have come a long way with a sad tale. The best thing we can do is to tell the Lord about it." So saying, he knelt down, and with great fervor implored the God of all mercy to be gracious to the stranger who had fared so badly in the devil's service. "Give him to see the evil of sin and his need of a Saviour. The great ocean he has just crossed is not half so vast as the ocean of Thy love. Be thou his God, his Guide, his Friend, his All."

Then, taking Mr. Holt by the hand, he told him he had just come at the right time, for he wanted a steward of education and thorough business habits. "You shall have the stewardship, Mr. Holt, if you will solemnly promise me to have done with drink and stick to the work." This promise being gladly given and faithfully kept, Mr. Holt became so valuable a steward that before three years had elapsed he had been taken into partnership with his new-found friend, and in a few years more had entirely retrieved himself and amassed a considerable fortune. But the lesson so learned was never forgotten, and John Holt, though prosperous, could never be induced to touch another drop of liquor.

ETHEL THORNLEY'S LETTER.

AN orphan's lot is a very sad one, however its hardships are mitigated by circumstances. Money and kind friends may do much to alleviate its sorrows, but with all these it is inexpressibly mournful for a child to be without the tender guidance of a father and the love of a mother.

That was Ethel Thornley's lot. She was twelve years of age, and during the last four years she had been deprived of parental care. Her mother had been stricken with consumption, and had died in a few months, and her father, who had appeared a healthy, robust man, was the victim of heart disease, which terminated fatally only a few weeks after his wife died. The doctors said the shock of the wife's death had hastened that of her husband, who had loved her tenderly.

Mr. Thornley had no near relatives, but he had lived on very intimate terms with his lawyer, and when he found that his death was imminent, he placed all his wealth, which was considerable, in his friend's hands, and besought him to receive his little eight-year-old daughter into his home, and care for her during her childhood. The trust was accepted and faithfully discharged. As far as it was possible to fill a father's place, Mr. Norton had done it, and Ethel grew up cheerful and contented.

Her twelfth birthday came round, and then Mr. Norton had a commission to fulfil. His dead friend had left a packet in his hands with the superscription, "To my dear little daughter, to be given her on her twelfth birthday, if God grant that she live to that day." Ethel was a child more than ordinarily intelligent, but joined with that intelligence was a sensitiveness and a delicacy that struck all who knew her with the impression that she was very frail. Mr. Norton feared that this letter, which seemed like a message from the dead, might produce a painful shock to the child, and it was with some trepidation that, when he came down to breakfast on that eventful morning, he brought the packet down with him. But Ethel had not returned from her morning walk, and Mr. Norton, glad of a reprieve, took it with him to his city office. But he was nervous about it all day, and he returned to his home earlier than usual, as he phrased it to himself, "to have it over."

When he returned Ethel was not in the house, but as he looked out in the garden he saw her sitting on a rustic seat, one hand holding a book and the other caressing a favorite cat, her especial pet, a big animal, tractable to no one else but Ethel. Mr. Norton made his way to the place where she sat, and after a few words of explanation placed the packet in her hands.

Let us look over Ethel's shoulder and see what a father, feeling himself about to leave the world, felt it was most important for the child he loved best in all the world to know, and what he sought to impress on her mind. This is what Ethel read:

"MY DEAR LITTLE DAUGHTER:

"I have heard from my physician to-day that I must soon die and leave you alone in the world. The thought is agonizing to me, for the world is a dangerous place for a girl to live in without a father or mother. I have made such arrangements for you as seem to me best, and before you read this you will know what they are. But still, with all my anxiety and thought, the consciousness remains that you must be left to a large extent to your own guidance, and I thought I might help you a little by a letter for you to read four years hence. I want you to grow up a noble, good woman, such as your mother was, and I have thought much of how I should advise you. I have prayed, too, Ethel, that God would tell me what to say, and this is the result. Inclosed you will find a copy of the New Testament. It was your mother's. Will my little girl obey the request of a dying father? I ask you, Ethel, to read it every day of your life, and every time you read it pray to God to bless it. This is my last request, and as I stand on the threshold of the unseen world it seems to me the best request I can make. Obey it, my love, and meet your mother and father in the land this will tell you how to reach. God bless my little girl, and keep her from all harm is the prayer of her loving father, WILLIAM THORNLEY."

There was no word of direction as to her property—no word such as Lord Chesterfield wrote to his son about deportment. The dying man saw in the New Testament a higher rule of life than any to be found elsewhere, and to that he directed his daughter. And he was right. If the spirits of the departed can see what occurs in the world they have left, William Thornley's spirit must have rejoiced as he saw his daughter's life. Consecrated early to Christ, she spent her years in His service, and lived the highest, noblest, and best of lives, that of a sincere Christian.

THE SPEZIA MISSION, ITALY.

SOME fifteen years ago a few Christian young men were travelling in Italy. Among them was Mr. Edward Clark, a man whose earnest desire was to do some work for Jesus. In the various towns through which the party passed, Mr. Clark made inquiries of the people as to the religious condition of the population. The answers filled his soul with sorrow, and he determined in the Lord's strength to take up his permanent residence in Italy, and there work to spread the knowledge of the Gospel among people sunk in darkness. He was a Baptist, but he sought no help from any missionary society, but resolved, God helping him, to earn his own livelihood and preach Christ as God gave him opportunity. His Christian wife fully sympathized with him, and together they bade adieu to their friends in England and settled at Spezia, a flourishing seaport near Genoa, where the large ironclads are built for the Italian navy.

Mr. Clark says: "The field of labor, when we commenced, seemed to present little else than a region overgrown with rank weeds, thorns, and nettles. Nearly all the inhabitants were Papists or infidels. But now God's Word has been circulated, and there have been many conversions. Our prayer-meetings are attended by sixty-seven persons, and our little church has become as a small oasis in the midst of the barren sands of Romanism and infidelity, and from it go forth refreshing and fertilizing waters of salvation, carrying with them life and beauty."

As the work grew and the blessing of God came upon it, Mr. Clark felt the inconvenience of the small accommodation his straitened means would alone permit him to engage. Many more came to the meetings than his rooms would hold, and the necessity for a more commodious building was felt. The matter was made the subject of prayer, and Mr. Clark was directed to a large palace then unoccupied. It was resolved to secure it, and in order to meet the expense to let a large portion of it to visitors. Thus the Spezia mission, a picture of which appears above, was established.

The place is now become the centre of evangelizing work. Young men who have there heard for the first time the message of the Gospel, and have been converted by the Holy Spirit, have been trained as teachers and have gone out to other places to declare what God has done for their souls. A day-school for children has also been formed in the building. Mr. Clark says: "It began with one child, and now numbers about 250 scholars. They carry the Gospel into their homes by singing such hymns as 'Rock of Ages,' etc. The only adequate power to conquer and transmute evil is love, and to the large mingling of this element in our school work in Spezia we may trace much of our present success."

As the work increased other volunteers came into the field, and there are now eighteen workers engaged in the mission, of whom thirteen are native Italians. Among numerous instances showing the need of such a work as the Spezia mission, we quote one which appears in "Sunny Memories," by Rev. J. H. Betts, who says: "For a fellow-passenger in our compartment we find an Italian youth who is on his way to Pisa. Our friend Mr. Clark, after chatting with him on general subjects, asks, 'A student, I presume?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Of medicine?' 'No, sir; theology.' 'Ah, indeed! I have myself a great interest in theology. Of course you read the Bible?' 'No, sir; I have not come to that yet. I am not old enough at present.' 'Well, I hope you will read it soon, for the finest theology in the world is to be found there.' The student uttered an exclamation of surprise. When alighting at the station, within sight of the Leaning Tower, however, Brother Clark induced him to accept a copy of a portion of the Book, which, though the best theological treatise in the world, he—a theological student—had never yet read."

Mr. Francis Murphy's Gospel Temperance services in Bolton, England, closed on Friday, October 28th, with a convention, amid much enthusiasm. The Temperance Hall had been crowded to excess every night for three weeks previous, and hundreds vainly sought admission at each meeting. The number of pledges taken exceeds ten thousand.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Fast Bound.

ROLAND SEFTON had met with but few difficulties in getting clear away out of England, and there was little chance of his being identified, from description merely, by any of the foreign police, or by any English detective on the Continent who was not as familiar with his personal appearance as the Riversborough force were. In his boyhood he had spent many months, years even, in his mother's native village with her father, M. Roland Merle, the pastor of a parish among the Jura Mountains. It was as easy for him to assume the character of a Swiss mountaineer as to sustain that of a prosperous English banker. The dress, the patois, the habits of the peasant were all familiar to him, and his disguise in them was as complete as disguise ever can be. The keen eye either of love or hate can pierce through all disguises.

Switzerland was all fatherland to him, as much so as his native country, and the county in which Riversborough was situated. There was no ignorance in him of any little town, or the least known of the Alps, which might betray the stranger. He would never need to attract notice by asking a question. He had become a member of an Alpine club as soon as his boyish thews and sinews were strong enough for stiff and perilous climbing. He had crossed the most difficult passes and scaled some of the worst peaks. And there had been within him that passionate love of the country common to the Swiss, which an English Alpine climber can never feel.

His mother's land had filled him with an ardent flame, smouldering at times amid the absorbing interests of his somewhat prominent place in English life, but every now and then breaking out into an irrepressible longing for the sight of its white mountains and swift, strong streams. It was at once the safest and the most dangerous of refuges. He would be certainly sought for there; but there he could most effectually conceal himself. He flew thither with his burden of sin and shame.

Roland adopted at once the dress of a decent artisan of the Jura—such a man as he had known in his boyhood as a watchmaker of Locle or the Doubs. For a few days he stayed in Geneva, lodging in such a street as a Locle artisan would have chosen; but he could not feel secure there, in spite of his own certainty that his transformation was complete. A restless dread haunted him. He knew well that there are in every one little personal traits, tricks of gesture, and certain tones of voice always ready to betray us. It was yet too early in the year for many travellers to be journeying to Switzerland; but already a few straggling pioneers of the summer flight were appearing in the larger towns, and what would be his fate if any one of them recognized him? He quitted Geneva, and wandered away into the mountain villages.

It was May-time, and the snow-line was still lingering low down on the steep slopes, though the flowers were springing into life up to its very margin, seeming to drive it higher and higher every day. The High Alps were still fast-locked in midwinter, and with untrodden wastes and plains of snow lying all around them. The deserted mountain farms and great solitary hotels, so thronged last summer, were empty. But in the valleys and the little villages lying on the warm southern slopes, or sheltered by precipitous rocks from the biting winds, there was everywhere a joyous stir of awakening from the deep sleep of winter. The frozen streams were thawed and ran bubbling and gurgling along their channels, turning water-wheels and filling all the quiet places with their merry noise. The air itself was full of sweet exhilaration. In the forests there was the scent of stirring sap and the up-springing wild flowers; and the rosy blossoms of the tender young larch-trees shone like jewels in the bright sunshine. The mountain-peaks overhead, gleaming through the mists and clouds, were of dazzling whiteness, for none of the frozen snow had yet fallen from their sharp, lance-like summits.

Journeying on foot from one village to another, Roland roamed about aimlessly, yet as one hunted, seeking for a safe asylum. He bore his troubled conscience and aching heart from one busy spot to another, homesick and self-exiled. Oh, what a fool he had been! Life had been full to the brim for him with gladness and prosperity, and in trying to make its cup run over he had dashed it away from his lips for ever.

His money was not yet spent, for a very little went a long way among these simple mountain villages, and in his manner of travelling. He had not yet been forced to try to earn a living, and he felt no anxiety for the future. In his boyhood he had learned wood-carving, both in Switzerland and from old Marlowe, and he had acquired considerable skill in the art. Some of the panels in his home at Riversborough were the workmanship of his own hands. It was a craft to turn to in extremity; but he did not think of it yet.

Labor of any kind would have made the interminable hours pass more quickly. The carving of a piece of wood might have kept him from torturing his own heart perpetually; but he did not turn to this slight solace. There were times when he sat for hours, for a whole age, as it seemed to him, in some lonely spot, hidden behind a great rock or half lost in a forest, thinking. And yet it was not thought, but a vague, mournful longing and remembrance, the past and the absent blended in dim, shadowy reverie, of which nothing was clear but the sharp anguish of having forfeited them.

There was a Garden of Eden still upon earth, and he had been dwelling in it. But he had banished himself from it by his own folly and sin, and when he turned his eyes toward it he could see only the "flaming brand, and the gate with dreadful faces thronged and fiery arms." But even Adam had his Eve with him, "to drop some natural tears, and wipe them soon." He was utterly alone.

If his thoughts, so dazed and bewildered usually, became clear for a little while, it was always Felicita whose image stood out most distinctly before him. He had loved her passionately; surely never had any man loved a woman with the same intensity—so he said to himself. Even now the very crime he had committed seemed as nothing to him, because he had been guilty of it for her. His love for her covered its heinousness from his eyes. His conscience had become the blind and dumb slave of his passion. So blind and dumb had it been that it had scarcely stirred or murmured until his sin was found out, and it was scarcely aroused to life even yet.

In a certain sense he had been religious, having been most sedulously trained in religion from his earliest consciousness. He had accepted the ordinary teachings of our nineteenth-century Christianity. His place in church, beside his mother or his wife, had seldom been empty, and several times in the year he had knelt with them at the Lord's table, and taken the Lord's Supper, feeling himself distinctly a more religious man than usual on such occasions. No man had ever heard him utter a profane word, nor had he transgressed any of the outward rules of a religious life.

It is true he had never made a vehement and extraordinary profession of piety, such as some men do; but there was not a person in Riversborough who would not have spoken of him as a good churchman and a Christian. Whilst he had been gradually appropriating Mr. Clifford's money and the hard-earned savings of poorer men confided to him, he had felt no qualm of conscience in giving liberally to many a religious and philanthropic object, contributing such sums as figure well in a subscription list; though it was generally his wife's name that figured there. He had never taken up a subscription list without glancing first for that beloved name, Mrs. Roland Sefton.

In those days he had never doubted that he was a Christian. So far as he knew, so far as words could teach him, he was living a Christian life. Did he not believe in God, the Father Almighty? Yes, as fully as those who lived about him. Had he not followed Christ? As closely as the mass of people who call themselves Christians. Nay, more than most of them. Not as much as his mother, perhaps, in her simple, devout faith. But then religion is always a different thing with women than with men, a fairer and more delicate thing, wearing a finer bloom and gloss, which does not wear well in a work-a-day world such as he did battle in. But if he had not lived a Christian life, what man in Riversborough had done so, except a few fanatics?

But his religion had been powerless to keep him from falling into subtle temptations, and into a crime so heinous in the sight of his fellow-men, that it was only to be expiated by the loss of character, the loss of liberty, and the loss of every honorable man's esteem. The web had been closely and cunningly woven, and now he was fast bound in it, with no way of escape.

The weeks passed by in Riversborough, and brought no satisfactory conclusion to the guarded investigations of the police. A close search made among Acton's private papers produced no discovery. His will was among them, leaving all he had to leave, which was not much, to Felix, the son of his friend and employer, Roland Sefton. There was no memorandum or letter which could throw any light upon the transactions, or give any clue to what had been done with Mr. Clifford's securities.

Nor was the watch kept over the movements of the family more successful. The police were certain that no letter was posted by any member of the household, which could be intended for the missing culprit. Even Phebe Marlowe's correspondence was subject to their vigilance. But not a trace could be discovered. He was gone; whether he had fled to America, or concealed himself nearer home on the Continent, no one could make a guess.

Mr. Clifford remained in Riversborough, and resumed his position as head of the firm. He had returned with the intention of doing so, having heard abroad of the extravagant manner in which his junior partner was living. The bank, though seriously crippled in its credit and resources, was in no danger of insolvency, and there seemed no reason why it should not regain its former prosperity, if only confidence could be restored. He had reserved to himself the power of taking in another partner, if he should deem it advisable; and an eligible one presenting himself, in the person of a Manchester man of known wealth, the deeds of partnership were drawn up; and the Old Bank was once more set up on a firm basis.

During the time that elapsed while these arrangements were being made, Felicita was visibly suffering, and failing in health. So sensitive had she grown to the dread of seeing anyone not in the immediate circle of her household, that it became impossible to her to leave her home. The clear colorlessness of her face had taken on a transparency and delicacy which did not lessen its beauty, but added to it an unearthly grace. She no longer spent hours alone in her desecrated room—it had grown intolerable to her; but she sat speechless, and almost motionless, in the oriel window overlooking the garden and the river; and Felix, a child of dreamy and sensitive temperament, would sit hour after hour at her feet, pressing his cheek against her knee, or with his uplifted eyes gazing into her face.

"Mother," he said one day, when Roland had been gone more than a month, "how long will my father be away on his journey? Doesn't he ever write to you, and send messages to me? Grandmamma says she does not know how soon he will be back. Do you know, mother?"

Felicita looked down on him with her beautiful dark eyes, which seemed larger and sadder than of old, sending a strange thrill through the boy's heart; and for a minute or two she seemed uncertain what to say.

"I cannot tell you, Felix," she answered; "there are many things in life which children cannot understand. If I told you what was true about your father, your little brain would turn it into an untruth. You could not understand it if I told you."

"But I shall understand it some day," he said, lifting his head up proudly; "will you tell me when I am old enough, mother?"

How could she promise him to do that? This proud young head, tossed back with the expectant triumph of some day knowing all that his father and mother knew, must be bowed down with grief and shame then, as hers was now. It was a sad knowledge he must inherit. How would she ever be able to tell him that the father who had given him life, and whose name he bore, was a criminal, a convict, if he was arrested and brought to judgment, an outlaw and an exile if he made good his escape? Roland had never been as dear to her as Felix was. She was one of those women who love more deeply and tenderly as mothers than as wives. To see that bright, fond face of his clouded with disgrace would be a ceaseless torment to her. There would be no suffering to compare with it.

"But you will tell me all about it some day, mother," urged the boy.

"If I ever tell you," she answered, "it will be when you are a man, and can understand the whole truth. You will never hear me tell a falsehood, Felix."

"I know that, mother," he replied; "but Oh! I miss my father! He used to come to my bedside at nights, and kiss me, and say 'God bless you.' I tried always to keep awake till he came; but I was asleep the last time of all, and missed him. Sometimes I feel frightened, as if he would never come again. But grandmamma says he is gone on a long journey, and will come home some day, only she doesn't know when. Phebe cries when I ask her. Would it be too much trouble for you to come in at night sometimes, like my father did?" he asked timidly.

"But I am not like your father," she answered. "I could not say 'God bless you' in the same way. You must ask God yourself for His blessing."

For Felicita's soul had been thrust down into the depths of darkness. Her early training had been simply and solely for this world; how to make life here graceful and enjoyable. She could look back upon none but the vaguest aspirations after something higher in her girlhood. It had been almost like a new revelation to her to see her mother-in-law's simple and devout piety, and to witness her husband's cheerful and manly profession of religion. This was the point in his character which had attracted her most, and had been most likely to bind her to him.

THE SERPENT IN THE WILDERNESS.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 27, Num. 21:1-9. Golden Texts, John 3:14, 15; Isa. 45:22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE journey of the children of Israel in the wilderness was full of trial. God's purpose in its various vicissitudes was, as He declared to them by Moses, "to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments or no. And He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna (which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know), that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live" (Deut. 8:2, 3). God was seeking to teach them a life of faith in which they should see Him as the first cause in every circumstance which occurred, and should cease to be discouraged by any difficulty which should arise. Sometimes their faith rose to the occasion, but too often they acted exactly as if they had no knowledge of an Almighty God, ignoring most completely that that Almighty One was in their very midst in the pillar of fire and of cloud.

After the death of Aaron, Arad the Canaanite which dwelt in the south, heard that Israel came by the way of the skies; then he fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners. It was a good time among the people; they went boldly to the Lord, and vowed a vow unto Him and said, "If Thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, I will utterly destroy their cities." This is the kind of vow for us to make whenever sin asserts its power over us. Our old man is crucified with Him that the body of sin should be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. Now, how to act in the case of any violent attack of the enemy? "Lord, destroy Thou the sin, and I will destroy its dwelling place; any habit of mine which harbored it shall be renounced; any idol which has embodied it shall be cast down. Lord, do Thy great part, and my little part shall not be wanting." Then utter destruction is the result.

Why did they not, after this victory, go on from conquering to conquer? The next occurrence speaks of defeat. "They journeyed from Mount Hor by way of the Red Sea, to compass the land of Edom: and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way." What was the matter? Were there foes to be met? was there another Red Sea to be crossed? Foes and sea had alike been conquered by Him who went before them; what, then, was the invincible difficulty which stood in their way? Must it be said? The people of God did not like what they had to eat! The lusts of the flesh were more unconquerable enemies than were the Canaanites. They spoke against the God who had just delivered the Canaanites into their hand, and against Moses, and said, "Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt, to die in the wilderness? for there is no bread, neither is there any water, and our soul loatheth this light bread." Are there no believers now who are more really put out when the dinner is badly cooked, than when no souls are won to Jesus, or when the power of God is not manifest in His children?

It was the third time that the people had complained of the food with which God had provided them: once at Taberah (Num. 11:1-6), a second time in Kadesh (20:3-5), and now again. In the first instance the very food which they had desired brought a plague with it, and many of the people died. "He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul" (Ps. 106:15). And thus it is almost universally, when we in our perversity insist on having our own way, no good comes of it; it is not part of the plan of God for us, and evil follows. This third time, when the people murmured about their food, "the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died." There had been no deaths from lack of proper food, illness was unknown among them; "there was not one feeble [sick] person among their tribes" (Ps. 105:37). But now in an hour or two the best and fairest were laid low, and death was marching with fearful strides throughout the camp.

Blessed be God, the children of Israel had not arrived at the degree of practical unbelief so almost universal in our day, which prompts men everywhere to seek for some natural cause which has produced any prevailing plague, or epidemic. The people, bad as they were, did believe that God's hand was in all which happened, and their first and only hope of relief was direct from Him. "When He slew them, then they sought Him; and they returned and enquired early after God" (Ps. 78:34). They came to Moses and said, "We have sinned, for we have spoken against the Lord, and against thee; pray unto the Lord, that He may take away the serpents from us." Did Moses reproach them and tell them they had deserved their fearful punishment? No; the object was attained for which it had been sent: the people were brought to listen to and to seek their God instead of complaining and murmuring against Him. "And Moses prayed for the people."

And God directed Moses to make a fiery serpent and to put it on a pole, and it should come to pass that every one that was bitten when he looked upon it should live. Moses was not slow to obey the command of God; he lived too much in His presence to bear any malice against the people, who never showed him any gratitude, but, on the contrary, murmured so often against him. And soon it came to pass that when a bitten Israelite looked up and beheld the serpent of brass, he lived. But he must look. It was not enough that he should hear about the serpent, it was not enough that he should believe that some one else had been healed; he must himself look away from himself to the serpent of brass, and immediately that he in faith and obedience turned his languid eyes to God's provision, the poisoned blood flowed in healthy circulation again, inflammation ceased, the swollen limbs resumed their former shape, and all trace of the serpent's bite was gone: the Lord had healed.

"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life." "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." Yes, Jesus has been lifted up, but how few men look unto Him and live! how terribly small a proportion of those whom we know are fully, savingly converted! The deadly bite of the serpent is everywhere manifest, the poison of sin has entered the blood which is the life of the moral nature, and man has become a diseased, corrupted being. What is it which fills our public-houses with abject, wretched slaves to a lust which they know is ruining them body and soul? what is it which makes them leave wife and children in cold and hunger, while they spend every penny in working thus their own destruction? It is the bite of the serpent. What is it which makes the hearts of publicans so hard that they can see their fellow-creatures thus going down to ruin, and can minister drop by drop with their own hands the deadly drink which works such ruin? It is the bite of the serpent. But what makes brewers dwell in their gorgeous homes, furnished like palaces, affording hospitality to earnest preachers of the Gospel, giving their thousands to all good works—thousands gained by this murderous traffic, creating with one hand the evil which they seek to alleviate with the other? It is the bite of the serpent.

Again, what is it which sows discord between families? what is it which destroys all the transparency of upright truthfulness? what is it which sows impurity in our literature and dishonesty in our trade? Surely, the bite of the serpent. What is it which makes men old before their time under a weight of worldly care, making haste to be rich, straining after ambitious hopes of fame and reputation? It is the bite of the serpent. Shall it, must it go on without a check? God forbid. "For this cause the Son of man was manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil" (1 John 3:8). He has tried His strength with Him and conquered. It is a precious and most blessed truth that there is healing power in our beloved Lord. When He was on earth He healed all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people, and as surely has He power and will to heal all manner of sin. Why remain under the power of an evil temper? Look unto Him—i.e., put the case away from your hands into His, and be saved from it. Why remain under the burden of your cares? Why be anxious? Bring that burdened, anxious, worrying mind to Him, and look away out of yourself. He can and will heal that, too, if you will let Him. But look unto Him—i.e., let your expectation be from Him, count upon Him. Oh, how many have experienced the blessed relief of having placed in His true hands all which concerns them, and having left the responsibility with Him, ceasing from forebodings, regrets, or vacillation. And in measure as we look to Him in our own individual cases, is our faith strengthened to look unto Him for our family, our congregation, our land. He who can do the lesser can do the greater too. "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" Oh for the true power of intercession!

Should any read these words who have not yet found pardon for their past sins, and who have perhaps lived comfortably on in a dreamy uncertainty as to their state before God, oh let me warn you that the serpent's poison never works in a more deadly way than when you are indifferent and unconscious! The Lord arouse you! The poison is in your blood! You are marked for death, eternal death, and but one hope is left you: "Look unto Me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." Look unto Him who has already borne your sins in His own body on the tree, that you being dead unto sin should live unto righteousness. Look, and live!

The Stars and Stripes were Carried in the procession which accompanied the new Lord Mayor of London, when he went in state on November 9th to take the oath of office. This is the first time the honor has ever been shown to the American flag, and was intended as a response to the greeting of the British flag at Yorktown. The banner was borne by a waterman and escorted by the City of London Royal Fusiliers, with fixed bayonets, preceded by the regimental band, which played the "Star-Spangled Banner." The flag, as it came in view, was received with a general clapping of hands and cheers by the spectators. The same honor was not conspicuously rendered to any other feature of the procession. There was a striking demonstration on Broad Street and the Strand, where ladies waved the American colors from the balconies. Among the decorations throughout the city the American flag was conspicuous. When the pageant arrived at Westminster the flag was placed in front of the company, facing the grand entrance of Westminster Hall in the Palace Yard, and remained there while the Lord Mayor elect was taking the oath. The sight was very impressive, considering the associations of the ancient place and the utterances made there a century ago.

At a Banquet Given by the Lord Mayor of London to the Cabinet, on November 9th, Mr. Gladstone, referring to the Irish difficulty, said that the law would be enforced with firmness and decision in Ireland. Its enforcement had been intrusted to those agents who, whether constabulary or military forces, have already earned a title to the gratitude of their countrymen by the courage and patience with which they have performed their difficult duties. Mr. Gladstone said, "I can discern signs of improvement in Ireland. One question has been decided—the people are determined to make full trial of the Land act. Though I cannot yet state that throughout Ireland the covenants into which the tenants have entered are punctually performed, yet they are largely and increasingly performed. Those who decline their performance are generally those who are well able to fulfil their engagements. I can safely say the Irish will make full use of the Land act, which will be impartially administered." The London Times, commenting on the speech, said, "This emphatic statement may serve as a warning to those tenants who, being tempted, yield even temporarily to the no-rent policy. We understand that the practical difficulty of engaging in a conflict with the large body of Irish tenantry will be met if occasion arise by taking one by one the counties in which resistance to rent may be organized, and by using for the enforcement of law the whole power of the executive."

A Wise Step has been Taken by the Collector of the Port at Toronto, Canada, in seizing a consignment of books sent from New York to a bookseller in that city. The parcel included works by Tom Paine and Voltaire, and were of an immoral as well as blasphemous character. The collector said that he made the confiscation in the interests of morality and godliness. The collector's course has brought upon his head a torrent of vituperation from the secular press, but Christians everywhere will applaud his action. Every one would have approved him had he seized a package of plague-infected garments, and the stuff he has actually confiscated was capable of producing worse mischief even than a pestilence.

The Increased Cordiality Existing Between England and America was the subject of remark by Lord Granville at the Lord Mayor's banquet on Wednesday last. He said: "Ever since the United States became an independent power there has never been a time when the same friendly feeling existed as exists now between the two great English-speaking nations. I know of no more striking test than the feeling which has been shown of sincere and deep grief in England in regard to the death of President Garfield."

Landowners in Ireland Loudly Complain of the decisions of the new Land Court. A Liberal member of Parliament, who loyally supported the Land bill, writes to the papers complaining that it is as unjust that rent be lowered because of waste and improvidence on the part of the tenant as that it be raised on his improvements. If the rent is to be reduced because of increasing age and feebleness of the tenant, the landlord should be compensated by the Government. Another landowner protests against the principles on which the commissioners act. These he defines as follows: First, the rent of the holding is decided on agricultural value alone, regardless of proximity to large towns—that is, if a person has bought an estate near a town he gets no more rent than if the estate is fifty miles from a town or railway, though he paid a heavy sum on account of its proximity to the markets. Second, the rent is to be fixed upon the holding as it is found, without regard to the capability of the land in the hands of industrious tenants; that is, an indolent, ignorant farmer, who has neglected his farm, will pay less for his holding than a skilful, hard-working tenant, who has farmed the land for all it is worth. This, the writer considers, is a premium on indolence and a tax on industry. Outrages have decreased everywhere since Mr. Parnell was arrested.

The French Cabinet Officers have Tendered their resignations to M. Grevy, the President of the Republic, and M. Gambetta has accepted the office of premier. His advent to office has caused some apprehension, because he has committed himself to a declaration involving the permanent retention of Tunis, and approving a policy of conquest and annexation. The Bardo Treaty, which he declares shall be implicitly executed, was extorted by force from the lawful ruler of Tunis, for whom France professed friendship. This, says the London Spectator, shows that Gambetta accepts the evil doctrine that French interests override justice, deliberately prefers the prestige and material advantage of France to every other consideration. It gives rise to grave apprehensions as to his future foreign policy.

The Relations Between France and England have been strained by the Egyptian difficulty, as well as by the policy of France in the matter of the commercial treaty, which still remains unsettled. The London Times says it would be affectation to deny that the relations of France and England have lately not been quite as cordial as formerly. It is also evident that suspicion of France and apprehension as to her future policy is felt in Austria, Italy, and Russia.

Lefroy, the Man Accused of Murdering a passenger on a British railroad, has been tried and found guilty. He was sentenced to be hanged, but an effort is being made to have his sentence commuted on the ground of insanity, though since his detention he has conducted himself in a sane manner.

Prince Bismarck is Again Expressing his desire to retire from office. The recent election have made it clear that the people of Germany ar opposed to his domestic policy, and the journals o the various sections of the Liberal party, whil conceding the eminent abilities of the Chancell as a diplomatist, contend that his influence in ir ternal affairs is wholly mischievous, and charg upon his policy the responsibility for the enormou emigration which is draining Germany of her be blood. According to the principles of parliamen tary government, the majority ought to be oblige to assume the succession to the office of Imperi Chancellor. At the same time the progressis and the members of the centre party, although ab to combine for purposes of opposition to Bismarcl are incapable of governing in concert. They a divided by local differences, differences of race an political principles.

Alarm is Still Felt in Russia About the plots of the Nihilists. A German diplomatic off cial who returned to Berlin last week from S Petersburg, gives a gloomy description of the situa tion in that city. He says affairs are growin more and more critical daily. Riots are feared consequence of the increasing dearness of pro sions. The Nihilists are distributing circula charging the Czar with being the cause of all th trouble, and declaring that he is sending all th gold of Russia to Denmark. The truth is, that small part of the 60,000,000 rubles found in th Imperial cellars after the assassination of Alexa der II. has been forwarded to Denmark, possib with the view of providing for the empress in th not improbable event of her becoming a widow High Russian officials are advising landlords leave the country for the city if they do not wish be assassinated. Great anxiety prevails at Gat china, where the Czar resides.

Another Revolt in Egypt has been Averted by the exertions of Mr. Wolf, the Consul-Gener of the United States. On the first intelligence Araby Bey, who led the late revolt, being aga engaged in preparation for hostile measures, M Wolf called upon him. The interview is thus d scribed in a telegram from Cairo, dated Novemb 9th: "Mr. Wolf impressed Araby Bey with th fact that his past conduct was exactly what th enemies of Egypt wanted, and that the abuses h wished to remove were the result of centuries misrule. Hence he must proceed slowly. Aral said: "I wish to establish a responsible gover ment and am ready to die for that end. The Kh dive is the first of his race who is not bloodthirs and avaricious. I will not meddle with foreig affairs. I will obey the present Ministry." Th result of Consul-General Wolf's endeavors w that Araby Bey called on the Khedive and Che Pacha and left Cairo. The Khedive and Che Pacha heartily thanked the American Cons General for the tact and zeal he displayed in ave ing a serious crisis. If Araby Bey can control t excitement he has aroused all may yet be well."

The Rev. Dr. Barclay, who was Appointed Bishop of Jerusalem in 1879, died in that city o October 25th. Before his appointment to the bis opric, Dr. Barclay acted as incumbent of Chr Church, Jerusalem, where he also was examini chaplain to the Anglican Bishop, Dr. Gobat, who he afterward succeeded. Dr. Barclay was an em inent scholar, noted for his proficiency in Hebre Arabic, and German, and was the translator an commentator of parts of the Talmud.

IT is now a little over ten years since one who knew Father Taylor well, wrote of him when he heard of his death: "No American citizen has a reputation more impressive and unique. In the hall of memory his spiritual statue will have forever its own niche. What is his peculiar place? He belonged to no class. In any dogma he was neither leader nor led. He is the sailor's representative. He stands for the sea, the greatest delegate the ocean has sent upon the stage of any purely intellectual calling, at least in this part of the world; and his fame has been borne into thousands of ships, by almost millions of mariners, who have christened him 'Father,' into every port and commercial city of the globe. The sailor says he has been in places where the United States had not been heard of, but not where Father Taylor had not; while the universal eagerness of all other classes to hear him has been scarcely less than of the navigators."

It was as a sailor preaching to sailors that Father Taylor established his fame; but while the sailor was regarded by him throughout his life as his own son—as his chosen hearer always sought and always welcome beyond any other class—educated and cultured men, our own citizens and those of other lands, were captivated by his eloquence, and were deeply moved by his appeals. Miss Harriet Martineau, who was no mean critic, listened to him in 1835, and thus speaks of him in her "Retrospect of Western Travel:" "I heard him called a second homely Jeremy Taylor, and I certainly doubt whether Jeremy Taylor himself could more absolutely sway the minds and hearts of the learned and pious of his day than 'the seaman's friend' does those of his flock. His pathos shed in thoughts and tones so fleeting as to be gone like lightning, is the most awful of his powers. I have seen a single clause of a short sentence call up an instantaneous flush on the hundreds of hard faces turned to the preacher; and it is no wonder to me that the widow and the orphan are cherished by those who hear his prayers for them."

Another and far different critic, who practically concurs in the opinion of the brilliant writer, was the distinguished novelist

CHARLES DICKENS.

It was in 1843 that Dickens heard Father Taylor preach, and so impressed was he with the eloquence of the preacher that he devotes some pages of one of his books to a description of the sermon and the preacher. The text was "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness leaning upon her beloved?" (Cant. 8: 5.) Dickens says, "He handled his text in all kinds of ways, and twisted it into all manner of shapes; but always ingeniously, and with a rude eloquence well adapted to the comprehension of his hearers. He pursued his text after this manner: 'Who are these—who are they—who are these fellows? Where do they come from? Where are they going to? Come from? What's the answer?' leaning down from the pulpit, and pointing downward with his right hand: 'From below;' starting back and looking at the sailors before him: 'From below, my brethren. From under the hatches of sin, battened down above you by the evil one. That's where you came from!' A walk up and down the pulpit, 'And where are you going?' stopping abruptly: 'Where are you going? Aloft!' very softly, and pointing upward: 'Aloft!' louder: 'Aloft!' louder still: 'That's where you're going.'". Dickens then describes the preacher's words and manner in recommending the Bible to his hearers as the Pilot, Guiding Star, and Compass, all in one to all hands, and concludes by saying, "I never heard those points so wisely touched by any preacher of that kind before."

It was no ordinary genius that could equally impress minds so differently constituted as these polished writers and the untutored sailors who formed the bulk of his congregation. Both the matter and the manner of his discourses were original. They entered, as no art-given eloquence could have done, into the hearts of his hearers, and more than all, as we have seen over and over again in the history of the Church, they were owned and blessed by the Holy Spirit, who used them to the conversion of sinners. God had a work to do for those who go down to the sea in ships, who do business in great waters; and, as is ever the case, He raised up an instrument and specially endowed him to do that work. In this case especially did it seem that God was jealous for His own honor, for in the instrument He selected, as in those fishermen who eighteen centuries ago left their nets to follow Jesus, there seemed no fitting material out of which an evangelist could be made. But the power was in the User, not in the instrument; and in modern times there has been no more conspicuous proof of this fact than in the work God enabled Father Taylor, the Sailor Preacher, to accomplish.

Edward F. Taylor was

BORN AT RICHMOND, VA.,

December 25th, 1793. He had little knowledge of his parents, and appears to have been removed from them in his early childhood. A lady who lived a short distance from the city took him in charge, and with whom he lived, doing such work as he was able, until his seventh year. One day he was sent by his foster mother to pick up chips, and while so engaged, a sea captain who passed asked him if he would not like to become a sailor. The boy replied in the affirmative, threw down his chips, and there and then, at seven years old, followed his new acquaintance to his ship.

During the next ten years the little runaway led a seafaring life. What ships he sailed on, what were his voyages or his companions, we are not told. He became thoroughly acquainted with all the hardships and duties of a sailor's life, and acquired a reputation for skill and endurance which shows he must have labored earnestly and intelligently in his calling. At seventeen years of age he came under the influence that turned his future life into a new channel. The ship on which he sailed entered the port of Boston, Mass., and young Taylor went ashore. As he walked along Tremont Street the bell of Park Street Church was tolling. "I put in," says Father Taylor, relating the circumstance many years afterward, "and, going to the door, I saw the port was full. I up helm, unfurled topsail, and made for the gallery; entered safely, doffed pennant, and scudded to the corner pew, where I came to anchor." Dr. Griffin was preaching, and the young sailor was deeply moved. "Every one in the house wept," he used to say, "the salt spray flew in every direction, but more especially did it run down my cheeks."

After he left Dr. Griffin's church, and while passing down another street he heard some one preaching; he stopped to listen, and drew near an open window, from which the sound came. As he listened he was drawn by almighty power, and, the church being densely crowded, he, with his nautical instinct and agility, seized the window-frame with his hand and climbed through. The preacher was Elijah Hedding, afterward Bishop Hedding, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The sermon concluded with an earnest appeal to sinners, and several young Christian workers left their seats to speak to any among the congregation who appeared to be moved, and urged them to stay for an after meeting. Among these young people was one Thomas W. Tucker, who saw Taylor standing where he had dropped from the window, and going straight to him, urged him to go forward and ask for prayers. It was the first time such a request had been made to him, and the evidence that a stranger took an interest in his welfare touched the young sailor, and he yielded. He went to the pew near the pulpit, and there joined in the prayers offered for his salvation. That night was the beginning of a new life for Taylor. Ever after he spoke of Mr. Hedding as "a cannonader preacher; a seventy-four who had riddled him

At this time Taylor could not read or write: b was earnest after knowledge, and while he rema in Boston he lost no opportunity, at class-meet and in other ways, of getting all the informa secular as well as religious, that he could. his time ashore was short, and just then, as with Great Britain broke out, Taylor embarke the "Black Hawk," a privateer fitted out to on the British merchant marine. But the B Hawk became the hunted instead of the hun she was captured by a British man-of-war, and crew, Taylor included, were incarcerated at Halifax. While the American prisoners la their dungeon a lady called at the prison and a permission to give some tracts to the unfortu men, and she was allowed to go through the pr for the purpose. As she approached the gra of the cell where the American prisoners lay was astonished to hear herself hailed by name f within, and, on entering, at being saluted in rc but hearty fashion by a young sailor. It was T lor who thus welcomed her, and in him she re nized the young man who, some months bef when she was living in Boston, had attended class and been a most attentive listener. T wept and talked like mother and son; she g him her Bible, which he never parted with all life, and she left with him a supply of tra religious books, and clothing. The good la opportunities for ministration to the Ameri prisoners were brief, as she was called to other part of Canada. But her visits were without result. A spirit of inquiry was arous and Taylor, who knew little, was called upon teach his shipmates, who knew less.

The prison-chaplain was an Episcopalian, the prayers read included the usual loyal pray for the king, which to the patriotic prisoners w especially disagreeable. They petitioned that of their number (referring to Taylor) might of ate for them instead of the chaplain, and their quest was granted. Very timidly did Taylor pre

HIS FIRST SERMON IN PRISON.

Before the service he set a fellow prisoner w could read, to read aloud from the Bible, listen intently for a suitable passage for a text. T book was opened at Ecclesiastes, and the rea read on until he came to the words "Better i poor and a wise child than an old and foolish king (Eccles. 4: 13). "Stop," cried Taylor; "re that again." It was read again. "That v do!" he exclaimed. "Give me chapter a verse." That done, a short time was allowed consideration, and then the sermon was co menced. The old lunatic King, George III. England, against whom these men had been fig ing, was in the minds of the listeners as Taylor scribed a tyrannical, obstinate king, old and fo ish, whose captives were fettered and in prisc Preacher and hearers might have fared badly, b all were surprised by a sudden turn in the sermc "You think I mean King George," said Tayl "I don t; I mean the devil." The shot tol The American prisoners were moved by the d scription, and saw the character of their satar master; and the British officers, who were about stop the preaching, were appeased. This was t beginning of Taylor's public efforts. They we for the benefit of his fellow sailors, and they we uttered in a prison. They were continued, ar when, at the close of the war, the men were libe ated, Taylor's one earnest desire was to preach th Gospel to the people.

With the recovery of his liberty Taylor aba doned his seafaring life. Returning to Boston h sought employment, determined to take anythin that offered which gave him an opportunity t learn to read and to speak for Jesus. The pr prietor of a junk shop was his first employer, an Taylor was soon travelling through New Englan with a horse and cart peddling iron and tin ware.

Near Lynn, Mass., Taylor entered the house c a Mrs. Sweetser, a widow, whose husband had le her a small farm. An acquaintance was com menced between the young peddler and the widow ch soon ripened into friendship, and ultimately to the kind lady inducing Taylor to give up the dling business and become the manager of her . Taylor consented, and in 1815 settled down the time as a farmer, having previously stipud that Mrs. Sweetser should teach him to read. e arrangement was carried out, and at twenty- years of age Taylor successfully wrestled with educational difficulty, to him more arduous n farm labor. But he did not wait for proency before continuing his preaching. Mrs. eetser allowed meetings to be held in her house, which Taylor preached, pursuing the same plan in the prison, of having some one read the Bible him until a text struck him. But he was soon to read for himself, and with the Bible a... ddridge's "Notes" all his spare time was spent. Soon the meetings were transferred to a building own as the Rock School House, and there, every nday night, Taylor preached; his rude, but power- eloquence drawing large crowds, among whom ny were brought to Jesus. One of his hearers, Christian man of considerable means, was parularly impressed with Taylor's power and with results achieved. He saw how sorely training d general knowledge were needed, and urged young man to enter Newmarket Seminary at expense. Taylor accepted the offer; but his y was very short, and the little he learned in the stitution convinced him that he was only wasting cious time, and at the end of six weeks he left d went at the wish of his elder to Marblehead, ere there was a small church much frequented sailors.

At Marblehead he renewed an acquaintance with godly young woman he had met while at work the farm. This was Deborah D. Millett, the ughter of pious parents, poor in this world's ods, but rich in faith. Taylor loved her, proosed, and was accepted. In 1819 they were mard, and during the whole of their joint lives were one heart and one mind; both animated by one sire, to serve the Lord with unwavering ...

AN AMUSING WEDDING INCIDENT

related of the affair. Taylor was a most absentinded man throughout his life, and many singur stories are told of the difficulties in which his rgetfulness involved himself and his wife. One ay, before the marriage, Taylor had an opportunity f doing some Christian work, and he had set about , as he was wont, with all his heart, and when e service was over, he climbed a hill overlooking assachusetts Bay, and, being tired, threw himself n the ground and indulged in anticipations of his pproaching happiness. He looked across the bay om Hingham toward Marblehead, where his future ride was, and thought of her. Then he began to eckon how many days must elapse before the arriage. As he thought he became excited, and t last, to his horror, he discovered that this was he day fixed for the wedding. There was he lying n the rock while his affianced was forty miles way wondering where he could be. Nothing ould be done at that hour, and the next day he resented himself with apologies, the acceptance f which proved how unusually gentle and aimable vas the lady to whom he had given his love.

From Marblehead Mr. Taylor was removed by he Conference to a sphere of labor known as the cituate Circuit, of which one extreme was Dorchester, and the other Duxbury. Here the unlettered young preacher had scarcely commenced work when a revival was witnessed. Crowds athered to hear him, and one aged minister setled at Duxbury, was provoked to a little temporary bullition of jealousy. Meeting the new Methodist minister he said, "So you've come to preach in Duxbury, young man?" "Yes," replied Taylor; "the Lord says, 'Preach the Gospel to every creature.'" "Yes," was the reply, "but He never said that every critter should preach the Gospel." This retort might have discouraged some men, but Taylor knew his deficiencies, and he knew too that God was blessing his work, and he was unmoved. He continued his work, and both there, and in another sphere to which he was afterward removed, he was encouraged by seeing many souls converted.

Wherever Mr. Taylor had been stationed his sympathies had been drawn toward sailors. The chance of holding a service on board ship, especially in one about to encounter the perils of a voyage, he would never miss. No exertion, no effort, was too great for him to make if he could by any possibility preach to sailors. Therefore, when, in 1829, an invitation was extended to him to undertake a in Boston, he accepted with alacrity. The Methodists of Boston had a chapel left vacant by the erection of a new church, and they resolved that, as so many sailors were always to be found in Boston, then the first port of the Union, the discarded chapel should be used for the benefit of that class. The difficulty was to find a suitable man to conduct it. When, however, the qualifications of Mr. Taylor were brought under the notice of the managers there was no hesitation, and early in 1829 he entered upon his life work.

AN INFIDEL'S DREAM.

One of the first services was signalized by a remarkable circumstance. Mrs. Taylor says in her journal, "A dissipated man, an infidel, despising religion and everything good, dreamed that a stranger was coming to Boston, and he was to go and hear him preach. The good spirit followed him; he went to the church; and when he saw Mr. Taylor, he audibly exclaimed, 'That is the man I saw in my dream.' Before the service closed, he came forward to the altar, begging to be prayed for and with. This was the first fruit of Mr. Taylor's labors in Boston. God gave him this soul."

Originally the management of the mission was in the hands of a company of members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who were organized under the name of "the Port Society of the city of Boston," and the building occupied was called "the Seamen's Bethel." But in 1830 it was deemed advisable that the mission should be strictly non-sectarian, and an effort was made to purchase the old Methodist chapel, for which two thousand dollars were asked. This sum Mr. Taylor soon raised by an appeal to generous Christian friends in the South. From the first the movement was attended with marked success, and many wealthy merchants in Boston evinced their sympathy with it. At the end of two years a public meeting was held, at which it was resolved to erect a more commodious edifice. Large donations were made, especially by opulent Unitarian friends, and in 1833 the Seamen's Bethel in North Square was built at a cost of twenty-four thousand dollars. Mr. Taylor was appointed permanent chaplain, and as the Unitarians undertook the financial burdens of the enterprise, many Methodists withdrew from the board. The original plan was soon extended, and a society was established in connection with the Bethel for the relief of seamen and their families. This was followed by the erection of a "Mariner's House," as a home for seamen, which cost thirty-four thousand dollars, and which was opened in 1847.

Many anecdotes are related of Father Taylor's work at the Bethel, of the astonishing success which attended his labors, and of his quaint, witty sayings in and out of the pulpit. Some of these remarks were uttered in reproof of men who came to his services to interrupt and annoy him, and were pungent and severe; others were made in efforts to apply the truth to the consciences of his hearers. Occasionally a more cultured audience would have pronounced them coarse if not irreverent; but souls were converted, hardened sinners were turned from their evil ways, and who are we that we should cavil at his methods? Men who heard the Gospel for the first time from Father Taylor's lips, others who had been reared in Christian homes, but who had wandered far away from Christ, turned to the Lord; and as they went back to their ships and to their native countries became messengers of peace. Thus from the Boston Bethel went forth a circle of Christian influence the circumference of which touched the uttermost ends of the earth.

Though Father Taylor's work was undenominational he was always careful to maintain his standing in the Methodist Church. Only once in the course of his life was his connection in danger. During the anti-masonic agitation considerable pressure was brought to bear on Father Taylor, who was an enthusiastic freemason, to induce him to separate himself from his lodge. But Father Taylor knew more of freemasonry than those who condemned it, and maintained his standing in the order, though he never suffered it to interfere with his religious work. He was, however, publicly reprimanded by his conference for taking part in a public masonic ceremony, and it required no little effort on his part to bear the rebuke patiently. His meek Christian spirit, however, carried him through the ordeal, and he was never troubled again on the subject.

The most severe trial of Father Taylor's life was the loss of his beloved wife, his faithful helper in all his labors. She died June, 23d, 1869, in her seventy-fourth year. From this blow Father Taylor never rallied. He lived nearly two years afterward, but he felt his work was done, and awaited joyfully the final summons. He died April 6th, 1871, having labored in the cause of the Boston Sailors' Mission more than forty years. Of a man so original, so earnest in all that he said and did, interesting anecdotes almost innumerable might be told. But our space will not admit of their being inserted here. Those desirous of learning more of this eminent servant of Christ we must refer to the biography of Father Taylor, published by Messrs. Phillips & Hunt of New York, to which we are indebted for the life-like portrait of Father Taylor on our frontispiece, and for a knowledge of the facts of which this sketch is woven.

The Source of Crime in Ireland has been Forcibly indicated by the Recorder of Dublin, who, in disposing of applications for new saloon licenses recently in Dublin, said: "I have been for a whole week trying such cases as no Christian judge ought to try—cases of outrage and violence, in the city, every one of which originated in drinking saloons. The drinking system of Dublin is responsible for three heavy sentences of penal servitude and seven heavy sentences of imprisonment which I had to impose, varying from twelve to twenty-four calendar months. I marked the evidence in every single case, and every one of them began in the liquor stores. It is the drink system, and the drink alone, that leads to all this crime and misery and sorrow. Yesterday I went through a mile and three quarters of miserable, wretched streets, manifesting on every side the penury and wretchedness of the unfortunate people who lived in them. The only bright spots were the saloons, which, brilliantly lighted up, reflected and contrasted with the surrounding misery. I hate this magnificence. I look upon it with horror. I know it but too well. As each case of crime and violence comes before me, the same wretched story is told—the Drink Demon is as necessary a part of every case as the police or myself."

A Boy's Revenge for an Undertaker's Unkindness.—"I want to see my mother," sobbed a poor boy, as the undertaker screwed down the lid of a coffin. "You can't! Get out of the way, boy! Why don't somebody take the brat away?" "Only let me see her a minute," cried the orphan. "Only once; let me see my mother only once." Quickly and brutally the hard-hearted monster struck the boy. "When I'm a man I'll kill you for that!" muttered the child. Years passed away. The man had committed a crime and was being tried. The court-house was crowded. "Does any one appear as this man's counsel?" asked the judge. There was silence. A young man stepped forward and pleaded his cause. He was a stranger; but his advocacy secured the acquittal of the criminal. "May God reward you, sir," said the acquitted man, "I can't." "I want no thanks," replied the stranger. "Man, I will refresh your memory. Twenty years ago you struck a broken-hearted boy away from his poor mother's coffin. I was that boy." Turning pale, the man said, "Have you rescued me, then, to take my life?" "No! I have a sweeter revenge. I have saved the life of a man whose brutal deed has remained with me twenty years. Go, and remember the tears of a friendless child."

THE TEN PLAGUES OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.

THE PLAGUE LITERARY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon delivered Last Sunday Morning, November 20, 1881.*

"And the frogs came up and covered the land of Egypt. And the magicians did so with their enchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt." —EXODUS 8: 6, 7.

THERE is almost a universal aversion to frogs, and yet with the Egyptians they were honored, they were sacred, and they were objects of worship while alive, and after death they were embalmed, and to-day their remains may be found among the sepulchres of Thebes. These creatures, so attractive once to the Egyptians, at divine behest became obnoxious and loathsome, and they went croaking and hopping and leaping into the palace of the king, and into the bread-trays and the couches of the people, and even the ovens, which now are uplifted above the earth and on the side of chimneys; then being small holes in the earth with sunken pottery, were filled with frogs when the housekeepers came to look at them. If a man sat down to eat, a frog alighted on his plate. If he attempted to put on a shoe, it was preoccupied by a frog. If he attempted to put his head upon a pillow, it had been taken possession of by a frog. Frogs high and low and everywhere; loathsome frogs, slimy frogs, besieging frogs, innumerable frogs, great plague of frogs.

What made the matter worse, the magicians said there was no miracle in this, and they could by sleight-of-hand produce the same thing, and they seemed to succeed, for by sleight-of-hand wonders may be wrought. After Moses had thrown down his staff and by miracle it became a serpent, and then he took hold of it and by miracle it again became a staff, the serpent-charmers imitated the same thing, and knowing that there were serpents in Egypt which by a peculiar pressure on the neck would become as rigid as a stick of wood, they seemed to change the serpent into the staff, and then, throwing it down, the staff became a serpent. So likewise these magicians tried to imitate the plague of the frogs, and perhaps by smell of food attracting a great number of them to a certain point, or by shaking them out from a hidden place, the magicians sometimes seemed to accomplish the same miracle. While these magicians made the plague worse, none of them tried to make it better. "Frogs came up and covered the land of Egypt, and the magicians did so with their enchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt."

THE PLAGUE ABROAD TO-DAY.

Now that plague of frogs has come back upon the earth. It is abroad to-day. It is smiting this nation. It comes in the shape of corrupt literature. These frogs hop into the store, the shop, the office, the banking-house, the factory—into the home, into the cellar, into the garret, on the drawing-room table, on the shelf of the library. While the lad is reading the bad book the teacher's face is turned the other way. One of these frogs hops upon the page. While the young woman is reading the forbidden novelette after retiring at night, reading by gaslight, one of these frogs leaps upon the page. Indeed, they have hopped on the news-stands of the country, and the mails at the post-office shake out in the letter-trough hundreds of them.

The plague has taken, at different times, possession of this country. It is one of the most loathsome, one of the most frightful, one of the most ghastly of the ten plagues of our modern cities. There is a vast number of books and newspapers printed and published which ought never to see the light. They are filled with a pestilence that makes the land swelter with a moral epidemic. The literature of a nation decides the fate of a nation. Good books, good morals. Bad books, bad morals.

I begin with

the literature, that which does not even pretend to be respectable—from cover to cover a blotch of leprosy. There are many whose entire business it is to dispose of that kind of literature. They display it before the schoolboy on his way home. They get the catalogues of colleges and young ladies' seminaries, take the names and the post-office addresses, and send their advertisements and their circulars and their pamphlets and their books to every one of them.

The president of one of the finest young ladies' seminaries on the Atlantic coast being absent one day, one of these miscreants came in and secured a catalogue. The president returning and hearing of it, had his fears excited, and he reported the case to official authority. For two weeks that man was hunted, and he was hunted down, and in his possession were found not only the catalogue of that institution, but the catalogues of fourteen colleges, and in eight of them already he had done the damning work. In the possession of these dealers in impure literature were found nine hundred thousand names and post-office addresses, to whom it was thought it might be profitable to send these corrupt things.

In the year 1873 there were one hundred and sixty-five establishments engaged in publishing salacious literature. From one publishing house there went out twenty different styles of corrupt books. Although twenty-four tons of salacious literature have been destroyed by the Society for the Suppression of Vice, still there is enough of it left in this country to bring down upon us the thunderbolts of an incensed God. What has been very remarkable is the fact that more of those publishers of impure literature lived in the City of Brooklyn than any other city—lived here, did business in New York, had their factories, some on this side the river, some on the other side the river, but they dared to have their residences in this City of Churches. All of them now driven out, or for the most part driven out, these vultures will alight in other fields, and they must be pursued and exterminated from Christendom.

In the year 1868 the field had become so great in this country that the Congress of the United States passed a law forbidding the transmission of impure literature through the United States mails; but there were large loops in that law through which criminals might crawl out, and the law was a dead failure—that law of 1868. But in 1873 another law was passed by the Congress of the United States against the transmission of corrupt literature through the mails—a grand law, a potent law, a Christian law—and under that law multitudes of these scoundrels have been arrested, their property confiscated, and they themselves thrown into the penitentiaries where they belonged.

Against that good and wholesome and Christian law no good man could make any objection; but it stirred up the animosity and the indignation of a great many people, and they sent up a petition to Congress to compel that body to repeal that good, Christian law. The petition rolled up to the door of the House of Representatives asking for the repeal of the law, and the head name on the petition was Robert G. Ingersoll, the champion blasphemer of America. He appealed to the House of Representatives with others. That body refused to grant the petition. Then Mr. Ingersoll made application to the Senate of the United States, and that body also refused, so that both Houses of Congress rejected the petition.

That application for the repeal of that good law against the transmission of corrupt and obscene literature through the mails of the United States, only demonstrates what you and I know, that the same infidelity which wipes its feet on the Bible and spits in the face of God is the worst foe American society. I do not wonder that when Robert G. Ingersoll applied to the Mayor Toronto for permission to lecture in that city, the Mayor of Toronto replied: "No, sir; you may have no God in the United States, but we have one up here in Canada, and you shall not stand here and blaspheme Him."

One of the filthiest creatures who had been sending corrupt literature through the mails of the United States was arrested, tried, condemned and put in the Penitentiary. A petition went to President Hayes asking him to pardon the culprit. President Hayes looked over the whole case, saw there was no excuse for the infamy, that there were no mitigating circumstances, and he declined to pardon the miscreant. Then a company of what are called "Liberalists" got together in a meeting and passed a resolution of "deepest sympathy"—these were the two words—"deepest sympathy" for that culprit, and the resolution of "deepest sympathy for that culprit was offered by Robert G. Ingersoll and the resolution was passed amid great acclamation of the people present.

Ah! my friends, the day will come when it will be demonstrated—and if no one else will undertake the work, I will—that while Christianity is the mother of all the virtues, Infidelity is the foster mother of all the vices of this century, not one excepted. Any man who could ask for the repeal of that good law against the sending of corrupt literature through the mails of the United States, any man that could do that is the enemy of every decent home in America, and has offered an insult to every clean-minded man and every pure-hearted woman in Christendom.

HOW ARE THE FROGS TO BE SLAIN?

I. Now, my friends, how are we to war against this corrupt literature? and how are the frogs of this Egyptian plague to be slain? First of all, by the prompt and inexorable execution of the law. Let all good post-masters and United States district attorneys, and detectives and reformers concert in their action to stop this plague. When Sir Rowland Hill spent his life in trying to secure postage not only for England, but for all the world and to open the blessing of the post-office to all honest business and to all messages of charity, and kindness, and affection, for all healthful intercommunication, he did not mean to make vice easy or to fill the mail bags of the United States with the scabs of such a leprosy.

It ought not to be in the power of every bad man who can raise a one-cent stamp for a circular, or a three-cent stamp for a letter, to blast a man or destroy a home. I was glad when I saw how Jay Gould last week pounced upon the culprit who was desecrating our magnificent post-office system. Because the culprit lived on Fifth Avenue instead of Elm Street only made the matter more outrageous. The New York Post-Office never did better work than when they detailed fifty postmen to watch the letter-boxes, and the Police Department of New York City never did better work than when they detailed fifty detectives to make summary arrests. The postal service of this country must be clean, must be kept clean, and we must all understand that the swift retributions of the United States Government hover over every violation of the letter-box.

There are thousands of men and women in this country, some for personal gain, some through innate depravity, some through a spirit of revenge, who wish to use this great avenue of convenience and intelligence for purposes revengeful, salacious, and diabolic. Wake up the law. Wake up all its penalties. Let every court-room on this subject be a Sinai thunderous and aflame. Let the convicted offenders be sent for the full term to Sing Sing or Harrisburg, and hurl that Governor from his chair who shall dare to pardon before the expiration of the sentence.

I am not talking about what cannot be done. I am talking now about what is being done. A great many of the printing-presses that gave themselves entirely to the publication of salacious literature have been stopped, or have gone into business less obnoxious. What has thrown off, what has kept off the rail-trains of this country for some time ack nearly all the leprous periodicals? Those of s who have been on the railtrains have noticed a reat change in the last few months and the last ear or two. Why have nearly all those indecent eriodicals been kept off the rail-trains for some me back? Who effected it? These societies for ie purification of railroad literature gave warning the publishers and warning to railroad compaies, and warning to conductors, and warning to ewsboys, to keep the infernal stuff off the trains. Cleveland and Rock Island and Ann Arbor nd other cities have successfully prohibited the ost of that literature even from going on the ews-stands. Terror has seized upon the publishrs and the dealers in impure literature from the ct that over six hundred arrests have been made, nd the aggregate time for which the convicted have een sentenced to the prison is over one hundred and fty years, and from the fact that over one million hree hundred thousand of their circulars have een destroyed, and the business is not as profitble as it used to be.

How have so many of the news-stands of our reat cities been purified? How has so much of his iniquity been balked? By moral suasion? Oh o. You might as well go into a jungle of the ast Indies and pat a cobra on the neck, and with rofound argument try to persuade it that it is orally wrong to bite and to sting and to poison nything. The only answer to your argument ould be an uplifted head and a hiss, and a sharp, eeking tooth struck into your arteries. The only rgument for a cobra is a shot-gun, and the only rgument for these dealers in impure literature is he clutch of the police and bean soup in a penientiary. The law! The law! I invoke to conummate the work so grandly begun!

II. Another way in which we are to drive back his plague of Egyptian frogs is by filling the minds f our boys and girls with a

HEALTHFUL LITERATURE.

I do not mean to say that all the books and ewspapers in our families ought to be religious ooks and newspapers, or that every song ought o be sung to the tune of "Old Hundred." I have o sympathy with the attempt to make the young ld. I would rather join in a crusade to keep the oung young. Boyhood and girlhood must not be bbreviated. But there are good books, good hisories, good biographies, good works of fiction, ood books of all styles with which we are to fill he minds of the young, so that there will be no nore room for the useless and the vicious than here is room for chaff in a bushel measure which s already filled with Michigan wheat.

Why are fifty per cent of the criminals in the ails and penitentiaries of the United States to-day nder twenty-one years of age? Many of them nder seventeen, under sixteen, under fifteen, nder fourteen, under thirteen. Walk along ne of the corridors of the Tombs prison in New York and look for yourselves. Bad books, ad newspapers, bewitched them as soon as they ot out of the cradle. Beware of all those stories hich end wrong. Beware of all those books hich make the road that ends in perdition seem o end in Paradise. Do not glorify the dirk and he pistol. Do not call the desperado brave or the ibertine gallant. Teach our young people that f they go down into the swamps and marshes to vatch the jack-o'-lanterns dance on the decay and ottenness, they will catch the malaria and death.

"O!" says some one, "I am a business man, nd I have no time to examine what my children ead. I have no time to inspect the books that ome into my household." If your children were hreatened with typhoid fever, would you have ime to go for the doctor? Would you have time o watch the progress of the disease? Would you ave time for the funeral? In the presence of my God I warn you of the fact that your children are hreatened with moral and spiritual typhoid, and hat unless the thing be stopped, it will be to them uneral of body, funeral of mind, funeral of soul. Three funerals in one day.

My word is to this vast multitude of young peole: Do not touch, do not borrow, do not buy a orrupt book or a corrupt picture. A book will ecide a man's destiny for good or for evil. The book you read yesterday may have decided you for time and for eternity, or it may be a book that may come into your possession to-morrow.

A good book—who can exaggerate its power? Benjamin Franklin said that his reading of Cotton Mather's "Essays To Do Good," in childhood gave him holy aspirations for all the rest of his life. George Law, the millionaire, now awaiting his burial, declared that a biography he read in childhood gave him all his subsequent prosperities.

A clergyman, many years ago, passing to the Far West, stopped at a hotel. He saw a woman copying something from Doddridge's "Rise and Progress." It seemed that she had borrowed the book, and there were some things she wanted especially to remember. The clergyman had in his satchel a copy of Doddridge's "Rise and Progress," and so he made her a present of it. Thirty years passed on. The clergyman came that way and he asked where the woman was, whom he had seen long ago. They said: "She lives yonder in that beautiful house." He went there and said to her: "Do you remember me?" She said: "No, I do not." He said: "Do you remember a man gave you Doddridge's 'Rise and Progress' thirty years ago?" "O yes; I remember. That book saved my soul. I loaned the book to all my neighbors, and they read it and they were converted to God, and we had a revival of religion which swept through the whole community. We built a church and called a pastor. You see that spire yonder, don't you? That church was built as the result of that book you gave me thirty years ago."

O the power of a good book! But, alas! for the influence of a bad book. John Angel James, than whom England never had a holier minister, stood in his pulpit at Birmingham and said "Twenty-five years ago a lad loaned to me an infamous book. He would loan it only fifteen minutes and then I had to give it back; but that book has haunted me like a spectre ever since. I have in agony of soul, on my knees before God, prayed that He would obliterate from my soul the memory of it; but I shall carry the damage of it until the day of my death." The assassin of Sir William Russell declared that he got the inspiration for his crime by reading what was then a new and popular novel, "Jack Sheppard." Homer's "Iliad" made Alexander the Warrior. Alexander said so. The story of Alexander made Julius Cæsar and Charles XII. both men of blood.

Have you in your pocket or in your trunk, or in your desk at business a bad book, a bad picture, a bad pamphlet? In God's name I warn you to destroy it.

III. Another way in which we shall fight back this corrupt literature and kill the frogs of Egypt is by rolling over them the Christian printing-press, which shall give plenty of healthful reading to all adults. All these men and women are reading men and women.

WHAT ARE YOU READING?

We see so many books we do not understand what a book is. Stand it on end. Measure it, the height of it, the depth of it, the length of it, the breadth of it. You cannot do it. Examine the paper and estimate the progress made from the time of the impressions on clay, and then on to the bark of trees, and from the bark of trees to papyrus, and from papyrus to the hide of wild beasts, and from the hide of wild beasts on down until the miracles of our modern paper manufacturies, and then see the paper, white and pure as an infant's soul waiting for God's inscription. A book! Examine the type of it. Examine the printing of it and see the progress from the time when Solon's laws were written on oak planks and Hesiod's poems were written on tables of lead, and the Siniatic commands were written on tables of stone, on down to Hoe's perfecting printing-press.

A BOOK!

It took all the universities of the past, all the martyr fires, all the civilizations, all the battles, all the victories, all the defeats, all the glooms, all the brightnesses, all the centuries to make it possible. A book! It is the chorus of the ages—it is the drawing-room in which kings and queens and orators and poets and historians and philosophers come out to greet you. If I worshipped anything on earth I would worship that. If I burned incense to any idol, I would build an altar to that. Thank God for good books, healthful books, inspiring books, Christian books, books of men, books of women, Book of God. It is with these good books that we are to overcome corrupt literature. Upon the frogs swoop with these eagles.

I depend much for the overthrow of iniquitous literature upon the mortality of books. Even good books have a hard struggle to live. Polybius wrote forty books; only five of them left. Thirty books of Tacitus have perished. Twenty books of Pliny have perished. Livy wrote one hundred and forty books; only thirty-five of them remain. Eschylus wrote one hundred dramas; only seven remain. Euripides wrote over a hundred; only nineteen remain. Varro wrote the biographies of over seven hundred great Romans. All that wealth of biography has perished. If good and valuable books have such a struggle to live, what must be the fate of those that are diseased and corrupt and blasted at the very start? They will die as the frogs when the Lord turned back the plague. The work of Christianization will go on until there will be nothing left but good books, and they will take the supremacy of the world. May you and I live to see the illustrious day!

Against every bad pamphlet send a good pamphlet; against ever unclean picture send an innocent picture; against every scurrilous song send a Christian song; against every bad book, send a good book; and then it will be as it was in ancient Toledo, where the Toletum missals were kept by the saints in six churches, and the sacrilegious Romans demanded that those missals be destroyed, and that the Roman missals be substituted; and the war came on, and I am glad to say that the whole matter having been referred to champions, the champion of the Toletum missals with one blow brought down the champion of the Roman missals.

So it will be in our day. The good literature, the Christian literature, in its championship for God and the truth, will bring down the evil literature in its championship for the devil. I feel tingling to the tips of my fingers and through all the nerves of my body, and all the depths of my soul, the certainty of our triumph. Cheer up, O, men and women who are toiling for the purification of society! Toil with your faces in the sunlight. "If God be for us, who, who can be against us?"

Lady Hester Stanhope was the daughter of the third Earl of Stanhope, and after her nearest friends had died she went to the far East, took possession of a deserted convent, threw up fortresses amid the mountains of Lebanon, opened the castle to all the poor and the wretched and the sick who would come in. She made her castle a home for the unfortunate. She was a devout Christian woman. She was waiting for the coming of the Lord. She expected that the Lord would descend in person, and she thought upon it until it was too much for her reason. In the magnificent stables of her palace she had two horses groomed and bridled and saddled and caparisoned, and all ready for the day in which her Lord should descend, and He on one of them and she on the other should start for Jerusalem, the city of the Great King. It was a fanaticism and a delusion; but there was romance, and there was splendor, and there was thrilling expectation in the dream.

Ah! my friends, we need no earthly palfreys groomed and saddled and bridled and caparisoned for our Lord when He shall come. The horse is ready in the equerry of heaven, and the imperial rider is ready to mount. "And I saw, and behold a white horse, and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him; and he went forth conquering and to conquer. And the armies which were in heaven followed him on white horses, and on his vesture and on his thigh were written, King of kings, and Lord of lords."

Horsemen of heaven, mount! Cavalrymen of God, ride on! Charge! Charge! until they shall be hurled back on their haunches—the black horse of famine, and the red horse of carnage, and the pale horse of death. Jesus forever!

SYLPH SOMERS.

Sylph Somers Applies to the Mayor—His Concession—Dr. Gilbart's Soliloquy in Jail—His Doubts of Sylph's Constancy—Sylph's Arrival at the Jail.

SYLPH SOMERS found it very difficult to gain access to the city magnate. Dr. Gilbart's advanced opinions made all the officials and sinecurists of the municipality, and especially those of the rank and file, to look upon him as an arch enemy; one who would annihilate their reign of office.

All these men knew Sylph, and identifying her with their feared and hated foe, as they regarded him, manifested their dislike in no equivocal manner. The beadles, with awful visage, scowled upon her, the city constables fiercely stared at and impeded her, and the under-clerks, under pretence of most absorbing business, continued writing when she drew near them, and kept her standing several minutes without condescending to answer her request to see the Chief Magistrate, or giving her a sign of attention. Indeed, the first quill-driver she addressed, as though totally unconscious of her presence, did not deign to give her so much as a look.

"What brings she here, I wonder?" she heard one of the beadles say—a man, grand in the quaint corporation livery, and majestically handling his mace. The question was addressed to a rubicund brother beadle beside him, a fac-simile of himself.

"How should I know?" was the answer, "excepting it's to make mischief. If I had me will of her, she'd get lodgin's, her would, near her father, as she calls him, the hussy; but how he can be that, passes me wit to know, for her real name they tell me is 'Somers.' But like enough there's somethin' not all out correct and respectable in the business, and if so, it's right bould and saucy of she to show her face here, so it is."

"Yer don't say her isn't proper born, do yer?" was the rejoinder of the second bailiff to his chum. "Well," but that's quare, and her wan o' them Methody saints as they call theirselves. Why, it's downright wicked of she; but it's just the way, as I've allus said, with them over partic'lar people. They purtend to be far better nor their neighbors, them does; but when you come to look into them close, they're far worse nor other folks; and are as rotten as a pear; and them's the kind o' people too, if ye plaze, herself an' her bad, wicked father, and the whole bag and baggage o' them, that takes it on 'em to interfere with honest, dacent min like we, and would, savin' the mark, reform us as they call it."

Sylph did not quite understand the inuendoes and charges of these men. She knew, however, that they challenged the purity of her Christian profession, and her ears tingled and her face burned.

To get away from hearing these calumniators, as well as to attain the object of her coming, she more earnestly pressed her demand to see the mayor, and, after some further delay, and with much ceremony, was ushered into his august presence.

No sooner did she approach him, however, than her heart failed her; it is true she had some slight acquaintance with his worship, having met him before his elevation to the civic chair, at one or two social gatherings in the city; but, though he recognized her—for none that ever saw her fair face could forget it—he bore himself toward her with a haughty reserve and formal dignity.

"Miss Somers Gilbart, I believe," said the mayor. Sylph gracefully acknowledged as much. "And what may Miss Somers Gilbart want with me?" inquired his worship. Sylph with beating heart and nervous agitation made known the purpose of her coming, and urged her request. "I am afraid, Miss Somers Gilbart, you bring me a request that I cannot entertain," was the mayor's reply. "You see," he said, "we have fallen upon perilous times—times which make it incumbent upon those in authority to have no respect of persons. Doctor Gilbart—individually considered—is a respectable man, Miss Gilbart. I grant that; and a useful man in the city. I also grant that. But he has cast in his lot with a low, bad set of miscreants—men who, as Solomon says, would 'remove the ancient landmarks;' and, in fact, worse still—infinitely worse—would destroy our great and glorious British constitution in Church and State; and, consequently, though as a neighbor and an acquaintance of Doctor Gilbart, I might personally strain a point to give you an order to see him, yet, as a public functionary—I regret to tell you that I must positively refuse what you ask."

"Please do not say that, Mr. Mayor," was Sylph's request, with a great look of entreaty. "What you say against Doctor Gilbart I have not the least understanding of," she continued; "but, if it be anything very evil, I am certain you do him wrong." And then observing that the mayor seemed disposed to resent this assertion, she explained herself by saying, "I mean, Mr. Mayor, you must be laboring under some unfortunate mistake. I have known Doctor Gilbart, sir, from the days of early childhood, and I have reason to know that he has an upright nature and a kind, generous heart, thinking evil of none, and is a man loyal to his king and a lover of his country."

The chief magistrate, it was evident, was greatly struck with Sylph's attractive appearance and impressive manner; and not only so, but was moved by the sincerity and force of her testimony to Doctor Gilbart's character. He, therefore, felt himself impelled to justify by argument the apparent severity and strictness of his resolve.

Sylph wisely did not attempt to debate the matter with him, though he weakly gave her the opportunity, but making use of her grace and charm (instinctively felt by all fair women to belong to them), she sought to conquer him by her suppliant voice and still more pleading tears.

The mayor outwardly maintained his haughty dignity and unyielding look, but inwardly he was subdued and made to surrender, for, after a little, he told his clerk to make out the order, which Sylph so victoriously had solicited, and when made out he signed it, and then courteously handed it to his tearful but glad and grateful conqueror.

The same glum bailiffs, that had offended Sylph by their coarse criticisms, were still on duty outside the mayor's office, and when she passed near them again flouted her with the same angry and contemptuous looks, but she was scarcely conscious of their conduct so elated was she with her success.

* * * * * *

Doctor Gilbart was seated on the pallet of his dungeon, sadly and gloomily pondering his wrongs, and the dark and perplexing problem of his life. He was not conscious of any offence against his fellow citizens or mankind in general, to warrant this high-handed arrest. Rather, he felt himself the friend of his country and the champion of human rights. The principles he had accepted, and for the advocacy of which he supposed himself now immured in a grave-like dungeon, were not, he believed, such as would work the overthrow of society, or hinder the welfare and happiness of men: on the contrary, he was persuaded, they would lead to the extension of human well-being, and in their operation would bring about the regeneration of his native land.

"Why, then, should I be treated as a felon, and that by men—many of them incompetent and politically corrupt, who having little conscience and no scruples, had managed," he said to himself, "to wriggle themselves into place and power?

"Could I stoop to their meannesses," he soliloquized, "and shut my eyes to righteousness and truth, and could I care as little as they do for the oppressed, and stand up selfishly for partial laws, and class privileges, and fawn upon the great, after their fashion, like a dog, I might this moment be the wielder of unjust power, and not its victim. And they know this; and know, also, that I scorn and contemn them for their littleness. Hence their hatred and this tyranny. Oh, is there in this universe," he cried, "no great judge of right and wrong—and no vindicator of the injured and the oppressed?" Doctor Gilbart asked himself this question, wrung from the depths of his soul by a sense of cruel injustice and bitter wrong, such he had not previously known.

But no. Doctor Gilbart's thoughts, wending his unbelief, darkly through infinitude, could c cover none, for to him there was no God and Supreme Ruler of the affairs of men; and holdi to this, it clothed for him this hour, all space a time, with a sable shroud. And all was > "Dark, dark, dark——

> Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse, > Without all hope of day."*

"It is horrid," he cried. "It crushes the he and stifles one's breath, as it were, to think of And I am not the only one in this wretched world he repeated, "whose motives have been misinte preted, and whose virtuous acts have been visit with punishment. Unnumbered thousands in the past have thus basely suffered, and, even in t ture, have died—with no one, above or beneath, understand or befriend them. Oh, what a hu and absurd comedy is life! or, rather," (and I shuddered) "what an appalling tragedy!" a Doctor Gilbart rose to his feet, and stood in t middle of his cell, in the greatness of his ment agitation.

"But it is all part and parcel of the same hideo drama," he continued, after some moments of fu ther meditation. "Every object I have loved h been snatched from me in the hour of my greate enjoyment. No matter how it darkened my lif wounded my sensibilities, agonized, and all b broke my heart, death came and was inexorabl In the grave, those most precious to me are hidde from my sight—consigned to loathsomeness an sickening corruption—and I shall see them agai —never! Yes—never," he repeated; "for spir is but the highest result of organized matter, at t dissolution of which, that which was evolved fro it and depended upon it must, in the nature things, be also dissolved. This my science tells i their end."

"Oh, thou world of men," he exclaimed, "wha a mocking phantom thou art! And human exist ence—What is it but a spectral dream? Our affec tions are of a strange power," he went on to sa after a pause—"are rooted deep and strong withi us; and objects of an infinite attractiveness are se before us, in wife and child, as if to allure an tempt us to twine around them our most sacre sensibilities. And then, when our bliss is com plete, as we think, and we flatter ourselves tha they are safely ours, and are too good and fair t die, with a demon laugh Fate steps in, and, a though they had been airy nothings they fade awa from us, and vanish into night. The whole thing," he continued, "is an outrageous farce and a cheat."

Such were some of the thoughts arising from his dreadful theory of the universe, as a place void o immortality and a personal, loving God, and now forced upon the mind of Doctor Gilbart by his present circumstances and experiences.

At length he sought by a strong effort of will to draw himself away from these meditations so shadowed with despair; but only gradually was his mind obedient to this desire, for we cannot at once command our thoughts and wishes; and then his anxieties naturally turned toward his home, and to Sylph, his protégée.

"This will be a sad blow and a dreadful surprise to her," he said. "The last thing she could suppose for me, is a lodging in this noisome cell; and she knows my opinion of the cruelty and danger of confinement in this old pestilential jail. But I wonder how she will come to hear of my unjust arrest? It was done so secretly and suddenly, and, I now remember, I quite forgot to send her word. Ah! after all tidings of this kind travel fast," he continued; "and I dare say she will soon know all about it. Poor thing, it will alarm and grieve her dreadfully."

When a considerable time passed, however, and no Sylph appeared coming to console him, Doctor Gilbart fell into a sad and gloomy course of thought again. "It may be," he said to himself, "that she has not come to me because, like others in the town, her mind has been poisoned against me. Indeed, if she has happened to go to one of my enemies for tidings of me, or that they have volunteered the news, this is not at all improbable. From ignorant prejudice and self-interest the political views I hold are maligned and most unpopular, at least with the supporters of old abuses in the city. Sylph is inexperienced and simple-minded; one, in these matters, easily to be imposed upon. And she may have been brought to think I am that pestilent fellow, which I am declared by some to be.

"But then," again he inquired within himself, "can this be possible? Surely she knows me better and loves me better than to forsake and repudiate me. No; to believe her false would be to calumniate her, and I will not and cannot do this. It would make my load of misery unendurable.

"And yet," he went on, after a while, "why should I flatter myself of her fidelity? As I was led here by the city bailiff I observed that the foremost in the crowd to rejoice at my misfortune, and even to hoot and insult me, were those, both rich and poor, whom I had, in other days, most befriended—saving not a few of them from the very jaws of death. Ah! mankind are a sorry and fickle lot, and Sylph, with all her charm and lovingness, is, after all, but human. And beside all this, her religion—her fanatical Methodism—has for a long time put a wide gulf between us.

"Ah! I see it all. This inner protest of hers against my unbelief has had added to it a mental and moral recoil from me, because of my libelled character. And even Sylph, dear and loving Sylph, has deserted me." And, under this conviction, Doctor Gilbart bowed his head low upon his breast, and in his desolation of heart, stood in the middle of his cell absorbed and motionless.

Lost to everything around him, he did not hear a light step moving along the damp subterranean passage outside; did not hear the latch of his cell door gently raised—did not see (his back being turned to the entrance of his narrow dungeon) a graceful form pass within its gloomy precincts. No, he heard and saw nothing, until clasped round the neck in a warm embrace, and thus aroused from his reverie, he looked into the face of Sylph, heard her call him father, and felt his face wetted with her tears.

SOME OF THE SIGNS OF THE LAST TIMES.

By Dionysius.

THE DAYS OF NOAH.

Two of the evangelists record a prophecy of our Lord and Master Himself, that one of the great signs of the "end of the days" would be a return of the times of Noah (Matthew 24 : 37, 39; Luke 17 : 26, 27). Have we then any existing evidence of the fulfilment of this prophecy in our own day? Are the times of Noah being repeated in this end of the nineteenth century? The question is startling from its directness, and the answer to be given will be equally startling for its exactness. As will be seen at a glance, and while we institute the comparison, the days of Noah were like the days in which we live; and can it therefore be presumption for those who recognize and realize the analogy, to regard our times as the last times and the very days of the coming of the Son of man?

The main characteristic of the times of Noah was the prevalence of a practical and even avowed atheism; and this atheism is really the key to that whole misfortune of the deluge. Eliphaz, in his controversy with Job, describes those "whose foundation was overflown with a flood," as men who, from once believing in God, so fell away as to desire to be, and to live, without God, as men who actually "said unto God Depart from us," and in a spirit of scepticism and defiance inquired, "What can the Almighty do for us?" (Job 22 : 17). And are not materialism and atheism marked features also of our times? Do not certain men strive their utmost to banish God from the government and from the education of mankind?

When 5000 electors in England return an avowed Atheist to Parliament, and a powerful administration seek to enforce his admission on a reluctant Chamber, the times of Noah are but the more prominently and expeditiously recurring.

But a belief in God, and in the law and will of a Supreme Being, can alone afford any secure basis to human society. If God has not given laws for the due ordering and preservation of society, it is certain that man cannot supply the deficiency. Only one last and temporary expedient then remains —the application of force. This is exactly what was tried in the days of Noah. Religion then set aside, and with it the divine restraints, men fell back on their own will. That will, not being unanimous, but quite the contrary, conflicting and diverse, men soon took to violating one another's liberty. The earth was filled with violence, not only physical violence, although that would follow, but moral violence; man in his thoughts and deeds working mischief to his fellow man, and bringing on the necessary retaliation, until the world was itself in a state of shipwreck and ruin.

The aspect of things in the British House of Commons is but an illustration of what is in front of us as a necessary result of our virtual atheism. The weak, to save themselves from the mere imposition of the will of the stronger, resort to the privileges of the House to defend themselves. The Nihilist, who cannot hope to cope with a regiment of dragoons, resorts to the aid of dynamite, wherewith to defend what he calls his liberty. With no common standard of right and wrong to which authorities can appeal, what else remains but violence, and as a consequence of violence, the same results as happened in the days of Noah—a mighty shipwreck?

But our times resemble the times of Noah in one other respect, that is, in the utter indifference to all signs and to all warnings. A surprise is again in store for the worldly and the wicked, who despise the long-suffering of God, and who discern not the signs of the times, for "the day of the Lord will come as a thief" (2 Peter 2 : 10).

MYSTIC DATES AND NUMBERS.

There are several dates and periods mentioned in the prophetic Scriptures. That they are in a sense mystic, and so in keeping with the rest of the hieroglyphical writings of which they form a part, admits of no doubt; but they must have been inserted for the purpose of being understood at least by some persons, at some period. Many conjectures have indeed been hazarded from time to time as to the proper application of these mystic figures; but beyond the establishment of what is termed the "year for a day," or year-day principle of interpretation, no further progress in their reasonable decipherment had been made until quite lately. One of the first mystic periods is mentioned in Daniel 7 : 25, viz. "a time and times, and the dividing of time," which is equivalent to three and a half years, each of 360 days; or 1260 days, that is, "year-days." A second mystic period is given in Daniel 8 : 14, viz., "two thousand and three hundred days." In the last chapter of Daniel two other periods occur in the 11th and 12th verses, as 1290 days and 1335 days.

Some of these dates are repeated in the Apocalypse of St. John, as in chapter 11, "a thousand two hundred and three score days" (1260) (verse 6); "a time and times and half a time" (verse 14); chapter 13, "forty and two months," the equivalent of 1260 days, taking 30 days to each month (verse 5).

All these dates seem to be consistently compounded of solar months, each of 30 days, and years of 12 such months. Thus 42 months multiplied by 30 equals 1264; one time added to two times added to half a time or year, equals 42 months. Such was the real limit of our knowledge until the discovery of M. de Cheseaux, a Swiss, who, in dealing with these apocalyptic dates, found them to be actual astronomical periods or cycles. These so-called cycles, M. de Cheseaux has himself defined as "periods which bring into harmony different celestial revolutions containing a definite number of each without remainder or fraction."

He furnishes an illustration of some interest: "315 years, a soli-lunar cycle, is a quarter of 1260 years; i.e., after 406,205 days six hours, sun and moon come into conjunction, and in 406,205 days 7 hours 23 minutes the sun has returned to its exact point on the ecliptic, a period of 1260 years, within an hour or two—from 2300 years (Daniel 7 : 14), a cyclical period, deduct 1260 years, which leaves 1040, a cycle at once solar-lunar and diurnal, or terrestrial, of the most perfect accuracy."

I can only, by means of a few hypothetical or suggestive examples show the probable intention of their employment; that is, to mark the duration of historic periods or cycles during which certain orders of ideas work out to a conclusion their good or evil effects.

"The schools of heathen philosophy were closed by the edict of the Emperor Justinian, A.D. 529." —Professor Jebb. This period, plus 1260 years, brings us to 1789, the date when the French revolution did, in effect, reopen the schools of Greco-Pagan teaching. Justinian constituted the Pope of Rome head of the churches A.D. 533, which, plus 1260 years, brings us to 1793, a year of vast significance in revolutionary annals, "the Reign of Terror." In 622 the Koran was published, and the Sclave tribe penetrated into Russia and Poland, both memorable events affecting the history of the Roman empire and the Christian Church; adding to this date 1260, brings us to 1882, and confessedly both the Sclave and Mahometan peoples are hastening to a crisis of no little magnitude.

I will now conclude my necessarily brief collection of outside witnessing by quoting two paragraphs—one from a foreign, and the other from an English journal. The former is from an article in Le Témoignage, a Lutheran organ, and runs: "Evidently a total separation of tendencies is at hand. Never was the Antichristian mind so deeply cunning, so decided, and so systematic as to-day. It is manifest that we are advancing toward a time when the so-called Christian world will separate into two camps, the Christian and the Antichristian." The following paragraph is furnished by a leading article in the Times of the 25th of December, 1876: "The jealousies and divergences of two continents, indeed of all the old world, the accumulated difficulties of two thousand years—all are seen in imminent collision as they never were seen before. There never was a time when the cup of iniquities was held to be fuller, or the cup of vengeance so ready to be poured out."

A Message in a Locket was Recently Sent by an Indian princess to Queen Victoria. It is a dishonor for a Hindoo lady of high caste to see or be seen by a man other than her husband, father, or brother. Rather than take advantage of the professional skill of the English civil surgeon, death is preferred. Good and charitable persons in England have seen their opportunity, and started a zenana and medical mission, which gives lady missionaries to India a medical training peculiarly fitting them to relieve Hindoo women. The London Times says: "The Maharajah of Punnah, the capital of a native state in Central India, applied for the assistance of a lady medical missionary at Lucknow for his wife, the Maharanee, who was suffering from an internal complaint. Miss Beilby, the lady medical missionary, traversed the two hundred miles between Lucknow and that place, and by her skill restored the Maharanee to health, besides relieving other more humble patients. Miss Beilby's departure from Punnah was the occasion of a touching interview with the Maharanee. This distinguished patient exacted a promise which testifies remarkably to the confidence she felt in the Queen's sympathy. 'I want you,' said the Maharanee, 'to tell our Queen, and the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the men and women in England, what the women in the zenanas in India suffer when they are sick.' Miss Beilby was made to write down the message in small characters and to put it in a locket, which was to be given by her own hands to the Empress of India. The message was duly delivered, and it has also been told in quarters where it is more likely to do good—namely, to those benevolent Christian citizens of England who believe it is better to spend their money in the cause of Christ than to hoard it."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Mormon Question is Expected to Come up for discussion soon after the meeting of Congress. The delegation from Utah is contested. Of the two claimants to the seat, Mr. Cannon, the notorious polygamist, holds the certificate of the Secretary of State, while his opponent, Mr. Campbell, holds that of the Governor. There is also a dispute as to the legality of Mr. Cannon's naturalization papers. It is probable that when called upon to decide the question between the rival claimants the whole subject of Mormon defiance of law will be dealt with by Congress.

The Atlanta Cotton Exposition is Attracting public attention throughout the country. All its departments are complete, and there are indications that the exhibits of Southern produce and of the capabilities of the soil will induce many Northern capitalists to settle there. There are over two thousand exhibits, filling the two large buildings and four smaller ones. Liberal reductions in railroad fares have facilitated the excursions of visitors. It is understood that the exposition will not be closed before February 1st.

The Examination of the Affairs of the Mechanics' National Bank, of Newark, N. J., reveals a state of affairs reflecting seriously on the capacity of the directors. The morocco factory which was debited by the cashier with the responsibility for the bank failure does not appear to have been more than one of the contributing causes. A Wall Street broker testified that the paying teller of the bank, a half-brother of the cashier, had been a heavy speculator in stocks, and would send at times $20,000 to cover margins on stock speculations. He was, beside, owner of a half-interest in a theatre, and otherwise showed he had command of larger sums of money than bank tellers usually possess. Other Wall Street speculations in the name of the cashier's wife were also described, which confirmed the suspicion that the cashier was using the depositors' money in a reckless way. These disclosures should arouse men who hold positions of responsibility, such as directors of public institutions, to a more careful discharge of their duties, or we may have another panic such as convulsed society a few years ago.

Another Bank Suspension was Announced last week. On Thursday, November 17, the Pacific National Bank of Boston closed its doors and affixed a notice stating that "owing to failures in which the bank is involved, payment is temporarily suspended." It is understood that the suspension was caused by the failure of a stock broker, one of the bank's customers, to meet his engagements. He owes the bank $1,260,000, against which shares of doubtful value are held as security. There appears to be some similarity between the failure of the Boston institution and that at Newark, but in that case, unlike the Newark failure, the culprit is the president instead of the cashier. The directors appear to have been in ignorance of the large advances being made to the stock broker; no entries of the transactions appeared in the books, the president "keeping the account in his head." Public confidence in the banks was rudely shaken by the disclosure, and in consequence there was so severe a run on another bank in Boston that the payment of cheques had to be suspended for two hours, but after that interval payment was resumed. The run was caused by a report that the failure of the Pacific National would involve other institutions known to hold their rediscounted paper. The affairs of the Pacific National have been placed in the hands of Colonel Needham, the bank examiner, and a committee of directors. The assurance is given that the depositors will lose none of their money and that the loss of the shareholders will not be large. The issue largely depends on pending stock speculations, and it is stated that if a rise in certain values took place, the bank might resume business. A very uneasy feeling has resulted in commercial circles from this failure following so closely that of the Newark bank.

The Trial of the Assassin of the late President commenced on Monday, November 14th, in the District Supreme Court at Washington before Judge Cox. Three days were occupied in obtaining a jury. It was impossible to find jurors who had not read newspaper accounts of the crime, but the defence were content to submit the case to the judgment of such men as were not satisfied on the question of Guiteau's sanity. After exhausting the panel of jurors and two lists of seventy-five talesmen each, twelve men were selected with whom both the prosecution and the defence were satisfied, and on Thursday the trial commenced. It was necessary to prove the offence, which was done by the evidence of Secretary Blaine and other persons who were present at the shooting, but that question is not the real issue in the case. The defence admits the shooting; the real point to be decided is whether the criminal was sane when the crime was committed. The cross-examination of Dr. Bliss on Saturday, implied that the question of malpractice would also be raised and that the jury would be asked to say whether President Garfield's death was the result of unskilful medical treatment; but Mr. Scoville, Guiteau's brother-in-law and counsel, stated distinctly that the main ground of his defence would be the insanity of his client. The prisoner frequently interrupted the proceedings, quarrelled with his counsel, and conducted himself in a boisterous manner. He said on Saturday that he thought his conduct had done his case good, and that more people believed him insane then than at the beginning of the week. He is gratified by the sensation he has produced, and appears pleased to be the chief topic of public interest. His inordinate vanity and egotism excite universal disgust, and his constant dread lest some one like-minded with himself should assassinate him as he assassinated the President, shows how despicable a creature he is.

The Attempted Assassination of Guiteau on Saturday last caused intense excitement in Washington and other cities. When the court adjourned at 2.30, the prisoner was removed to the prison van for conveyance to the jail. A man on horseback followed the vehicle, and looking through the aperture left for ventilation in the rear door could see Guiteau as he stood looking through the holes in front, steadying himself by the bars. He then rode to the side of the van and, calculating his distance, fired through the side, in the direction where Guiteau stood. Either the strong iron lining of the van turned the bullet aside, or the man aimed incorrectly, for the ball only grazed Guiteau's arm, inflicting a slight bruise, passed in front of his chest and fell on the floor of the van. The man who fired the shot was arrested the same evening. There is a general feeling of satisfaction that the attempt to assassinate the prisoner was unsuccessful. This does not arise out of any regard for Guiteau, who by his demeanor in court has intensified the loathing and contempt felt for him ever since the commission of his crime. It is regretted, because it tends to disgrace us as a people. It is a lawless act, and the fact that the victim is a creature of the most degraded type does not justify any act wrong in itself. The honor of the nation is involved in Guiteau having a fair trial and being treated as the law directs. The enormity of his offence only renders impartiality and strict observance of law more necessary We may hope that the government will adopt such precautionary measures as will render any repetition of the offence impossible. These self-appointed ministers of justice must not be allowed to usurp functions which the people have committed to the hands of others. In this case the offender seems to have been a man whose mental condition closely resembles Guiteau's, but Guiteau and all others who think they are detailed to serve the community by the commission of a crime, are the pests of society who as far as is possible must be restrained from wrong doing.

Secretary Kirkwood's Views of the Indian problem deserve careful consideration. In his annual report he urges as the best and only practicable solution of the difficult question an attempt to civilize the Indians. He says: "The Indians should learn both to know the law and administer it. They will not become law-abiding citizens until they do so learn. In my judgment it would be well to select some tribe or tribes among those most advanced in civilization and establish them in a form of local government as nearly like as may be to the system of county government prevailing in the State or Territory in which the reservations are located, allowing the Indians to elect corresponding county officers having corresponding power and authority to enforce such laws of the State and Territory as Congress may deem proper to declare in force in each reservation, for local purposes. Should the experiment prove successful, it would, I think, be a long step forward in the path the Indian must travel if he shall ever reach full and intelligent citizenship." Secretary Kirkwood also recommends the strengthening of the Indian schools, and that the Indian should be encouraged to engage in farming by giving him a valid and permanent title to his land.

The Michigan Sufferers are still in Sore need of assistance. At a meeting of the Committee of New York Clergymen held on Tuesday, November 15th, Dr. Bellows read a report of the result of the Committee's investigation and of the measures suggested to meet the urgent requirements. The Committee find that money is needed to finish the housing of the people; to provide provender for the stock they saved until the spring; and to feed 15,000 persons from November 1st to May 1st. It appears from the report that there has been received from all sources up to that date about $500,000. Of this amount over $100,000 in money came from Michigan and another $100,000 worth in cash supplies, not to speak of the aid the people of Michigan have given directly to individual sufferers. The report further says, "Of the $175,000 now in hand it is estimated that it will take $50,000 to finish the mean shelters now building for the people and $125,000 for hay to keep their teams alive until May 1st. This will leave nothing to feed the people with from December 1st till May 1st, or perhaps till July1st. The calculation is that ten cents each a day will support the people, or $1500 a day, which for 180 days, to May 1, is $270,000. If they are to be fed until July 1st, and we do not see how it can be avoided, it will require $360,000." Under these circumstances the committee recommends that a collection should be taken up in all the city churches on behalf of the sufferers.

The Death of Rev. John W. Mears, D.D., Professor of Metaphysics at Hamilton College, is announced. Dr. Mears was only fifty-five years of age. He was ordained, in 1852, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. He continued pastoral work for about nine years, after which he devoted his attention to religious literature. In 1871 he was elected to the professorship of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy in Hamilton College, a position he occupied until his death. He was the author of several works on religious subjects which had a large circulation. He was recently brought into prominence as the leader of the movement against the Oneida Community which resulted in breaking up that immoral society. A student of Hamilton College relates that Dr. Mears was turning his attention to the Mormon question. He writes: "A few months ago, when the opposition of our late President Garfield to Mormonism was referred to in conversation, Dr. Mears said, 'If the matter isn't quickly handled I will see Bishop Huntington, and begin to stir up the Church and the country; but if President Garfield lives I think he'll fight this evil.'" Dr. Mears died at Clinton, N. Y., November 13th.

The Victim of a Curious Superstition Died recently in San Francisco. A Chinese woman was washing her feet in one of the houses in the Chinese quarter when she accidentally spilled some of the water on one of her own countrymen. It is believed by the Chinese that such an accident will bring misfortune to the person upon whom the water thus falls, and it becomes the duty of the careless person to present to the other a certain amount of candy and coin to avert the evil. The woman did as this strange superstition commanded, but the man was not satisfied, and threatened to shoot some one in the house. A few hours later he returned and deliberately shot the woman. Ignorance, superstition, and cruelty are inseparable companions, as the Scripture assures us (Psalms 74 : 20).

A Discarded Horse was Reinstated by a Fire Brigade at Virginia, Nev., recently. The horse was known as "the Old Gray." A Virginia journal says: "Old Gray was trained regularly every day, and he soon came to know as much as anybody about what he ought to do. After a year or two of hard work Old Gray was retired to a furniture wagon. Three days after his retirement he was in front of Currie's auction store, hitched to an express wagon loaded with furniture. All at once an alarm of fire was sounded. Old Gray waited about the length of time that he thought it should take to hitch him to the hose-cart, and then he started. The furniture was scattered from one end of the street to the other, but Old Gray reached the fire before the opposition cart, and with a self-satisfied air backed up to the hydrant. Next day he was returned to the department. His devotion to duty was appreciated." This prompt obedience to the call of duty was the result of habit in the old horse. It is not the first time that the lower creation has set an example to human beings (Isa. 1 : 3).

The Rapid Increase of the Practice of Cigarette smoking, especially among ladies and boys, has called forth a serious warning from Dr. William A. Hammond, one of the most distinguished physicians of America. Dr. Hammond states that the inhalation of the smoke, which is the almost universal habit of cigarette smokers, produces facial neuralgia, insomnia, nervous dyspepsia, sciatica, and an indisposition to mental exertion, especially in young persons. This is all the more forcible because it is the opinion not of a prejudiced fanatic but of an authorized physician who for certain constitutions and to a moderate extent has prescribed the use of tobacco.

A Letter with a Blind Direction was Received at the New York Post Office, and was submitted to the man whose business for the past twenty-five years has been to decipher bad addresses on letters. It was directed to "Patrick Mahoney, First House in America." The letter was from Ireland, and after the usual inquiries the expert learned the time that the vessel bearing the letter arrived. As an experiment, he placed it in the hands of a carrier, who was instructed to deliver it at the end of —— Pier. The house was a sailors' boarding-house, and, strange as it may seem, Patrick Mahoney was found. When the letter was opened the only contents were found to be a draft for $400. The address was probably suggested to the writer by the fact that it may have been the first house at which he called in America after his voyage, but his vague idea of the requirements of the postal service might have lost the money had not the expert divined his meaning. It is remarkable that every year many sums of money fail to reach the persons for whom they are intended owing to the senders writing these blind directions, and persons who are probably in need of funds never learn that money sent to them lies unclaimed in the post-office. The promises in the Word of God, which are far more precious than gold, are often similarly unused, but in this case the blindness is not in the direction, but in the people whom Satan has blinded.

The Awful Punishment of Two Blasphemers in Arkansas is announced in a telegram from Little Rock, under date of November 1st. It says: "people in this neighborhood have been much solemnized by two remarkable events which have just been reported. Robert Nelson, aged 70, has suffered heavily by reason of the long-continued drought, and one day began cursing the Lord for permitting such an affliction. While thus engaged he suddenly fell backward, having been stricken with paralysis. He has not spoken since. A similar occurrence is reported in Union County, where a young man named John Freeman, who had spoken blasphemously of the Lord for not sending rain, was struck by lightning and killed. Two such events carry with them a solemn warning. The oaths uttered in ordinary conversation, which shock the ears of Christian people on the cars and ferry-boats and on the streets, are appalling. Those who utter them forget that God hears their profanity, as is shown in these two cases (Ps. 9 : 16).

A Terrible Tale of Suffering from Colorado is published in a daily journal. Four Italian laborers attempted to walk from Pitkin to Gunnison City, and were overtaken by a blinding snowstorm. They lost the road and became separated. Only one was saved. He struggled on, trying in vain to warm his chilled blood by thoughts of sunny Italy, and at last fell prostrate on the railway track of the Denver and Rio Grande road. Providentially he was seen by the engineer of an approaching train, and was taken in an exhausted condition to Denver. Rescuing parties were immediately organized to search for his comrades, but they had little hopes of finding them. There is something very pathetic in the idea of the poor Italian endeavoring to cheer himself with reminiscences of past pleasures. The Christian's unfailing remedy is the exact opposite. He thanks God that the past is blotted out, and his joy lies within him and his hope before him (Phil. 3 : 13).

A Determined Race for Life was Made by a man near Meriden, Conn., lately. He swallowed a large dose of morphine, intending suicide, but quickly changed his mind, and started for the nearest physician, who was two miles away. He felt the dangerous drowsiness stealing over him, and ran with all his might. The exercise kept him awake, but his mouth became parched, his eyes filmy, and his strength less. He stopped to pray, but an instant of delay warned him that the fatal drowsiness was increasing in power, and he again started forward. He at length stumbled into the doctor's office, and fell senseless on the floor, but was saved by energetic treatment. If sinners overcome by listless indifference would only exercise the same energy in an appeal to the Great Physician, they might be saved from eternal death.

The Arrival of Commander Cheyne, of the British Royal Navy, in New York, has directed public attention afresh to the subject of polar exploration. Commander Cheyne's object in visiting this country is to arrange for an Anglo-American Arctic expedition in which balloons are to be used for the purpose of obtaining an extended view of the region and the discovery of the most available routes for exploration. A portrait of Commander Cheyne and a sketch of his life will appear in an early number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE PRINCIPAL WHEAT.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"The principal wheat."—ISAIAH xxviii. 25.

The Husbandman Taught of God—I. He Knows the Principal Seed—The Evil of a Huddled Life—What are you Living for?—The Most Needful Thing, the Principal Thing—The most Profitable—A Blind man's Essay on Colors—II. He Gives it the Principal Place—Godliness should have the Principal Abilities—Most Intense Love—Attentive Respect—Most Earnest Labors—Greatest Sacrifices—An Off-hand Farm—III. He Selects the Best Seed for Sowing—Believe the Weightiest Doctrines—Sow the Noblest Examples—The Closest Communion with God—IV. Gives the Principal Crop the Principal Care—Planting Wheat—V. He Expects a Principal Crop—The Harvest of the World to Come.

THE whole passage runs on this wise: "Give ye ear, and hear my voice; hearken, and hear my speech. Doth the plowman plow all day to sow? doth he open and break the clods of his ground? When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat and the appointed barley and the rye in their place? For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him. For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised; because he will not ever be threshing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen. This also cometh forth from the Lord of hosts, which is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working."

The prophet, inspired of God, shows that the husbandman is wise and skilful in the management of his farm, in ploughing, sowing, and threshing, and in all the processes of husbandry. He asserts that this skill has been taught him of his God. I suppose that this is set before us, not as poetry, but as fact. The wisdom of earth is a reflection of the light of heaven. If there had not been some information concerning husbandry conveyed to our first parent when he left the garden of Eden he would not have known how to till the soil, and produce a harvest, and before he had found it out by experience he would have died of starvation, and the race would have ended with him. The twenty-sixth verse says, "His God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him." Yes, God has taught men the rudiments of husbandry; and I conclude, therefore, that if God gives men instruction so that they are able to cultivate the land and produce a harvest of divers kinds of seed, He will much more instruct us if we wait upon Him as to the tillage of our lives, so that we may not sow to the flesh and reap corruption, but may learn how to sow to the Spirit, and may of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

We are all of us husbandmen. Some of us may be wicked husbandmen who slay the heir; or slothful husbandmen who suffer hemlock and darnel to come up where there should be wheat and barley; or fickle husbandmen who having put our hand to the plough have looked back; but we all have fields to till and work to do for the great Landlord to whom all things belong. If any of us wish to be true husbandmen, and so to sow and so to reap as to be found accepted of our great Lord, and to produce a harvest unto His glory, then we had better go to Him for instruction, and ask Him to teach us knowledge, and guide us in the way of wisdom. Breathe that prayer to God now, and may He hear it on behalf of every one of us by sending us His Holy Spirit.

I. There is one point which the prophet mentions as a matter of wisdom on the part of the husbandman. It is this: that he knows to cultivate, and makes it his principal object. My text is, "Does not the husbandman cast in the principal wheat?" He does not set to work at haphazard without thought, and go to the granary and take out wheat, and cummin, and barley, and rye, and fling these about right and left; but he estimates the value of each grain, and arranges them in his mind according to their proportionate values. He does not think that cummin, and dill, and carraway, which he merely grows to give a flavor to his dish on the table, is at all of such importance as the wheat; and, though rye and barley have their values, yet he does not reckon that even these are equal to the corn which he calls "the principal wheat." He is a man of discretion, he arranges things, and he places the most important thing in the front rank, and spends upon it the most care.

Herein I would have you learn of the husbandman. Do keep things distinct in your minds—not mixed and muddled by a careless thoughtlessness. Do not live a huddled life, without care and discretion, running all things into one; but sort them out, and divide and distinguish between the precious and the vile. See what this is worth, and what the other is worth, and set your matters in rank and order, making some of them principal, and others inferior. I suggest to you young people especially that, in starting life, you say to yourselves, "What shall we seek for?" For he that seeketh findeth. "What shall we sow?" "For whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

The little things of this life are to be attended to, as a man may sow cummin and fitches; there are some inferior things that ought not to be left undone, as a man should sow rye and barley in their appointed place. Still there is some principal thing—some master thing—for which we ought to live—and what shall that be? What ought to be the principal crop that we shall endeavor to cultivate in our hearts and lives? Have you turned that over? Have you really put the problem before you? or have you gone at it hit or miss, as if it did not matter what.

Remember, the eye is a most important part of the body. How shall a man direct his steps if he cannot see? And the motive is the eye. What have you an eye to? What are you living for? What is the principal aim with you? Is it going to be that of the old gentleman satirized in Horace who said to his son—"Get money: get it honestly, if you can; but, by all means, get money?" Is money-getting to be the principal wheat with you? Or will you choose a life of pleasure—"a short life and a merry one," as so many fools have said, to their great sorrow? Is it in dissipation that your life is to be spent? Are thistles to be your principal crop? Because there is a pleasure in looking at a Scotch thistle, do you intend to grow acres of pleasurable vices? And will you make your bed upon them when you come to die? Oh, look and see what is worthy of being the principal object in life; and, when you have found that out, then pray God of His Holy Spirit to help you to choose that one thing, and to give all your powers and faculties to the cultivation of it.

The farmer, who finds that wheat ought to be his principal crop, makes it so, and lays himself out with that end in view. He looks around and says, "What is the best thing for me to produce?" and when he has found it out he calls it his principal thing. Dear friends, do, I pray you, remember that true godliness is the principal thing; therefore get it and prize it above all things.

Now, mark that this farmer was wise, because he counted that to be principal which was most needful. His family could do without cummin, which was but a flavoring. Even the fitches are thought to have been a plant which yielded a grain used in giving a taste to bread, but they were not a valuable crop. The family could do without cummin and fitches. Perhaps the mistress might complain, or the cook might grumble; but that did not signify so much as it would do if the children cried for bread. They certainly could not do without wheat, for bread is the staff of life. It is bread that strengtheneth man's heart, and therefore the Eastern farmer must grow bread if he does not grow anything else. That which is most necessary he makes to be the principal thing.

Is not this common sense? If we were wisely to sit down and estimate, should we not say, "To be forgiven my sin, to be right with God, to be holy, to be fit to live eternally in Heaven is the greatest, the most needful thing for me, and therefore I will make it the principal object of my pursuit?" Other things may be desirable, but this thing is needful. A certain competence, a measure of esteem among men, a degree of health—all these are the flavoring of life, but to be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation, this is life itself; this is the bread by which our soul's best life is to be sustained. Oh, that we were all wise enough to feel that to be one with Christ is the one thing needful; that to be at peace with God is the principal thing; that to be brought into harmony with the Most High is the true music of life. The moralities and courtesies of life, like the minor seeds, may take their place in due order upon our farm; but the fear of the Lord is the principal wheat, and we must cultivate it with our whole heart.

This farmer was wise, because he made that to be the principal thing which was the most fit to be so. Of course, barley is very useful as food. Nations have lived on barley bread, and lived healthily too; and rye has been the nutriment of whole nations; neither have men starved when restricted to oats, and other grains. Still, for all in all, give me good wheaten flour. I know our Scotch friends like oat-cake better, but I hardly think that we shall all come to their mind while wheat flour is of a reasonable price. We still like a piece of wheaten bread, and look upon it as being the best staff of life. And what is there, brethren, that is so fit for the heart, the mind, the soul of man, as to know God and His Christ? Other mental foods, such as the fruits of knowledge, and the dainties of science, excellent though they may be, are inferior nutriment and unsuitable to build up the entire structure of our manhood.

Moreover, this farmer was wise, because he made that the principal thing which was

THE MOST PROFITABLE.

Under certain circumstances, in our own country, wheat is not the most profitable thing which a man can grow; but, ordinarily, wheat is the best crop that the earth yields for general consumption, and therefore the text speaks of "the principal wheat." Our grandfathers used to rely upon the wheat-stack to pay the rent. They looked to their corn as the arm of their strength; and though it is not so now, yet so it always was of old, and perhaps it may yet be so again. Anyhow, the figure is just as good with regard to true religion; to fear the Lord is the most profitable thing.

I am told that rich men at the present time find it hard to get hold of anything which yields five per cent. Oh, but this blessed fear of the Lord is an extraordinarily profitable kind of business, for it brings in far more than a hundred per cent or a thousand per cent. In this business a man begins without any capital; in fact, he commences over head and ears in debt, and yet he makes a fortune such as misers never dream of. You will say it is a strange way of starting in business; but the believing sinner does so. When he comes to God he is penniless, and as much in debt as he can be; the Lord discharges his heavy arrears of sin, and then the believer rises in riches by sinking more deeply into debt of another kind; not of sin, but of gratitude.

Then let godliness be the principal wheat, for there is nothing so profitable. Godliness is profitable for the life that now is, and for that which is to come. Godliness is a blessing to a man's body; it keeps him from drunkenness and vice. It is a blessing to his soul: it makes it sweet and pure. It is a blessing to him every way. If I had to die like a dog, I would like to live like a Christian. If there were no hereafter, yet still, for comfort and for joy, give me the life of one that lives like Christ, or strives to do so. There is a practical, everyday truth in the verse—

> "'Tis religion that can give > Sweetest pleasures while we live;
> 'Tis religion must supply
> Solid comfort when we die,"

Only that religion must not be of the common sort; it must not be a vain profession, but it must have for its root a hearty faith in Jesus Christ. See ye to it. Religion must be either everything or nothing, either first or nowhere. Make it the principal thing, and it will fill your soul with treasure.

Thus, you see, the farmer was right in having a principal crop, and in selecting the right seed to be his principal care. I do not suppose that he ever entered into any dispute upon the matter. He felt sure that wheat must be his principal produce, and he gave his thoughts to it. I cannot bear to hear people disputing as to whether it is worth while to give their heart to Christ. The people who question the value of faith have never tried it.

Whenever you observe some conceited creature writing an essay against true religion, and putting it into one of our precious "reviews," do not be carried away by hearing people say that it is mightily clever. If you read it, say to yourselves, "Certainly, this is a clever thing, for here is a blind man writing upon the harmony of colors;" see what learned observations he makes upon scarlet and blue, which, he says, are precisely the same, only some narrow-minded folks insist upon their being different." We are willing to take the evidence of scientific men upon the science that they have mastered; but we care nothing for their opinion upon a matter which is quite out of their range.

Oh yes, we have made up our minds long ago; we are not going to argue about it any more; godliness is the principal wheat to us. We know it by experience. We have tasted and handled the good word of life. As the Eastern farmer was quite sure that the wheat was the principal thing, so are we quite sure of it, and henceforth, God helping us, we shall sow the principal wheat and leave others to sow tares or darnel if they will.

Thus have I said sufficient upon our first observation; the husbandman is a lesson to us because he knows what is the principal thing.

II. Secondly, he is a lesson to us because he gives this principal thing

THE PRINCIPAL PLACE.

I find that the Hebrew is rendered by some eminent scholars, "He puts the wheat into the principal place." That little handful of cummin, for the wife to flavor the cakes with, he grows in a corner; and the various herbs he plants in their proper borders. The barley he puts in its place, and the rye in its acre; but if there is a good bit of rich soil—the best he has—he says to his men, "That is for the wheat." The principal place is for the principal crop. He gives his choicest fields to that which is to be the main means of his living.

Now, here is a lesson for you and for me. Let us give to true godliness our principal powers and abilities. Let us give to the things of God our best, our ripest, our most careful, our most intense thought. I pray you, do not take religion at second hand from what I tell you, or somebody else tells you; but think it over, and give it your principal thoughts. Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the Word of God. The thoughtful Christian is the growing Christian. Remember, the service of God deserves our very best consideration and endeavor. We are poor things at our best, but we ought to give the Lord nothing short of our principal powers.

Be sure, also, to yield to this subject your most earnest love. The best field in the little estate of manhood is not so much the intellect as the affections; sow the principal wheat there. Oh, to have true religion in the heart; to love what we know—intensely to love it; to hold it fast as with the grip of life and death—never to let it go! The Lord says, "My son, give me thy heart," and He will not be contented with anything less than our heart. When your zeal is most burning, and your love is most fervent, let the warmth and the fervency all go toward the Lord your God, and to the service of Him who has redeemed you with His precious blood. Let the principal wheat have the principal part of your nature.

Then let the Lord have also always the attentive respect of your life. Let the principal wheat be sown in every action of life. I think if we are truly Christians we must, of necessity, be as much Christians outside the church as in it. We shall try to make our eating and our drinking, and everything we do, tend to the glory of God. Draw no line between the secular and the religious part of your conduct, but let the secular be made religious by a devout desire to glorify God in the one as much as in the other.

We should give to this principal wheat our most earnest labors: I mean for the spread of the Gospel. A man ought to consecrate himself to the utmost in the matter of holy work for Jesus. I dread to see a professing man zealous in politics, and luke warm in devotion; all on fire in the parish vestry, and chill as winter when he comes to a prayer-meeting. Some fly like eagles when they are serving the world, but they have a broken wing when they come into the worship of God. This should not be. If anything could rouse us up and make the lion within us roar in his strength, it should be when we confront the foes of Jesus, or fight for His cause. Our Lord's service is the principal wheat, let us labor most in connection with it.

This should also take possession of us so as to lead us to our greatest sacrifices. The love of Christ ought to be so strong as to swallow up self, and make sacrifice our daily joy. For Christ's name's sake we should be willing to endure poverty, reproach, slander, exile, death, and count them all joy. Nothing should be precious to a Christian in comparison with Christ, who is preciousness to them that believe. I will put it to you whether it is so with you or not. Is the love of Jesus the principal wheat with you? Are you giving your religion the chief place or not?

I am afraid that some people treat religion as certain gentlemen treat a part of their estate. They have a farm away from their dwelling-house which they call they put a bailiff into it, and only give an eye to it now and then. Some people hold their religion as an off-hand farm, and their minister is the bailiff, who has to see to it for them. I am sure such spiritual farming never pays. They have religion? Certainly. Yes. Oh, certainly; yes. But I am afraid they are like the man of whom the child spoke at the Sunday-school. "Is your father a Christian?" said the teacher. "Yes," said the child, "but he has not worked much at it lately."

I could point out several of this sort, who are sowing their wheat very sparingly, and choosing the most barren patch to sow it in. They profess to be Christians, but religion is a tenth-rate article on their farm. Some have a large acreage for the world, and a poor little plot for Christ. They are great growers of worldly pleasure and self-indulgence, and they sow a little religion by the roadside for appearance sake. They spend more time at billiards than at prayers. This will not do. God will not thus be mocked. If we despise Him and His truth we shall be lightly esteemed. O come, let us give our principal time, talent, thought, effort, to that which is the chief concern of immortal souls. May God help us so to do. May we imitate the husbandman who gives the principal wheat the principal place in his farm.

III. Let us learn a third lesson.

THE HUSBANDMAN SELECTS

the principal wheat or the best seed when he is sowing his fields. That is another meaning of the text, namely, when a farmer is setting aside wheat for sowing, he does not put by the tail corn and all the worst of his produce; but if he is a sensible man he likes to sow the best grains that he can meet with. Many farmers search the country round for a good sample of wheat for sowing, for they do not expect to get a good harvest out of a bad sowing. The husbandman is taught of God to put into the ground the principal wheat —the selected kernels.

If I am going to sow to the Lord and to be a Christian, I should sow the purest form of our holy religion, and I should try to do this, first, by believing the weightiest doctrines. I would like to believe, not this ism, nor that, but the unadulterated truth which Jesus taught; for if I want to produce in my soul a holy character, it will come by the Spirit of God out of true doctrine. Falsehood always breeds sin; truth begets and fosters holiness. You and I, therefore, ought to pick over all our seed carefully, judge and decide between truth and error, and not let our soul receive anything but what is according to the word of the Lord.

Next to that we ought to sow the noblest examples. Many men are dwarfed because they choose a bad model to start with. They imitate dear old Mr. So-and-so till they grow wonderfully like him, only the best of him is left out. One minister happens to be of a gloomy turn of mind, and he preaches the deep experience of the children of God, and in consequence a band of good people think it to be their duty to be melancholy. How unwise! We should never copy any man's infirmities. To be like Paul there is no need to have weak eyes; to be like Thomas there is no necessity to doubt; to be like Peter we need not be rash. If you copy any good man, there is a point at which you ought to stop short. Yet, if I must have a human model, I would like to have one of the bravest of the saints of God; but, oh, how much better to imitate that perfect pattern which you have in Christ Jesus. Thus, when you are sowing the wheat of holy living, sow the best seed you can, by having Christ Jesus Himself as the example by which you shape your life.

And, then, there is one more mode of sowing selected seed. We should endeavor to live in the closest communion with God. One dear brother prayed in our little meeting before the present service that we might have as much grace as we were capable of receiving, and that God would work in us all that He willed to work in us, and bring us into such state that we might not hinder Him in any good thing which He willed to do by us. This is to be our desire; we should rise to the highest form of spiritual life. If you do sow the principal wheat, get the best sort of wheat.

There is religion and religion. There is a spirit and a spirit; and there is a system of divinity and another system of divinity. The best is always good enough for me. I exhort you not to rest content with anything short of the best that can be had. O young men, if you mean to follow Christianity, go in for it thoroughly. If you mean to serve the devil, serve him. He is a pretty master! Remember his wages! But if you wish to serve Christ, do not go sneaking through the world as if you were ashamed of your Lord. If you are Christ's, show yourself. If you are worthy of so great a captain, put on your regimentals.

IV. Fourthly, the husbandman attends to the principal crop with

THE PRINCIPAL CARE.

This Hebrew language always astonishes me, for it conveys such a mint of meaning. Sometimes when I study a verse I find that the critics say that it means this, that, and the other, until I have thought, "This language is miraculous, so full, so deep; very different from our poor English tongue. It teaches us many truths in a few words, and, like a diamond, it has a hundred facets, each flashing forth a distinct ray of light. This plenitude of meaning leads us to reflect upon a far more weighty matter. It is wonderful how much God can put into a word. Why, He put Himself into one. The name of our divine Lord is "the Word of God."

Some critics insist upon it that the proper translation of our text is, that the farmer plants his wheat in rows. I do not know whether our farmers often plant wheat. They sow the seed in due order, but I do not hear much of planting it. It is said that the large crops in Palestine in old time were due to the fact that they planted the wheat, absolutely putting it in root by root, so that there might be no more wheat in a row than there ought to be, and they set it in lines so that it was not checked or suffocated by its being too thick in one place, neither was there any fear of its being too thin in another. The wheat was planted, and then streams of water were turned by the foot to each particular plant of wheat. No wonder, therefore, that the land brought forth abundantly.

We give our principal care to the principal thing. Our godliness should be carried out with earnest thought; our service of God should be performed with great care. Brethren, are we careful enough as to our religious walk? Have you ever searched to the bottom of your profession? Have you ever inquired into the reason of your belonging to your present denomination? Why do you happen to be members of a certain church? Your mother was. Well, there is some good in that reason, but not enough to justify you in the sight of God. Why do you happen to profess, as you do, such and such a form of Christianity? Did you ever look into it? I do pray you judge your standing. If any Christian minister is afraid to urge you to this duty I should stand in doubt of him. I am not at all afraid. I wish you to examine all that I teach you. I beg you to do it, for I would not like to be responsible for another man's creed.

Take care, also, that you nourish every part of your religion with prayer, even as the farmer watered each plant. Pray for grace from on high that your soul may never be parched and dried up. Perform to your faith, to your hope, to your love, and to all the graces that are in your soul every needful service which the husbandman renders to his wheat. Watch, weed, ward, and water every gracious principle; give your graces your principal care, for they are to yield your principal harvest.

V. With one more lesson I close. Do this, because from your principal care you may expect

YOUR PRINCIPAL CROP.

If religion be the principal thing, you may look to religion for your principal reward. The harvest will come to you in various ways. For instance, you will make the greatest success in life if you wholly live to the glory of God. Success or failure must much depend upon the suitableness of the endeavor. I shall never be able to conduct a choir, but I may succeed in preaching, for that is my proper work. Now you, Christian man, if you try to live to the world you will not succeed, for you are not fitted for it. Grace has spoiled you for sin. If you live to God with all your heart you will succeed in it, for God has made you on purpose for a holy sphere.

The Eastern farmer's prosperity hinges on his wheat, and yours upon devotion to God. It is to your faith and love that you must look for your joy. Is there any bliss like the bliss of knowing that you are in Christ, and are the beloved of the Lord? It is to your religion that you must look for comfort on a sick and dying bed; and you may be there very soon. "Ay, and the sooner the better," you may say, if you have grown this principal wheat, and have sown to the Spirit that you may reap life everlasting.

In the world to come what a crop, what a harvest will come of serving the Lord! What will come out of all else? Nothing but vanity of vanity. A man has made a million of money, and he is dead. What is he the better for his gold? A warrior becomes an emperor, his fame rings throughout all the earth; he dies. What has he of all his honors? What will any of you have at the last if you live to the world? To live to the world is like playing with boys in the street for halfpence, or entertaining yourself as children do with bits of platter and oyster shells. A life devoted unto God yields real and substantial results, but all else is waste. Let us think so, and gird up our loins to serve the Lord.

May the Divine Spirit help us to sow the principal wheat, and live in joyful expectation of reaping a joyous harvest in due season, according to the promise, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." That which was the cause of our principal anxiety here shall be the source of our endless felicity hereafter.

A Sceptic's Grief.

Watching a Wreck.

THE SCEPTIC'S DYING CHILD.

"O GOD! I cannot spare her yet. She must not die!" exclaimed the agonized father as he stood by the bed of his dying child. "Just! no, it is not just nor merciful that I should be robbed of my only daughter! If she must die, then I will die with her, for how can I live without her?"

For a moment the sweet smile fled from the peaceful features of the expiring girl, and there was an expression of mingled sadness and pity. She beckoned him to her side, and as he bent over her to catch the whisper, for she was almost gone, she murmured low, "Father, meet me in heaven. When you think of me, remember God has taken me, that He may save you. O my father, hear His voice!"

The rebellious man was silenced. His head was bowed like the reed. He had been a sceptic. His daughter had been his God. But he was a sceptic no longer. The fountain of his soul was stirred by the grim features of death staring him in the face.

Profound silence filled the room. Nothing save the flickering breath of the dying child could be heard. Sorrowing friends were standing round to see her die, and she gave each a last farewell look. Her eyes were lighted up with holy love as she whispered, "Jesus! heaven." A peaceful, happy smile, such as only the dying Christian wears, parted her lips. Again her eyes wandered to her father, when, slowly raising her hand, she pointed her finger toward heaven, and with her gaze fixed upon him, the light of life glimmered feebly and more feebly, until it went out.

When they said, "She is gone!" Oh, how those last words, "God has taken me that He may save you," rang in the father's ear.

He sought his room and closed the door. He tried to pray, but in vain. It seemed to him that the billows of his soul were running mountains high, but could not escape their prison bounds. He took from the table the "Word of God," and sitting down, tried to read therefrom, but he could not. He rose and paced the room, murmuring in his heart against God. But he could not hush that voice. Louder and louder it rang, and at every step the echo came back, "God has taken me that He may save you." Suddenly he stops. With uplifted hands, he exclaims, "O my God, I have sinned. I have worshipped my child, and have forgotten Thee. Now do I know that Thou art a jealous God, and wilt have no other god before Thee."

He returned to the death-chamber. There she lay, his lovely idol, all pale in her snowy robe. He gazed upon her long and earnestly as she lay smiling in death's sleep. Then humbly he said, "My daughter, if you, so young and so loved, were willing to die for your father's sake, I will hear the voice."

For many days that father groaned beneath the burden of his sins. There seemed to be not one ray of light, so great was the darkness. But at last, when hope had well nigh fled, just at the dawn of day, there was a glorious dawning in his weary soul. The light of God's countenance shone in upon him, and he was saved in Christ—everlastingly saved.

THE STRANDED VESSEL.

IT was a fearful night off the coast of W——. The wind blew terrifically—howling down the chimneys and rattling the doors and casements, so that sleepers were startled in their beds, and breathed a prayer for the poor mariners. The morning dawned, and I hastened to the beach. The gale continued with unabated fury, and the sea lashed the bold cliffs with a grandeur rarely seen. The white foam whirled through the air, and the billows broke high over the pier and lighthouse of the port in sheets of spray.

The scene was intensely grand and exciting. A vessel in distress was off the coast—no other sail appeared on the horizon. Many an eye was watching her with doubt and anxiety, as she struggled to keep off the rocks and labored hard to make the port. The glass revealed her condition. All the sails but one were in shreds—and only a portion of that remained—her only hope; her masts were splintered, and her spars dangled among the ropes. For some time we watched her dubious course, as she was beaten nearer and nearer the shore. And now, on, on she sped, driven by the wind and the incoming tide! It was a moment of exciting suspense! Will she—can she make the port? Now she stands fair—now—now—she enters! Backward again! Now! There! Oh—oh! Just missed! and in five minutes more she lay a stranded hulk upon the beach!

Oh, to be so near the port, and just to miss entering!—what could be more melancholy and disappointing? But this was only a ship—a lifeless thing of timber. What must a stranded soul be? Alas! there are souls—precious souls—yea, thousands, who are in a similar case! See how they work and toil for the port! No sail but is unfurled, and no rope is left untouched! How they strain, but 'tis no use. The pilot is not aboard: Jesus is not there. They will never enter; there is no alternative—they will be stranded.

Oh, man—woman—how is it with your bark?—your soul—something infinitely more valuable to you than the greatest ship afloat, even were you the only proprietor. Whither are you bound? Is the Word of God your chart and compass? Are you trusting only in the precious blood of Christ? Ah, when it is too late, "many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able!" (Luke 13 : 24).

"THE DRINK DID IT."

DID what?

Well, so long a catalogue of things that it would take me longer time, and you more patience, than either of us has to spare. Here, however, is a sample—

What did the drink do? Emptied the cupboard; bruised the wife; ruined the health; spoiled the temper; weakened the will; dismissed the friends; disgraced the family; robbed the landlord; forfeited the place; broke the peace; and destroyed the love.

A pretty long catalogue this, I think. One had need draw breath before starting again, if it were worth while to start again at all. Which it is not.

But did the drink do all this? They say so. Men are always saying so. Ask the magistrates, ask the masters, ask anybody of wide experience, whether it isn't so. It is just the excuse of every drunkard who gets into a scrape of any kind —"It was the drink. That's what it was. The drink did it."

For instance, Jem Tripp, round the corner, who knocked down his wife yesterday week, and gave her a black eye, put it down to the drink, and said the next morning, "The drink did it."

"The drink did it," was Peter Barlow's excuse, when his master had a private interview with him, and put a few questions about such things as spoiled work, and certain days of absence.

And when Johnnie Robinson stood in the prisoner's dock, and was tried for assault of a very ferocious kind, and got a heavy sentence, he, too, pleaded that "the drink did it."

And to give one more instance, haven't we all read in the papers how a condemned man, as he stood by the gallows, and was soon to be launched into eternity, put his awful fate to the credit of the drink, and said with almost his last breath, "The drink did it"?

Well, in a way, there is no denying that the "drink did it," and that if it weren't for the drink it wouldn't have been done at all. That the drink has a hand in most of the mischief of the world, it does not take a philosopher to prove. It's a fact, a fact, a fact.

But that the drink is to blame, that the drink is the offender, that the drink is, in a word, a good excuse, is a thing I do not admit for one moment. Behind the drink, trying to crouch away in hiding, is the real culprit. Come out into the light, you skulking creature, and while you pipe out your idle cry of "the drink did it," hear my blunt denial.

"The drink did it?" The drink could never have done it, if you had not given it an entrance into your poor brain first of all. It is in that will of yours which bade the hand seize the tankard, and lift it to your lips, that the guilt lies. No, no, it was not "the drink that did it," but your own evil self.

"The drink did it?" And yet you are punished for it? It is a great shame that you should be touched with a single finger, if only "the drink did it." The rebuke, the chastisement, the dismissal, the prison, the gallows, are huge mistakes, surely. And is the civilized world about to stand by and watch such wicked judgments, and not say a single word by way of protest? Oh, poor foolish man, I wonder you never saw before that nobody believes you, that nobody accepts your excuse, that nobody doubts but that you yourself are the culprit, in spite of your cry of "the drink did it." And if the world lays the blame at your door, why don't you begin to lay it there, too?

"The drink did it?" Shall the drink do it any more? Here is a plain question, which you had better answer if you are a wise man. You can answer it, if you will. The drink! You know as well as I do, it can never do anything more through you if you decide to-day to have done with it. Frequent the tap-room, broach a private barrel at home, go on as you are going on now, and soon the drink will do something more. Come, man, which shall be the master, you or the drink? Shall the drink do it any more?

"The drink did it?"

A Fireman's Heroism.

When before the great white throne your guilty soul lies bare and open, and the wife, the children, the mates, and the neighbors, point the finger of accusation at you, and your crimes are read out of the book, one by one, think you the great Judge will listen to your plea of, "The drink did it?"

Tell the truth, man. Make a clean breast of it. Down on your knees before the blessed Saviour of sinners, and say, "Lord, I did it, I did it," and as you confess your bitter, bitter sin, and seek the Saviour's pardon, and believe His wondrous love, there shall steal into your soul the peace of the forgiven.

Oh! friend, with sins gone, and heart made new, and a Saviour's strength to lean upon, you shall go out into the battle to win a glorious victory.

"The drink did it!" Yes, did it in the old, bad days, but never a thing shall it do when the grace of God comes in.

A TIMELY RESCUE.

"FIRE! fire!" A cloud of dense black smoke hangs like a pall over the street, shutting out the midnight stars. But soon the flames dart out from the windows, they leap from floor to floor, and shooting through the roof, cast a red, flickering light on the anxious faces gathering in the street below.

It is a narrow street; the house is old and burns fiercely. Have they all escaped? Oh, yes! at the first alarm men and women rushed out, springing from their beds and escaping for life. So the firemen try to keep the fire from spreading.

But stay! here is a mother inquiring for her two children; neither friend or neighbor has them, they are still in the burning house. And as the terrible truth flashes on the mother's mind, she rushes forward to seek her children amid the flames. But strong arms keep her back; then a ladder is raised against the burning house and a brave young fireman steps forward. But the ladder is too short to reach their bedroom, and it is placed against a lower window. He rushes up through clouds of blinding smoke, and for a moment he stands at the window, whence the smoke is pouring out in dense volumes. It was but a moment; the crowd cheered him, and he dashed forward up the perilous staircase till he reached the children's bedroom.

He found the children, and taking one in each arm, turned to descend. Through the blinding, choking smoke he stumbled down the stairs, the tongues of flame licking and singeing him as he passed, but he reached the window in safety. There help was waiting, and he resigned his burden to the care of his comrades. The crowd cheered him to the echo as he descended, and he was rejoiced to find that he had not risked his life in vain; the children lived.

Unconverted reader, are you not in as great danger as those children? Greater, because the death that threatens you is eternal. You cannot escape through the window, because the ladder is too short; you cannot be saved by trying to fulfil the law of God.

But the Son of God left His throne in heaven, in order to provide for guilty man a way of escape. He "bare our sins in His own body on the tree;" and every penitent sinner accepting that blessed fact in simple and absolute confidence shall as surely be saved.

Will you leave the burning house now a way of escape has been found? Or will you be like a drunken rioter, who, some years ago, was seen at the window of the upper floor of a house in flames? Waving a stick to the crowd below, he shouted, "Hurrah! hurrah!" Hundreds of people loudly cried, "Get out on the roof, or you will be burned!" But all the man did was to wave his arms again, and shout "Hurrah!" Presently the flames burst into the room, and the man went back from the window; a shriek went up from the crowd, who saw him no more. But on the following morning the body of a man was found in the ruins burned to a cinder.

Most persons will say that this poor man was drunk, and blind to his danger. So are all those who neglect to flee from the wrath to come, who are intoxicated with the pleasures and affairs of this present evil world, and blind to the fact that there is but a step between them and death. Therefore they sport upon the brink of destruction, heedless of those who seek to arouse them to a sense of their guilt and danger; and they refuse to avail themselves of the offered deliverance in Christ.

Dear reader, Christ can save you, whether you be a brand ready for the flames, or a respectable and highly moral sinner. Whatever your condition, Christ can save you if you come to Him, and He must save you before you can be admitted to heaven!

The Conscience Money.—"A Friend of Mine," says Mr. Moody, "in America, who had come to Christ, was trying to consecrate himself and his wealth to God. He had formerly had business transactions with the Government, and had taken advantage of them. After his conversion the enormity of his offence became increasingly plain to him, and his conscience troubled him. He asked me what he should do. 'I want to consecrate my wealth, but it seems as if God won't take it.' He had a terrible struggle; his enlightened conscience smiting him with ever-increasing force until the man became absolutely miserable. His prayers seemed to be a sham, and his profession of religion a hypocrisy. At last he drew a check for $1500, and sent it to the Government. He told me he got such a rich blessing when he had done it. That is bringing forth fruits meet for repentance."

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Old Marlowe.

THE unconscious influence of Roland Sefton's life and character had been working secretly and slowly upon Felicita's nature for years. They were very young when they were married; and her first feeling of resentment toward her own family for pressing on the marriage had at the outset somewhat embittered her against her young husband. But this had gradually worn away, and Felicita had never been so near loving him heartily and deeply as during the last year or two, when it was evident that his attachment to her was as loyal and as tender as ever. He had almost won her, when he staked all and lost all.

For now she asked herself, what was the worth of all this religion, which presented so fair a face to her? She had a delicate sense of honor and truthfulness, which never permitted her to swerve into any by-ways of expediency or convenience. What use was Roland's religion without truthfulness and honor? She said to herself that there was no excuse for him even feeling tempted to deal with another man's property. It ought to have been as impossible to him as it was impossible to her to steal goods from a tradesman's counter. Was it possible to serve God—and Roland professed to serve Him—yet cheat his fellow-men? The service of God itself must then be a vanity—a mere bubble, like all the other bubbles of life.

It had never been her habit to speak out her thoughts, even to her husband. Speech seemed an inefficient and blundering medium of communication, and she found it easier to write than to talk. There was a natural taciturnity about her which sealed her lips, even when her children were prattling to her. Only in writing could she give expression to the multitude of her thoughts within her; and her letters were charming, and of exceeding interest. But in this great crisis in her life she could not write. She would sit for hours vainly striving to arouse her languid brain. It seemed to her that she had lost this gift also in the utter ruin that had overtaken her.

Felicita's white, silent, benumbed grief, accepting the conviction of her husband's guilt with no feminine contradicting or loud lamenting, touched Mr. Clifford with more pity than he felt for Madame, who bore her son's mysterious absence with a more simple and natural sorrow. There was something irritating to him in the fact that Roland's mother ignored the accusation he made against him. But when Roland had been away three months, and the police authorities had given up all expectation of discovering anything by watching his home and family, Mr. Clifford felt that it was time something should be arranged which would deliver Felicita from her voluntary imprisonment.

"Why do you not go away?" he asked her; "you cannot continue to live mewed up here all your days. If Roland should be found, it would be better for you not to be in Riversborough. And I for one have given up the expectation that he will be found; the only chance is that he may return and give himself up. Go to some place where you are not known. There is Scarborough; take Madame and the children there for a few months, and then settle in London for the winter. Nobody will know you in London."

"But how can we leave this house?" she said, with a gleam of light in her sad eyes.

"Let me come in just as it is," he answered. "I will pay you a good rent for it; and you can take a part of the furniture to London, to make your new dwelling there more like home. It would be a great convenience to me, and it would be the best thing for you, depend upon it. If Roland returns he will never live here again."

"No, he could never do that," she said, sighing deeply. "Mr. Clifford, sometimes I think he must be dead."

"I have thought so too," he replied gravely; "and if it were so, it would be the salvation of you and your children. There would be no public trial and conviction, and though suspicion might always rest upon his memory, he would not be remembered for long. Justice would be defrauded; yet on the whole I should rejoice for your sake to hear that he was dead."

Felicita's lips almost echoed the words. Her heart did so, though it smote her as she recollected his passionate love for her. But Mr. Clifford's speech sank deeply into her mind, and she brooded over it incessantly. Roland's death meant honor and fair fame to herself and her children; his life was perpetual shame and contempt to them.

It was soon settled that they must quit Riversborough; but though Felicita welcomed the change, and was convinced it would be the best thing to do, Madame grieved sorely over leaving the only home which had been hers, except the little manse in the Jura, where her girlhood had passed swiftly and happily away. She had brought with her the homely, thrifty ways in which she had been trained; and every spot in her husband's dwelling had been taken under her own care and supervision. Her affections had rooted themselves to the place, and she had never dreamed of dying anywhere else than among the familiar scenes which had surrounded her for more than thirty years. The change, too, could not be made without her consent, for her marriage settlement was secured upon the house; and her husband had left to her the right of accepting or refusing a tenant.

To leave the familiar, old mansion, and to carry away with her only a few of the household treasures, went far to break her heart. "It is where my husband intended for me to live and die," she moaned to Phebe Marlowe; "and, oh, if I go away I can never fancy I see him sitting in his own chair as he used to do, at the head of the table, or by the fire. I have not altogether lost him, though he's gone, as long as I can think of how he used to come in and go out of this room, always with a smile for me. But if I go where he never was, how can I think I see him there? And my son will be angry if we go; he will come back, and clear up all this mystery, and he will think we went away because we thought he had done evil. Ought we not to come home again after we have been to Scarborough?"

"I think Mrs. Sefton will die if she stays here," said Phebe. "It is necessary for her to make this change; and you'd rather go with her and the children than live here alone without them."

"Oh, yes, yes!" answered Madame; "I cannot leave my little Felix and Hilda, or Felicita: she is my son's dear wife. But he will come home some day, and we can return then; you hope so, don't you, Pheeb?"

"If God pleases!" said Phebe, sighing.

"In truth, if God pleases!" repeated Madame.

When the last hour came in which Phebe could see Roland's wife, she sought for her in her study, where she was choosing the books to be sent after her. In the very words in which Roland had sent his message she delivered it to Felicita. The cold, sad, marble-like face did not change, though her heart gave a throb of disappointment and anguish as the dread hope that he was no longer alive died out of it.

"I will meet him there," she said. But she asked Phebe no questions, and did not tell her where she was to meet her husband.

Life had put on for Phebe a very changed aspect. The lonely farmstead on the uplands had been till now a very happy and tranquil home. She had had no sorrow since her mother died, when she was eight years of age, too young to grieve very sorely. On the other hand, she was not so young as to require a woman's care; and old Marlowe had made her absolute mistress of the little home. His wife, a prudent, timid woman, had always repressed his artistic tendencies, preferring the certainty of daily bread to the vague chances of gaining renown and fortune.

Old Marlowe, so marred and imperfect in his physical powers, had submitted to her shrewd, ignorant authority, and earned his living and hers by working on his little farm, and going out occasionally as a carpenter. But when she was gone, and his little girl's eyes only were watching him at his work, and the child's soul delighted in all the beautiful forms his busy hands could fashion, he gave up his out-door toil and, with all the pent-up ardor of the lost years, he threw himself absorbingly into the pleasant occupation of the present. Though he mourned faithfully for his wife, the woman who had given to him Phebe, he felt happier and freer without her.

Phebe's girlhood also had been both free and happy. All the seasons had been sweet to her: dear to her was "the summer, clothing the general earth with greenness," and the winter, when "the red breast sits and sings betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch of the mossy apple-tree." She had listened to "the eave-drops falling in the trances of the blast," and seen them "hang in silent icicles, quietly shining to the quiet moon." There had been no change in nature unnoticed or unbeloved by her.

The unbroken silence reigning around her, heightened by the mute speech between herself and her father, which needed eyes only, not lips, had grown so familiar as to be almost dear to her, in spite of her strong delight in fellowship with others. The artistic temperament she had inherited from her father, which very early took vivid pleasure in expressing itself in color as well as in form, had furnished her with an occupation of which she could never tire. As long as there was light in the sky, long after the sun had gone down, in the lingering twilight, loath to forsake the uplands, she was at her canvas catching the soft gray tones, and dim colored tints, and clearer masses of foliage, which only the evening could show.

To supply her need of general companionship, there had been so full and satisfying a sense of friendship between herself and the household at the Old Bank at Riversborough, that one day spent with them gave her thought for a month. Every word uttered by Roland and Felicita was treasured up in her memory and turned over in her mind for days after. Madame's simple and cheerful nature made her almost like a mother to the simple and cheerful country girl; and Felix and Hilda had been objects of the deepest interest to her from the days of their birth. But it was Roland, who had known her best and longest, to whom she owed the direction and cultivation of her tastes and intellect, who had been almost like a god to her in her childhood; it was he who dominated over her simple heart the most. He was to Phebe so perfect that she had never imagined that there could be a fault in him.

There is one token to us that we are meant for a higher and happier life than this, in the fact that sorrow and sin always come upon us as a surprise. Happy days do not astonish us, and the goodness of our beloved ones awakens no amazement. But if a sorrow comes we cry aloud to let our neighbors know something untoward has befallen us; and if one we love has sinned, we feel as if the heavens themselves were darkened.

It was so with Phebe Marlowe. All her earthly luminaries, the greater lights and the lesser lights, were under an eclipse, and a strange darkness had fallen upon her. For the first time in her life she found herself brooding over the sin of one who had been her guide, her dearest friend, her hero. From the time when as a child she had learned to look up to him as the paragon of all perfection, until now, as a girl on the verge of womanhood, she had offered up to him a very pure and maidenly worship. There was no one else whom she could love as much; for her dumb and deaf father she loved in quite a different manner—with more of pity and compassion than of admiration. Roland, too, had sometimes talked with her, especially while she was a child, about God and Christ; and she had regarded him as a spiritual director. Now her guide was lost in the dense darkness. There was no sure example for her to follow.

She had told her father he would never see her smile again if Roland Sefton was taken to jail. There had been, of course, an implied promise in this, but the promise was broken. Old Marlowe looked in vain for the sweet and merry smiles that had been used to play upon her face. She was too young and too unversed in human nature to know how jealously her father would watch her, with inward curses on him who had wrought the change. When he saw her stand for an hour or more, listlessly gazing with troubled, absent eyes across the wide-spreading moor, with its broad sweep of deep-purpled bloom, and golden gorse, and rich green fern, yet taking no notice, nor hastening to fix the gorgeous hues upon her canvas while the summer lasted, and when he watched her in the long dusk of the autumn evenings sit motionless in the chimney-corner opposite to him, her fingers lying idly on her lap instead of busily prattling some merry nonsense to him, and with a sad pre-occupation in her girlish face, then he felt that he had received his own death-blow, and had no more to live for.

The loss of his hard-earned money had taken a deeper hold upon him than a girl so young as [illegible] could imagine. For what is money to a young nature but the merest dross, compared with the love and faith it has lavished upon some fellow-mortal? While she was mourning over the shipwreck of all her best affections, old Marlowe was brooding over his six hundred pounds. They represented so much to him—so many years of toil and austere self-denial. He had risen early and late taken rest and eaten the bread of carefulness. His grief was not all ignoble, for it was for his girl he grieved most; his wonderful child, so much more gifted than the children of other men, whom nature had treated more kindly than himself; men who could hear and speak, but whose daughters were only commonplace creatures. The money was hers, not his; and it was too late now for him to make up the heavy loss. The blow which had deprived him of the fruits of his labor seemed to have incapacitated him for further work.

Moreover, Phebe was away oftener than usual; gone to the house of the spoiler. Nor did she come home, as she had been wont to do, with radiant eyes, and a soft, sweet smile coming and going, and many a pleasant piece of news to tell off on her nimble fingers. She returned with tear-stained eye-lids and a downcast air, and was often altogether silent as to the result of the day's absence.

BALAAM.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 4. Num. 24 : 1-19. Golden Text, James 1 : 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE history of Balaam is one of the saddest, but perhaps one of the most instructive, in the Old Testament. He was a man who believed in God, and who was so well known as a follower of the Lord, and so recognized as a man whose faith was with power, that Balak, the heathen king of Moab, felt certain of victory over his foes if Balaam's faith were on his side. He said to Balaam, "I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed." Balaam was a man possessing rare gifts of the Spirit of God; he had prophetic light upon the far future, and told of the coming Messiah; he knew what it was to commune with God, and would take no step until he had obtained counsel from on high; he knew the character of the God he had to deal with, and yet with all this he was a man who lived for himself, who had never fully surrendered himself to God; his conversion was without consecration, and was therefore imperfect. He fell, and great was his fall.

It is evident that Balak knew what was Balaam's weak side, or he could never have made him such a proposition as that he should curse God's people. Balak knew that the things of this world had still a hold on Balaam; it may be that in private intercourse with him he had perceived something of greediness or selfishness, and thus he was not without hope that "the rewards of divination" which he sent by his messengers would weigh somewhat with him. We little know how much the smallest selfishness in us Christians gives occasion to those who know not God to take advantage of us. Balak was not out in his calculations; when the messengers arrived Balaam did not reject with horror the proposition they made him; he would think over it, would pass a night of prayer over it. It is difficult to conceive how a man of God could have entertained such a proposition for a moment; but whenever one Christian worker in our own day seeks to overreach or to supersede another for his own advantage, or for the advantage of his mission or his "cause;" does it not savor of the same spirit of self-seeking as that which influenced Balaam?

O how blind is a man, even a believing man, when under the influence of self-interest! Balaam went to pass the night in prayer that he might obtain permission from God to curse those who believed in Him and served Him, and who, moreover, were His chosen people! No wonder God was the first to break silence, no wonder Balaam could not at first urge his plea; yet he did mean business, he did mean to have to do with God. The Lord said: "What men are these with thee?" And Balaam stated the commission of the King of Moab. "And God said unto Balaam, Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people; for they are blessed. And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the princes of Balak, Get you into your land; for the Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you."

The princes returned to Balak with their answer. How came it then that the King of Moab should think it possible that Balaam was yet to be overcome? There must have been some sadly weak points in Balaam's character, and Balak must have known them. The bare idea that the prophet of the Lord would sell his spiritual power to a heathen is evidence that Balak knew that other motives stronger than the love of God influenced him, and that he was open to bribes. O that the truth were understood that when a man yields himself to the Spirit of God, he does not become the Spirit's master, but His instrument; he cannot control the Spirit of God, nor force Him to work in the channel which he wishes to accomplish his own purposes. Poor ignorant Balak was not to be blamed if he saw in Balaam only a more powerful kind of sorcerer, who could use his supernatural power to increase his own riches or better his own worldly position; and therefore sent to Balaam "princes more and more honorable than they," with promises of great honors and unlimited reward.

Balaam was flattered; perhaps he argued, "I cannot be expected to refuse such a chance, it would be the making of me and of my family. My sons can get government appointments. I can get my daughters comfortably settled, surely the Lord will not be so unkind as to refuse me such great advantages." But the price; would he curse God's people? Alas! so blinded was he with the brilliant prospect that he forgot to weigh the means of attaining his wishes. Still he could not do anything without praying over it; he told the messengers that if Balak would give him his house full of silver and gold, he could not go beyond the word of the Lord, and yet, fatal inconsistency! he added, "Now, therefore, I pray you, tarry ye also here this night, that I may know what the Lord will say unto me more." He knew, for he said it himself, that "God is not a man, that He should lie; neither the son of man, that He should repent," and yet, so thoroughly had he yielded himself to love "the wages of unrighteousness" (2 Pet. 2 : 15), that he acted against his own declaration and entreated God to do that which he himself prophesied He could not do. And God answered him as one "that setteth up his idols in his heart . . . according to the multitude of his idols" (Ezek. 14 : 4).

Alas! he had taken the first step on the terrible incline to ruin. He made God's answer the excuse for doing his own will, and God was angry. Yet the patient love of his Heavenly Father gave him one more chance, he "was rebuked for his iniquity; the dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet" (2 Pet. 2 : 16); the ass had eyes for the angel of the Lord, Balaam had eyes only for his own earthly interest. When at last he was aroused through the voice of the ass, and when "he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way," who told him that his way was perverse, and that he had come to withstand him, still the blinded Balaam threw a doubt upon the will of God. "I have sinned," he said; "for I knew not that thou stoodest in the way against me; now, therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again" (chap. 22). If it displease thee? Had not the Lord said: "Thou shalt not go with them?" and was not the angel there to withstand him? Must he not have known, if he had paused to think, that the second answer of God was an answer according to his folly, that God does not change? That fatal if turned the scale. Henceforth Balaam became a "vessel of wrath fitted to destruction;" a helpless voice, forced to declare God's truth in spite of himself, and then a terrible tool in the hands of the enemy of souls.

He knew that he should have no control over his prophetic utterances, and told Balak so; but he sought by means of sorcery (chap. 23 : 23; 24 : 1) to engage the enemy, if not God, against Israel. It was in vain, and he was obliged at last to confess, "Surely, there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel." God met with him, but not in mercy, and made him to pour out blessings upon the people whom he sought to curse, and even to pray a prayer which could not be answered. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Balak had to learn that spiritual power, blessing, or cursing by the Spirit of God, is not to be bought or sold, and is neither at the command of the heathen, nor yet of the believer. He was grievously disappointed, and brought Balaam to another point of view where he could see but the utmost part of the people; but the Lord put a word in his mouth which was one stream of blessing upon them, one declaration of their coming greatness.

At last Balak became angry when, for a third time, the Spirit of the Lord came upon Balaam, and he was forced in spite of himself to speak the Lord's message. He had thrown away his soul, lost all real communion with God, and had the mortification of receiving his discharge from the service of Balak with the biting irony, "I called thee to curse mine enemies, and behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times. Therefore, now flee thou to thy place; I thought to promote thee unto great honor; but, lo! the Lord hath kept thee back from honor." Once more he opened his mouth in prophecy, and spoke of the Messiah, but as one whose part and lot with Him was lost. "I shall see Him, but not now; I shall behold Him, but not nigh." Then the unhappy man "went and returned to his place," his dreams unrealized, his hopes blighted.

But an awful devilish thought struck him. He had staked his soul upon this venture, and had lost it, but he should not die just yet, there might still be a possibility of obtaining the prize for which he had paid so dear. So he passed over at once from the service of God to be the active agent of the great enemy of souls, and went again to Balak suggesting that if God's faithfulness to His people could not be tampered with, they might be snared into sin against Him, which would bring on them certain judgment. And so the dark spirit which had replaced the Spirit of God in him, laid the deep plot, and he "taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication" (Rev. 2 : 14). The snare was only too successful. The history of chap. 25 with 31 : 15, 16, tells us of the sin and of its fearful punishment twenty-four thousand dying in the plague which followed.

And what of Balaam? God called upon Moses to "avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites," and five kings of the Midianites fell, and with them "Balaam the seer of Beor;" he attained his end, wrought a curse upon the children of Israel, obtained the favor of their enemies, and lost his own soul. O how much a man may have to do with God and yet be lost when his whole being, body, soul, and spirit is not fully given up to God! Christ hath died for us "that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them, and rose again" (2 Cor. 5 : 15). Self is a principle of corruption, antagonistic to eternal life; but Christ in us cannot sin, cannot fall away, cannot perish, cannot fail. God, teach us in very deed to live crucified with Christ, that not we may live, but Christ in us!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The German Reichstag was Opened by Prince Bismarck on November 17th. The Emperor's absence caused some remark, and the Chancellor, before reading the speech from the throne, conveyed his Majesty's excuses therefor. The speech was received by the deputies with icy coldness, the absence of applause being regarded as a demonstration of hostility. In spite of the unequivocal vote of the people, the Emperor announced his adherence to the old policy, thus setting the will of the electors at defiance. The following is the summary of the speech as cabled: Concerning internal affairs, the speech states that the economic policy of the government as to reforms in the system of taxation hitherto pursued will be strictly adhered to. Stress is laid on the necessity that provision be made by the State for invalid workmen. The Emperor says the budget shows gratifying results of the economic policy. The measures announced are these: For the incorporation of Hamburg in the Zollverein, for quadrennial parliaments, for biennial budgets, the Accident Insurance bill, the tobacco monopoly, and the liquor tax. The Emperor's speech emphatically points out that the social evils are not to be remedied by repression alone, but rather by concurrent promotion of the welfare of the working classes.

M. Gambetta, in Assuming the Reins of Power, has delivered before the French Chambers a speech describing the policy he proposes to pursue. He said: "We propose to reform the judicial system. With the view of securing reforms the government has testified to its desire to place, by means of a wisely limited revision of the constitutional laws, one of the essential powers of the State in more complete harmony with the democratic nature of our society." After promising the development of the educational system he said the administration would seek, without impairing the defensive power of France, by reducing the land and sea forces to relieve the burdens of the country; they would also lessen the financial burdens upon agriculture, fix by treaties an economic régime of the various industries, give a greater impulse to the means of production, transport, and exchange and the promotion of social thrift, and insure respect for established powers in the relations of the various religious denominations with the State, and, finally, while protecting public liberties, to maintain with firmness, order at home and with dignity, peace abroad. The allusion to one of the essential powers of the State indicates that M. Gambetta intends to remodel the constitution so far as the Senate is concerned. Some disappointment is expressed that the policy proposed is not the brilliant policy expected, but is only such a line as an ordinary minister might mark out. M. Gambetta's cabinet is composed of men whose antecedents do not encourage the hope that a pacific future is in store for the French Republic.

Earthquakes in Europe.—A Newspaper Correspondent cables that three more shocks of earthquake were felt at Agram, the city which was recently almost demolished by an earthquake, on Tuesday, November 15th. Earthquake shocks were felt at Naples, Catanzaro, and Cosenza early the following morning. There were two earthquake shocks at Messina on Thursday, November 17th, the first at one o'clock and the second at twenty minutes to six o'clock. It is reported that the shocks caused some disasters and loss of life in the interior."

Self-government for Ireland is the Watchword of a large number of Irishmen in this country and in Ireland. The difficulties in the way of realizing that object were presented recently in a speech Mr. Chamberlain, M.P., made at Liverpool. Mr. Chamberlain's opinions are entitled to the attention of Irish patriots, because, unlike some of his colleagues, he has frequently avowed his preference for a republican form of government, and is the earnest advocate of the rights of the laboring classes. Mr. Chamberlain said "Are we prepared to admit that the question of separation is an open one between us? Well, I say for myself that I am not prepared to admit that this is possible, either in the interest of this country or in the interest of Ireland, that there should be created a hostile power within striking distance of these shores. I suppose that the first result of this would be that independent Ireland would be plunged into civil war, in which we would be forced to take a side. Ireland independent must always be jealous and afraid of England, which would be a strong military and commercial nation close to her. Ireland would be crushed under the weight of military and naval expenditure, which it would have to maintain in order to secure its separate existence. The two countries would be a standing menace the one to the other. Sooner or later the condition would be intolerable."

Mr. John Bright, the Renowned English statesman, celebrated his seventieth birthday on November 16th. Congratulatory addresses were presented to him. Mr. Bright, replying to an address at a meeting at Rochdale, where he resides, dwelt upon the benefits of free trade. Speaking on the land question, he said that unless means were taken to stimulate production by putting increased capital and skill into the soil, there was no remedy whatever for the agricultural distress but a great and permanent reduction of rent.

The Question of Obstruction in the British Parliament is under the consideration of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues, and the probability appears to be that power will be given to the Speaker and the chairmen of the committees to name a member for anything like wilful obstruction, such naming, if backed by the result of a division without debate, to exclude the offender for a month, while a second conviction should exclude for the whole session.

Owners of Property in Ireland Have in Many cases suffered severe hardship through the refusal of the tenants, on the advice of Mr. Parnell, to pay rent. To the rich among them, and to such as have property other than Irish land, the loss may have been merely inconvenient, but there is a large number of owners of land whose condition is truly deplorable. There are numerous cases where landlords, who a few years ago were in affluent circumstances, are now almost beggared. Sometimes the sufferer is an elderly lady, with a life estate; sometimes a mortgagor, compelled to go on paying interest on the debt, or a leaseholder forced to pay his superior landlord the rent agreed upon to the last penny. A gentleman in a western county, with a nominal rental of $10,000, is reduced to live on the produce of his poultry-yard; another has only received $200 out of $5000 due for rent. A lady living in Dublin, with a jointure of a fair amount, is obliged to the kindness of a relative for bare subsistence; and two Dublin ladies, entitled to some $2000 a year between them, are existing on the charity of their friends.

An Egyptian Parliament has been Convoked to take into consideration the condition of the country. It is called "an assembly of notables," and is composed of the most prominent men of the nation. The election passed off quietly. The Arabs manifested little interest. The Premier, Cherif Pacha, who was appointed at the dictation of the insurgents, has expressed his satisfaction at the result. As to the policy of the new Assembly there is as yet no indication. The British attitude has been thus defined by the Foreign Secretary in a letter to the representative of Great Britain in Egypt: "We are convinced that the tie uniting Egypt to the Porte is the best safeguard against foreign intervention. If it should be broken Egypt might soon be endangered by rival ambitions. The only circumstance which could force us to cease maintaining this tie would be an outbreak of anarchy in Egypt, and we look to the Khedive, to Cherif Pacha, and to the good sense of the Egyptian nation to prevent such a catastrophe. As long as Egypt continues tranquil it will be the earnest desire of Her Majesty's government to contribute toward a satisfactory result."

A Wholesale Massacre of Young Girls is reported from Africa. A telegram from London says advices from Cape Coast Castle, dated October 16th, state that information has been received there that the King of Ashantee has killed two hundred young girls for the purpose of using their blood for mixing mortar for the repair of one of the State buildings. The report of the massacre was received from a refugee who was to have been one of the victims. It receives some confirmation also in the fact that such wholesale massacres are known to be a custom with the king (Ps. 74 : 20).

A British Search Expedition for the Jeanette has been suggested by the Royal Geographical Society. The President, Sir Rutherford Alcock, in the course of a speech delivered November 14th, said: "It had been suggested that the best way to find the missing steamer would be to send an expedition by land, and that the Hudson's Bay Company might have a chance of fitting out an expedition to examine both sides of the Mackenzie River to see whether the Jeanette's crew had been heard of in that direction. He might say that the Royal Geographical Society had authorized him to communicate with the Chief Secretary for the Colonies, and to sugggest that the Hudson's Bay Company be asked to send out such an expedition, and he had hopes that it would be done."

An Outbreak of Cholera is Reported from Mecca, the resort of Mahommedan pilgrims. Advices state that five hundred persons are dying daily there, and as steamers refuse to carry returning passengers, the people are wandering into adjacent cities and "spreading the infection."

A Lawsuit is Reported Pending as the Result of the marriage of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts with her American protegé. The London correspondent of an American journal says: "It was supposed that all litigation arising from the marriage had been averted. It seems, however, that such is not the case. Mrs. Money, the Baroness's sister, has brought an action to recover about $400,000 a year, which, since the wedding, she asserts, belongs to her son under the will of the Duchess of St. Albans, and in which she has a life interest. The legal question involved is whether or not Mr. Ashmead Bartlett was an alien at the time of his marriage."

In The Christian Herald of the 13th October, we gave portraits and biographical sketches of six of the most prominent British delegates to the Methodist Œcumenical Conference which had been sitting in London. The Rev. Mr. Arthur would naturally have been in the group, but we felt that a scholar and orator who had twice visited America, and whose writings were as well known in this country as in his own, would be more acceptably placed before our readers if the biographical pages of one number of The Christian Herald were entirely devoted to an account of his life and career. To-day we carry out the design of which we then gave notice.

William Arthur was born in 1819 in County Antrim, one of the most populous counties of Ireland, and one widely known for the natural curiosity named the Giant's Causeway. He was sent to school perhaps earlier than at the usual age, and was soon taken away again; for even as a very young child he was forward in his learning to the extent of precocity. When about twelve years of age, he moved with the family to Westport, a town in the county of Galway, on the Atlantic shore, and being designed for business, was placed in a trading firm connected with that town. Although of Presbyterian parentage, he was there brought into connection with the Wesleyans, and it was not long before he underwent the great change of being born again (John 3 : 3).

Before he had completed his sixteenth year, he had joined himself in membership with the church whose ministrations had been blessed to him, and had made

HIS FIRST ATTEMPT TO PREACH.

It was predicted at the time that he would attain to eminence; and his calling being clearly the Christian ministry, he was accepted by the Irish Conference, and sent by that body, in 1837, to Hoxton College, London, his age being not more than eighteen. There he rapidly distinguished himself by his extraordinary aptitude for learning; and after a course of study extending over two years, having offered himself for foreign service, he was sent to the Mysore territory in Southern India.

He embarked for India with the since distinguished Rev. Ebenezer Jenkins and another young companion, in April, 1839; and the mixed company and various incidents of the long voyage round the Cape of Good Hope at once aroused his energies and proved his principles. A first-class East-Indiaman of the old time, well-officered and manned, with a large company of passengers — civilian, naval, and military—afforded a good field for self-discipline and for observation: and Mr. Arthur's first exercises in the ministerial service, to which his life was already consecrated, were most successfully discharged on board the ship.

MISSION TO INDIA.

It was a new mission which he was appointed to establish in the Mysore territory; and he threw himself into it heart and soul. But he overtaxed his strength. Unslumbering activity in the tropical climate impaired his health, and before he had completed the second year of residence in the new mission, his health showed symptoms of exhaustion by the sudden failure of his sight. His medical friends assured him that the preservation of his eyesight, not to say his life, would be hopeless if he remained in the climate of India, and warned him that his constitution would not endure a return to any country within the tropics. Forty years ago doctors had ideas about the effect of new climates which would seriously interfere with modern commercial enterprise; still, Mr. Arthur's state of health was indeed alarming, and he embarked in the first homeward-bound ship that could be found, a leaky, slow, ill-provisioned, badly manned, and miserably commanded vessel. The number of persons on board was soon reduced by deaths, the survivors were in a famishing state, the pumps proved insufficient to overcome the leakage, and the little crew was ready to break out into mutiny.

In that predicament Mr. Arthur, a fellow-passenger, one or two seamen, and the captain himself, took to a boat in mid-ocean, in the forlorn hope of catching a ship that was just in sight but not going in their course. A negro sailor-boy on the ship providentially spied the floating speck; the humane captain shortened sail, took the two passengers on board, and supplied his unhappy brother captain with a stock of provisions, wherewith to pull back to the old vessel again. The missionary and his companion sped on their voyage in the hospitable ship, and in due time set foot on English ground.

HIS FIRST BOOK.

Notwithstanding that dangerous adventure, Mr. Arthur's health was much improved by the sea-voyage, but his eyesight continued to be so much impaired that the doctors kept him in a darkened room for a year after he reached England. However, upon his restoration from that disability, he employed his leisure at home, writing "My Mission to the Mysore." The book, which was his first essay in authorship, was marked by the orderly arrangement, the perspicuity of statement, and the animated style which have secured popularity for all Mr. Arthur's writings. It was rendered further valuable from the accurate information it embodied about the Canarese country, which was much in advance of what might have been expected from the author's short residence there. Mr. Arthur had in fact mastered the Canarese language, which is the principal vernacular of Mysore, sufficiently to preach in it; and we may add that he has always shown remarkable power of acquiring languages, and can speak several of those of Europe fluently, so that he has often assisted delegates from foreign countries by acting as interpreter for them before meetings and conferences.

After several years spent in England, Mr. Arthur went to France and was stationed at Boulogne, and then for two years at Paris. He was soon able to preach in French, and crowded and influential congregations attended his ministry in the French capital. During his stay in Paris came the revolution of 1848, in which Louis Philippe's government was overthrown. During that terrible time he stayed at his post and continued to hold his services after most of his congregation had fled, and when the two or three that were left were constantly disturbed by the sound of fighting close to the little chapel where they met.

In 1849 he returned to England, and in 1851 was appointed one of the General Secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. From that position he retired in 1867, after having for sixteen years served the cause of missions with an efficiency that was highly appreciated; mingling freely with good men of every name as a fellow-laborer in the common cause of Christianity.

Mr. Arthur paid his first

in 1856, as a deputation from his Church to the Methodist Episcopal General Conference, with Dr. Robinson Scott as his colleague. After speaking and preaching in the Middle States, he went out west, and while there was attacked by a severe form of malarial fever. To this day he frequently speaks of the kindness of the friends who were with him, and of their nursing, which with the blessing of God saved him from death. Also he has a vivid recollection of the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dodge, who, upon his return to New York, took him to their home, shut him up, and would let him see no one and do nothing till his health was in some measure restored. On reaching England again the doctors ordered him away to the East, and he spent some months travelling up the Nile, through the Long Desert and through Palestine.

In the same year, 1856, Mr. Arthur published "The Tongue of Fire," as the author of which his name is most widely known, and which has had a very large circulation in England and America, and has been translated into several languages. That precious book, which owes no small part of its value to its compendious shape, describes the mystery of the power of the Holy Ghost in the Church and in the ministry, and is marvellously calculated to stir the soul to a diligent endeavor after an acquisition which belittles the noblest aspirations of fallen man. Almost every line of it is intelligible to a simple understanding, and it engrosses the reader's attention on a subject which, as one might suppose, no felicity of style could make interesting to persons unaccustomed to theological reading. In these days, when the multitude of religious disquisitions has become bewildering, that little treatise may be read and re-read with profit even to the neglect of a whole book-shelf of larger and more ordinary volumes. If Mr. Arthur had done nothing more than write that single book, his life would have been productive of more good than it falls to the lot of every man to accomplish.

Next in order of his writings came "The Successful Merchant," a biography of Mr. Samuel Budgett, of Bristol, which has passed through at least forty-three editions, and has been translated into Welsh, Dutch, French, and German. It made the name of the author as familiar to the general public as it had previously been to his own denomination. Its adaptation to commercial life, and its eminently practical turn, sufficiently account for its popularity. In 1860 Mr. Arthur published "Italy in Transition," a volume dealing with the political and religious crisis through which Italy was then passing, when its smaller kingdoms were being consolidated, religious toleration was being established, and the present kingdom was in process of formation under Victor Emmanuel. It is a most entertaining narrative of a personal journey, sparkling with humor and enriched with the practical observations of an original and able mind, and pains have not been spared to attest the correctness of his statements by references to official documents.

In the meantime Mr. Arthur had travelled backward and forward through England, speaking on the missionary platform, and had come before the public as one of the lecturers to the Young Men's Christian Association in Exeter Hall. In 1866, in the forty-seventh year of his age, Mr. Arthur was raised by his brethren in the Church to of the British Wesleyan Conference. So young a man had never, except once, occupied the presidential chair, and that one case had happened long previously, when the position was very different from what it had become at the time we write of.

He was subsequently placed at the head of the Methodist College established in Belfast, where another important field of usefulness was opened up to him. But before entering on his duties there he visited Oxford and Cambridge, and made himself acquainted with the best methods of collegiate instruction, and he carried to his work the comprehensive views which had characterized him in other spheres. He took a prominent part in connection with the general question of Irish education, as a staunch upholder of the national system against the Romish Church.

During that period another severe trial overtook him in an affection of the throat, which almost entirely deprived him of the power of speech for about two years. He has never altogether recovered the distinctness of utterance which used to make his not very strong voice intelligibly audible in large audience-rooms; and to this day his organs of speech are liable to be affected by dampness in the atmosphere.

After three years spent in Belfast, Mr. Arthur went back to England, and turned his special attention to a subject which had long interested him. From his personal observations of Roman Catholicism, both in Italy and in other countries, he had a clearer perception than most Englishmen of the dangerous tendency of its religious and political designs, and he tried to set that before his countrymen, first in a little book called "The Modern Jove," a short collection and translation of some Pius IX.'s speeches, and afterward (1877) in a rge work of two volumes entitlee, "The Pope, e Kings, and the People." That is "a history the movment to make the Pope Governor of the Vorld by a universal reconstruction of society." was the work of years of personal inquiry in aly and Germany, and of close examination into ficial Papal records and documents, many of nich had never been made public before.

An extract from the preface will show the design the book. Speaking of the aims of those now power in the Roman Catholic Church, Mr. rthur says: "If the authors of the movement are t deceived, the generations that will come up :er I am no more will witness a struggle on the dest scale and of very long duration, during nich will disappear all that is known to us as odern liberties, all that to Rome is known as the odern State, and at the close of which the eccle-:stical power will stand alone, presiding over the stinies of a reconstituted world. Not at all be-ving in the possibility of this issue, I do not dis-lieve in the possibility of the struggle. To avert y such repetition of past horrors, to turn the war o a war of thought, a war with the sword of the iter and of the orator, instead of that of the uave and of the dragoon, is an object in attempt-; to serve which, however humbly, a good man ght be content to die."

In the same preface Mr. Arthur comments with : confidence of exact information upon the un-:essary hesitancy with which modern English iters allude to the present claims and professions the ese he asserts to be what they have been from beginning; so that, however its methods have n modified in accordance with the changed ıditions of society, its character and exalted pre-sions are not admitted to have undergone any dification. Speaking of the appearance of Mr. ıdstone's famous essay on the Vatican Decrees, . Arthur says: "The controversy which fol-ed brought proof that it was even more neces-y than I had supposed to beware of assuming t phrases, modes of conception, and projects l understood in Italy or Germany were at all lerstood here. . . . Accredited terms and ases were treated as inventions; by some as entions of genius, by others of animosity. It s often more than hinted that principles and igns habitually proclaimed at the Vatican were ribed to priests only by opponents. Not un-quently a gentleman would seem to think it more erous to attribute his Protestant ideas to Ultra-ntanes than to take it for granted that they pre-ed their own. It was incredible how political stions pregnant with future controversies, per-is with future wars, were evaded as theology!"

t will be seen from these remarks and extracts t Mr. Arthur is a laborious writer. His books not written off at a few sittings with little ıble and less thought, but are the result of ent investigation and mature study. Hence h of them is a unique contribution to the liter-e of the subject of which it treats. He writes vly, composing with attention as he proceeds, subjects his manuscript, but not his proof-ets, to careful revision. Unlike the most suc-ıful scholars and public men, he devotes the rs of the night rather than of the early morning ork, and bears with difficulty the interruptions ch nearly all busy men are compelled to submit

So many persons in America as well as in gland have listened with unflagging interest to sermons and addresses, that the fact of his de-ing his most elaborate speeches without notes ell known. But our readers are not as well re that even in preparing his discourses he s little or no assistance from the pen. His d is so clear and his memory so methodical, the steps of his argument and the illustrations s to use dispose themselves in order as he pro-ls with his thinking; while his native gift of y utterance enables him to put his thoughts unstudied words at will.

he divine truth that "it is more blessed to give to receive" (Acts 20:35), is part of Mr. ur's personal religion and of his Gospel mes-sage. He has written and spoken much to correct the world's greed of money, and to inspire people with a sense of the obligation of open-handed be-nevolence, and a belief in the joy that comes from it. As an example of the way he can enforce a principle and stimulate a purpose, we quote the following passage from "The Successful Mer-chant": "A man with a heart restlessly desiring to do good may go on without fixing a proportion, and yet certainly bestow a fit amount of his gains; but they are few who would not be astounded at the small proportion their givings bear to their in-come if they tested them for a year. Most men need, for their own sake, to fix a minimum, and that minimum should not be less than

ONE-TENTH.

"I have known many who early in life have adopted this principle; and where it has been steadily maintained a blessing seems ever to follow it. We are not so addicted to doing good that it comes upon us by accident; and as God bountifully gives, we should deliberately resolve that we will honor God with our substance and with the first fruits of our increase (Prov. 3:9). The work of charity to men's souls and bodies, of gratitude for God's bounty, is too sacred to be left to chance and impulse: regular and calculated reserves should be made for such outlay if we would not live to our-selves but to Him who died for us and rose again."

Since Mr. Arthur's return from Belfast, his con-ference relation has been that of Honorary Secre-tary to the Missionary Society. Within the last few years he has visited the evangelical missions in Italy as co-delegate with the Hon. H. V. Bligh and Dr. Donald Fraser from the Evangelical Alliance. Last year he paid his second visit to America, with the Rev. Frederick McDonald, D.D., as fraternal delegate from the British Conference to the Gen-eral Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church which met at Cincinnati in the month of May. He travelled a good deal in the States, and preached in many pulpits. Since his return to Europe he has been engaged in evangelistic work among the lower classes in France, with Mr. M'All and Mr. Gibson in Paris, Mons. Saillens in Marseilles, and other missionaries in Cannes and other places. It is well to give glory to God that with such fields white to the harvest, He has such laborers to send into them.

"WHAT! STILL AT IT?"

TREMBLING hands, a tight, sallow skin, some patches of dirt, sleepy looks, and a general inde-scribable something, prompted the exclamation, "What! still at it?"

And it was quite understood.

Is it necessary to impart the information that Job Sweetman had been out on the spree, and that this was the next morning?

Job was feeling seedy, and was showing it, although he had washed his face, and combed his hair, and endeavored to obliterate all traces of last night's dissipation.

Job was now off for a hair of the dog that bit him.

I was glad to meet him at such a favorable time, glad of the opportunity to say, "What! still at it?"

I don't think Job was so glad, to judge by the drooping head, and the averted look.

"What! still at it," after such a serious illness but a short while since? The doctor half ques-tioned whether you would ever get about again then, and you yourself had doubts upon the sub-ject. And a great deal, if not all, of this was traceable to the drink, you remember. And yet you are at it again? Another attack of the same kind would be no laughing matter, the doctor said. Surely it is not wise, surely it is madness, to run such a tremendous risk. What! in the face of death, still at it?

"What! still at it," with your master's warn-ing still ringing in your ears? "Job," he said, "keep sober, and I'll keep you; be a drunkard, and you'll go. So I warn you." And he meant it. Lose this place, and who will take you? Em-ployers look at the character pretty closely, you know. You cannot afford to be turned off, Job Sweetman. And yet, in the face of this, you are at it again? No place, no money. No money, no bread. Think of that a bit.

"What! still at it," and the rent not paid? You have a hard landlord, you say? Why is he hard? Because he wants the money you're spend-ing in the public-house? Because he thinks he has more right to it than the publican? No, it's not the landlord who is hard. It's you who are hard upon the landlord. And if you are turned out into the street, and your furniture seized, it is really because you choose to be hard upon your-self. Keep your angry words and black looks for yourself, friend Job. A little thought will not be amiss now, if you will take the trouble to think. It's a mistake, surely, to be so free with your money and the rent not paid?

"What! still at it," in spite of the confession you made? You said that sprees were things which promised more than they gave and turned out to be more bitter than sweet. You said, that you had been a fool to think that the drink could give any comfort. And you said, too, that you were never so wretched and low and miserable, as in the midst of a drinking bout. I haven't for-gotten your own words, Job. And I don't want you to forget them, either. And I feel sure that if you would speak the truth this morning, your con-fession would be exactly the same. Is it any wonder that, remembering so vividly your own confession, I should ask with amazement, "What! still at it?"

"What! still at it," after the promise you made? A promise is a solemn thing, and you made it solemnly too. Perhaps you don't choose to remember the time and the place when you made the promise. Let me recall it to you. A little child's coffin. A weeping mother. A sob-bing father. Three kneeling ones, kneeling in prayer. A burst of weeping from the father. Hands uplifted to heaven as the conscience-stricken man pledged his word, never, never to touch the accursed drink again. That man was Job Sweet-man. Oh, man and father! how can you, after this promise so solemnly uttered, be still at it?

"What! still at it," in spite of the examples that surround you? And very awful ones some of them. There's one man you know well, a beg-gar on the face of the earth. There's another who worked at the same bench, a member of the poorhouse. There's a third, serving his sentence in a convict prison. But why enumerate them, when there are so many? These examples ought to have some weight with you. They speak far more powerfully than any sermon of mine can do. O Job! listen to their message. Hear them all with one piercing voice, crying "Beware! Be-ware!" Surely with all these examples to warn you, you are not "still at it?"

"What! still at it," after all your losses! I wonder how many days' work you have lost since you began to cultivate sprees, and to take so en-thusiastically to the glass. You have lost quite a little fortune, I suspect. And then it cuts two ways. You are not only losing money from lost time, but you are losing money in the lost time on the drink. How I should like to get you to sit down and honestly count up your losses. You can't forget some of them. Job Sweetman, when you remember your lost money, your lost time, your lost peace, your lost friends, and your lost rep-utation, I am amazed that you should be "still at it."

And, then, there is this awfully solemn thought that I pray God you may lay to heart before you go any further. What if the Judge were to sum-mon you while you are "still at it?" What if you were to be cut off in the midst of your sins, and especially in this sin of drunkenness? I tremble for you, lest death should lay his hand upon you, and your doom be fixed forever.

But ah! blessed thought, while you have been "still at it," the precious Saviour Jesus has been still loving, still pleading, still beckoning, still offering you pardon, and life, and peace. Will you accept the offer? Then you shall find in Him power to overcome the old evil habit which so en-slaves you, and it shall never be said of Job Sweet-man again, "What! still at it?"

"Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

THE TEN PLAGUES OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.

THE PLAGUE OF DRUNKENNESS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Morning, November 27, 1881.*

"And there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt."—EXODUS 11 : 6.

The Worst of all the Plagues—The Destroying Angel of To-day—Four Fiends—The Fiend of the Vineyard—The Blood of Broken Hearts—The Fiend of the Grain-field—Laughter by the Whiskey Barrel—The Fiend of the Dairy—The Design of Milk Punch—The Fiend of Music—A Plague of Suffering to the Inebriate—I. He Loses His Good Name—II. His Self-Respect—The Inebriate a Slave—Men who Could Not Stop—III. Loss of Usefulness—IV. Loss of Health—Scene in an Inebriate Ward of an Hospital—V. Loss of Home—VI. Loss of the Soul—The Thirst of Hell—Are You Astray?—A Reformed Inebriate's Testimony—The Dead March of Souls.

THIS was the worst of the ten plagues. The destroying angel at midnight flapped his wing over the land, and there was one dead in each house. Lamentation and mourning and woe through all Egypt. That destroying angel has fled the earth, but a far worse has come. He sweeps through these cities. It is of strong drink. Far worse devastation wrought by this second than by the first. The calamity in America worse than the calamity in Egypt. Thousands of the slain, millions of the slain. No arithmetic can calculate their number.

I am glad to see that the decorations of Thanksgiving Day have been retained until this hour, but as last Thursday we used them as symbols of the goodness and the kindness of God to the American people, to-day, I shall use them for a different purpose. Who could think that the ripe clusters of the vineyard and the golden sheaves of the harvest field could be used for the world's damage and the world's death?

Once upon a time,

met in the lost world. They resolved that the people of our earth were too happy, and these four infernals came forth to our earth on embassy of mischief. The one fiend said: "I'll take charge of the vineyards." Another said, "I'll take charge of the grain fields." Another said, "I'll take charge of the dairy." Another said, "I'll take charge of the music." The four fiends met in the great Sahara Desert, with skeleton fingers clutched each other in handshake of fidelity, kissed each other good-bye with lip of blue flame and parted on their mission.

The fiend of the vineyard came in one bright morning amid the grapes and sat down on a root of twisted grapevine in sheer discouragement. The fiend knew not how to damage the vineyard, or, through it, how to damage the world. The grapes were so ripe and beautiful and luscious. They bewitched the air with their sweetness. There seemed to be so much health in every bunch; and while the fiend sat there in utter indignation and disappointment, he clutched a cluster and squeezed it in perfect spite, and lo! his hand was red with the blood of the vineyard, and the fiend said: "That reminds me of the blood of broken hearts; I'll strip the vineyard and I'll squeeze out all the juice of the grapes, and I'll allow the juices of the grapes to stand until they rot, and I'll call the process fermentation." And there was a great vat prepared, and people came with their cups and their pitchers, and they dipped up the blood of the grapes, and they drank and drank and went away drinking, and they drank until they fell in long lines of death, so that when the fiend of the vineyard wanted to return to his home in the pit, he stepped from carcass to carcass and walked down amid a great causeway of the dead.

Then the second fiend came into the grain field. He waded chin-deep amid the barley and the rye. He heard all the grain talking about bread, and prosperous husbandry, and thrifty homes. He thrust his long arms into the grain field and he pulled up the grain and he threw it into the water and and he made beneath it great fires—fires lighted with a spark from his own heart—and there was a grinding, and a mashing, and a stench, and the people came with their bottles and they dipped up the fiery liquid, and they drank, and they blasphemed, and they staggered, and they fought, and they rioted, and they murdered, and the fiend of the pit, the fiend of the grain field, was so pleased with their behavior that he changed his residence from the pit to a whiskey barrel, and there he sat by the door of the bunghole laughing in high merriment at the thought that out of anything so harmless as the grain of the field he might turn this world into a seeming pandemonium.

The fiend of the dairy saw the cows coming home from the pasture-field, full-uddered, and as the maid milked he said: "I'll soon spoil all that mess; I'll add to it brandy, sugar, and nutmeg, and I'll stir it into a milk punch, and children will drink it, and some of the temperance people will drink it, and if I can do them no more harm, I'll give them a headache, and then I'll hand them over to the more vigorous fiends of the Satanic delegation." And then the fiend of the dairy leaped upon the shelf and danced until the long row of shining milkpans almost quaked.

The fiend of the music entered a grogshop, and there were but few customers. Finding few customers he swept the circuit of the city, and he gathered up the musical instruments, and after nightfall he marshalled a band, and the trombones blew, and the cymbals clapped, and the drums beat, and the bugles called, and the people crowded in, and they swung around in merry dance, each one with a wine-glass in his hand; and the dance became wilder and stronger and rougher until the room shook, and the glasses cracked, and the floor broke, and the crowd dropped into hell.

Then the four fiends—the fiend of the vineyard, and of the grain field, and of the dairy, and of the music hall—went back to their home, and they held high carnival because their work had been so well done; and Satan rose from his throne and announced that there was no danger of the earth's redemption so long as these four fiends could pay such tax to the diabolic. And then all the demons, and all the sprites, and all the fiends filled their glasses and clicked them, and cried: "Let us drink—drink to the everlasting prosperity of the liquor traffic. Here's to woe, and darkness, and murder, and death. Drink! Drink!"

But whether by allegory or by appalling statistic this subject is presented, you know as well as I that it is impossible to exaggerate the evils of strong drink. A plague! A plague! I shall show you that it is a plague of suffering to the inebriate.

I. In the first place, it is a plague of suffering to the inebriate because it is to him a LOSS OF GOOD NAME.

God has so arranged it that no man loses his reputation except by his own act. The world may assault a man, and all the powers of darkness may assault him—they cannot capture him so long as his heart is pure and his life is pure. All the powers of earth and hell cannot take that Gibraltar. If a man is right, all the bombardment of the world for five, ten, twenty, forty years will only strengthen him in his position. So that all you have to do is to keep yourself right. Never mind the world. Let it say what it will. It can do you no damage. But as soon as it is whispered "he drinks," and it can be proved, he begins to go down.

What clerk can get a position with such a reputation? What store wants him? What Church of God wants him for a member? What dying man wants him for an executor? "He drinks!" I stand before hundreds of young men—and I say it not in flattery—splendid young men who have their reputation as their only capital. Your father gave you a good education, or as good an education as he could afford to give you. He started you in city life. He could furnish you no means, but he has surrounded you with Christian influences and a good memory of the past. Now, young man, under God you are with your own right arm to achieve your fortune, and as your reputation is your only capital, do not bring up it suspicion by going in and out of liquor establiments, or by an odor of your breath, or by glare of your eye, or by any unnatural flush your cheeks. You lose your reputation and lose your capital.

The subject comes over me this morning, the waves of the Atlantic for power. O! whe see the influences abroad in Brooklyn and N York to destroy young men, I hardly know w to say. For the young men themselves all sy pathy have I, and all compassion. For those w deal out the deadly stuff, all pity that they sho bring upon themselves the condemnation of g society and the retributions of God. But for liquor establishments themselves, for the rum-s ing restaurants, may God Almighty consume th with the brightness of His coming.

LOSS OF SELF-RESPECT.

II. The inebriate suffers also the plague in fact that he loses also his self-respect, and wh you destroy a man's self-respect there is not mu left of him. Just as soon as a man finds he i slave, he loses his self-respect. Then a man do things he would not do otherwise, he will things he would not say otherwise. He has l his self-respect.

The fact is that man cannot stop, or he wo stop now. He is bound hand and foot by Philistines, and they have shorn his locks and his eyes out, and made him grind in the mill o great horror. After he is three-fourths gone this slavery, the first thing he will be anxious impress you with is that he can stop at any ti he wants to. His family become alarmed in reg to him, and they say: "Now do stop this; afte while, it will get the mastery of you." "O! n he says, "I can stop at any time; I can stop no I can stop to-morrow; I can stop at any tim His most confidential friends say: "Why, afraid you are losing your balance with that ha you are going a little further than you can aff to go; you had better stop." "O! no," he sa "I can stop at any time; I can stop now." goes on further and further.

He cannot stop. I will prove it. He loves h self, and he knows nevertheless that strong dr is depleting him in body, mind, and soul. knows he is going down, that he has less self-c trol, less equipoise of temper than he used Why does he not stop? Because he cannot st I will prove it by going still further. He loves wife and children. He sees that his habits bringing disgrace upon his home. The probab ties are they will ruin his wife and disgrace children. He sees all this, and he loves th Why does he not stop? He cannot stop.

I had a very dear friend, generous to a fa He had given thousands and tens of thousand dollars to Bible societies, tract societies, missi ary societies, asylums for the poor, the halt, lame, the blind, the imbecile. I do not believe twenty years anybody asked him for a dollar or dollars, or a hundred dollars for charity but gave it. I never heard of anybody asking him help, but he gave it. But he was under the po of strong drink, and he went on down, do down. His family implored him, saying: "" are going too far in that habit; you had be stop." He replied: "I can stop any time; I my own master; I can stop." He went on do down. His friends advised and cautioned h He said: "Don't be afraid of me; I am my c master; I can stop now; I know what I am ing." He went on down until he had the delir tremens. On down until he had the delir tremens twice. After the second time the doc said: "If you ever have an attack like this ag you will die; you had better stop." He said: can stop any time; I can stop now." He w on down. He is dead. What slew him? Ru Rum! Among the last things he said was t he could stop any time. He could not stop. could not stop.

O! my young friends in this congregation want to tell you that there is a point in inebria beyond which if a man go he cannot stop. sometimes a man will be more frank than that. victim of strong drink said to a reformer: "I ossible for me to stop ; I realize it. But if you ld tell me I couldn't have a drink until to- row night unless I had all my fingers cut off, I ld say, ' bring the hatchet and cut them off.' " ul a very dear friend in Philadelphia whose new came to him and was talking about his ble and confessed it. He confessed he could stop. My friend said, " You must stop." He " I can't stop. If there stood a cannon, and as loaded, and there was a glass of wine on mouth of the cannon, and I knew you would it off if I approached, I would start to get that s of wine. I must have it. I can't get rid of habit. I can't get away from it." O ! it is ul for a man to wake up and feel that he is a ive. I hear him soliloquizing, saying : " I ht have stopped three months ago, but I can't now. Dead but not buried. I am a walking se. I am an apparition of what I once was. n a caged immortal and my soul beats against wires of my cage on this side and beats against wires of my cage on the other side, until there lood on the wires, and blood on the soul, but I t get out. Destroyed without remedy !"

I. Again : the man suffers from the o you know some of the men who have fallen the ditch were once in the front rank in rches and in the front rank in reformatory insti- ons? Do you know they once knelt at the ily altar, and once carried the chalice of the communion on sacramental days? Do you w they once stood in the pulpit and preached Gospel of the Son of God.

We will not forget the scene witnessed four or years ago in this church when a man rose in midst of the audience, stepped into the aisle, walked up and down. Everybody saw that was intoxicated. The ushers led him out, and poor wife took his hat and overcoat and fol- ed him to the door. Who was he? He had e been a mighty minister of the Gospel of Jesus ist in a sister denomination, had often preached his very city. What slew him? Strong drink. ! what must be the feeling of a man who has troyed his capacity for usefulness? Do not be ry with that man. Do not lose your patience n him. Do not wonder if he says strange things gets irritated easily in the family He has the enees, and the Andes, and the Alps, and the alayas on him. Do not try to persuade him there is no future punishment. Do not go any argument to prove to him that there is no He knows there is. He is there now !

V. But he suffers also in the

older people in this audience can remember tor Sewell going through this country electrify- great audiences by demonstrating to them the ct of strong drink upon the human stomach. I told he had eight or ten diagrams which he sented to the people, showing the different ges in the progress of the disease, and I am told s of thousands of people turned back from that rous sketch and swore eternal abstinence from intoxicants. God only knows what the drunk- suffers. Pain files on every nerve, and travels ry muscle, and gnaws on every bone, and stings n every poison, and pulls with every torture. at reptiles crawl over his shivering limbs. at spectres stand by his midnight pillows ! at groans tear the air ! Talk of the rack, talk the funeral pyre, talk of the Juggernaut—he ers them all at once.

ee the attendants stand back from that ward in hospital where the inebriates are dying. They not stand it. The keepers come through it and : " Hush up, now, stop making this noise. still ! You are disturbing all the other patients. ep still now !" Then the keepers pass on, and r they get past then the poor creatures wring ir hands and say : " O ! God. Help, help ! e me rum, give me rum ! O ! God. Help ! e the devils off of me. O ! God. O ! God." d they shriek, and they blaspheme, and they for help, and then they ask the keepers to slay m, saying : " Stab me, strangle me, smother O ! God. Help, help ! Rum ! Give me . O ! God. Help !" They tear out their hair by the handful, and they bite their nails into the quick. " O ! God," they say, " help ! O ! God, help, help, help !" This is no fancy picture. It is transpiring in a hospital at this moment. It went on last night while you slept ; and more than that, that is the death some of you will die unless you stop ! I see it coming. God help you to stop before you go so far that you cannot stop.

V. But it plagues a man also in the LOSS OF HOME.

I do not care how much he loves his wife and children, if this habit gets the mastery over him—this habit of strong drink—he will do the most outrageous things. If need be, in order to get strong drink he would sell them all into everlasting captivity. There are hundreds and thousands of homes in New York and Brooklyn that have been utterly blasted of it. I am speaking of no abstraction. Is there anything so disastrous to a man for this life and for the life to come? Do you tell me that a man can be happy when he knows he is breaking his wife's heart and clothing his children with rags? There are little children in the streets to-day, barefooted, unkempt, uncombed, want written on every patch of their faded dress, and on every wrinkle of their prematurely old countenance, who would have been in the house of God this morning as well clad as you had it not been that strong drink drove their parents down into penury and then down into the grave. O ! rum, rum, thou despoiler of homes, thou foe of God, thou recruiting officer of the pit, I hate thee, I hate thee !

But my subject takes a deeper tone when it tells you that the inebriate suffers the LOSS OF THE SOUL.

The Bible intimates that if we go into the future world unforgiven the appetites and passions which were regnant here will torment us there. I suppose when the inebriate wakes up in the lost world, there will be an infinite thirst clawing upon him. In this world he could get strong drink. However poor he was in this world, he could beg or he could steal five cents to get a drink that would for a little while slake his thirst ; but in eternity where will the rum come from? Dives wanted one drop of water, but could not get it. Where will the inebriate get the draught he so much requires, so much demands. No one to brew it. No one to mix it. No one to pour it. No one to fetch it. Millions of worlds now for the dregs that were thrown on the sawdusted floor of the restaurant. Millions of worlds now for the rind flung out from the punch-bowl of an earthly banquet. Dives called for water. The inebriate calls for rum.

If a fiend from the lost world should come up on a mission to a grog shop, and having finished the mission in the grog shop, should come back, taking on the tip of his wing one drop of alcoholic beverage, what excitement it would make all through the world of the lost ; and if that one drop of alcoholic beverage should drop from the wing of the fiend upon the tongue of the inebriate, how he would spring up and cry : " That's it ; that's it ! Rum ! Rum ! That's it !" And all the caverns of the lost would echo with the cry, " Give it to me. Rum ! Rum !" Ah ! my friends, the inebriate's sorrow in the next world will not be the absence of God, or holiness, or light ; it will be the absence of rum. " Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it moveth itself aright in the cup ; for at the last it biteth like a serpent, and it stingeth like an adder."

When I see this plague in the land, and when I see this destroying angel sweeping across our great cities, I am sometimes indignant, and sometimes humiliated. When a man asks me : " What are you in favor of for the subjugation of this evil?" I answer, " I am ready for anything that is reasonable." You ask me " Are you in favor of Sons of Temperance?" Yes, " Are you in favor of Good Samaritans?" Yes. " Are you in favor of Good Templars?" Yes. " Are you in favor of a prohibitory law?" Yes. " Are you in favor of the pledge?" Yes. Combine all the influences, O Christian reformers and philanthropists. Combine them all for the extirpation of this evil.

Thirty women in one of the Western States banded together, and with an especial ordination h, as v" tn ish character throughout. The marriage which it celebrates is not that of the " Lamb" of God (Revelation 19 : 7-9), but that of the Messiah of Israel, concerning which union it is written by the women-hosts : " Thy maker is thine husband." God should go forth feeling the responsibility of their work and discharging their mission, they could in this city shut up all the grog shops. Put an end to this mighty vice of strong drink and redeem our beloved city.

But I must not dwell on generalities ; I must come to specifics. Are you astray? If there is any sermon I dislike it is a sermon on generalities. I want personalities.

ARE YOU ASTRAY?

Have you gone so far you think you cannot get back? Did I say a few moments ago that a man might go to a point in inebriation where he could not stop? Yes, I said it, and I reiterate it ; but I want you also to understand that while the man himself, of his own strength, cannot stop, God can stop any man. You have only to lay hold of the strong arm of the Lord God Almighty. He can stop you. You cannot.

A few summers ago I went over to New York one Sabbath evening—our church not yet being open for the autumnal services—I went into a room in the Fourth Ward, New York, where a religious service was being held for reformed drunkards, and I heard a revelation that night that I had never heard before—fifteen or twenty men standing up and giving testimony such as I had never heard given. They not only testified that their hearts had been changed by the grace of God, but that the grace of God had extinguished their thirst. They went on to say that they had reformed at different times before, but immediately fallen, because they were doing the whole work in their own strength : " But as soon as we gave our hearts to God," they said, " and the love of the Lord Jesus Christ has come into our soul, the thirst has all gone. We have no more disposition for strong drink."

It was a new revelation to me, and I have proclaimed it again and again in the hearing of those who have far gone astray ; and I stand here to-day to tell you that the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ can not only save your soul, but save your body. I look off to-day upon the desolation. Some of you are so far on in this habit, although there may be no outward indications of it—you never have staggered along the street—the vast majority of people do not know that you stimulate ; but God knows, and you know ; and by human calculations there is not one chance out of five thousand that you will ever be stopped.

BEWARE !

There are some of you to whom I minister Sabbath by Sabbath, and who are my warm personal friends, to whom I must say that unless you quit this evil habit, within ten years, as to your body you will lie down in a drunkard's grave, and as to your immortal soul, you will lie down in a drunkard's hell ! It is a hard thing to say, but it is true, and I utter the warning lest I have your blood upon my soul. Beware ! As to-day you open the door of your wine closet, let the decanter flash that word upon your soul, " Beware !" As you pour out the beverage let the foam at the top spell out the word, " Beware !" In the great day of God's judgment, when a hundred million drunkards shall come up to get their doom, I want you to testify that this day in love of your soul and in fear of God, I gave you warning in regard to that influence which has already been felt in your home, blowing out some of its lights—premonition of the blackness of darkness forever.

O ! if you could only this morning hear Intemperance with drunkards' bones drumming on the top of the wine cask the dead march of the immortal souls, you would go home this morning and kneel down and pray God that rather than your children should ever become the victims of this evil habit, you might carry them out to Greenwood and put them down in the last slumber, waiting for the flowers of spring to come over the grave—sweet prophecies of the resurrection. God hath a balm for such a wound, but what flower of comfort ever grew on the blasted heath of a drunkard's sepulchre?

THE TEN PLAGUES OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.

THE PLAGUE OF DRUNKENNESS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Dr. Gilbart Gives Sylph a Welcome—Her Account of Her Visit to the Mayor—She Wants to be Imprisoned—Dr. Gilbart Drawn to the Light—Hugh Visits the Jail—The Doctor's Illness.

SYLPH'S sudden arrival at the jail produced as sudden a change in Doctor Gilbart. He saw at once how greatly he had wronged her. His strong revulsion of thought and feeling was more than he could bear. Unable to maintain his habitual self-control he folded his arms fondly around his adopted daughter; and weeping aloud, mingled his tears with hers.

Sylph gently moved herself toward the little pallet in the cell, drawing Doctor Gilbart in the same direction; and upon it, side by side, as father and daughter, they took their seat.

"Oh, this is a dreadful place, father," said Sylph, as she glanced round the pitchy walls of the dungeon; "what can be the reason of such cruelty toward you? The Mayor, I believe, entered into some explanation, but I did not understand him."

"Oh, have you been to him, Sylph?" "Yes," was the reply, and she gave Doctor Gilbart a brief account of the reason and result of her visit to the Mayor's office.

"Upon my word, Sylph," said the Doctor, having largely recovered his equanimity, "you are a dear girl, with a brave, loving heart. Why, it was heroic of you to face that man; and not only have you done this, but you have conquered him; and, more wonderful than all, conquered him for me, for I believe there is not one man in Chester with a greater animus against me. I am proud of you, Sylph; but tell me what he said about me, I feel certain he was pretty profuse in his observations, for he had quite a con amore subject, and has a voluble tongue."

"I cannot," replied Sylph; "as I have told you, I did not pay much heed either to his meaning or his words, I only plied him with most earnest entreaty. So I have to repeat my question, and learn from you the cause of this horrible imprisonment. What does it mean?"

"Well, I am not sure that I can explain the matter to you," he said, "for my accusers as yet have not met me face to face. But I believe it is because of some words that fell from me a day or two ago at a public meeting in favor of the 'rights of man,' if you have ever heard that phrase; and your exemplary Christian magnates in the city," he added, sarcastically, "do not believe in such things, only in the rights of those, who, through extortion and unjust privilege, can, like Dives in the parable, clothe themselves in gold and purple, and fare sumptuously every day."

"Ah! do not speak in that way, father," cried Sylph. "At all events, do not call these men Christians. Jesus Christ, believe me, father, is the friend of man, and is the foe of all tyranny and wrong. When on earth He identified Himself with the poor and needy, and denounced injustice and oppression. He even gave His life in the cause of freedom; and is still, in the highest sense, the champion of human rights. Did you know Him, father," said Sylph, throwing a deep pathos into her words, "from the very principles you profess, I know you would love and honor Him."

"Perhaps so," said Doctor Gilbart, but in such a listless way, as gave Sylph to see that it was spoken, not from a change of conviction, but rather to end the subject, by raising no controversy upon it.

"This is a dreadful place," again exclaimed Sylph. "Oh, how can you endure to live in it—it will kill you?" Then after a little she added, "Would they let me, do you think, take your place here, father, and leave you free to return home. You know you are a great deal older than I am," she urged, "and therefore I could better bear to stay here."

Another glance round the living tomb showed her the dreadful self-sacrifice such an act of substitution would be; but she did not shrink from it, nor think to retract her words. "Yes, father, I'll willingly stay here in your stead, if only they will let me. I wonder," she asked herself half aloud, "what would be the best way to get the consent of the city officials?"

Dr. Gilbart was conscious of a choking sensation in his throat. He knew the impracticability of Sylph's proposal, but he was touched in the depths of his heart by her simple-minded and self-forgetting love.

"God bless you!" he said. It was the first time for years that he had used the sacred name, but he seemed to feel instinctively, that no other phrase would express the depth and warmth of his emotion. A significant fact, if he had but pondered it. "God bless you, darling Sylph!" he repeated. "Forbid it that I should ever consent to such a method of escape from this cell, as that. No, darling; I never could stoop to it. However, I shall not have opportunity given me of proving this, dear child, for your proposal is wholly out of the question. No one can take my place here, Sylph. In my own person I must bear this misery. Such is English law.

"Thank heaven such is not God's law, nor Jesus Christ's law," exclaimed Sylph, encouraged by Doctor Gilbart's late unwonted mention of the Divine name; which she noted with a thrill of pleasure, and which she supposed to mean more than it really did. "Such, thank Heaven, is not God's law, nor Christ's law, father."

Doctor Gilbart made no remark. He was not just now disposed to agree with Sylph, but neither was he in a mood to vex Sylph by controverting her opinions. He therefore deemed it advisable to say nothing, and left her to renew the conversation at her will.

"If they will not let me take your place here," she said, "oh, do let me know what I can do for you? Let me tell them that you regret what you have said, and ask them to release you?" and then, remembering her success with the Mayor, she added, "I do believe I could persuade them."

"No, dear Sylph," he said, "I cannot do that; I have said nothing that I do not believe is true, and, therefore, can retract nothing; but there is a thing you can do for me, Sylph. This is a bare and comfortless cell, as you say, unfit for a human being; return home, then, and send Hugh here with a few requisites, such as you will judge necessary."

Sylph promptly consented to this suggestion. Kissing and lovingly parting from Doctor Gilbart, she hastened to the house in the Rows to carry out his request.

Hugh's horror, as, laden with some household wares, he was led down, and still lower down, the stone steps within the castle walls, and into his master's gloomy cell, is indescribable. Every few steps in his descent from the upper air, he exclaimed in his usual manner, "Oh, the poor master! Oh, the poor master! It's down to his grave! It's down, down, to his very grave that I'm goin'." And when at last he reached the narrow and fœtid dungeon, and could barely see Doctor Gilbart in the struggling light, he was ready to die with blank amazement and terror.

Doctor Gilbart encouraged him with his voice, and helped to relieve him of his burden.

"Thank you for coming to me and so quickly, Hugh," he said. "This is a wretched place, my poor friend, but what you have brought me will soon improve it. See, Hugh, already it looks better; doesn't it?" he asked, as he flung a rug on the floor, and a good blanket and coverlet on the pallet.

Hugh was heartily glad when his task of arranging things was over. Touching his hat, he said, "May I go now, sir?" and upon receiving consent, with a prompt "Good evening, sir," said, however, in a hopeless and dubious tone, he left the gloom of the underground jail, and hurried up, with glad steps, to the free air and light of heaven.

"Oh, Miss Sylph! oh, Miss Sylph!" he cried, when he arrived home, "they've put the poor Doctor, miss—down in his grave, and before he's dead. And as for myself, why, I thought I'd never get back to tell you of it. I've been down, down, and down, I do believe, nigh hand to th middle o' the earth; and the awful smell and th damp and the darkness has a'most blinded an choked me."

Sylph for several days repeated her visits to thi unwholesome abode. And her coming was, eac time, as will be supposed, an unspeakable relief t the lonely captive—lonely because, as Milton sing of worldly friends—

"————————in properous days
They swarm, but in adverse withdraw their heads
Not to be found though sought."

Doctor Gilbart was forced to engage her in con versation; and to Sylph's great delight, seemed more and more to turn, of his own accord, to subjects bearing upon her religious views and experiences.

It has been said by an English writer that few men are Atheists in the times of extreme danger or trouble. That at such a period the human being instinctively appeals to a Power behind the visible creation and the play of material forces, for sympathy and help. That in the felt need of supernatural aid all previous reasoning against the supernatural falls to pieces and proves itself a reductio ad absurdum. And the truth of this was being very strikingly evidenced to Sylph in the case of Dr. Gilbart.

The cruel injustice which he was called to endure showed him that without a Divine ruler the universe itself would be a still greater injustice—would be an everlasting tyranny and wrong; and such a universe his whole mental and moral nature convinced him was unthinkable.

Not in David's words, but in David's thoughts, he said within himself, "The selfish and unprincipled are 'in power,' 'spreading themselves like a green bay tree.' They prosper in the world and increase in riches, while men in all respects their moral superiors are strangely given to spend their days in abject wretchedness and contempt." And under this reflection, as with a gleam of sunshine across the darkness of his soul, belief in a world to come, where there are no such inconsistencies, with eternal righteousness, came upon Doctor Gilbart with the light of demonstration.

The logic of circumstance, by which God in His Providence led this man to the acknowledgment of Himself and of his own immortality was certainly a severe one; for unjust accusation, the desertion of friends, and a narrow and noisome dungeon were the process of proof; but his was a special case, and we may be certain that a milder discipline and course of argument would have been in vain.

Strange and painful circumstance was Doctor Gilbart's teacher of Divine truth thus far, but Sylph was his guide into the still fairer light of the Christian faith.

"The arms of love that compass me,
Would all mankind embrace,"

was her conviction; and often would she repeat and echo these words to her adopted father, speaking of her own happy experience, and urge him to the proof.

Long did Doctor Gilbart doubt and hesitate, his soul vibrating as on the verge of fate; long until he stooped to be as "a little child," and came to trust himself as such in Christ's name to his Father's arms.

* * * * * *

Sylph hoped for great things in Chester, as the result of Doctor Gilbart's return to Divine faith and hope. His reputation as a thinker and scholar, she felt, would be a mighty argument for the truth she so much loved; but such was not to be. The course of demonstration appointed by Heaven to bring him from a chilling scepticism to renewed conviction, was to close in death.

Upon entering his cell one morning she was grieved to find him ill. He had slept little the previous night, and was restless and feverish. Doctor Gilbart made light of his ailment—but this was only to save Sylph from alarm—for he strongly suspected that his incipient malady was the deadly jail fever, the scourge of the unwholesome prisons of that day. As not quite certain of this, however, he would not make known his fears to Sylph until he was sure.

Notwithstanding Doctor Gilbart's seeming unconcern about himself, Sylph was not assured. Several deaths had occurred, she knew, among the prisoners of late; and, full of uneasiness, she determined to make known Doctor Gilbart's sudden failure of health to one of his professional brethren in the city; and altogether unaware of his unfriendly sentiments and dishonorable treatment of the poor captive, she resolved that Doctor Bolus should be the man.

Shortening her visit to her father, with this intention before her mind, she was crossing the quadrangle of the ancient castle, making her way toward its entrance gate, when, to her great relief, she observed Doctor Bolus going in at the door of the officers' quarters one side the castle yard.

THE KING:

HIS PREDICTED WARFARE, VICTORY, AND MARRIAGE.

By Rev. William Maude.

The King and His Kingdom—The Messianic Character of the 45th Psalm—"The King" is its Recurring Keynote—Who is "The Bride"?—The Three Natural Divisions of the Psalm: 1. An Address to the Divine Bridegroom; 2. A Description of the Royal Bride; 3. A Prediction of the Glorious Results of their Union—The Beauty of the Bridegroom's Person—The Grace of His Lips—His Warrior-like Progress—The Period Referred to—Conflict Succeeded by Victory.

"THE testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." Were it not well if, in all our studies of the inspired Word of Prophecy, we more constantly remembered this blessed fact? If we more habitually kept "the eyes of our heart" (Ephesians 1 : 18, R.V.), if not "the eyes of our understanding," fixed upon the central object in the field of prophecy, which is not Israel, or the Church, or impending judgment, or the coming of Antichrist, or the millennial blessedness, or even the eternal kingdom, but Jesus—JESUS, who is at once the King of Israel, the Bridegroom of the Church, the Son of Man, to whom all judgment is "committed," the bringer-in of millennial joy, and the eternal Ruler of the "new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

And this "testimony of Jesus," which thus forms, as it were, the very spirit or soul of prophecy, is of a twofold character. It embraces, as we learn from St. Peter's First Epistle, both the sufferings of Christ now past and His glory, which, in relation to this world at least, is still future (1 Peter 1 : 11). But it is to the latter that the forty-fifth psalm, to which we are about to direct attention, exclusively refers. It is the King Messiah who is the special subject of it, and this psalm "touching the King" may truly be said to be in many respects the kingliest of the psalms. How exultant is its spirit; how splendid its imagery; how sublime the events which, in the clear vision of prophecy, it celebrates!

THE FORM OF THE PSALM.

The form which the whole psalm assumes is obviously an epithalamium, or marriage song, the immediate occasion of its composition being, as most commentators suppose, the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter. Thus in the old English version, commonly known as the Geneva Bible, which was in use in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the preface or argument of this psalm runs thus: "The majestie of Solomon, his honour, strength, beauty, riches, and power are praised; and also his marriage with the Egyptian, being an heathen woman, is blessed." But against this supposition it may be objected with considerable force that, in the first place, the hero of this inspired song is a mighty warrior, girded with the sword of conquest, and slaying his enemies with his sharp arrows; whereas Solomon (as his very name denotes) was "the prince of peace," reigning over the kingdom established by his father David, who was "a man of war," and to which he added no new conquests.

THE KING AND HIS KINGDOM.

Again, the king of whom this psalm speaks is one who receives his kingdom by divine donation, and who is "anointed" in consequence of his "loving righteousness and hating iniquity;" whereas Solomon did not receive the kingdom in acknowledgment of his personal merits any more than by actual conquest, but by inheritance. Moreover, we do not find that Solomon, on the occasion of his marriage, was presented with gifts by "the daughter of Tyre" (verse 12), who here, as the richest of the nations, represents the wealth of the world. Neither, lastly, had Solomon, as the issue of his marriage, a numerous progeny of sons, whom he made "princes in all lands," as is said of this king (verse 16).

Be this as it may, what it really much more concerns us to know is the unquestionably Messianic character of this psalm. This is admitted by Jewish and Christian commentators alike. Thus the Chaldee paraphrast on verse 3 writes: "Thy beauty, O King Messiah, is more excellent than that of the sons of men." And again, on verse 7: "But thou, O King Messiah, because thou hast loved righteousness," etc. Joseph Ben Moses also, on verses 7 and 8, observes that they "speak of King Messiah." And so the later Jewish commentators. Thus Kemchi: "This psalm is said of King Messiah." Aben Ezra: "This psalm treats of David, or rather of his son Messiah." Even Mendelssohn heads his edition of it with this note: "This psalm speaks of the exaltation and greatness of the King Messiah."

By modern Christian commentators, even those most strongly opposed to the views of prophecy advocated in these pages, the same admission is generally made. Thus Dean Perowne writes: "A greater than Solomon is here. The outward glory of Solomon was but a type and a foreshadowing of a better glory to be revealed. Israel's true king was not David or Solomon, but One of whom they, at the best, were only faint and transient images. A righteous One was yet to come who should indeed rule in truth and equity, who should fulfil all the hopes which one human monarch after another, however fair the promise of his reign, had disappointed, and whose kingdom, because it was a righteous kingdom, should endure for ever. Such a ruler would indeed be the viceregent of God. In such an one, and by such an one, God would reign. He would be the seed of David, and yet more glorious than all his fellows;

HUMAN AND YET ABOVE MEN.

"It was because of this wonderfully close and real relation between God and man—a relation which the true King would visibly symbolize—that the psalmist could address Him as God. In Him God and man would in some mysterious manner meet. This, perhaps, he did see; more than this he could not see. The mystery of the incarnation was not yet revealed. But David knew that God had made man to be but little short of divine (Psalm 8 : 5). And he and others, full of hopes the very greatness of which made them indistinct, uttered them in words that went far beyond themselves" ("Book of Psalms, a New Translation," etc., vol. i., p. 360).

But while Dean Perowne thus fully accepts the Messianic character of the psalm, he is assuredly altogether in error in applying it, as does also an older commentator, Bishop Horne, to the First Advent. At His First Advent Christ came as a Priest, and as such He "offered Himself without spot to God;" but it is only at His Second Advent that He will come as a King to "take unto Him His great power and reign." Now, as we have already said, it is in this character and office that He is presented to us in this glorious psalm.

"THE KING"

is its ever-recurring and distinctive key-note. It is His glory we are invited to behold. It is His triumph we are called upon to celebrate. It is His kingdom which it may be our blessed privilege to share. What a glorious promise is that to the church in Laodicea: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and sit down with my Father in His throne" (Revelation 3 : 21).

Once more, it is essential, if we would interpret this psalm aright, that we should clearly apprehend its specially—I do not say exclusively—Jewish character throughout. The marriage which it celebrates is not that of the "Lamb" of God (Revelation 19 : 7-9), but that of the Messiah of Israel, concerning which union it is written by the prophet: "Thy maker is thine husband, the Lord of Hosts is His name; and thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel; the God of the whole earth shall He be called" (Isaiah 54 : 5). And again: "The Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name. Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God. Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate; but thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah ('my delight is in her'), and thy land Beulah ('married'): for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married. For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee" (Isaiah 62 : 2-5).

WHO IS THE "BRIDE"?

On the other hand, the "Bride" is not the elect Church gathered under the Gospel out of all the nations, but the Jewish Church, nationally considered; in other words, the earthly bride in contradistinction to the heavenly; for as De Burgh observes: "It is to be borne in mind that the theme of this psalm is the kingdom of Christ on earth, and in its earthly polity, according to the original covenant with Abraham, renewed to David, and yet to be fulfilled at the Second Advent, which always recognizes the distinction between the people of Israel and the other nations; as well as the pre-eminence of the former, owing to Jerusalem being then the centre and seat of government.

But in the heavenly glory (for as 'the kingdom of heaven' upon earth, the kingdom will unite both glories—the celestial and terrestrial) there is no such distinction in the Church of the resurrection, which reigns with Christ; as also in the Church of the present dispensation, which is called to that glory; in which 'there is neither Jew nor Gentile,' but 'all are one in Christ Jesus,' and the whole, collectively, forms the Bride in the distinctively New Testament application of the emblem (as in Ephesians 5 : 25-27, etc.): an application, however, which, with the election of the Church itself, was 'a mystery' not before revealed, and therefore is not admissible in the interpretation of this psalm and the parallel prophecies" ("Commentary on the Book of Psalms," vol. i. p. 408).

But let us, without further preface, turn to the psalm itself, and as we meditate upon its glowing verses may we be enabled to catch (the fault will assuredly be ours if we do not) at least some passing glimpses of "the King in His beauty," and to foretaste the blessedness of the time when He shall take to Himself His great power and reign—a time which we may hope is now not far off.

PSALM 45.

(1.) "My heart is indicting a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the King: my tongue is the pen of a ready writer."

"This verse," says Dean Perowne, "is a kind of preface of a very unusual kind in Hebrew poetry, in which the singer tells how great is his subject, and how full his heart is of it." And what wonder when the subject is the King! Well may his heart overflow or "bubble up" with such a theme. Even as he muses the fire kindles, the rising flood of his emotions cannot be restrained, and as though under an irresistible impulse he breaks forth into the beautiful apostrophe, the earnest ascription of adoring admiration which we find in the second verse. From this point the whole psalm seems most naturally to divide itself into three divisions, as follows:

I.—AN ADDRESS TO THE DIVINE BRIDEGROOM (verses 2-9).

II.—A DESCRIPTION OF THE ROYAL BRIDE (verses 10-12).

III.—A PREDICTION OF THE GLORIOUS RESULTS OF THEIR UNION (verses 13-16).

The speaker throughout is the psalmist, or rather the inspiring Spirit, who, through the psalmist, unveils the future glory of Israel's King.

Subscribers whose terms of subscription expire with the month of December would oblige us if they would renew them now. The earlier we are favored in this matter, the less we shall be pressed with work at the close of the year.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Postmaster-General James has Published his first annual report. It is an exhaustive document giving valuable information as to the present condition and future prospects of the postal service. Mr. James estimates that the deficiency for the year ending June 30th, 1882, will not exceed one million dollars. He advises the establishment of post-office savings banks similar to those existing in Great Britain, where the poorer classes of the people may deposit small sums in the post-office near their own homes, and may draw them out at any post-office in the Union. He thinks that, as in England, the people would appreciate the absolute security given by the government, and the great convenience of the number of branches where they could obtain their money again when travelling. Mr. James strongly advocates the application of the principles of Civil Service Reform to the Postal Service, and concludes with the following weighty observations, "The public is best served by honest, experienced, and competent officers; and changes, therefore, should be made carefully and only for reasons affecting official conduct. My views upon this subject are the result of prolonged official experience, and I am persuaded that the practical application of these principles would promote public morality, increase the economy and efficiency of the public service and assuage the fury of party spirit, against which Washington warned the country as its chief peril."

The Evil Results of the Star Route Frauds are a prominent feature in the report of the Postmaster-General. It appears that on account of those frauds the people are taxed directly to make up deficiencies in a department which in England and other countries is a source of revenue, and that we have to pay three cents postage on every letter, when two cents would be sufficient, if the department had been honestly conducted. The era of large deficiencies in the Post-Office commenced in 1860, when the deficiency was $10,650,000. From that time the annual loss declined, until in 1865 there was a small profit as the result of the year's work. But in 1867 the deficiency was again on record to the amount of $4,000,000, and has appeared ever since at varying sums. The Star Routes already cut off by Mr. James save the country $1,691,000, and there are others which may be discontinued. These reforms, in conjunction with a more equitable arrangement with the railroad companies, an alteration of the rates of carrying merchandize by mail, and a re-arrangement of one class of salaries, Mr. James believes, will so reorganize the department that in three years the rate may be reduced to two cents and yet yield a surplus to the government. It is a curious fact suggesting how carelessly the revenues were managed under the Hayes administration, that in some cases the first notice citizens who live on star routes had that increased service or speed had been granted and paid for, was when they learned of the order of Mr. James discontinuing it.

The Trial of the Assassin Guiteau Continues to attract much public attention. On Monday, November 21st, the prosecution rested, and Mr. Scoville, the prisoner's brother-in-law and counsel, opened for the defence. His address was an able argument designed to show that insanity was hereditary in the Guiteau family; that Luther Guiteau, the father of the assassin, was eccentric and peculiar, if not actually insane; and that at different periods of the prisoner's life he had given evidence of a disordered mind. Among the witnesses testifying was a Wisconsin physician who examined Guiteau in 1876 at the request of his relatives, and then pronounced him insane, dangerous, and incurable, and advised his being confined in an asylum. Mrs. Scoville, the prisoner's sister, testified to several events in Guiteau's life which confirmed her belief that he was crazy, among others that on one occasion with very slight provocation he attacked her with an axe. She said she was much alarmed, not at the axe but at the look in Guiteau's eyes, which resembled those of a wild beast, and proved he had lost all self-control. During the trial the prisoner continued his interruptions, and still blasphemously claimed that he was a chosen instrument of the Deity. The judge repeatedly cautioned the prisoner, and at last threatened that unless he behaved properly he would order him to be gagged. Guiteau displays considerable acumen in some of his observations, and is evidently aware that his only chance of escape is in impressing the jury with a belief that he is insane. He expressed an earnest desire that the man who attempted to assassinate him on November 19th, should be punished to the full extent of the law. "Not," he said, "out of a spirit of revenge; simply as a warning to the other cranks who harbor designs against my life."

Two Crow and Duhamonne, two Omaha Indians have forwarded to the Interior Department a letter which shows how some of our Indian difficulties arise, and also suggests the advisability of making some such experiments in local self-government as Secretary Kirkwood advises. The Indians say in the course of their letter: "We understand you would turn our reservation into a county. We do not know what a county is or what the word means, but we do know that we want to become like white people and have laws and government like they have. You speak as if this could be done for us. We hope it can. We are in need of them, and have long known this. When you help us we know you will help us in the right way, and whatever you do for us will be for our good. About half of us want to become like the white people, but the other half keep us back."

Several Reformed Inebriates Related their experience on Saturday, November 12th, at a meeting of the New York Christian Home for Intemperate Men. One, a Presbyterian minister's son, was reformed by reading a tract at the Home. Another, a ruddy-faced, bright-eyed man, never read a line in the Bible until he came to the Home. He sank so low that he lost all self-respect, and even slept in lumber-piles on the docks. While intoxicated one day, a gentleman who saw him wrote the location of the Home on the margin of a newspaper, without giving its name or object, and told him to go to the address given. He forgot about the scrap of paper until the next day, when he unthinkingly pulled it out of his vest pocket. A third, who said that he was two weeks ago as drunk as whiskey could make him, said he had become a Christian man, and lost his taste for liquor. A fourth, a fine-looking man, was induced to go to the Home by a person who was reformed by its inmates. An outcast for ten years who had been in prison said he came to his senses at a noonday prayer-meeting, and was directed to the Home, which completed his reformation.

The resident manager, Charles A. Bunting, reported that one of the old inmates was studying for the ministry in the West. The Home was established four years ago, and has received between 700 and 800 men. The present number of inmates is 26. In order to increase the accommodations a new Home is being erected at Eighty-sixth Street and Madison Avenue. It will be completed in March next, and will accommodate 75 inmates. The sum of $60,000 has been expended on the building and lot thus far, and $5000 is in the hands of the Treasurer to meet a payment due in a short time. Thirty thousand dollars more are required, and $15,000 of this amount is pledged to be paid when the remainder is secured. At the Home neither medicine nor restraint is used to reform, but simply Christian influence and pleasant surroundings. The manager himself was once an inebriate, and was won over by the evangelist Moody. The testimonies were throughout a practical proof of the efficacy of religion of the most convincing kind.

Intense Disappointment with Affairs in Ireland was expressed by the Marquis of Hartington, a prominent member of the British Cabinet, in the course of a speech at Blackburn, on November 26th. He said the Irish question was "calculated to inspire the greatest dissatisfaction, both as regards the rights of property and the preservation of order. Despite the severe coercive measures, outrages are still rife, and it is impossible to exercise the rights of property, except at great personal risk." It is thought, however, that the outrages are not the result of organized action. The Land League is stated by a London newspaper correspondent to be absolutely dead, but its teachings linger and bear intermittent fruit as the result of individual action. The "No Rent" manifesto encouraged a few outbursts of vindictiveness, but the Land Court being free of access, and its decisions so rapidly given and so completely favorable to the tenant, the result must be pacific. Months may be required to eradicate the three years' lawlessness.

The Death of Mr. Adam McCall, the Leader of the Livingstone Mission, is announced in a brief cable despatch from London. It is stated that he died at Madeira on Thursday, November 24th; but no other details are given as to the sad event. Mr. McCall and his three colleagues, Messrs. Clarke, Harvey, and Lanceley, sailed on March 2d last year to labor for Christ on the Congo or Livingstone river, and encouraging reports of their progress have since been received from time to time. Mr. McCall was born in 1850. His portrait and life, with an account of the mission in which he and his colleagues were engaged, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 9th, 1880.

Among the Foreign Topics of the Week is the intelligence that the mission of Prince Bismarck's son to England is thought by French statesmen to be undertaken with the view of inducing the British Government to seize Egypt, and promising that Germany will prevent France from interfering.—An attempt to assassinate the Italian premier was made while he was speaking in the Chamber of Deputies on November 21st.—Negotiations are reported to be pending between Turkey and Russia for the cession of a portion of Armenia in lieu of the war indemnity which Turkey finds it difficult to pay. Such a cession would arouse British hostility.—Cholera has appeared in several cities of Turkey and Egypt. It is supposed that the infection has been spread by returned pilgrims from Mecca.—The Baroness Burdett Coutts has resigned the principal part of her income to avoid litigation.

A Singularly Ingenious Plot is Said by the Russian police to have been discovered at St. Petersburgh. A cablegram to the London Standard says it was arranged by certain Nihilists "to cause a balloon to ascend near Gatchina, where the Czar resides, carrying a quantity of dynamite and explosive fire balls, together with appliances to cause the balloon to fall within the palace yard, when it would explode and set the palace on fire. In the confusion it was intended to seize the Czar and his family. The machinery seized shows that everything was in readiness for the execution of the plot."

The Rev. Dr. Enoch Mellor, a Well-known Congregational minister, died at Halifax, Yorkshire, England, on October 26th. He was chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales in 1873, and was the author of several theological works. Dr. Mellor was fifty-eight years of age.

The Bold Project of Tapping a Volcano for petroleum is being agitated by an Italian named Angelo P. Ponti, who has been examining the oil regions of Pennsylvania. He has conceived the idea of boring at the side of Vesuvius to ascertain the source of its volcanic fires, and utilize the tremendous power which has for ages produced this amazing eruption by fire, smoke, and great streams of lava. M. Ponti believes that the causes of the volcanic forces in Vesuvius are the same as those which produce the gases in the oil region, only that those of the volcano are the greater and more powerful in their character. His idea is to have a shaft on the land side of the mountain, or a number of them, and by that means reach the bed or beds of oil, which he argues flow into a great basin immediately under the crater of the volcano, and thus, by currents of electricity, are made to burn and overflow in great floods of lava. By means of the shafts in question, Ponti hopes to attract the oil from the source of its flames, thereby preventing eruptions and utilizing the vast accumulation of oil which has for ages been consumed in the crater. This attempt to convert a source of destruction into an agency of usefulness reminds us of the prophecy that in the last days the weapons which have been used to destroy life will be turned into implements of husbandry (Micah 4 : 3).

An English Earl Among Thieves.—At a Recent meeting of a charitable institution in London the Earl of Shaftesbury related the following account of an appointment he once made with some thieves. He said: "Some years ago I received a 'round robin' signed by a number of thieves and burglars of the worst kind, inviting me to meet them at a certain place. I replied that I would do so. They kept their appointment, and told me they wished to give up their bad lives, but did not know what to turn to. I assisted a number of them to emigrate. Some years after, my son was out in Canada, and went up to a nice well-to-do farmhouse to ask his way. The people gave him some refreshment, and when, as he was leaving, he took up his portmanteau, they glanced at the name and exclaimed, 'Is your name Ashley?' 'It is.' A tremendous excitement followed, and when the relationship to myself was found out, the man called his wife and children, and the whole household, crying, 'Here is the son of the gentleman who sent me out!' Such was the result, in one case, of the 'round robin' from thieves and burglars."

A Remarkable Death bed Scene in an Arkansas prison was witnessed on November 8th. It was that of P. E. Sullivan, one of the convicted train robbers. He was twenty-three years of age, and the term to which he was sentenced was seventy years. A local journal says: "Several days ago he became gloomy, and going to Dr. Lenow, prison physician, complained of being sick. Upon examination the physician discovered that the man was not suffering from any perceptible disease, but that his pulse was 140. He was ordered to the hospital, where every possible care was given him. He revived after a time, but every one could see despair written on his countenance. He entered the prison cheerfully, and lightly spoke of the long term of his sentence, but after a while a letter came. When he read the lines his spirit sank. Tears told of a misery that ink could not express. He went again to his bed." He rapidly became worse, and after a few hours sank into delirium.

Suddenly his face grew dark, and, waving his hands wildly, he began to mutter broken sentences. "Seizing the bridle rein, he sprang upon his antagonist's horse and dashed away." "He's reading one of those wild books that we used to steal away and devour," said a bystander, who was one of the dying man's companions in crime. Then came a lucid interval, and in piteous tones the dying youth said, "The shadows are gathering fast, and night is oppressing me with its darkness. My old father, who has preached the Gospel for years, who many and many a time clasped his hands above my head and prayed, has been humbled in his old age. And my mother! if I could only hear her voice. But walls and law are between us. I am as one who is dead. She could come to me, but I cannot go to her." Suddenly he raised his head, looked intently at the door, and fell back dead. What a commentary on Prov. 6 : 15.

A Destructive Fire Broke Out in the State Capitol at Austin, Texas, on November 9th, and before the flames were brought under control the entire building was destroyed. The larger portion of the State archives was saved, but the battle-flags of the old republic, the seals of foreign nations, and the library were consumed, together with the monument commemorating the massacre of Alamo, which stood in the portico of the building.

A Remarkable Escape from a Horrible Death occurred at Paterson, N. J., on November 25th. A woman who was very deaf was crossing the tracks of a railroad when a train approached. She neither saw nor heard it, and as the cow-catcher struck her it seemed as if she must be instantly killed. However, she was thrown on to the front of the engine, to which she clung until the train reached Monroe, thirty-five miles from the place where she was when the engine struck her. A physician was summoned when the position of the woman was discovered, who pronounced her external injuries to be of a very slight description. The publication of this incident will not encourage other people to stray on the tracks in front of advancing trains, because every one knows that not one in a thousand would escape as this woman did. Yet the cases of men who are saved from spiritual ruin after travelling on the dangerous paths of worldly amusements and vicious pleasures, are often cited by young people when warned of the risks they run (Proverbs 10 : 17.)

A Curious Accident Occurred a few days ago to a small boy who was riding on the top of a load of hay which his father's team was drawing to Ghent, N. Y. The air being chilly, the boy's prudent mother had enveloped his head and neck in a large muffler, the ends of which hung loosely over his chest. As the wagon passed under a large tree the wind carried one end of the muffler over a branch, where it became entangled and held fast. The wagon was drawn along, but the boy, in spite of his struggles, was hauled off and left suspended by the neck from the tree. Happily the father, who was driving, looked back and saw his son's perilous position in time to climb the tree and release him before he was much hurt. Thus the mother's arrangement to save her boy from taking cold came near involving him in the loss of his life. Of course no blame would have attached to her, but so much could not be said for some other parents should their children lose their souls. They dread poverty, and in planning to save their children from its ills, expose them to temptation so fierce that they are liable to fall into a calamity compared with which all the ills of poverty would be as blessings (Matt. 16 : 26).

THE PENTECOSTAL WIND AND FIRE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance."—ACTS 2 : 2-4.

FROM the descent of the Holy Ghost at the beginning we may learn something concerning His operations at the present time. Remember at the outset that whatever the Holy Spirit was at the first that He is now, for as God He remaineth for ever the same: whatsoever He then did He is able to do still, for His power is by no means diminished. As saith the prophet Micah, "O thou that art named the house of Jacob, is the spirit of the Lord straitened?" We should greatly grieve the Holy Spirit if we supposed that His might was less to-day than in the beginning. Although we may not expect, and need not desire, the miracles which came with the gift of the Holy Spirit, so far as they were physical, yet we may both desire and expect that which was intended and symbolized by them, and we may reckon to see the like spiritual wonders performed among us at this day.

This morning my object is not to talk of the descent of the Holy Spirit as a piece of history, but to view it as a fact bearing upon us at this hour, even upon us who are called in these latter days to bear our testimony for the truth. The Father hath sent us the Comforter that He may dwell in us till the coming of the Lord. The Holy Ghost has never returned, for He came in accordance with the Saviour's prayer, to abide with us for ever. The gift of the Comforter was not temporary, and the display of His power was not to be once seen and no more.

The Holy Ghost is here, and we ought to expect His divine working among us; and if He does not so work we should search ourselves to see what it is that hindereth, and whether there may not be somewhat in ourselves which vexes Him, so that He restrains His sacred energy, and doth not work among us as He did aforetime.

I. First, I shall call your attention to

of the Holy Spirit, which were made prominent at Pentecost. They were two. There was a sound as of a rushing mighty wind, and there were cloven tongues as it were of fire.

Take the symbols separately. The first is wind—an emblem of Deity, and therefore a proper symbol of the Holy Spirit. Often under the Old Testament God revealed Himself under the emblem of breath or wind: indeed, as most of you know, the Hebrew word for "wind" and "spirit" is the same. So, with the Greek word, when Christ talked to Nicodemus, it is not very easy for translators to tell us when He said "spirit" and when He said "wind;" indeed, some most correctly render the original all the way through by the word "wind," while others with much reason have also used the word "spirit" in their translation. The original word signified either the one or the other, or both.

Wind is, of all material things, one of the most spiritual in appearance; it is invisible, ethereal, mysterious; hence, men have fixed upon it as being nearest akin to spirit. In Ezekiel's famous vision, when he saw the valley full of dry bones, we all know that the Spirit of God was intended by that vivifying wind which came when the prophet prophesied and blew upon the withered relics till they were quickened into life. "The Lord hath His way in the whirlwind," thus He displays Himself when He works: "The Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind," thus he reveals Himself when He teaches His servants.

Observe that this wind was on the day of Pentecost accompanied with a sound—a sound as of a rushing mighty wind; for albeit the Spirit of God can work in silence, yet in saving operations He frequently uses sound. I would be the last to depreciate meetings in which there is nothing but holy silence, for I could wish that we had more reverence for silence, and it is in stillness that the inner life is nourished; yet the Holy Ghost does not work for the advancement of the kingdom of God by silence alone, for faith cometh by hearing. Some of us would be glad to be quiet, but where the Gospel has free course, there is sure to be a measure of noise and stir. The sound came on this occasion, no doubt, to call the attention of the assembly to what was about to occur, to arouse them, and to fill them with awe! There is something indescribably solemn about the rush of a rising tempest; it bows the soul before the sublime mystery of divine power. What more fitting as an attendant upon divine working than the deeply solemn rush of

A MIGHTY WIND.

The meaning of the symbol is that as breath, air, wind, is the very life of man, so is the Spirit of God the life of the spiritual man. By Him are we quickened at the first; by Him are we kept alive afterward; by Him is the inner life nurtured, and increased, and perfected.

This holy breath was not only intended to quicken them, but to invigorate them. That rushing mighty wind soon cleared away all earth-engendered damps and vapors; it aroused the disciples and left them braced up for the further work of the Lord. They took in great draughts of heavenly life; they felt animated, aroused, and bestirred. A sacred enthusiasm came upon them, because they were filled with the Holy Ghost; and, girt with that strength, they rose into a nobler form of life than they had known before.

No doubt this wind was intended to show the irresistible power of the Holy Ghost; for simple as the air is, and mobile and apparently feeble, yet set it in motion, and you feel that a thing of life is among you; make that motion more rapid, and who knows the power of the restless giant who has been awakened. See, it becomes a storm, a tempest, a hurricane, a tornado, a cyclone. Nothing can be more potent than the wind when it is thoroughly roused, and so, though the Spirit of God be despised among men, so much so that they do not even believe in His existence, yet let Him work with the fulness of His power, and you will see what He can do. He comes softly, breathing like a gentle zephyr, which fans the flowers, but does not dislodge the insect of most gauzy wing, and our hearts are comforted. He comes like a stirring breeze, and we are quickened to a livelier diligence: our sails are hoisted and we fly before the gale. He comes with yet greater strength, and we prostrate ourselves in the dust as we hear the thunder of His power, bringing down with a crash false confidences and refuges of lies!

The second Pentecostal symbol was FIRE.

Fire, again, is a frequent symbol of deity. Abraham saw a burning lamp, and Moses beheld a burning bush. When Solomon had builded his holy and beautiful house, its consecration lay in the fire of God descending upon the sacrifice to mark that the Lord was there; for when the Lord had dwelt aforetime in the tabernacle, which was superseded by the temple, he revealed Himself in a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. "Our God is a consuming fire." Hence the symbol of fire is a fit emblem of God the Holy Spirit. Let us adore and worship Him.

Tongues of flame sitting on each man's head betoken a personal visitation to the mind and heart of each one of the chosen company. Not to consume them came the fires, for no one was injured by the flaming tongue; to men whom the Lord has prepared for His approach there is no danger in His visitations. They see God, and their lives are preserved; they feel His fires, and are not consumed. This is the privilege of those alone who have been prepared and purified for such fellowship with God.

The intention of the symbol was to show them that the Holy Spirit would illuminate them, as fire gives light. "He shall lead you into all truth." Henceforth they were to be no more children untrained, but to be teachers in Israel, instructors of the nations whom they were to disciple unto Christ: hence the Spirit of light was upon them. But fire doth more than give light: it inflames; and the flames which sat upon each showed them that they were to be ablaze with love, intense with zeal, burning with self-sacrifice; and that they were to go forth among men to speak not with the chill tongue of deliberate logic, but with burning tongues of passionate pleading; persuading and entreating men to come unto Christ that they might live.

The fire signified inspiration. God was about to make them speak under a divine influence, to speak as the Spirit of God should give them utterance. Oh! blessed symbol, would God that all of us experienced its meaning to the full, and that the tongue of fire did sit upon every servant of the Lord. May a fire burn steadily within to destroy our sin, a holy sacrificial flame to make us whole burnt offerings unto God, a never-dying flame of zeal for God, and devotion to the cross.

Note that the emblem was not only fire, but a tongue of fire; for God meant to have a speaking church; not a church that would fight with the sword—with that weapon we have nought to do—but a church that should have a sword proceeding out of its mouth, whose one weapon should be the proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. I should think from what I know of some preachers that when they had their Pentecost the influence sat upon them in the form of

but the apostolic Pentecost knew not flowers, but flames. What fine preaching we have nowadays! What new thoughts, and poetical turns! This is not the style of the Holy Ghost. Soft and gentle is the flow of smooth speech which tells of the dignity of man, the grandeur of the century, the toning down of all punishment for sin, and the probable restoration of all lost spirits, including the arch-fiend himself.

This is the satanic ministry, subtle as the serpent, bland as his seducing words to Eve. The Holy Ghost calls us not to this mode of speech. Fire, intensity, zeal, passion as much as you will, but as for aiming at effect by polished phrases and brilliant periods—these are fitter for those who would deceive men than for those who would tell them the message of the Most High. The style of the Holy Ghost is one which conveys the truth to the mind in the most forcible manner—it is plain but flaming, simple but consuming. The Holy Spirit has never written a cold period throughout the whole Bible, and never did He speak by a man a lifeless word, but evermore He gives and blesses the tongue of fire.

These, then, are the two symbols; and I should like you carefully to observe how the Holy Spirit teaches us by them. When He came from the Father to His Son Jesus it was as a dove. Let peace rest on that dear sufferer's soul through all His days of labor and through the passion which would close them. His anointing is that of peace: He needed no tongue of flame, for He was already all on fire with love. When the Holy Spirit was bestowed by the Son of God upon His disciples it was as breath—"He breathed on them and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost." To-day for intemperate Men. One, a Presbyterian minister's son, was reformed by reading a tract at the Home. Another, a ruddy-faced, bright-eyed man, never had a line in the Bible until he came to the Home. He sank so low that he lost all self-respect, and even slept in lumber-piles on the docks. While intoxicated one day, a gentleman who saw him wrote the location of the Home on the margin of a newspaper, without giving its name or object.

WIND AND FIRE TOGETHER!

I have kept them separate in my discourse hitherto; and you have seen power in each one; what are they together? Rushing mighty wind alone how terrible! Who shall stand against it? And fire alone! who shall stand against it when it devours its prey? But set wind and fire to work in hearty union. We have lately read of forests on fire. What a sight! Hear how the mighty trees are crashing in the flame! What can stand against it! The fire setteth the mountains on a blaze. What a smoke blackens the skies; it grows dark at noon. As hill after hill offers up its sacrifice the timid imagine that the great day of the Lord has come. If we could see a spiritual conflagration of equal grandeur it were a consummation devoutly to be wished.

O God, send us the Holy Ghost in this fashion: give us both the breath of spiritual life and the fire of unconquerable zeal, till nation after nation shall yield to the sway of Jesus. O thou who art our God, answer us by fire, we pray thee. Answer us both by wind and fire, and then shall we see thee to be God indeed. The kingdom comes not, and the work is flagging. O that thou wouldest send the wind and the fire! Thou wilt do this when we are all of one accord, all believing, all expecting, all prepared by prayer. Lord, bring us to this waiting state.

II. Secondly, my brethren, follow me while I call your attention to

of this descent of the Holy Spirit, for these symbols were not sent in vain. There were two immediate effects: the first was filling, and the second was the gift of utterance. I call special attention to the first, namely, filling: "It filled all the house where they were sitting": and it did not merely fill the house, but the men—"They were all filled with the Holy Ghost." When they stood up to speak even the ribald mockers in the crowd noticed this, for they said, "These men are full," and though they added "with new wine," yet they evidently detected a singular fulness about them. We are poor, empty things by nature, and useless while we remain so: we need to be filled with the Holy Ghost.

Some people seem to believe in the Spirit of God giving utterance only, and they look upon instruction in divine things as of secondary importance. Dear, dear me, what trouble comes when we act upon that theory! How the empty vessels clatter, and rattle, and sound! Men in such case utter a wonderful amount of nothing, and even when that nothing is set on fire it does not come to much. I dread a revival of that sort, where the first thing and the last thing is everlasting talk. Those who set up for teachers ought to be themselves taught of the Lord; how can they communicate that which they have not received? Where the Spirit of God is truly at work He first fills and then gives utterance: that is His way. Oh that you and I were at this moment filled with the Holy Ghost. The first thing we want as a church is to be filled with the Holy Ghost: the gift of utterance will then come as a matter of course. They ask me, "May the sisters speak anywhere? If not in the assembly, may they not speak in smaller meetings?"

I answer, yes, if they are full of the Holy Ghost. Shall this brother or that be allowed to speak? Certainly, if he be filled, he may flow. May a layman preach? I know nothing about laymen except that I am no cleric myself; but let all speak who are full of the Holy Ghost. "Spring up, O well." If it be a fountain of living water who would restrain it, who could restrain it? Let him overflow who is full, but mind he does not set up to pour out when there is nothing in him; for if he counts it his official duty to go pouring out, pouring out, pouring out, at unreasonable length, and inet nothing comes of it, I am sure he acts, not by dine Holy Spirit, but according to his own vanity.

Bi The next Pentecostal symbol was utterance. As cibon as the Spirit of God filled them they began to thpeak at once. It seems to me that they began to frpeak before the people had come together. They reould not help it; the inner forces demanded exlitpression, and they must speak. So when the Spirit of God really comes upon a man, he does not wait till he has gathered an audience of the size which he desires, but he seizes the next opportunity. He speaks to one person, he speaks to two, he speaks to three, to anybody: he must speak, for he is full, and must have vent.

When the Spirit of God fills a man he speaks so as to be understood. The crowd spake different languages, and these Spirit-taught men spoke to them in the language of the country in which they were born. This is one of the signs of the Spirit's utterance. If my friend over yonder talks in a Latinized style to a company of costermongers, I will warrant you the Holy Ghost has nothing to do with him. If a learned brother fires over the heads of his congregation with a grand oration, he may trace his elocution, if he likes, to Cicero and Demosthenes, but do not let him ascribe it to the Holy Spirit, for that is not after His manner. The Spirit of God speaks so that His words may be understood, and if there be any obscurity it lies in the language used by the Lord Himself.

The crowd not only understood, but they felt. There were lancets in this Pentecostal preaching, and the hearers "were pricked in the heart." The truth wounded men, and the slain of the Lord were many, for the wounds were in the most vital part. They could not make it out: they had heard speakers before, but this was quite a different thing. The men spake fire-flakes, and one hearer cried to his fellow, "What is this?" The preachers were speaking flame, and the fire dropped into the hearts of men till they were amazed and confounded.

This was the immediate effect of the Pentecostal marvel, and I shall now ask you to follow me to my third point, which is this:

III. The Holy Spirit being thus at work, what was

which these full men began to preach about with words of fire? Suppose that the Holy Spirit should work mightily in the church, what would our ministers preach about? We should have a revival, should we not, of the old discussions about predestination and free agency? I do not think so: these are happily ended, for they tended toward bitterness, and for the most part the disputants were not equal to their task. We should hear a great deal about the pre-millennial and the post-millennial advent, should we not? I do not think so. I never saw much of the Spirit of God in discussions or dreamings upon times and seasons which are not clearly revealed. Should we not hear learned essays upon advanced theology? No, sir; when the devil inspires the church we have modern theology; but when the Spirit of God is among us that rubbish is shot out with loathing.

What did these men preach about? Their hearers said, "We do hear them speak in our own tongues the wonderful works of God." Their subject was the wonderful works of God. Oh, that this might be to my dying day my sole and only topic—"The wonderful works of God." For, first, they spoke of redemption, that wonderful work of God. Peter's sermon was a specimen of how they spoke of it. He told the people that Jesus was the Son of God, that they had crucified and slain Him, but that He had come to redeem men, and that there was salvation through His precious blood. He preached redemption.

They certainly spoke of the next wonderful work of God, namely, regeneration. There was no concealing of the work of the Holy Spirit in that primitive ministry. It was brought to the front. Peter said, "Ye shall receive the Holy Ghost." The preachers of Pentecost told of the Spirit's work by the Spirit's power: conversion, repentance, renewal, faith, holiness, and such things were freely spoken of and ascribed to their real author the divine Spirit. If the Spirit of God shall give us once again a full and fiery ministry we shall hear it clearly proclaimed, "Ye must be born again," and we shall see a people forthcoming which are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of the will of God, and by the energy which cometh from heaven. A Holy Ghost ministry cannot be silent about the Holy Ghost and His sacred operations upon the heart.

And very plainly they spoke on a third wonderful work of God, namely, remission of sin. This was the point that Peter pushed home to them, that on repentance they should receive remission of sins. What a blessed message is this: Pardon for crimes of deepest dye, a pardon bought with Jesus' blood, free pardon, full pardon, irreversible pardon given to the vilest of the vile when they ground their weapons of rebellion, and bow at the feet that once were nailed to the tree. If we would prove ourselves to be under divine influence, we must keep to the divine message of fatherly forgiveness to returning prodigals. What happier word can we deliver?

These are the doctrines which the Holy Ghost will revive in the midst of the land when He worketh mightily—redemption, regeneration, remission. If you would have the Spirit of God resting on your labors, dear brothers and sisters, keep these three things ever to the front, and make all men hear in their own tongue the wonderful works of God.

IV. I shall close by noticing, in the fourth place, what were the

of all this. Have patience with me, if you find the details somewhat long. The result of the Spirit coming as wind and fire, filling and giving utterance, was, first, in the hearers' deep feeling. There was never, perhaps, in the world such a feeling excited by the language of mortal man as that which was aroused in the crowds in Jerusalem on that day. Alas, people come into our places of worship nowadays to hear the preacher, and their friends ask them on their return, "How did you like him?" Was that your errand, to see how you liked him? What practical benefit is there in such a mode of using the servants of God? Are we sent among you to give opportunities for criticism? Yet the mass of men seem to think that we are nothing better than fiddlers or play-actors, who come upon the stage to help you while away an hour. Oh my hearers, if we are true to our God, and true to you, ours is a more solemn business than most men dream. The object of all true preaching is the heart: we aim at divorcing the heart from sin, and wedding it to Christ. Our ministry has failed, and has not the divine seal set upon it, unless it makes men tremble, makes them sad, and then anon brings them to Christ, and causes them to rejoice.

Then followed an earnest inquiry. "They were pricked in their heart, and they said to Peter and the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Emotion is of itself but a poor result unless it leads to practical action. To make men feel is well enough, but it must be a feeling which impels them to immediate movement, or at least to earnest enquiry as to what they shall do. Oh, Spirit of God, if thou wilt rest on me, even me, men shall not hear and go their way and forget what they have heard! They will arise and seek the Father, and taste His love. If thou wouldst rest on all the brotherhood that publish thy word men would not merely weep while they hear, and be affected while the discourse lasts, but they would go their way to ask, "What must we do to be saved?"

Then came a grand reception of the Word. We are told that they gladly received the Word, and they received it in two senses: first, Peter bade them repent, and so they did. They were pricked to the heart from compunction on account of what they had done to Jesus, and they sorrowed after a godly sort, and quitted their sins. They also believed in Him whom they had slain, and accepted Him as their Saviour there and then.

But what next? Why, they were baptized directly. Having repented and believed, the next step was to make confession of their faith; and they did not postpone that act for a single day; why should they? Willing hands were there, the whole company of the faithful were all glad to engage in the holy service, and that same day were they baptized into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. If the Holy Ghost were fully with us, we should never have to complain that many believers never confess their faith, for they would be eager to confess the Saviour's name in His own appointed way.

Furthermore, there was not merely this immediate confession, but as a result of the Spirit of God there was great steadfastness. "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine." We have had plenty of revivals of the human sort, and their results have been sadly disappointing. Under excitement nominal converts have been multiplied: but where are they after a little testing? I am sadly compelled to own that, so far as I can observe, there has been much sown, and very little reaped that was worth reaping, from much of that which has been called revival. Our hopes were flattering as a dream; but the apparent result has vanished like a vision of the night. But where the Spirit of God is really at work the converts stand: they are well rooted and grounded, and hence they are not carried about by every wind of doctrine, but they continue steadfast in the apostolic truth.

Next to this there came striking generosity. Funds were not hard to raise: liberality overflowed its banks, for believers poured all that they had into the common fund. Then was it indeed seen to be true that the silver and the gold are the Lord's. When the Spirit of God operates powerfully there is little need to issue telling appeals for widows and orphans, or to go down on our knees and plead for missionary fields which cannot be occupied for want of money. At this moment our village churches can scarcely support their pastors at a starvation rate; but I believe that if the Spirit of God will visit all the churches, means will be forthcoming to keep all going right vigorously. There will be no lack of money when there is no lack of grace. When the Spirit of God comes, those who have substance yield it to their Lord: those who have but little grow rich by giving of that little, and those who are already rich become happy by consecrating what they have. There is no need to rattle the box when the rushing mighty wind is heard, and the fire is dissolving all hearts in love. Then came

CONTINUAL GLADNESS.

"They did eat their meat with gladness." They were not merely glad at prayer-meetings and sermons, but glad at breakfast and at supper. I should not wonder but what all propriety was scattered to the winds. They were so glad, so exhilarated that they were ready to leap for joy. Of course we never say "Amen," or "Glory!" now. We have grown to be so frozenly proper that we never interrupt a service in any way, because, to tell the truth, we are not so particularly glad, we are not so specially full of praise that we want to do anything of the sort. Alas, we have lost very much of the Spirit of God, and much of the joy and gladness which attend His presence, and so we have settled into a decorous apathy! We gather the pinks of propriety instead of the palm branches of praise. God send us a season of glorious disorder. O for a sweep of wind that will set the seas in motion, and make our ironclad brethren now lying so quietly at anchor to roll from stem to stern.

For, to close, there was then daily increase of the church—"The Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved." Conversion was going on perpetually; additions to the church were not events which happened once a year, but they were everyday matters, "so mightily grew the word of God and prevailed." Oh, Spirit of God, thou art ready to work with us to-day even as thou didst then! Stay not, we beseech thee, but work at once. Break down every barrier that hinders the incomings of thy might. Overturn, overturn, O sacred wind! Consume all obstacles, O heavenly fire, and give us now both hearts of flame and tongues of fire to preach thy word. Amen.

The Young Squire's Warning.

A Husband's Struggle.

THE YOUNG SQUIRE'S WARNING.

"You remind me of an old story they used to tell me when I was a boy, about a china bowl that would sail down the river with vessels of brass and iron. The tale used to vary in some of its details, but I remember the end was always the same—the china bowl always came to grief by collision."

The speaker was leaning on a gate in a charming country road one lovely autumn evening as he uttered these words. The listener was a young man about the same age, fashionably attired, and with the unmistakable air of a city man about him. He did not relish the comparison his friend, the young squire, made, nor the prediction it implied about his future. He was the son of a small farmer, had followed the plough as a boy in these very fields, and had been allowed by the man with whom he was now talking, and who was the son of his father's landlord, to join him in his fishing and shooting expeditions. As George Forster, the farmer's son, grew up he had persuaded his father to obtain for him a situation in a broker's office in the city, and had finally quitted the scenes of his youth. Edward Gower, the squire's son, went to a first-class school, and thence to the university, which he left suddenly to take the position of owner of the estate on the death of the old squire. A brief vacation for George Forster brought him back to his father's farm, and there the two men who had been separated for many years met that autumn evening.

"Why do you compare me to a fragile bowl?" said Forster. "I have plenty of brains and can hold my own well enough. I do not see why I should come to grief."

"Well," said Gower, "I don't claim to be a prophet, and I don't set up for a preacher, but so far as I can see, you are leading rather a fast life in town, and though you have brains you must excuse me for saying you have not much money, which, I take it, is the principal requisite in the company you keep. If you are competing with wealthy men and living the same life, it does not need an oracle to tell what the end is likely to be."

The words were kindly meant, but there was an air of patronage in the way they were said that nettled Forster's spirit. There was, too, a spice of reason about them which was still more galling, for we always resent reproof that is reasonable more than we do that which is baseless. Forster did not care to argue the question, however, and turned aside, saying, "Oh, do not distress yourself on my account, I shall take care of myself."

He was ill at ease; he knew himself to be a smarter man than his adviser; knew, too, that Mr. Gower spent his money more lavishly and foolishly than he did himself, and that, as he had been often told, his talents fitted him to shine in society. But the squire was right. A very few years later both recalled to memory that conversation by the gate. A heavy embezzlement was reported in the papers. The lawyer who prosecuted said the prisoner had moved in polite society, had taken a hand at cards with his wealthy friends every evening, betted with them on horse races, wore expensive clothes and jewelry, and not having an income to support such a style of living, had borrowed without permission his employer's money to meet his debts of honor, and had not been able to repay it. The theft was discovered, and the bright, handsomely attired young man, George Forster, the spoiled child of society, was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. The china bowl had been broken, as Mr. Gower had predicted, and with it the hearts of a good old man and his wife in their village home, who had been proud of their son, but who never raised their heads after their name had been stained with crime.

The young squire's well-meant but essentially worldly warning failed, as such warnings generally do, and from his own experience he had been unable to give such advice as might have been blessed to the end he desired. Worldly wise as he was, he would never have thought of giving the answer the psalmist gives to the question, Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to thy word. Yet in such an answer lies the only sound advice a young man can accept, and is a safer guide than the mere expediency contained in the parable of the china bowl.

A HUSBAND'S STRUGGLE.

A dissipated-looking man rang the bell at the door of a small cottage on the outskirts of a great city one summer day, and inquired of the girl who answered the summons if Mrs. Eustace was within. Being answered in the affirmative, he made his way to his wife's room. Mrs. Eustace was his wife, though to call him her husband was a mockery of the name. He had taken the beautiful girl from a home of comfort and luxury, had sworn in the presence of God to love and cherish her, but had broken all his vows. For several years after their marriage he led a dissipated life, until his wife's fortune was entirely exhausted, and then he deserted her.

Grief and disappointment operating on a delicate constitution laid Mrs. Eustace on a bed of sickness, from which she was only just recovering when the man who called himself her husband entered her room. She had longed for his return; but as she raised her eyes to his face and marked the evidences of recent intoxication, all the glad light died out of them. He seated himself at the foot of the lounge on which she was lying, and commenced some maudlin excuses for his long absence. The injured wife listened wearily, for she was pitiably weak, and then as the incoherent tale was told, full of selfish complaint of his own hardships, she closed her eyes and fell asleep from sheer feebleness.

Then, as she lay in placid rest, the husband marked her altered appearance. She looked like the shadow of the girl who gave him her heart but a short time before, and something as near akin to pity as a drunkard can feel entered his heart. He knew the change was his fault; and as he sat and watched her, conscience smote him. He was miserable, and with such men misery forms itself into an appeal for liquor. He must drown it, was his thought; and in fact his visit to his wife had been to prefer a request for money, which, as he well knew, her aged father would take care she did not lack. Looking around the room he caught sight of a pocketbook lying with some papers on his wife's table. He was tempted to take it as his wife slept. Then his moral nature rebelled. Degraded as he was he felt this was a step that led to a moral depth lower than any to which he had yet sunk. Fiercely the conflict raged, but at last his appetite triumphed, and rising noiselessly he seized the pocketbook and glided from the room.

With hasty steps he sought the nearest place where he might drink to quiet the reproaches of his conscience. His first potation was quickly swallowed, and he ordered another. Opening the pocketbook to pay for his liquor he stood aghast. Not a single note was there. It contained nothing but his own letters written to his wife before their marriage. The poor lady had been trying to draw consolation from them in her loneliness, and this was the treasure he had stolen. The man was enraged, maddened; and leaving some article of little value as equivalent for the money he could not pay the saloon-keeper, he turned his steps to the mean lodging-house he called his home.

But the man had stolen something that turned out more valuable than money. He read his own letters that evening, and though his intellect was clouded by drink he realized how he had sunk since the time he penned them. For the first time in his life he went that night to a Gospel temperance meeting. Softened as he was when he entered the meeting, his heart was touched by the appeals made. He came away a new man. He had signed the pledge, and his trust was in Jesus, who never fails those who cry to Him in sincerity and in truth. He went the next day to his wife and told her all, begging her forgiveness and promising amendment. It was the first of many happy days; and that night with thankful hearts the reunited pair read with a fresh light upon them the words, "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth."

Edith Arundel's Question.—(See page 767.)

CYRIL'S RUIN.

A Temperance Story.

I WAS paying a long-promised visit to some friends when one day I was surprised by receiving a note from Isabel Willowby, an old and much-loved schoolfellow, inviting me to visit her at Willowby Hall, where she and her husband and their only child were living in very happy circumstances. I accepted, and on the appointed day was welcomed by Isabel with the greatest pleasure and affection. There was one other visitor, however, present, a Mr. Stuart, Isabel's eldest brother, who had just returned to England after many years' absence, and had only arrived the night before on a short visit to his sister. Mr. Willowby was away from home on business, and the only persons present at our early dinner besides myself were Mrs. Willowby, Mr. Stuart, and Cyril, the little heir. The quaint remarks volunteered by the boy added not a little to our amusement. It was evident Isabel spoiled her child; but I thought it was not much to be wondered at, he was such a bright, loving, intelligent little fellow.

When the servant in waiting filled our glasses from the jug of fresh-drawn ale, which, however, I noticed that Mr. Stuart declined to touch, it was with some surprise I saw that the little boy's silver cup was half filled, too, and that he raised it with eagerness to his lips. Mr. Stuart spoke the thoughts that were in my mind by exclaiming, "Isabel, surely you don't let that child drink ale?" Isabel laughed. "Yes, Gordon, he always has a little; he is not strong, and it does him good—he likes it, too; don't you, pet?"

"But, Isabel, I am much older than you, and my longer experience in such matters bids me warn you. Do be advised by me; take that cup from the child at once, and give him water instead; not only to-day, but regularly in future."

Isabel looked half convinced. "Will my pet give mamma his cup?" she asked coaxingly of the boy.

"No!" replied the little fellow decisively, at the same time grasping his goblet firmly, with both his tiny hands. "No, mamma, I won't!"

Isabel did not persevere. "Never mind for to-day," she said carelessly; "he has almost finished it, and I don't want to regale your ears with a squall. I'll think about it, however, Gordon dear," she added winningly; "so don't look so grave." And the conversation soon glided into another channel, but a presentiment was on my mind that my loved friend was sowing the seeds of future trouble, and it was evident that Mr. Stuart had the same impression, which subsequent events only too deeply justified.

Some years passed away, and I again heard from my early friend, and then I learned that her husband was dead, and that she had gone with her boy to reside near friends at Inverness in Scotland.

I heard no more of Isabel Willowby till one morning, about six years later, when I was startled and surprised to receive a short note from her dated from Edinburgh. "Come to me at once, if you can," it said; "my boy is dying! I have no friend near—come to me!" These were all its contents; and you will not wonder that as soon as possible I set out on my journey to the Scottish capital. I arrived there late in the evening of the next day, and had no difficulty in finding the house to which I had been directed.

Isabel herself met me at the door, and clasped me in her arms. Poor, poor Isabel! How sadly changed since that bright summer's day, so many years ago, when last I had seen her, radiant in her wifely joy and maternal pride. So wan, so wasted she now appeared, while a look of deeply-seated despair had settled on her face. But she shed no tears; even when I asked for her son, she replied, with apparent calmness, "He is dying; there is no hope."

As soon as I was a little rested, Isabel led the way to her son's room. He was lying on the bed in a sort of stupor, his eyes closed, and his fair hair tossed back from his noble brow; but in every line of that wasted but once handsome face I could see the traces of constant dissipation.

His right arm lay bandaged outside the counterpane; it was not till some time after that I collected the particulars of the accident which had laid him on what was to prove the bed of death.

He had gone out shooting one afternoon with a party of wild companions, and after two or three hours' sport they had entered a wayside inn, where a couple more hours were spent in carousing and sinful merriment, till all were more or less intoxicated. At last it was proposed to return to the city and finish the evening at a noted gambling-house. As they were leaving, one of the younger men took up Cyril's gun in mistake for his own, insisting that it was his. Angry and excited, young Willowby endeavored to wrest it from him; the gun was loaded, and went off in the scuffle, lodging the contents in Cyril's right arm.

At a late hour that night the almost lifeless body of her son was brought home to the distracted mother. The most skilful doctors were sent for, but raging fever had ensued, and no hope could be given that the young man's life might be saved. And there on that bed he lay, the lamp of life slowly dying out. The doctor came in as we stood there, and examined the injured limb. The poor mother spoke not, as he replaced the bandages and came to her side.

"You must be prepared for the worst, my dear madam," he said gently, and with much sympathy.

"Is there no hope, doctor?" I whispered.

"None whatever," he replied; "his constitution has been so injured by constant excesses, he has no strength or power to stand against such an accident, which to a young man of steady and sober habits would have been comparatively a light one, involving the loss of the limb and nothing more. But in this case it is unhappily different; inflammation has set in, and in a few hours all will be over. I can do nothing more, but I will look in again later."

As the doctor left the room, Cyril opened his eyes, and there was a gleam of consciousness in them.

"Mother!" he faintly whispered, "I heard what he said; I know I am dying. Oh, why did you teach me to love the strong drink that has killed me! Oh, mother! I am dying! You have ruined me, body and soul!" And, with a convulsive groan, he relapsed into insensibility. He never spoke again. Through the long hours of that night we watched by his bedside, hoping, praying, oh how fervently, for another gleam of consciousness, but Isabel had heard the last words from the lips of her idolized boy.

The doctor came in later, as he had promised, and stood with us; but no human skill could avail now; and when the morning's sun arose it looked upon a lifeless body lying there; the spirit of Cyril Willowby had passed away forever.

And his dying words, like a poisoned dagger, they rankled in the heart of his bereaved and agonized mother. The constant thought that to her her boy ascribed his ruin, was more than she could bear: it killed her!

For two months she lingered, slowly fading day by day. I tried to impart to her the consolations of religion. God grant my efforts may not have been in vain! I never knew how far she received the truth. No immediate danger had been anticipated, but one night she passed away, quietly, painlessly; falling asleep in time to awake in eternity. "Died of a broken heart" might truthfully have been inscribed upon her tombstone.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Conscience Speaks.

Old Marlowe strove, notwithstanding a ead of failure, to resume his old occupation. Doggedly every morning he put on his brown paper cap, and went off to his crowded little workshop, but with unequal footsteps, quite unlike his former firm tread. But it would not do. He stood for hours before his half-shaped blocks of oak, with birds, and leaves, and heads partly traced upon them; but he found himself powerless to complete his own designs. Between him and them stood the image of Phebe, a poverty-stricken, work-worn woman, toiling with her hands, in all weathers, upon their three or four barren fields which were now the only property left to him. It had been pleasant to him to see her milk the cows, and help him to fetch in the sheep from the moors; but until now he had been able to pay for the rougher work on the farmstead. His neighbor, Samuel Nixey, had let his laborers do it for him, since he had kept his own hands and time for his artistic pursuit. But he could afford this no longer, and the thought of the next winter's work which lay before him and Phebe harassed him terribly.

"Father," she said to him one evening, after she had been at Riversborough, "they are all going away; Mrs. Sefton, and Madame, and the children. They are going to Scarborough, and after that to London, never to come back. I shall not see them again."

"Thank God!" thought the dumb old man; and his eyes gleamed brightly from under their thick gray eyebrows. But he did not utter the words, so much less easy was it for his fingers to betray his thoughts than it would have been for his lips. And Phebe did not guess them.

"Is there any news of him?" he asked.

"Not a word,' she answered. "Mr. Clifford has almost given it up. He is an unforgiving man, an awful man."

"No, no; he is a just man," said old Marlowe; "he wants nothing but his own again, like me; and that a scoundrel should not get off scot free. I want my money back; it's not money merely, but my years, and my brain, and my love for thee, and my power to work; that's what he has robbed me of. Let me have my money back, and I'll forgive him."

"Poor father!" said Phebe aloud, with a little sob. How easy it seemed to her to forgive a wrong that could be definitely stated at six hundred pounds! All her inward grief was that Roland had fallen; he himself. If by a whole sacrifice of herself she could have reinstated him in the place he had forfeited, she would not have hesitated for an instant. But no sacrifice she could make would restore him.

"Does Mrs. Sefton know what he has done?" inquired her father.

She nodded only in reply.

"Does she believe him innocent?" he asked.

"No," answered Phebe.

"And Madame, his mother?" he pursued.

"No, no, no! she cannot believe him guilty," she replied; "she thinks he could free himself if he would only come home. She is far happier than Mrs. Sefton or me. I would lay down my life to have him true and honest and good again, as he used to be. I feel as if I was in a miserable dream."

They were sitting together outside their cottage-door, with the level rays of the setting sun shining across the uplands upon them, and the fresh air of the evening breathing upon their faces. It was an hour they both loved, but neither of them felt its beauty and tranquillity now.

"You love him next to me?" asked old Marlowe.

"Next to you, father," she repeated.

But the subtle jealousy in the father's heart whispered that his daughter loved these grand friends of hers more than himself. What could he be to her, deaf mute that he was? What could he do for her? All he had done had been swept away by the wrongdoing of this fine gentleman, for whom she was willing to lay down her life. He looked at her with wistful eyes, longing to hold closer, swifter communication with her than could be held by their slow finger-speech. How could he ever make her know all the love and pride pent up in his voiceless heart?

Phebe, in her girlish, blind preoccupation, saw nothing of his eager, wistful gaze, did not even notice the nervous trembling of his stammering fingers; and the old man felt thrown back upon himself, in more utter loneliness of spirit than his life had ever experienced before. Yet he was not so old a man, for he was little over sixty; but his hard life of incessant toil and his isolation from his fellow-creatures had aged him. This bitter calamity added many years to his actual age, and he began to realize that his right hand was forgetting its cunning, his eye for beauty was growing dim, and his craft failing him. The long, light summer days kept him for a while from utter hopelessness. But as the autumn winds began to moan and mutter round the house he told himself that his work was done, and that soon Phebe would be a friendless and penniless orphan.

"I ought not to have let Roland Sefton go," he thought to himself; "if I'd done my duty he would have been paying for his sin now, and maybe there would have been some redress for us that lost by him. None of his people will come to poverty like my Phebe. I could have held up my head if I had not helped him to escape from punishment."

If old Marlowe, or Mr. Clifford himself, could have followed Roland Sefton during his homeless wanderings, their rigorous sense of justice would have been satisfied that he was not escaping punishment, though he might elude the arbitrary penalty of the law.

As the summer advanced, and the throng of yearly tourists poured into the playground of Europe from every country, but especially from England, he was driven away from all the towns and villages where he might by chance be recognized by some fellow-countryman. Up into the mountain pastures he retreated, where he rambled from one châlet to another, sleeping on beds of fodder, with the keen night air piercing through the apertures of roof and walls, yet bringing with it those intolerable stenches which exhale from the manure and mire lying ankle-deep round each picturesque little hut. The yelping of the watch-dogs, the snoring of the tired herdsmen lying within arm's length of him, the shrill tinkling of cow-bells, musical enough by day and in the distance, but driving sleep away too harshly, the sickness and depression produced by unwholesome food, and the utter compulsory abandonment of all his fastidious and personal habits made his mere bodily life intolerable to him. He had borne something like these discomforts and privations for a day or two at a time, when engaged in Alpine climbing; but that he should be forced to live a life, compared with which that of an Irish bog-trotter was decent and civilized, was a daily torment to him.

It is true that during the long hours of daylight he wandered among the most sublime scenery. Sometimes he scaled solitary peaks and looked down upon far-stretching landscapes below him, with broad, dead rivers of glaciers winding between the high and terrible masses of snow-clad rocks, and creeping down into peaceful valleys, where little living streams of silvery gray wandered among châlets looking no larger than the rocks strewn around them, with a tiny church in their midst, lifting up its spire of glittering metal with a kind of childish confidence and exultation. Here and there, in deep sunken hollows, lay small tarns, black as night, and guilty-looking, with precipices overhanging them fringed with pointed pine-trees, which sought in vain to mirror themselves in those pitch-dark waters. And above them all, gazing down in silent greatness, rose the snow-mountains, very cold, whiter than any other whiteness on earth; pure and stainless in their far-off loveliness as the deep blue of the pure sky behind them.

But there was something unutterably awful to Roland Sefton in this sublimity. A bad man, whose ear has never heard the voice of nature, and whose eye is blind to her ineffable beauty, may dwell in such places and not be crushed by them. The dull herdsmen, thinking only of their cattle and of the milking to be done twice a day, might live their own stupid, commonplace lives there. The chance visitor who spent a few hours in scaling difficult cliffs, would perhaps catch a brief and fleeting sense of their awfulness, only too quickly dissipated by the unwonted toil and peril of his situation. But Roland Sefton felt himself exiled to their ice-bound solitudes, cut off from all companionship, and attended only by an accusing conscience.

Morning after morning, when his short and feverish night was ended, he went out in the early dawn, while all the valleys below were still slumbering in darkness, self-driven into the wilderness of rock and snow rising above the wretched châlets. With coarse food sufficient for the wants of the day he strayed wherever his aimless footsteps led him. It was seldom that he stayed more than a night or two in the same herdsman's hut. When he was well out of the track of tourists he ventured down into the lower villages now and then, seeking a few days of comparative comfort. But some rumor, or the arrival of some chance traveller more enterprising and investigating than the mass, always drove him away again. There was no peace for him, either in the high Alps or the most secluded valleys.

How could there be peace while memory and conscience were gnawing at his heart? In a dreary round his thoughts went back to the first beginnings of the road that had led him hither; with that vague feeling which all of us have when retracing the irrecoverable past, as if by some mighty effort of our will we could place ourselves at the starting-point again and run our race—oh, how differently!

Roland could almost fix the date when he had first wished that Mr. Clifford's bonds, bequeathed to him, were already his own. He recollected the very day when old Marlowe had asked him to invest his money for him in some safe manner for Phebe's benefit; and how he had persuaded himself that nothing could be safer than to use it for his own purposes, and to pay a higher interest than the old man could get elsewhere. What he had done for him had been still easier to do for other clients; ignorant men and women who knew nothing of business, and left it all to him, gratefully pleased with the good interest he paid them. The web had been woven with almost invisible threads at the first; but the finest thread among them was a heavy cable now.

But the one thought that haunted him, never leaving him for an instant in these terrible solitudes, was the thought of Felicita. His mother he could forget sometimes, or remember her with a dewy tenderness at his heart, as if he could feel her pitiful love clinging to him still; and his children he dreamed of at times in a day-dream, as playing merrily without him, in the blissful ignorance of childhood. But Felicita, who did not love him as his mother did, and could not remain in ignorance of his crime! Was she not something like those pure, distant, snowy pinnacles, inapproachable and repellent, with icy-cold breath which petrified all lips that drew too near to them? And he had set a stain upon that purity as white as the driven snow. The name he had given to her was tarnished, and would be publicly dishonored if he failed in evading the penalty he merited. His death alone could save her from notorious and intolerable disgrace.

But though he was reckless of his life, he could not bring himself to be guilty of suicide. Death was wooing him in many forms, day by day, to seek refuge with it. When his feet slipped among the yawning crevasses of the glaciers, the smallest wilful negligence would have buried him in their blue depths. The common impulse to cast himself down the precipices along whose margin he crept had only to be yielded to, and all his earthly woe would be over. Even to give way to the weary drowsiness that overtook him at times as the sun went down, and the night fell upon him far away from shelter, might have soothed him into the slumber from which there is no awaking. But he dared not. He was willing enough to die, if dying had been all. But he believed in the punishment of sin here, or hereafter—in the dealing out of a righteous judgment to every man, whether he be good or evil.

As the autumn passed by and the mountain châlets were shut up, the cattle and the herdsmen descending to the lower pastures, Roland Sefton was compelled to descend too. There was little chance of encountering any one who knew him at this late season; yet there were still stragglers lingering among the Alps. But when he saw himself again in a looking-glass, his face burned and blistered with the sun and now almost past recognition, and his ragged hair and beard serving him better than any disguise, he was no longer afraid of being detected. He began to wonder, in mingled hope and dread, whether Felicita would come out to seek him. The message he had sent to her by Phebe could be interpreted by her alone. Would she avail herself of it to find him out? Or would she shrink from the toil, and pain, and danger of quitting England? A few weeks more would answer the question.

THE LAST DAYS OF MOSES.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 11. Deut. 32:44-52. Golden Text, Ps. 90:12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE last days of Moses were very full ones. In his forty years of preparation in the land of Midian he had made close and deep acquaintance with his God; during the wanderings of the children of Israel in the wilderness he had been tried to the utmost in faith and patience, and only once had he been found wanting. Now the end was near, and instead of being occupied in remedying past mistakes and making up for lost time, he took the last steps of his life's course in spiritual and physical vigor, his whole being at the disposal of his God and his God's people. The last thirty-six days of life were engaged in speaking to the people, and afterward in writing almost the whole of the book of Deuteronomy. Writing was no easy work in those days; many records were made on monuments or graven upon the solid rock, some writing was done by an iron style upon the papyrus leaf, which grew by the river Nile; but anything like our rapid writing with pen, paper, and ink, was then unknown. It was on the first day of the eleventh month in the fortieth year after their coming out of the land of Egypt that Moses began to speak thus unto the people (Deut. 1:3), and on the tenth day of the first month in the next year they came up out of Jordan (Jos. 4:19), the three previous days were passed in preparation for their passage (Jos. 3:2), the spies which Joshua had sent to Jericho were hidden three days, being apparently the same three days as those of preparation (compare Jos. 1:11; 2:22; 22:4-19); this leaves thirty days for the mourning over Moses's death (Deut. 34:8), and thirty-six days only for the delivery and transcription of the last charge of Moses, which forms the chief part of the book of Deuteronomy.

Moses had sorely longed to see the good land which God had given unto His people; he besought the Lord, saying, "O Lord God, thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand: . . . I pray thee, let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon." But although God had granted him so many great requests and had suffered His wrath to be turned away again and again in answer to Moses' prayer, this personal request was not granted; the Lord said, "Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto Me of this matter" (Deut. 3:24-26).

And now Moses' last birthday came. He was a hundred and twenty years old; but though he said "I can no more go out and come in" (Deut. 31:2) for he knew his end was come yet his whole heart was as full of the people of God as though he had been only in the first spring of manly energy. The Lord had shown him that he himself might not go over Jordan, but he rejoiced to declare to them, "The Lord thy God, He will go over before thee;" and then, most touchingly, he called Joshua and without a trace of jealousy encouraged him and strengthened him in the sight of all Israel to take the place which he was resigning by the will of his God. There is a holy dignity about all this worthy of a man who lived day and night within sight and hearing of his God. He had previously declared the blessings and the cursings which should come upon the people, according to their diligence in hearkening to the voice of the Lord their God, or their negligence in refusing to hear and to obey; and now once again he charges them on this last birthday that, when they should be come to appear before the Lord in the place that He should choose, they should gather together all the people, men, women, and children, and read this law in their hearing (Deut. 31:11-13). Joshua obeyed this command (Jos. 8:34, 35), and once in the time of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:30), and once in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 9) this was done.

But Moses' work was not yet entirely completed, the Lord told him that the days approached that he must die, and He told him to call Joshua and present himself with him before the tabernacle of the congregation that He might give Joshua a charge. And the Lord Himself "appeared in the tabernacle in a pillar of a cloud," all the congregation could see that God was intimate with His servants to the last; and then God foretold the future defection of His people, and how His anger would be kindled against them, and He inspired Moses to write a song which should "testify against them as a witness; for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed (Deut. 31:14-22). It was Moses' birthday occupation to write this glorious song of God's faithfulness (Deut. 32), which is more than three thousand years old, and it would seem that it was on the self-same day that he taught it to the gathered officers and elders of their tribes; and he commanded them to keep the written book of the law in the side of the ark, that it might be a witness against them. Thus the learned song and the written Word were both witnesses against them.

It was a wonderful song, speaking of the greatness and power of their God, then of His tenderness and faithfulness to His people. Now He found them in their weakness, and made them great, now they departed from Him and gave themselves over to idolatry, and now He brought trouble upon them; yet He yearned over them and said, "O that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!" Then when their power was gone He would "repent Himself for His servants," and in the end would be "merciful unto His land, and to His people." See the hale old man, with his strong voice and his firm step, as he speaks the inspired words and makes the elders of Israel commit them to memory, while his own soul glows with the glorious theme, and his eye, undimmed with age, sparkles. He does not look like a dying man, there is no trace of pain or sickness, or infirmity, for he has kept the statute and the ordinance which God gave to Israel, "If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in His sight, and wilt give ear to His commandments, and keep all His statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians; for I am the Lord that healeth thee" [or the Lord thy Physician] (Ex. 15:26).

But Moses was not satisfied with the mere committing of this song to memory on the part of the people. He "made an end of speaking all these words to all Israel: and he said unto them, "Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day." Moses was not inclined to lose his time, for he had none to spare, nor yet the last few moments of strength which were given him. He wanted to do real work for eternity, and he knew by long experience that the very Word of God itself when it goes only head deep, and not heart deep never saves a soul or gives a believer victory. Oh, if this command were obeyed, if but one Sunday every hearer of the truth of God in all parts of the world would set his heart to the words testified, if every Sunday scholar set his heart to the lesson taught, if every preacher and teacher set his heart to the words he spoke, what a spring tide of conversions would flow up into the kingdom of God, what an unspeakable impetus would the work of God receive.

Now all was done, Moses had completed his life's work, God needed him no more upon earth, he had nothing to do but to bless the people, to see the Land of Canaan, and to die. The last command was given, the hours of that hundred and twentieth birthday were running quickly away. "And the Lord spake unto Moses that self-same day, saying, Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto Mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, that is over against Jericho; and behold the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession; and die in the mount whither thou goest up." Neither sickness nor accident were the messengers of God to call His chosen servant away from this to a better world. Moses was at God's disposal for life or for death, and we may believe that it was with no hesitating step that he took his way up into the mountain to return no more.

O how God honors those who honor Him! His very exactness with Moses was in itself a token of how dear to His heart was the education of this His servant. As Moses throughout his life insisted on having to do immediately with God, and refused the interference even of an angel to guide him in the way, so God also dealt immediately with Moses without intermediate agency. It was neither by dream nor by angel, nor by prophet, but by His own voice, face to face, that the Lord spoke to Moses, for this faithful servant "endured—as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11:2). Whenever the people murmured against him, Moses always went to God and laid his cause before Him, and then did as God showed him in all the authority of a man sent from God. And living thus in constant converse with Him, how should the call to die and to enter into a nearer contact with God trouble him? It could not. We may well believe there was no death struggle, but a calm, dignified resignation of life into the hands of Him who gave it; it was but the opening of another chapter in the life of eternity already begun. Lord, teach us so to live, and if the Lord tarries, so to die.

EDITH ARUNDEL'S QUESTION.

GEORGE HARDY had ferried many a passenger over the broad river on which he earned his livelihood before the day on which Edith Arundel stepped into his boat; but that day was one he never forgot. He was lithe and strong, and on this as on other days he bent to his oars with a will. He was an observant young fellow, and he glanced once or twice at his passenger with some interest. She was a stranger to him, but her sweet, kindly face attracted him. Usually silent, he for once ventured a remark or two on the weather and the tide, and from this the conversation, respectful on his side and cordial on that of Edith, became animated.

Edith Arundel was one of those Christian girls who are anxious that an opportunity for speaking a word for her Saviour should not be lost, but for some time she could see no way to an opening. At last the attitude of the boatman seemed to present the chance she sought. She asked, "How do you manage to guide your boat so skilfully while your back is turned toward your destination?" "Oh," he replied, "I am used to the ferry, miss; I know exactly where we are going, there is no need for me to turn to look." "I think," said Edith, "many people spend their lives the same way with less reason. They are travelling one way and looking another."

The idea was new to the boatman, and he said so. Then Edith explained. It was but a short ride; but before Edith left the boat the sculler had two questions lodged in his heart: "Where am I going at last?" "Am I looking toward that eternal haven, or am I looking to the world?" Beside this Edith had taken care that he should have an opportunity of getting an answer to those questions. The Bible she carried, and from which she read to him a few texts such as she was directed to at the moment, was left in his hands with a few words of prayer. That prayer was answered, for God gave her that soul.

The Bible House: Built 1853. The Christian Herald Founded October, 1878.

The past year has been one of great prosperity for The Christian Herald, and the Publishers for the third time record their acknowledgments to Almighty God for the favor thus steadily and abundantly bestowed.

The subscription list is a little more than 50 per cent. larger than it was at this time last year; and as the sermons of Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, which make the leading feature of the paper, are also its principal means of doing good, the publishers can, without self-glorification, express the satisfaction with which they send out thousands upon thousands of copies of those faithful statements of the way of salvation every week. They are read on Sabbaths in many solitary homes where the visit of the circuit preacher does not occur oftener than once a month.

The Christian Herald has also prospered financially. For, as our terms are always cash in advance, every subscription means a receipted bill, and we have neither outstanding accounts nor doubtful assets.

Our relations with our subscribers also have been of the pleasantest kind, with no harassing for payment and no disputes about bills. We have adhered to the rule with which we started, and which we believe to be required by Christian courtesy: viz., to reply by return of post to every inquiry from a subscriber.

We hereby tender our thanks to eight hundred agents, through whose exertions we have largely built up our circulation. Some are aged persons, who find that means of livelihood within their failing strength; some are young children, who take it as an easy way to earn pocket-money; and others are men and women in the prime of life who have chosen canvassing as their professional business; while not a few are to be included in the number who, out of sheer good-will and without a thought of gain, go to work to promote the circulation of The Christian Herald, in the usefulness of which they conscientiously believe.

Now we shall be glad to enter renewals for 1882 as early as it is convenient for our subscribers to send them, and we repeat our offer to mail a circular of agent's terms and a package of sample copies to any person who contemplates canvassing for the paper.

THE subject of this biographical outline is the pride of the Presbyterian denomination in the South. Like most men of decided character, clear conviction, and uncompromising disposition, he has warmer friends and sterner opponents than those men have whose habitual attitude is not sufficiently stalwart either to attract or to repel with energy. But when personal sentiments have no play, and some occasion brings him into notice simply as a minister of the Gospel, every Christian, and still more every Presbyterian, feels instinctively that loyalty to his own cause enjoins a cordial tribute to Dr. Palmer's ability, industry, scholarship, and eloquence. He has preached for more than twenty years in the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans, to the gratification of a large congregation and the appreciation of numerous strangers; he has made contributions to literature of no common value; and he has been a champion in many a conflict of his denomination.

If we trace Dr. Palmer's family back to the middle of

we find a minister of the same name in Massachusetts, whose son, Job Palmer, moved to Charleston, S. C., in company with William Tennant. That was the William Tennant, a devout and faithful minister, who seemed to die at the end of a severe illness, but came to life again after several weeks, his interment having been postponed all that time at the urgency of a friend who persisted that he felt a warm spot over the heart of the cold and stiffened body.

Job Palmer was in Charleston when the war of the Revolution broke out, and fell for a time a prisoner into the hands of the British. He continued to reside in Charleston after the establishment of the Republic, and died there at a great age, leaving two sons. One of these was the Rev. Dr. Benjamin Morgan Palmer, for many years the distinguished pastor of the Circular Church in Charleston. The other, the Rev. Edward Palmer, still lives, though more than ninety years old, and has two sons and one daughter. The daughter is Mrs. Hutson, the wife of a legal practitioner in Barnwell, C. H., S. C. The younger of the sons is Dr. Edward Palmer, of Mobile, Ala. The elder, named after his uncle, is he of whom we are writing, Dr. B. M. Palmer, of New Orleans.

Dr. Palmer was born upward of sixty years ago in South Carolina, but was sent for his education to the University of Georgia, at Athens, and there he graduated. He exhibited at that time, in a youthful way, some of the characteristics which in a better form now give symmetry to his mature years. He was animated in conversation, jocular and even mischievous in disposition, fond of society, and stylish in his dress. He was also proficient in his studies, and a leader among his fellows.

Brought up in a godly household, he came imperceptibly under the power of the Gospel; but it was Professor Porter, of Andover, Mass., who first turned his thoughts to the ministerial profession. He received his training for the ministry at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Columbia, S. C., where he came under the influence of Dr. Thornwell, who was then President of the South Carolina College, and received an impress upon his character which has never departed.

The following account of

is given in Dr. Palmer's own words: "Some strolling minstrels had an exhibition in the town, during which some indecorum among the audience drew forth a sharp rebuke from the performers. It was unfortunately levelled at some students, who claimed to be innocent of the offence. The result was a row, in which the meeting was broken up in great disorder. In the progress of the affair the students became arrayed against the young men of the town, and very soon a serious riot was threatened in the public streets. The students rallied to a man, like an old Scotch clan in the times of border warfare, and could not be persuaded to disperse by those who harangued the tempestuous assembly. Dr. Thornwell appeared late upon the ground, and when the storm was at its height.

"Without wasting breath upon men who were delirious with passion, he sought out the parties originally aggrieved, ascended into the hall with them, confronted the other party from whom the alleged grievance came, heard both sides of the story, and made up his mind quickly upon the merits of the case. He satisfied the minstrels that they had been mistaken as to the real authors of the outrage, and exacted of them a promise to repair the error by coming the next day into the college chapel with a formal retraction of the charge. He then descended to the street, and simply informed the infuriated students that the case was amicably settled and would be reported to them on the morrow. This simple affirmation from one in whose honor they implicitly confided appeased the storm, and in a few moments the street was as quiet as a churchyard."

Having completed his course at the Seminary and received ordination, Dr. Palmer held his first charge at Savannah, Ga., for one year, after which he accepted a call to a church in Columbia. He had acted there several years, when he was induced to occupy the temporarily vacant chair of a professor in the Seminary, thus returning as an instructor to the institution which had instructed him. That temporary engagement opened the way for his appointment to the permanent professorship of Church History. The occasion was further improved by his becoming the son-in-law of Dr. George Howe, Professor of Biblical Literature in the seminary, whose semi-centennial in that chair was celebrated last month at Columbia.

His leaning, however, was much stronger toward the charge of a congregation than toward the chair of a professor, and being flattered with many calls, he accepted in 1856 the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans. He held that position for five or six years, till the outbreak and progress of the war dissolved his congregation and drove him back to Columbia. But on the restoration of peace he returned, and from that time to the present he has remained in the same position. While we imagine these uneventful years of study and work to be passing on, we may step aside and survey the scope of his mission and the character of his influence.

The dominating features of Dr. Palmer's mind are a strong understanding and a rigid sense of duty. So powerful are these in their operation that whatever the difficulties of a position he may be placed in, and whatever the bent of his habits, it may be predicted with considerable certainty that he will discern the proper course to take, and will have the self-mastery to follow it. According to this rule there has been neither dubiousness nor inconsistency in his course for the last thirty years. He has always been outspoken in his opinions, and has in no instance disappointed his friends or surprised his opponents.

He has clear and wholesome convictions on the rights of authority—the authority of God, of kings and rulers, of magistrates, of ministers, of teachers, of masters and of parents, of synods, assemblies, and conferences. He sees that order and integrity cannot be continuously maintained in a church unless the principles of its government as well as the articles of its doctrine be accurately comprehended and expressly defined. And whenever there has been a division in the counsels of his own body on some point involving the qualification of a principle, the relaxation of a law, or the concession of a compromise, he has not lost time in announcing his side of the dispute.

HIS PET AVERSION

is the subterfuge of accepting a creed in "the substance of its doctrine," by which one or more prominent ministers in every leading denomination of Protestantism have opened a way to Universalism, Unitarianism, and Rationalism.

His position as a Southerner is equally decided. Many men who were strong secessionists at the time of the war, have, with the lapse of years and the alteration of circumstances, come to look at the great questions then at issue with less keenness of interest than they did when they knew no order of things but that to which they were accustomed. But Dr. Palmer's judgment was independent from the beginning. When war was only dreamed of as a dreadful possibility, he saw and estimated clearly how much good and how much evil would accrue whichever of three events took place, whether the North triumphed or the South triumphed, or whether war were successfully averted.

At the same time his active sense of his highest obligations made him zealously join those elder men who strove with heart and soul to identify the Presbyterian Church of America with the kingdom which is not of this world, and to preserve its unity and fulfil its mission regardless of the disruptions of secular governments. The effort proving unsuccessful, he became a member of the Southern General Assembly.

Dr. Palmer takes the widest view of the duty of every Church to proclaim the Gospel, by all lawful means, among all classes that can be reached. He considers the formation of Boards, to carry on education, tract distribution, home and foreign missions, and other Christian operations, to be a delegation of responsibility. Perhaps he would not interfere with these organizations as long as there was no competitor in the field with them. But he would have every Church organize evangelistic agencies for itself to the full extent of the power that God has given to it.

He has carried out this principle throughout his own career, and, more from a stern sense of duty than from other motives, has caused Sunday-schools, mission churches, and schools and classes for the colored people to grow into vigorous life in connection with each of the pastoral charges he has held. When he was at Columbia before the war, he had a large Sunday-school for negro children, and at the Lord's Supper in his church there used to be a considerable number of colored communicants. He has always been very popular as a preacher with that race, for they recognize his conscientious desire to see their souls saved, and appreciate his uniform kindness.

Dr. Palmer preaches without notes: his style is animated, his flow of language is smooth and accurate, his bearing in the pulpit is dignified, and his countenance is expressive. The substance of his sermons takes shape from the mould of his mind, and is expository and doctrinal. So philosophical are his mental operations that even when speaking of the way of salvation he will dwell upon the legal and spiritual processes of conversion, and seemingly overlook the spectacle of a frenzied soul rushing into the open arms of the Saviour. To the admiration which Dr. Palmer wins by the power of his preaching and the urbanity of his manner is added the respect which is always accorded to solid ability and conscientious industry.

Notwithstanding the heavy tax upon his time in responding to but a portion of the requests that come to him to preach and to lecture, he has written a great many essays and reviews. Two octavo volumes of his sermons preached in New Orleans have been printed by a member of his congregation. The work which entitles him to be ranked as an author is an able memoir of his teacher and friend, upon whom he has lavished expressions of generous admiration. And Dr. Thornwell's sound orthodoxy was not the least point of his character which the biographer admired, as the following extract will illustrate: "Penetrated with the conviction that God can be known only so far as He has been pleased to reveal Himself, he bowed with perfect docility before the dogmatic authority of the Scriptures. The writer has heard him say a dozen times, 'I have been cogitating upon such and such a subject, and can see no flaw in my reasoning, but I am gravelled with one verse in the Bible;' and then he would add, with inexpressible simplicity, 'You know, P., that if there is but one passage of Scripture against us our speculations must go to the winds.'" That was placing the Creator and the created in their proper relations.

In the spring of the present year the church in New Orleans came near losing its esteemed pastor. When the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church met at Staunton, Va., and the report of the Standing Committee on Theological Seminaries was read, a very animated discussion arose as to the transference of Dr. Palmer to the chair of Pastoral Theology in the Columbia Seminary. It was understood that his preference for the work of a preacher would be met, if the duty devolving on him were to give instruction in the art of preaching and not to impart book-learning. His acceptance of the call from the seminary was urged with great earnestness and ability; and on the other hand members of the Presbytery of New Orleans and members of the Assembly of the South-west urged with equal force that he could not be spared from his present field of labor.

The General Assembly declined to instruct Dr. Palmer to accept the invitation to Columbia, and contented itself with simply indorsing his selection to the professorship of Pastoral Theology. It did that very heartily. Dr. Palmer would no doubt have obeyed without question any instruction of the General Assembly, for, as we have seen, he is a loyal son of the Church and stanch in upholding its system of government; but having to decide the matter himself, he concluded to decline the call to Columbia, and to remain with the people to whom he is so much attached, and who so warmly return his regard. So the connection which has been so many years sustained promises to be indefinitely prolonged.

Dr. Palmer has been heavily afflicted with bereavement, nearly all his children having been removed from this earthly scene. The first-born child was his only son. He lost him and several girls. One married daughter remains to him, and he has several grandchildren.

A GOSPEL TRIUMPH IN AN ATTIC.

(See Illustration, page 780.)

A VISITOR among the poor was one day climbing the broken staircase which led to the highest floor of a tenement house, in one of the worst parts of London, when his attention was arrested by a man of ferocious and repulsive countenance, who stood upon the landing-place, leaning with folded arms against the wall. There was something about the man's appearance which made the visitor shudder; and his first impulse was to go back. He made an effort, however, to get into conversation with the man, and told him that he came there with the desire to do him good and to see him happy, and that the Book he had in his hand contained the secret of all happiness.

The ruffian shook him off as if he had been a viper, and bade him begone with his nonsense, or he would kick him downstairs.

When the visitor was endeavoring, with gentleness and patience, to argue the point with him, he was startled by hearing a feeble voice, which appeared to come from behind one of the broken doors that opened upon the landing, saying,

"Does your Book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?" And it was repeated, in urgent and thrilling tones, "Tell me—does your Book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?"

The visitor pushed open the door and entered the room. It was a wretched place, wholly destitute of furniture, except a three-legged stool and a bundle of straw in a corner, upon which were stretched the wasted limbs of an aged woman. When the visitor entered, she raised herself upon one elbow, fixed her eyes eagerly upon him, and repeated her former question,

"Does your Book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?"

He sat down upon the stool beside her, and inquired, "My poor friend, what do you want to know of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?" There was something fearful in the energy of her voice and manner as she replied, "What do I want to know of it? Man, I am dying! I am going to stand naked before God! I have been a wicked woman, a very wicked woman, all my life. I shall have to answer for everything I have done!'" And she groaned bitterly as the thought of a lifetime's iniquity crossed her soul.

"But once," she continued, "once, years ago, I came by the door of a church, and I went in—I don't know what for. I was soon out again, but one word I heard there I never forgot. It was something about blood which cleanseth from all sin. Oh, if I could hear of it now! Tell me, tell me, if there is anything about that blood in your Book."

The visitor answered by opening his Bible and reading the first chapter of the first Epistle of John. The poor creature seemed to devour the words and when he paused, she exclaimed, "Read more, read more!" He read the second chapter. A slight noise made him look round; the savage ruffian had followed him into his mother's room, and though his face was partly turned away, the visitor could perceive tears rolling down his cheeks. The visitor read the third, fourth and fifth chapters before he could get the poor listener to consent that he should stop, and then she would not let him go till he had promised to come again the next day. He never from that time missed a day reading to her until she died.

Every day the son followed the visitor into his mother's room, and listened in silence, but not in indifference. On the day of her funeral he beckoned the visitor to one side, as they were filling up her grave, and said:

"Sir, I have been thinking that there is nothing I should so much like as to spend the rest of my life in telling others of the blood which cleanseth from all sin."

"HALF-SCREWED."

SAM TIMBERS, looking rather seedy and dilapidated when he went to work on a certain Tuesday morning, was taxed by his fellow-workmen with having been drunk the day previous. While denying that he had been positively drunk, he admitted that he had been "half-screwed," which expression was evidently understood as meaning but halfway toward drunkenness. Sam Timbers, no doubt, thought this explanation took off all the disgrace, and put him in a right position in the opinion of all thoughtful, unprejudiced minds. Now, my desire is to have a few words with Sam, and to point out a few facts about this "half-screwed" condition.

Now, Sam, you're a carpenter, and therefore well acquainted with screws and their ways. You have driven in a good many screws in your day, far more perhaps than I have ever seen; so that to dwell upon the nature of a screw proper would be an unpardonable insult.

But one thing I will say, Sam, that if you would stick to your steel screws, and let the other kind alone, it would be vastly the better for you. Be honest now. Don't you think so yourself?

Which screws give you the most trouble, Sam? I dare say now and then you get an unmanageable steel screw which won't go in straight, try as hard as you may. And I expect sometimes you get bothered with a screw that isn't long enough. But what are these little inconveniences compared with the other screw, yourself?

When you make yourself into a screw, and wriggle about, and turn round and round, and find a difficulty in getting into your own doorway, don't you think you are working at a trade you were never intended for? Take my advice, Sam, and stick to your steel screws.

And then there's the matter of cost. You are paid for driving the steel screws, and you have to pay for driving the others. When you go screw-driving yourself, Sam, it is not only a painful, disagreeable, dishonoring process, but it is absolutely expensive. I shouldn't like to ask you how much you spent yesterday only in half-screwing yourself. Be a wise man now, Sam, and look after your wages, and instead of losing a day's work, and spending hard cash in screwing yourself, save your time and your money by working at the right sort of screws.

And then, there is another question I should much like to ask you. You say you were only "half-screwed." Now, didn't you mean "half-unscrewed"—"half-screwed out?" I feel you did. At any rate, I shall take it for granted that you meant "half-screwed out." Oh, Sam, Sam, what a rebuke this gives you! You, a good workman, to undo good work like this. After you have screwed, to "half-unscrew" again! Why couldn't you let well alone, Sam? And then to go and unscrew this so nicely screwed-up state of things and spoil it all. I'm ashamed of you, Sam.

And now, what a long time it will take to screw it up again, far longer than it took to unscrew it. Isn't it a sad pity? Weeks and months perhaps will pass away before you find your former standing again.

And then, it is a fact worth remembering, that the screw will never fit so easily and accurately again. Who doesn't know that the first screwing is always the tightest? I am no carpenter, but I learned that long ago. And the oftener you unscrew it, so much the worse it will fit. It is possible to so wear out the hole as to make it not only difficult but hopeless to fit the screw in it any more. O! Sam, what if you undo your prospects altogether with this miserable unscrewing of yours?

It means more than this. It means such an unfixed, unsettled state of things, that when the great storm of death and judgment breaks upon you, as one day it must and will, you will have nothing to lay hold of, and will assuredly drift away into the blackness of eternal death.

Sam, the screw is half out, perhaps, to-day. You have been "half-screwed." You may have recovered from your spree. But your soul is well-nigh unscrewed. Fix it, Sam; fix it. You can't fix it yourself, but there is One who can.

The blessed Saviour is the grand fixer of tossing, restless souls. He fixes them to Himself. And then, in contact with the precious blood, in the midst of the everlasting strength, you will be able to say, "O God, my heart is fixed; my heart is fixed. I will sing and give praise."

JOHN BUNYAN LISTENING TO THE WOMEN OF BEDFORD.

OUR engraving illustrates an important crisis in the life of the world-famed dreamer who wrote "The Pilgrim's Progress," which is well described by Bunyan himself in the following extract from his "Autobiography:"

Describing his struggles after inward peace, Bunyan says: "Poor wretch that I was, I was all this while ignorant of Jesus Christ, and going about to establish my own righteousness, and had perished therein had not God been merciful to me. But upon a day the good Providence of God called me to Bedford to work at my calling (a tinker), and in one of the streets of that town I came, where there were three or four poor women sitting at the door in the sun talking about the things of God. Being now willing to hear their discourse, I drew near to hear what they said, for I was a brisk talker in matters of religion; but they were far above my reach.

"Their talk was about the new birth, the work of God in their hearts, and also how they were convinced of their miserable state by nature. They talked of how God had visited their souls with His love in the Lord Jesus, and with what words and promises they had been refreshed, comforted, and supported against the temptations of the devil. Moreover, they reasoned of the suggestions of Satan in particular, and told to each other by what means they had been afflicted, and how they were borne up under his assaults. They also discoursed on their own wretchedness of heart, and of their unbelief, and did condemn, hate, and abhor their own righteousness, as vile and insufficient to do them any good.

"When I had heard and considered what they said, I left them and went about my employment again, but my heart would tarry with them, for I was greatly affected by their words." This conversation was one of the links in the chain of events which led to Bunyan's conversion. It was "a stepping-stone to higher things."

THE TEN PLAGUES OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.

THE PLAGUE OF GAMBLING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Morning, December 4, 1881.*

"Upon My vesture did they cast lots."—MATTHEW 27 : 35.

The Birth-Place of Lotteries—Moral Outrages—Poor People Robbed—A Circular to Agents—Men Who Have Won Prizes—Tickets of Admission to the Lost World—Art Associations—The Crosby Opera House Scheme—The Prize Packets—Lottery of Lots in a Burying Ground—Men Interested without Knowing it—What is Gambling?—Not a New Sprite—Gambling in the West—It is Unhealthy—Destroys Industry—The Loaded Dice—A San Francisco Gambler—A Letter from New Orleans—A Gambler's Career—The Time to Visit a Gambler's Grave.

CHRIST had been condemned to death and His property was being disposed of. He had no real estate. He was born in a stranger's barn, and buried in a borrowed sepulchre. His personal property was of but little value. His coat was the only thing to come into consideration. His shoes had been worn out in the long journey for the world's redemption. Who shall have His coat? Some one says:

"LET US TOSS UP in a lottery and decide this matter." "I have it!" said one of the inhuman butchers. "I have it!" "Upon My vesture did they cast lots." And there, on that spot, were born all the lotteries the world has seen.

On that spot of cruelty and shame and infamy there was born the Royal Havana Lottery, in which some of you may have had tickets. There was born the famous New York Lottery, which pretended to have over $722,000 worth of cash prizes. There was born the Topeka, Kansas, Laramier City, Wyoming Territory lotteries. There was born the Louisville lottery, with diamonds, and pearls, and watches by the bushel. There was born the Georgia lottery, for the East and the West. There was born the Louisiana Lottery, sanctioned by influential names. There was born the Kentucky Lottery, for the city school of Frankfort. All the lotteries that have swindled the world were born there. Without any exception, all of them moral outrages, whether sanctioned by legislative authority, or antagonized by it, and moral outrages though respectable people have sometimes damaged their property with them, and blistered their immortal souls for eternity.

One of the sad things about these lotteries is that poor people in their extremity and almost frenzied with their destitution, resort to them, and lose their last dollar, their last fifty cents, their last five cents; for there are lotteries where the drawing occurs every five minutes. In the time of the greatest distress in Italy, $14,000,000 were annually expended by the poorer population in lotteries. Let the people in all parts of the land beware when they get hold of any of the circulars that are flooding the country at this time—circulars in language something like this:

"Agents' prize tickets free of cost. Every ticket a prize. No blanks and a fortune within your reach without cost or risk. Any person can easily sell $10 worth of tickets in the enclosed monthly, among personal friends, and secure one of the agents' tickets free of cost. Capital prize $5000. Every ticket wins a prize. There are ten thousand prizes, and only ten thousand tickets."

Under the curse of the lottery tens of thousands of people are losing their fortunes and losing their souls. What they call a "wheel of fortune" is a Juggernaut crushing out the life of their immortal nature. In one of the insolvent courts of the country it was found that in one village $200,000 had been expended for lotteries. All the officers of the celebrated United States Bank which failed were found to have expended the embezzled moneys in lottery tickets. A man won $50,000 in a lottery. He sold his ticket for $42,500, and yet had not enough to pay charges against him for tickets. He owed the brokers $45,000. The editor of a newspaper writes: "My friend was blessed with $20,000 in a lottery, and from that time he began to go astray, and yesterday he asked of me ninepence to pay for a night's lodging."

A man won $20,000 in a lottery. Flattered by his success, he bought another ticket and won still more largely. Another ticket and still more largely. Then, being fairly started on the road to ruin, here and there a loss did not seem to agitate him, and he went on and on until the selectmen of the village pronounced him a vagabond and picked up his children from the street, half starved and almost naked. A hard-working machinist won a thousand dollars in a lottery. He was thrilled with the success, disgusted with his hard work, opened a rum grocery, got debauched in morals and was found dead at the foot of his rum casks.

Oh, it would take a pen plucked from the wing of the destroying angel, and dipped in human blod, to describe this lottery business. A suicide was found having in his pocket a card of address showing he was boarding at a grogshop. Beside that he had three lottery tickets and a leaf from Seneca's Morals arguing in behalf of the righteousness of self-murder. After a lottery in England there were fifty suicides of those who had held unlucky numbers. There are people who have lottery tickets in their pockets—tickets which, if they have not wisdom enough to tear up or burn up, will be their admission tickets at the door of the lost world. The brazen gate will swing open and they will show their tickets, and they will go in, and they will go down. The wheel of their eternal fortune may turn very slowly, but they will find that the doom of those who reject the teachings of God and imperil their immortal soul is their only prize.

I pray God that none of the young men who are in the audience this morning, may ever come to the lamentation of a Boston clerk who had embezzled $18,000 from his employer, and after it was all spent in this infernal lottery business, sat down and wrote these words: "I have for the last seven months gone fast down the broad road. There was a time, and that only a few months since, when I was happy, because I was free from debt and care. The moment of the first steps in my downfall was about the middle of last June, when I took a share in a company—bought lottery tickets whereby I was successful in obtaining a share of one half of the capital prize, since which I have gone from myself. I have lived and dragged out a miserable existence for two or three months past. Oh, that the seven or eight months past of my existence could be blotted out. But I must go, and ere this paper is read my spirit has gone to my Maker to give an account of my misdeeds here, and to receive the eternal sentence for self-destruction and abused confidence. Relatives and friends I have from whom I do not wish to part under such circumstances, but necessity compels. Oh, wretch, lottery tickets have been thy ruin. But I cannot add more."

The dismal echo of the ruin of tens of thousands of young men. But there are a good many respectable people who, while they oppose the ordinary lottery, patronize art associations and gift enterprises under the impression that iniquity is not quite so bad if it have a more popular nomenclature, and that there cannot be any very great harm in a ticket which will draw for one Bierstadt's "Yosemite Valley," or Cropsey's "American Autumn." Multitudes who cannot be captivated with the more vulgar forms of gambling or lottery, are captivated by this form.

A few years ago, we saw in all our cities the flaming advertisements of scheme. A man in Chicago found an unprofitable building on his hands, and he resolved to make all the nation help him out of that difficulty. Lottery offices were opened in all the great cities. The people rushed in. Philadelphia bought over $30,000 worth of the tickets; New York bought over $100,000 worth of the tickets. The hour approaches. The trains carry to the city dignified committees to see that the abomination is conducted in a Christian and orderly style. Trains are loade with great multitudes who come to get their fo tunes.

The agony is over. A great number of peopl have had narrow escape of sudden affluence. Swi horses, foaming and lathered, dash up to the hous of the man who holds the successful ticket. Th lightnings carry to the four winds of heaven th news, and our enterprising pictorials hasten fo ward their photographers to take the pictures c the man who had the ticket 58,600. Multitudes c people declared there was foul play, and that the truth were only known they themselves ha won the opera house. The man who won th opera house soon died of drunkenness, and th beautiful opera house which had been raffled awa strange to say, was found at last in the possessio of the original owner. A swindle! an insult t God and the American people!

ALWAYS A SWINDLE,

every lottery is.

Then, there are gift stores which make gambler by the hundreds. I refer to those stores where, you buy a watch, or a sewing-machine, or a pianc there is a prize connected with it. It is only sharp way of getting rid of unsalable goods Those stores have filled the land with fictitiou articles, and covered up our population with bras finger-rings, and despoiled public morals, and hav made more gamblers than you can count. Th lottery business will stop at no indecency. I Maryland they actually drew for prizes lots in burying ground!

But there are only two or three forms of thi great plague of the American nation—a plagu that has swept over all our cities and smitten dow a vast multitude of those who were once the ver best citizens. "O!" says some one, "that subjec has no interest for us; that evil never touches m at any point." There is not a man or woman i the house of God this morning but is touched b it. Years ago a society was formed for the sup pression of gambling and the agent of that societ went to a prominent merchant of New York an asked his help. "O!" said the merchant, " have no interest in that society. Gambling is a evil, but in no-wise touches my business." He di not know that his oldest son, a partner with hin in business, was the heaviest player in Hearne' famous gambling establishment.

The agent went to another citizen, who said: "O that's a very good society, but I don't know wh you ask my help. I am well acquainted with a my employes. They have nothing to do with thi gambling habit." He did not know that one c his bookkeepers on a thousand a year was losin fifty and a hundred dollars every night just the at the faro table. The agent of that society wen to a prominent railroad man, asking for his patron age. "O!" he said, "that society for the sup pression of gambling is a good thing for the de fence of merchants and manufacturers, but I don' know why you ask help of me, a railroad man." He did not know that two of his conductors wer spending three nights of every week at the far table. There is not a person in this house thi morning, but ought to have an interest in the sub ject.

WHAT IS GAMBLING?

Gambling is risking something more or less valu able with the idea of winning more than you ha ard. Playing cards is not gambling unless a stak be put up, while on the other hand a man ma gamble without cards, without dice, without bil liards, without ten-pin alley. It may not be bag atelle, it may not be billiards, it may not be an of the ordinary instruments of gambling. It ma be a glass of wine. It may be a hundred share in a prosperous railroad company. I do not car what the instruments of the game are, or what th stakes are that are put up—if you propose to ge anything without paying for it in time, or skill, o money, unless you get it by inheritance, you get i either by theft or by gambling.

This is no new sprite come forth to curse th nation. It is a haggard transaction that come down under a mantle of curses, staggering through the centuries. Before 1838 the French Govern ment received a revenue from the gaming tables

* An authentic report, revised and approved by Dr. Talmage.

In the sixteenth century the English Government, for the improvement of the harbors, had gambling enacted at the door of St. Paul's Cathedral. The British Museum and the Westminster Bridge were partially built by gambling. The Germans used to put themselves and their families up as prizes, and when they were lost as prizes would allow those who were physically weaker than themselves to bind them and take them off. In our day, the House of Commons adjourns on Derby Day, to go out and bet on the horses. What is bad in other lands is bad here, and all through this land.

A traveller said he travelled one thousand miles on Western waters, and at every waking moment, from the starting to the closing of his journey, he was in the presence of gambling. A man, if he is disposed to this vice, will find something to accommodate him; if not in the low restaurant behind the curtain, on the table covered with greasy cards, or in the steamboat cabin, where the bloated wretch with rings in his ears winks in an unsuspecting traveller, or in the elegant parlor, the polished drawing-room, the mirrored and pictured halls of wealth and beauty. This vice destroys through unhealthy stimulants.

We all at times like excitements. There are a thousand voices within us that demand excitements. They are healthful, they are inspiriting, they are God-given. The desire is for excitement; but look out for any kind of excitement which, after the gratification of the appetite, hurls the man back into destructive reactions. Then the excitement is wicked. Beware of an agitation which, like a rough musician, in order to call out the tune, plays so hard he breaks down the instrument. God never yet made a man strong enough to endure gambling excitements without damage. It is no surprise that many a man seated at the game has lost and then begun to sweep off imaginary gold from the table. He sat down sane. He rose a maniac.

The keepers of gambling saloons school themselves into placidity. They are fat, and round, and rollicking, and obese; but those who go to play for the sake of winning are thin, and pale, and exhausted, and nervous, and sick, and have the heart-disease, and are liable any moment to drop down dead. That is the character of nine out of ten of the gamblers. You cannot be healthy and practise that vice.

Then it is

KILLING TO ALL INDUSTRY.

Do you notice that just as soon as a man gets that vice on him, he stops his work. How dull is the store, the shop, the factory, the banking-house! Do you not know that this vice has dulled the saw of the carpenter, and cut the band of the factory wheel, and sunk the cargo, and broken the teeth of the farmer's rake, and sent a strange lightning to the battery of the philosopher? What a dull thing is a plough to a farmer, when in one night in the village restaurant he can make or lose the price of a whole harvest. How dull it is for a man to sell tape, and silk, and calico, and nankeen, and weigh sugars, or run up and down a long line of dull figures, when he can in one night make or lose the price of a whole business season. I am not talking an abstraction. A tremendous reality it is, and I cry it aloud in the ears of these young men.

John Borak was sent out as a commercial agent to Bremen and to the United States. After two years had gone by the house which sent him began to suspect there was something wrong. They made investigation and found that he had spent $86,000 in gambling saloons; $29,000 in Lombard Street, London; $10,000 in Fulton Street, New York; $3000 in New Orleans, and other thousands elsewhere. He was caught, tried, condemned, imprisoned; but he broke out of the penitentiary, went into the gambling business, and died a lunatic in an insane asylum. There never was a business strong enough to endure this evil habit.

The whole theory of gambling is hostile to industry. Every other occupation yields something to community. The street sweeper pays for what he gets by the cleanliness of the streets; the cat pays for what it eats by clearing the house of vermin; the fly pays for the sweets it extracts from the dregs of a cup by purifying the air and keeping back pestilence; but the gambler gives nothing. I recall that last sentence. He does make a return, but it is in the destruction of the man whom he fleeces, disgrace to his wife, ruin to his children, death to his soul.

Then look at the multiform dishonesties that come of this habit. Why, in the very shuffling of the cards there are deception and tricks. How often it is that by fraud the player knows what is in his opponent's hand. A skilful gamester has accomplices, and one wink decides the game. The cards are so marked that from the back they may be designated. Dice are loaded with platina, and these are put into the game unknown to the honest player, and that is the reason that nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand gamblers, though they may start with wealth, at the end are so poor and miserable and wretched that they would not be allowed to sit on the door-step of the brownstone front that they once owned.

A young man came to San Francisco having a large amount of money, which he got in the mines, and he put a large sum on the ace and won; a larger sum, and won again; and a larger sum, and won again. Then he was on the straight road to ruin, and he kept on. After a while the tide turned. The cards came forth very cautiously. There was not a sound heard until the ace was revealed favorable to the bank. The young man cried, "Foul! foul!" but the keepers of the saloon drew their pistols, and said, "Quiet! quiet! quiet!" It was all quiet. You call that a game of chance. It is decreed that in the long run the bank shall win, and the man shall lose.

THERE IS NO CHANCE ABOUT IT.

Oh! how many have gone down under this plague. It is an awful plague. A man, after having been elegantly brought up—he was polished and he was refined—went to New Orleans. He carried considerable wealth with him. His parents were wealthy. They had, moreover, given him a Christian blessing as he departed. The sharpers got after him. He played, and he played tolerably well. They patted him on the back, they flattered him, and they said: "You play as if you had always been playing. How skilful you are at the game!" They kept encouraging him until after a while it was time to change the tack, and he lost thousands after thousands of dollars. He lost all but his watch. Then he put up his watch and he lost that. When all was gone he thought it time to write to his old father and mother, and he wrote this letter:

"My Beloved Parents: You will doubtless feel a momentary joy at the reception of this letter from the child of your bosom, on whom you have lavished all the favors of your declining years; but should a feeling of joy for a moment spring up in your hearts when you shall have received this from me, cherish it not, I have fallen deep, never to rise. Those gray hairs that I have honored and protected I shall bring down in sorrow to the grave. This, my dear parents, is the last letter you will ever receive from me. I humbly pray for forgiveness. It is my dying prayer. Long before you have received this letter from me, the cold grave will have closed upon me forever. Life to me is insupportable. I can not, nay, I will not, suffer the shame of having ruined you. Forget and forgive, is the dying prayer of your unfortunate son."

The old father went to the post office for the letter. He opened the letter, and after he had read a little way he dropped upon the floor. The people thought he was dead, but they fanned him, and they pushed back the gray locks from his brow, and they found, after a while, that he had only fainted. "I wish he had been dead, for what is life to a father since his son is destroyed." When things go wrong at a gaming table, they cry "Foul! foul!" Over all the gambling saloons of Brooklyn and New York and the whole earth, I cry, "Foul,

FOUL, INFINITELY FOUL!"

Now, there may be persons in the house who have a cold, lethargic nature, and they would not be touched of this kind of temptation; but there are some of you who have excitable, nervous and enthusiastic temperaments, and you are easily led into this sin. And there are those who have already taken hold on death. They are in the rapids. They try to put back. Then they are hurled over the edge, and they clutch the side of the boat until their finger-nails, blood-tipped, pierce the wood, and with pale cheek and agonized stare, and horror lifting the hair from the scalp, they go down into depths from which no grappling hooks will ever drag them out. O men! beware if you have begun to tamper with this vice.

Professed gamesters come into the ten-pin alley where there are husbands and fathers, and brothers, and sons, and put down a thousand dollars in gold eagles. Let the boy set up the pins at the other end of the alley. Clear the way now. Roll the first. There! it strikes. Down goes respectability. Roll the second. There! it strikes. Down goes the last feeling of humanity. Roll the third. There! it strikes. Down goes the soul, the immortal soul. It was not so much the pins that fell as the soul, the soul!

Shall I in a word or two sketch

THE CAREER OF A GAMBLER?

Allured by bad company, he goes into a place where an honest man ought never to go. For the sake of pastime, or of being thought sociable, he sits down to the game. The dealer puts out the cards and they play unconsciously into Satan's hands, who takes all the tricks and the players' souls, he being a sharper at any game. A slight stake is put up just to add interest. Game after game is played, larger stakes and larger stakes, until they begin to move nervously in their chairs. Now brows lower and eyes flash, and with set jaw and with compressed lips and clenched fists, they sit there, and they who lose and they who win, fired alike with passion, are watching to see the turn of the game before it comes—if losing paling with envy and tremulous with unuttered oaths cast back red-hot upon the heart—or, winning, with hysterical laugh. "I have it! ha! ha! I have it!"

A few years have gone by, and there he sits, the mere wreck of a man. Before he begins the game he puts down the last relic of his wife, the marriage ring that sealed the solemn vows between them. He loses and he sags back in exhaustion, and he dreams. The bright hours of the past mock his agony, and fiends with eyes of fire and tongues of flame circle around him and join hands in the dance, and with fiendish chorus, cry: "Hail, brother, hail, brother!" and kiss his clammy forehead until their loathsome locks flowing in serpents crawl into his bosom, and sink their sharp fangs and suck up his life blood, and coil around his heart, and pinch it with chills and agonies unutterable.

Oh, my young friends, have nothing to do with the beginnings of the habit. I want to tell you this morning, it is down grade, and that every instant the momentum is increased. Launch not on that treacherous sea. Split hulks strew the beach, and everlasting storms howl up and down, driving the unwary craft into the hell gate. I have looked off and seen it. I have seen the whirling and the foam, and have heard the hissing beneath, and I have seen the mangled wretches writhing one upon another, and they strangled, and they struggled, and they blasphemed, and they cursed God, and they died. The death-stare of eternal despair on their countenances as the waters gurgled over them.

To the gambler's deathbed there comes no hope. He will probably die unattended. The men who destroyed him will not come and ring the bell and ask how he is. They will not attend the obsequies. Some day his poor body is being carted out to the Potter's Field, and the wretches will look out of the window of the gambling saloon, and say: "There goes the old carcase. Dead at last!" Let him down into the grave. Plant no tree there for shade. The eternal glooms that hover over the spot are shadow enough. Visit not that grave in the sunlight, for that would seem like mockery, but in the dismal night, when no stars are out, and spirits of darkness come down horsed on the wind. Then is the time to visit the grave of the gambler. May God save you from the scathing, scalding, blasting, damning influence of the gaming spirit!

SYLPH SOMERS.

Sylph Somers Waits for Dr. Bolus—Insulted by an Intoxicated Officer—Rescued by Capt. Vaughan—Dr. Bolus Refuses to Visit the Doctor—Capt. Vaughan Accompanies Sylph.

SYLPH SOMERS soon reached the open door of the officers' quarters at the old City Castle, and stepping into the stone-covered passage beyond it, stood there to await the reappearance of Dr. Bolus, who, she concluded, had come to see some patient upstairs. In this, however, she was mistaken. The doctor was partial to wine, and was fond of what is called "play." Some of the young officers of the garrison were, unhappily, of the same mind, and welcomed him, as a boon companion and "a jolly good fellow," to their private hospitality in an upper room.

Sylph, therefore, waited in vain in the lower passage, and in her anxiety about Doctor Gilbart's illness never reflected upon the risk of standing in such a place alone. Two or three "orderlies" passed her, in their attendance upon their officers, and, glancing at her, seemed surprised. Sylph thought of asking them to inform Dr. Bolus that Miss Somers Gilbart wished to see him; but her courage failed, and she made up her mind to await the doctor's coming, yet wondering at his long delay.

At last one of the men in attendance upon the young officers, in the apartment where Doctor Bolus was enjoying himself, having at intervals passed up and down stairs, and still observing a handsome and youthful lady standing in the lower passage, mentioned the strange and unwonted fact to those whom he attended.

"What's that you say, Timmins?" asked a juvenile lieutenant; "a handsome young lady is standing in the passage below. What a lark! I wonder who she's after? I say, Venables, is it after you? Lucky dog. Come, tell us her name, that's a good fellow."

Lieutenant Venables would not acknowledge himself the subject of any such "good fortune." And yet at the remembrance of certain not very reputable acquaintances in the city his conscience accused him, and he did not feel quite at ease.

"What a curious thing!" exclaimed the lieutenant. "Really! it's well the colonel hasn't spotted her, and doesn't know of her visit here, or she'd quickly get the right about, I can tell her."

"Shall I go, sir, and tell her she must leave?" asked Timmins; "for by coming here after any of you, sir, being against regulations, might get you into a scrape."

Lieutenant Venables was commissioning Timmins to do this, when another young officer, who had not yet spoken, and who was flushed with wine, protested against employing any deputy; saying with an oath, that as the lady, according to Timmins' report, was so handsome he would go and have a look at her, and that if he didn't admire her he would do the work of dismissal himself.

His walk was not quite steady, as with heavy step he left the apartment and descended the stone stairs.

Sylph observing that he was an officer, and concluding that therefore he must be a gentleman, moved toward him, summoning up courage at last to make inquiry concerning Doctor Bolus.

The vicious young officer misinterpreted her movement, and putting his own evil construction upon it, threw himself forward, caught the terrified Sylph in his arms, and attempted to kiss her.

Sylph struggled and screamed, but would have been overpowered by the half-intoxicated and insolent young man had not another officer, a Captain Vaughan, rushed out at her piercing cry from a room on one side of the passage, and, giving a violent push to her assailant, rescued her.

The baffled young lieutenant flew into a rage at his brother officer's interference, and forgetful in his passion of all discipline, raised his hand to strike him; but his arm was arrested by Doctor Bolus, who had now reached the scene.

"Let me go, Bolus," said the enraged officer; "let me go, I say," he cried, as the doctor strengthened his hold. "I have been insulted by Captain Vaughan; he has no right to interpose between me and this lady, who, of her own accord, challenged me as I passed."

"It's a falsehood, a base and ungentlemanly falsehood," exclaimed Sylph, bold and vehement in her anger. "Oh, do not believe him, sir," she said to her deliverer. "On the word of a lady, his statement is not true, sir; I only moved forward to ask if Doctor Bolus were in the house, as I was wanting to see him."

At the sound of his name Doctor Bolus advanced to where Sylph stood, agitated, pale, and trembling, and so altered in her appearance that he did not recognize her; and he had to ask her name, at the mention of which he felt both surprised and uncomfortable.

Not only was the doctor surprised at the name, but also the officer who had befriended her. Many soldiers and officers of the army were brought under the power of religion by the preaching of Wesley in those days, for he had been forward and zealous to minister to them; and in many of the regiments, both at home and abroad, he had established large "fellowship bands."

Captain Vaughan was not a member of the Methodist society, but he had caught its intense spiritual fervor, and was a thoroughly religious man. In his visits to Chester he had heard more than once of Sylph's "labors of love" among the ignorant and destitute, and was now delighted beyond measure to discover that unwittingly he had been a good knight to one who, he believed, was, in the language of the time, "a sister in the Lord."

"Miss Gilbart," he said, "you need not entreat me to believe you; I totally discredit your accuser. I regret greatly that a brother officer should have so forgotten himself as grossly to insult you. But calm yourself, Miss Gilbart; under my protection no one here shall dare to repeat the offence. Where do you wish to go? I place myself entirely at your service, and hope you will give me the honor of being your escort as long as it is necessary. My name is Vaughan—Captain Vaughan—and you may trust me."

Sylph informed her champion of the whole purpose of her standing in the passage, at which her assailant slunk away, and conveyed to Doctor Bolus her request that he would visit her father.

This was a very unpleasant request to the doctor. "A very unpleasant request indeed," he said, within himself, "one which I wish had not been made to me. What in the world shall I do? One of the last things I could wish is to meet that fellow Gilbart. This daughter of his does not know of it; but he will have heard of my decided voice at the city council board for his arrest, and would meet my visit to him with a look of daggers, and that I really could not and would not tolerate. And yet how can I refuse to go to him, in the presence of these young officers? It would so damage me in their minds, were I to treat a brother professional so meanly. I declare, I never was in such a horrid puzzle before; and for the life of me I don't know what to do."

It takes much longer to write these words than it did Doctor Bolus to think them; yet Sylph and Captain Vaughan and the others present felt some impatience and surprise at his evident hesitation to meet the natural and pressing request made to him.

"If you are not certain, Doctor Bolus, of where Doctor Gilbart lies ill," said Sylph, surmising that this was the ground of his silent deliberation, "I can lead you to the place, sir, for not long since I came from it."

"Ah, yes; thank you," was the reply; "but—but—I regret to say that, I fear, I cannot go."

Observing the look of astonishment upon every face around him, he went on inventing at the moment the most plausible excuse he could find. "You see, Miss Gilbart, since your father's sad imprisonment, a very valuable patient has come under my care;" but noticing a slight sarcastic smile at this phrase upon the countenance of one or two of the young officers, he lamely explained: "I mean of course, valuable, you know, in a social point of view. In fact, the person I refer to is the Honorable De Haipe, whom Docto. Gilbart used to attend, but whose case has come into my hands since his unfortunate arrest."

"You see," he repeated, "I much apprehend that Doctor Gilbart has been stricken with jail fever." Then seeing how startled Sylph and all around were at this statement, he asked, "Pray, Miss Gilbart, can you tell me any of your father's symptoms?" Sylph gave him all the particulars that had come under her notice, and had given her such distress.

"Ah, it is just as I feared," he said. "There can be little doubt that my suspicion is correct; and you will, therefore, see at once, gentlemen"—and as he spoke he turned from Sylph to them—"the expediency, the solemn duty there rests upon me of avoiding Miss Gilbart's father and his infected cell; for no disease is more easily taken or more deadly than the one I have named. And, moreover, apart from my own feelings on the matter altogether, I feel certain," he went on half thinking aloud, "that if the De Haipes were to discover I had been to a patient smitten with this fearful malady, they would forbid me all access to their house. And hence, you perceive, that I should forfeit the just rewards of my profession, and the Honorable Mr. De Haipe and his household would lose the exercise of what I will venture to call my superior medical skill."

"Oh, dear," exclaimed Sylph, "you greatly alarm me. Surely, sir, you will not leave my father to die. Many a time has he gone to minister even to the worst criminals in these same pestilential cells, and yet you refuse to minister to him—a brother professional man. Oh, sir, you cannot, I am sure, have considered what your refusal means. I entreat you to alter your mind, Doctor Bolus. Oh, do sir, come immediately to see him."

"Yes, do, doctor," said Captain Vaughan, backing up Sylph's entreaty. "And, don't you see, my good sir, that so far as the De Haipes are concerned, you have Doctor Gilbart's example to warrant you; for he went, it seems, upon needful occasions to visit those who were sick of the malady which, you suppose, this honorable family to dread; yet he retained them as his patients. So I think it is clear, doctor, you need have no scruples in visiting Doctor Gilbart."

"Oh, but I have scruples," was the reply, "and very great scruples; and then not only to abandon Doctor Gilbart to his fate, but to spitefully exalt his own professional care and character at his expense," Doctor Bolus added, "Doctor Gilbart's disregard of the safety of his upper-class patients was decidedly wrong, Captain Vaughan, and is no argument at all for my walking in his steps; and to be plain with you, I heartily condemn it."

"I tell you, however," he continued, "what I will do, Captain Vaughan, for this sick brother Medicus—I will prescribe for him." And then going across the castle quadrangle, followed by Sylph and her good knight, and unlocking the small surgery at the other side, of which he had the key—being on temporary duty for the army surgeon of the depot, who was for a short time away on leave—he compounded some medicine and gave some directions as to measures of disinfection and regimen that were to be pursued. Handing his powders and vial to Sylph, he requested her "to inform Doctor Gilbart of the great sorrow he felt at not being able, from a conscientious sense of duty to others, to visit him; but he hoped that his services, by so good and fair a proxy as she was, would bring about a satisfactory result."

Doctor Bolus knew full well that the remedies he had provided and suggested would be certainly of no good, as would all the physic of the pharmacopœia, and that the only possible hope of life for the sick and pining captive would be restoration to the pure atmosphere and light of day. And this conviction was uneasily pressed upon his thoughts, as, upon leaving the castle, he returned home. "But then, again," reflected Doctor Bolus, "I have at least done something for this man, and why should I do more? At all events, why should I bother myself with the authorities to get him released? He never was a cordial friend of mine, that's certain; and if it should come to the worst with him, why, after all, it is my interest that he should die."

"His death, then, will be a murder to lie at your door," conscience muttered, and with a frown; but Doctor Bolus silenced the unwelcome monitor.

Captain Vaughan escorted Sylph to the entrance of the stone passage which led down to Doctor Gilbart's cell. "May I accompany you to your patient, Miss Gilbart?" he asked; "you are alone, and perhaps I could be of some use."

The request was both a surprise and a pleasure of no ordinary kind to Sylph, but after a moment's pause she said, "I am deeply grateful to you, Captain Vaughan, "but do you think it would be safe? You have heard what has been said about this dreadful prison fever."

With the gallantry of a soldier the captain's answer was, "Safety is not a question, Miss Gilbart, for men of my profession, you know; but duty. Besides, I really am not afraid; and I know what fever is, having had to deal with it both at home and abroad I have nursed many a brave fellow of my company through it; and I suppose I can, therefore, claim some practical experience in regard to it. I shall only say, that any little knowledge I possess I most gladly place at your command, Miss Gilbart, for your father. Do not hesitate a moment, on my own account, to accept me as your helper," he added, as she paused in her reply, "but let me share with you in the blessedness which shall be known in the great day by those to whom Christ will say, 'I was sick and in prison, and ye visited Me.'"

THE KING: HIS PREDICTED WARFARE, VICTORY, AND MARRIAGE.

By Rev. William Maude.

THE DIVINE BRIDEGROOM.

(2.) "Thou art fairer than the children of men: grace is poured into Thy lips: therefore God hath blessed Thee for ever."

This address to the monarch whom the prophet sees, as it were, in prophetic vision standing before him, has respect, in the first place, to the transcendent beauty of His person. "Thou art fairer than the children of men;" or, as Dean Perowne renders the Hebrew: "Fair, fair art Thou beyond the children of men." And so Isaiah prophesies concerning Israel after their restoration and conversion: "Thine eye shall see the King in His beauty; thou shalt behold thy land far extended" (Isaiah 33 : 17). But if His person is glorious, so are His words most gracious. "Grace is poured into His lips." How different was the way in which He was once spoken of! How startling, in this respect, the contrast between His first and second advents! Of old Israel could say: "He grew up before us as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground. He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see Him there is no beauty that we should desire Him. . . . Many were appalled at Him; His visage was so marred more than any man, and His form more than the sons of men" (Isaiah 53 : 2; 52 : 14).

Even as regards the "grace poured into His lips," though, indeed, in the days of His flesh there were certain occasions when all were constrained to bear Him witness, and wonder at "the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth" (Luke 4 : 22); yet, on the whole, His words, as well as His person, were despised and rejected. "He hath a demon and is mad; why hear Him?" exclaimed the infuriated Jews; and He Himself was constrained pathetically to inquire: "If I say the truth, why do ye not believe me? He that is of God heareth God's words; ye, therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God" (John 8 : 45-47). But at His Second Advent, alike because of the beauty of His person and the graciousness of His utterance, it shall be universally acknowledged that "God hath blessed Him for ever;" and there shall be gloriously fulfilled that promise, embosomed, as it were, in a threatening: "Ye shall not see Me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord". (Matthew 23 : 39).

(3.) "Gird Thy sword upon Thy thigh, O most mighty, with Thy glory and Thy majesty.

(4.) "And in Thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and Thy right hand shall teach Thee terrible things.

(5.) "Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under Thee."

A WARRIOR GOING FORTH TO BATTLE.

The King whose glory this psalm celebrates is not, in the first instance at least, a Solomon—a prince of peace; howbeit it is elsewhere written concerning Him, "Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon His kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever" (Isaiah 9 : 7). Here He is presented to us as a mighty warrior going forth to battle. His sword is girded on His thigh, He has bent His bow and made ready His arrows within the quiver; nay, they have already left the string and transfixed the hearts of His enemies, so that the people fall under Him, and He rides on prosperously, while His right hand teaches Him terrible things.

The imagery here made use of at once suggests to us the Apocalyptic rider on the "white horse" who is seen going forth on the opening of the First Seal (Revelation 6 : 2); for he, too, not only has a bow and a crown—the emblem of victory—but goes forth "conquering and to conquer." Unless, indeed, with De Burgh, we find the parallel rather in Revelation 19 : 11-15, inasmuch as the psalm evidently pictures a work of judgment, not of grace, "where of the Lord Jesus coming in power it is said: 'And out of His mouth goeth a sharp sword, that wherewith He shall smite the nations' (the Antichristian confederacy, chapter 17 : 14); 'and He shall rule them with a rod of iron; and He treadeth the wine-press of the fierceness of the wrath of Almighty God.'" For observe, the royal warrior of the psalm has also a "sword"—doubtless His "word" pronouncing the doom of the rebellious; and thus the suitable accompaniment of the "sharp arrows in the heart of the king's enemies;" identical with "the rod of His mouth" in another parallel prophecy (Isaiah 11 : 4): "He shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked one"—"that wicked one . . . whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit (breath) of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (2 Thessalonians 2 : 8).

THE PERIOD REFERRED TO BY THE PSALM.

Whether, therefore, we find the true parallel to the psalmist's description of the Warrior King in Revelation 6 : 2, or Revelation 19 : 11-15—or rather shall we not say in both combined, in which case we have a beautiful instance of prophetic perspective, the twofold Apocalyptic going forth being seen in the earlier and more distant revelation as only one—it is evident that the period to which the psalm refers is that of the Second Advent.

Bishop Horsley, who like so many others was in bondage to the historical interpretation, is, therefore, altogether in the wrong when, referring to the "terrible," or as he would render the word "wonderful," things which the conqueror's right hand should show him, he says: "This I take to be the overthrow of the Pagan superstition in the Roman empire, and the other great kingdoms of the world, by the mere preaching of the Gospel, seconded by the exemplary lives and miracles of the first preachers, and their patient endurance of imprisonment, torture, and death for the sake of Christ." And again: "The subjugation of nations by the prosecution of this war is the triumph of the Church over idolatry, which took place in the reign of Constantine the Great, when the Christian religion was established in the Roman empire, and idolatry put down by that emperor's authority" ("Horsley's Sermons").

We shall surely more correctly find the fulfilment of the "terrible things" spoken of in this psalm in the awful events detailed by the prophet Zechariah: "For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the women ravished; and half of the city shall go forth into captivity, but the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city. Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle. And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west . . . and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Him. . . . And the Lord shall be King over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and His name one" (Zechariah 14 : 2-4, 9).

(6.) "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever: the sceptre of Thy kingdom is a right sceptre.

(7.) "Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness; therefore God, Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows.

(8.) "All Thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made Thee glad."

CONFLICT SUCCEEDED BY VICTORY.

The sixth verse marks a striking—almost abrupt—transition in the character under which the divine personage, whose power and glory the psalm celebrates, is presented to us. Up to this point we have seen Him as a mighty warrior casting down and destroying His enemies, but now conflict is succeeded by victory. The warfare is accomplished, all opposing authority and power has been put down, the prayer of the ages, "Thy kingdom come," has at last received its sublime fulfilment, and the prophetic harp seems shaken in every string, as, in full diapason, it strives to rise to the height of this great argument.

"Hallelujah! hark! the sound,
From the centre to the skies,
Wakes above, beneath, around,
All creation's harmonies.
See Jehovah's banner furled,
Sheathed His sword:—He speaks—'tis done;
And the kingdoms of this world
Are the kingdoms of His Son."

And this dominion, as it is the reward of "truth and meekness and righteousness"—for of this King it may emphatically be said that "in righteousness He doth judge and make war" (Revelation 19 : 11)—so is its character denoted by the words of the sixth verse, "The sceptre of Thy kingdom is a right (literally 'straight') sceptre." * As though it were said: The sceptre of Thy kingdom is indeed a straight sceptre; because of Thee it may be said, as of no other King that ever swayed a sceptre, that "Thou lovest righteousness and hatest iniquity." Oh, blessed prospect for this weary world where oppression, tyranny, and wrong have ruled so long, when "a King shall rule in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment." A King who "shall not judge after the sight of His eyes, neither give sentence after the hearing of His ears; but with righteousness shall He judge the poor, and give sentence with equity for the meek of the earth" (Isaiah 32 : 1; 11 : 3, 4).

"Therefore God, Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows." Yes; above Thy fellows—i.e., Thy fellow kings—because Thou art "better than they," and the character of Thy government higher than the character of their government, even as the heavens are higher than the earth. "Above Thy fellows," because God hath given Thee the name that is above every name, and Thou hast upon Thy vesture and on Thy thigh a name written, "King of kings, and Lord of lords (Revelation 14 : 16). "Above Thy fellows," for unto whom among men or angels did Jehovah ever say, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever?"

Thus peerless in beauty, perfect in character, unapproachable in dignity, does Israel's glorious King stand before us in the glowing picture of prophetic song; even His garments smelling of the myrrh, aloes, and cassia out of the ivory palaces—the dwelling places of kings—from whence they have made Him glad.

This mention of the "ivory palaces" fitly introduces the subject of "the Queen," which the psalm now proceeds to take up; but of her we must speak in another paper.

* See Isaiah 40 : 4; and 42 : 16. The noun is used for equity of government, Psalm 67 : 4; 96 : 10; Isaiah 11 : 3, 4 (Perowne).

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE past year has been one of great prosperity for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the Publishers for the third time record their acknowledgments to Almighty God for the favor thus steadily and abundantly bestowed.

The Subscription List is a little more than fifty per cent. larger than it was at this time last year; and, as the sermons of Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, which make the leading feature of the paper, are also its principal means of doing good, the publishers can, without self-glorification, express the satisfaction with which they send out thousands upon thousands of copies of those faithful statements of the way of salvation every week. They are read on Sabbaths in many solitary homes where the visit of the circuit preacher does not occur oftener than once a month.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has also prospered financially. For, as our terms are always cash in advance, every subscription means a receipted bill, and we have neither outstanding accounts nor doubtful assets.

Our relations with our subscribers also have been of the pleasantest kind, with no harassing for payment and no disputes about bills. We have adhered to a rule with which we started and which we believe to be required by Christian courtesy; viz., to reply by return of post to every inquiry from a subscriber.

We hereby tender our thanks to eight hundred agents though whose exertions we have largely built up our circulation. Some are aged persons, who find that means of livelihood within their failing strength; some are young children, who take it as an easy way to earn pocket-money; and others are men and women in the prime of life who have chosen canvassing as their professional business; while not a few are to be included in the number, who, out of sheer good will and without a thought of gain, go to work to promote the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the usefulness of which they conscientiously believe.

Now we shall be glad to enter renewals for 1882 as early as it is convenient for our subscribers to send them, and we repeat our offer to mail a circular of agent's terms and a package of sample copies to any person who contemplates canvassing for the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Forty-Seventh Congress Assembled on Monday, December 5th. The roll call of the House of Representatives showed that four members were absent, all of whom belong to the Democratic Party. The vote for the speakership was promptly taken. The Readjusters from Virginia acted with the Republicans. The Republican majority in the House is therefore assured. This is the first Congress since the Forty-third, in which the Republicans have had a majority.

The Nomination of Gen. J. W. Keifer of Ohio, for the Speakership of the House of Representatives, took place on Saturday, December 3d, at a meeting of the Republican caucus. Sixteen ballots were taken before a decision was reached. Mr. Hiscock, of New York, was in the early part of the week believed to have the best chance of succeeding to the office, but at the meeting of the caucus it was evident that he had not the support of the Stalwart wing of the party. Gen. Keifer was the first choice of many members, but his nomination would not have been carried had not the Pennsylvania delegation, voting as a unit, unexpectedly cast their votes for him. They had previously been counted on for Mr. Hiscock by that gentleman's friends. It is openly asserted that the change was made at the urgent request of Senator Cameron, whose antagonism to Mr. Hiscock arose out of the Senatorial struggle at Albany last fall, in which Mr. Hiscock opposed the Stalwarts. Gen. Keifer was born at Bethel Township, Ohio, in 1836, was educated in the common schools, and worked on a farm until 1856, when he commenced the study of law. When the war broke out he joined the Union army and served with distinction, being wounded several times. He was elected to the 45th, 46th, and 47th Congresses. At the same caucus E. Mc-Pherson, of Pennsylvania, was nominated for Clerk of the House, and Col. G. W. Hooker, of Vermont, for Sergeant-at-Arms. The Democratic nominee for the Speakership was S. J. Randall, and for the other offices the present incumbents.

The Coinage of Silver Dollars is Discussed in the Annual Report of Mr. Burchard, the Director of the Mint. Mr. Burchard acknowledges a change of views on the subject as a result of the recent conference on bi-metallism in Paris. It is impossible, Mr. Burchard now believes, "for the United States, single-handed, without European co-operation or allies to sustain the value of silver from the inevitable fall." During the past three years $100,000,000 of silver have been coined, of which, despite the extraordinary efforts made, only $34,000,000 have been forced into circulation. It is now evident that, even if a silver standard should be adopted, it would be a much lower one than that we have in use, and then it would be necessary to call in the cumbrous coins and recoin them, as well as the $66,000,000 lying unused in the Treasury vaults. Under these circumstances Mr. Burchard considers the further coinage of silver dollars a useless expenditure.

Guiteau's Testimony on his own Behalf on the witness stand last week intensified the interest taken throughout the country in his trial. In his examination by his own counsel, Mr. Scoville, he narrated the history of his life. He described his career in the Oneida community, his experiences as an itinerant lecturer, and as a lawyer; his political exertions in the Presidential campaign of 1880, his attempts to obtain office through Mr. Blaine, his applications to President Garfield, and finally the assassination. As in his previous narratives, he claimed that he "removed" President Garfield in obedience to the command of God, that he was a mere agent and instrument in the matter, and that he was "inspired" to perform the act as Paul and other holy men were inspired, and that it was done to save the Republican party from disruption, which he believed would be a catastrophe likely to involve civil war. When cross-examined by Mr. Porter, of counsel for the prosecution, Guiteau seemed chiefly anxious to display his intellectual abilities, forgetting for the time that the theory of his defence consists in his insanity. His replies to the searching questions put to him were characterized by insolence, effrontery, and audacity. He clung to the inspiration theory in which he has drilled himself, but when surprised into admissions by the circuitous questions of Judge Porter, he showed clearly that his idea of inspiration was the same as that other people define as impulse. He acknowledged that when Mr. Blaine declined to further his ambitious projects, he attempted to effect his removal by writing to President Garfield against him, and when the President showed no disposition to attend to his warning against the Premier, he concluded that the only event that could save the party and the country was the removal of Garfield to make room for Arthur. The two acts were identical in motive; both were directed toward the removal of men who thwarted his ambition. Thus stripped of the gloss Guiteau attempted to throw over his criminal motives, he stands revealed as a malicious, vindictive man, seeking to escape the consequences of his crime by blasphemously charging its responsibility upon the Deity. During his examination, as in the earlier days of the trial, the prisoner was allowed unusual liberty of speech, which he turned into license. On this account the Judge has been blamed, but it must be remembered that the prejudice universally felt toward this cowardly criminal is so natural and so intense, that a presumption existed that he would not have a fair trial. The unusual liberty allowed him refutes this presumption.

A National Tariff Convention Assembled in Cooper Union, New York, on November 29th. Senator Warner Miller presided, and advocated his well-known views on the subject of protection. Mr. Miller, as a manufacturer, is able to appreciate the value of heavy import duties, and he endeavored to convince his hearers that the interest of the mass of the people was also advanced by the system. Secretary Blaine sent a letter apologizing for his absence, in which he averred his conviction that the bulk of the people in all the States were enthusiastic protectionists. The Committee on Resolutions advocated a revision of the tariff, and declared that the whole system of tariff legislation was overturned by means of the Treasury decisions in customs cases, and that the decline of American shipping was due to the neglect of the Government. The last resolution recommended that an "immediate and progressive reduction of internal taxes" be made, and that they be ultimately abolished. These resolutions were all passed except the last, which encountered a fierce opposition, principally on the subject of removing the taxes on tobacco and spirits. It was ultimately rejected, and the Convention adjourned.

Drunkenness is Especially Criminal Because its indulgence nearly always entails evil results on innocent people. An instance unusually deplorable occurred in New York on November 29th, when an elevated railroad employé named Oliver lost his life. A drunken man attempted to board a Third Avenue train at Thirty-fourth Street, and Oliver, acting on the instructions of the company, refused him admission. Immediately the intoxicated wretch grappled with the officer, and in his fury dragged him from the car on to the platform of the station, and as the train moved on precipitated him to the street below. Oliver's injuries from the fall were so serious that he died in a few hours, while his murderer made his escape. This is one out of thousands of cases in which the intoxicating liquor the State allows men to sell, is directly responsible for a dastardly murder.

The First Number of the "The Christian Philosophy Quarterly is well calculated to sustain the dignity of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy which was organized last summer in the Hall of Philosophy at Warwick Woodlands, Greenwood Lake, N. Y., under circumstances that were related in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other papers. The new journal, the official organ of the Institute, has donned with becoming success the familiar uniform of the old, time-honored Quarterlies, and appears in a cover distinguishable only by its nineteenth century tint from the grave and potent ensigns of those famous Reviews. Regarding the contents, it would be superfluous to say more than that Dr. Deems and President Porter are among the contributors. Dr. Deems, our readers are aware, is President of the Institute.

The Threatened Lynching of the President and cashier of two broken banks in Kansas is reported. A telegram from Wellington, Kan, dated November 29th, says: "Mr. Danford, the owner of the banks at Hunnewell and Caldwell, which were recently closed, and Mr. Smith, his cashier, were arrested to-day and brought to this city, on the charge of receiving deposits after they knew the banks to be insolvent and must close. Over fifty citizens of Caldwell, who came ostensibly here to await the preliminary examination, took Danford and Smith from the officers by force." Later reports state that the two men were carried into the woods, ropes were fastened round their necks, and they were threatened with instant death unless they confessed and made restitution to the depositors in the banks. Mr. Danford made a proposition to hand over certain securities to his captors for distribution among the depositors, and a committee was despatched to inspect them. It is expected that the President's offer will be accepted.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon on the Plague of drunkenness ought to be extensively circulated. It deals with an evil which penetrates every class of society and produces more crime and misery than any other of our social curses. Unhappily the vice is so prevalent that every one knows personally of homes now being desolated by it, and of others which are being threatened by its insidious approach. If Dr. Talmage's earnest and practical sermon were placed in the hands of some who are in danger of falling under the power of liquor, it might be blessed by God to their rescue. A verbatim report of the sermon, revised by Dr. Talmage, was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of last week, December 1st.

A Remarkable Coincidence was Described last week at the Fulton Street prayer-meeting. It was the case of a missionary who has been sick for some time. The persons to whom he looked for his salary at length told him that they could no longer continue it. "Never mind," he said to his wife, "the Lord will provide." His wife was in consternation, but he bade her open her Bible and read him the first words on which her eye alighted. He prayed the Lord that the words might be His message for them. Her eye caught these words: "A continual allowance was made by the king" (2 Kings 25 : 30). Both were astonished, and took the words as an assurance of help. Next day a friend called to say that the sick man's case had been taken into consideration, and an allowance was to be made them during his sickness. The use of the word "allowance" recalled the passage they had read together, and husband and wife praised God for His goodness.

A Preacher was Dragged from his Pulpit by a bulldog at Memphis, Tenn., on Sunday, November 27th. A local journal says: "An unwelcome visitor caused consternation in the Mount Olive (colored) Church, at Memphis, last Sunday. As the visiting preacher was preaching, a big white bulldog bounded into the church, and, seizing the preacher, dragged him from the pulpit to the floor. He let go only when death overtook him. The congregation regarded him as the emissary of the devil. They were probably wrong in their supposition. Satan is always active in preventing the good effects of preaching, but he usually adopts methods less violent but more effectual than sending a bulldog to carry away the preacher bodily.

The Loss of a Set of Artificial Teeth Occasioned some alarm in a house at Paterson, N. J., last week. The lady who wore them said she had swallowed them in her sleep, and a physician was called up in the night to attend her. The lady declared she felt the edges of the teeth cutting into the sides of her stomach, and that she suffered excruciating agony. Several women were about her, who had been called in to give advice and support. Anodynes were administered to relieve her temporarily, and then the physician closely scrutinized her mouth and throat, but could find no evidence of laceration. Moreover she could swallow easily, and the doctor came to the concluison that the teeth had not been swallowed. He looked around, moved a few articles about the bed, and at last found the teeth under the pillow. They were shown to the suffering woman, and her pangs instantaneously ceased. This incident shows the power of the mind over the body, and how actual physical pain may be produced by the imagination alone. The hardened sinner, who, like a well-known lecturer, says that he is prepared to endure the punishment of his sin "like a man," forgets that God controls the imagination, the conscience, and the other powers of our spiritual nature, and can of them alone make an instrument for chastisement. God spoke of this power (Lev. 26 : 36).

A Music Teacher who is a King's Daughter, was seen recently by the correspondent of a St. Louis journal, who was visiting at Watertown, Jefferson Co., N. Y. Her name is Mrs. Benton, and she is the daughter of Joseph Bonaparte, whom his brother Napoleon made King of Spain. She is a refined, intelligent lady, looking much younger than she really is, and her gifts and accomplishments render her services as a teacher of French, drawing, and music very valuable. She is said to bear a striking resemblance to her father, and both in character and cast of features is much like her aunt, a sister of Napoleon. Mrs. Benton's regal ancestry has not been of much service to her in the affairs of life, but it is a distinction that is not forgotten by herself or her friends. It would be well if Christians, who are sons and daughters of the King of kings, always remembered their Father in heaven, and that it might be said of them, as of Mrs. Benton, that they resemble Him (Matt. 5 : 48).

A Missing Heir was found Last Week at Wolcott, N. Y., through the strenuous exertions of his brother, who had issued ten thousand circulars describing him. The missing man formerly resided at Pine Bluff, Ark., but has lately been wandering about the country in an almost destitute condition, with scarcely any money or clothes. When found, he received from his brother the welcome intelligence that under the will of a relative recently deceased, he was entitled to $20,000. Had he been aware of this fact earlier, he would not have continued his vagrant life so long. This is very much like the way men act in the affairs of the soul. When they are enabled through the power of the Holy Spirit to realize the priceless treasure they acquire through faith in Jesus and sonship to God, they think with regret of the days they spent wandering in sin, ignorant of the blessings God was offering to them (Eph. 2 : 19).

A Famous New Jersey Belle Died in a Poorhouse at an advanced age a few days ago. She was deserted by all her friends and by those, not a few in number, who had been in her prosperous days the recipients of her bounty. Her father owned the well-known Lodi Hotel, near Philadelphia, where Washington and Lafayette stayed several times when passing between that city and New York. She was very beautiful in person and vivacious in manner, and was very popular with the guests and in society. At her father's death she inherited considerable property, but gayety, mismanagement and indiscriminate generosity reduced her property, and at last, in her old age, she sank into poverty and was glad to take refuge in the poor-house, where she died. The ingratitude of which she had reason to complain is a very common experience; many famous men and women have suffered from it, but there has never been one found who complained that in poverty, old age, sickness, and death God has neglected them or failed to keep His promises (Ps. 37 : 25).

The Sale of the Mourning Drapery which was used to cover the stores and public buildings in New York in memory of President Garfield realized $350, which was sent to the fund for the relief of the Michigan sufferers. The material had deteriorated by exposure or it would have brought a larger sum.

TILL WE MEET AGAIN.

A Short Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.*

"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."—REV. 22 : 21.

The Apocalypse Full of Christ—Paul's Private Mark—I. The Benediction—Its Three Parts—1. What?—Grace Originating from Joy—The Order of the Benediction—The Grace of a Divine Person—Of Our Human Kinsman—2. How?—As a Matter of Fact—As the Object of Faith—As the Source of Favors—Producing Constant Communion—3. To Whom?—A Comprehensive Word—Those Who Limit it—A Hand for the Blunderers—II. The Position of the Benediction—The Last Word of Scripture—The Last and Highest Wish—What we Shall Want till the End Comes—What we Shall Wish for Then.

JOHN'S Book of Revelation is full of Christ. Its opening verse rings out the precious name, and the closing line which is now before us repeats the heavenly music. Is not the Lord Jesus the sum and substance, the glory of every vision seen in Patmos? May I not say of the Apocalypse, as John said of the New Jerusalem, "the Lamb is the light thereof"? until He looses the seals and opens the roll, the book of John's prophecy is so folded up that no man shall understand it.

John could not finish his book without mentioning that name which was dearest of all names to him. As he puts aside his pen to write no more, he concludes with an invocation of blessing upon all the saints in every place; and this is the form of it: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." Paul is thought to have claimed the use of this benediction as his particular token: "in every epistle so I write." I am not sure that it is so, for I suspect that the apostle referred to his own large handwriting, and to the signature which he put to his letters. But still, according to many interpreters, Paul used this particular blessing as his private mark, the seal of the authenticity of a letter. See the end of the epistles to the Corinthians and Thessalonians: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all."

Certainly Paul used the words often; but, perhaps, when Paul had been taken up, John deemed it right to adopt Paul's motto, and with it to set, as it were, his stamp and seal upon the last book of Revelation. It was a benediction which could not be engrossed by any one apostle, nor indeed by all the apostles put together. Paul made it his own, but John had equal right to use it; and it is now all the dearer to us because both these mighties employed it.

Brethren, the benediction before us is not only Paul's word and John's word, and the Bible's last word, but it is now the chosen word of all the ministers of Jesus Christ. Is not this the benediction with which we dismiss the faithful: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all"? So shall it remain until the Lord shall come a second time. It is an expression suitable to the most gracious heart, a prayer wherewith the believer may vent his best wishes and express his most devout desires. Over you all at this time, in my own most humble but sincere manner, I would pronounce the benediction, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all."

I. First, let us consider this benediction. It divides itself into three parts, under these heads:

WHAT?

How? and, To whom?

1. What? What is this which John desires when he says, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all"?

The word is Charis. I do not think any better translation could be given than "grace": it is usually translated grace throughout the New Testament. Those who understand the Greek language thoroughly tell us that it has for its root "joy." There is joy at the bottom of Charis, or grace. It also signifieth favor, kindliness, and especially

* This sermon was preached by Mr. Spurgeon immediately before setting out for the south of France for rest and recuperation. He has been preaching three sermons every week, of which we have only published one, but as the other two sermons have been reported, we shall be able during Mr. Spurgeon's absence to publish every week, as usual, a sermon recently delivered by him, which has not been printed before, either in England or America.

love; and I might, without violating the meaning of the Spirit, read the words thus: "The love of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." But inasmuch as love to unworthy creatures such as we are can only display itself in free favor—that is, grace, and we know that the term used is an accurate expression, we will let it stand as it is.

John desires that we may have the free favor of Jesus Christ, the love of Jesus Christ, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ Himself is generally mentioned in our benedictions as having grace, and the Father as having love; and our usual benediction begins with the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God. Is that the proper order? Should we not rather say the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit? Brethren, the order observed in the benediction is that of our experience, the order in which we learn, the order in which we receive. We first receive the grace and free favor which are in Christ Jesus, and then from these we learn the love of the Father; for no man cometh unto the Father but by Jesus Christ. The order is correct to our experience, and in an instructive benediction the Holy Spirit intendeth this for our learning.

The Father's love is, as it were, the secret, mysterious germ of everything. That same love in Jesus Christ is grace; His is love descending to earth, love wearing human nature, love paying the great ransom price, love ascending, love sitting and waiting, love pleading, love soon to come with power and glory. The eternal love which, as it were, did lie in the bosom of the Father, rises up and comes into activity, and is then called the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

This grace of our Lord Jesus Christ is therefore the grace of a Divine Person. We wish you, brethren, as we wish for ourselves, the grace of God Himself, rich, boundless, unfathomable, immutable, divine; no temporary grace such as some speak of, which keepeth not its own, but suffereth even the sheep of its own pasture to go astray and perish; but the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom it is written, "Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end"; that grace most potent which said, "None shall pluck them out of my hand." We wish this grace to be with you, infinite, everlasting, unchanging grace—we wish you may have that. May its divine height, and depth, and length, and breadth be enjoyed by you; may you know the loving grace of Christ which passeth knowledge; may you grasp the unsearchable riches of Christ. This is no small treasure—this grace of a Divine Person.

Yet is our Lord Jesus also human, as truly human as He is divine, and, believing in Him, you have the grace of Jesus Christ the man to be with you all. May you feel His tenderness, His brotherliness, His grace. He is your Kinsman, and He graciously favors His own kinsfolk. The Man is next of kin unto us, and as Ruth enjoyed all the love of Boaz, so may you possess all the heart of Jesus. May He redeem your inheritance for you, and take you to Himself to be His own, in blessed union with Himself forever.

Read the text again, and pause a little while in the middle to enjoy "the grace of our Lord." Whatever familiarity we have with Him, we call Him Master and Lord, and He saith, "Ye do well, for so I am." Let us never forget that. The grace that cometh from His majesty, the grace that cometh from His headship, the grace that cometh from His divinely human supremacy over His Church—this is the grace which we desire for you all.

Read the next word, "the grace of our Lord Jesus": may that be with you; that is to say, the grace of our Saviour, for that is the meaning of the word Jesus. All His saving grace, all that which redeems from guilt, from sin, from trouble, all that which saves us with an everlasting salvation—may that be yours to the full.

Then comes the other word, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you"; may He, as the Anointed One, visit you. May the grace of His anointing be with you, may the holy anointing which was poured upon the Head come down upon you, as the sacred nard dropped from Aaron's beard and perfumed all his robes. May you have that anointing from the Holy One which shall make you know all things.

I am tempted to linger over each one of these words, but I may not, for time would forbid. Yet must we tarry on that word "our." "May the grace of our Lord." Catch at that sweet word. It may not perhaps be genuine in this case, for it is not in the Sinaitic manuscript, but whether it is so in this particular instance or not, it is in the Word, and stands forever true. Jesus is our Lord—our Lord Jesus Christ: both yours and ours. May the fulness of His grace be with you and with us.

2. Our next division is

HOW?

"May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." What meaneth this? Our first answer is the wish that the grace of our Lord may rest upon you as a matter of fact—that He may love you truly and intensely; love you, not only as He loves the world, but as He loved His own which were in the world. May you have His redemption, not as a general thing, but according to that word, "He hath redeemed us from among men out of every kindred." May you have the special, peculiar love which Christ hath to those whom His Father gave Him, whose names are on His breastplate, and for whom He has paid an effectual ransom price, that they thereby might be delivered: may such grace be with you. As a matter of fact, may it rest upon you as the chosen, adopted, called, and sanctified.

Still further, may His grace be with you as the object of faith, so that your belief comes to be full assurance, till you know the love which Christ hath toward you, and no more doubt it than you doubt the love of the dearest friend you have on earth. May His love be a present fact, and not a thing to be questioned, a treasure in which you glory in the secret places of your soul, saying, "He loved me, and gave Himself for me." May His grace be with you in the sense that you are confidently assured of it.

And may His grace be with you, next, as to the favors which flow out of it. May you enjoy all the blessings which the grace of Christ can yield, the grace of a peaceful conscience, the grace of a cleansed walk, the grace of access to God, the grace of fervent love, the grace of holy expectancy, the grace of self-denial, the grace of perfect consecration, and the grace of final perseverance. May the fountain and well-head be with you, that so the sparkling streams may flow at your feet.

And may grace be with us, next, so as to produce constant communion between us and Christ, His favor flowing into our hearts, and our hearts returning their gratitude. Oh, to carry on blessed commerce with Christ, exchanging weakness for strength, sin for righteousness, and trust for care. Oh to give love for love and heart for heart, till my best loves me, and my best love is all His own. Oh, to come to this pass, that our Well-beloved is with us, and we enjoy sweet mutual intercourse: this is to have the love, or grace, of Jesus with us.

May our Lord Jesus Christ thus in His grace be with us, and may He work for us all that He can work. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, brethren, when you desire to pray; then may the great High Priest intercede for you. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, so that when you are downcast He may say, "Let not your heart be troubled." May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you to check you when you are likely to start aside, to guide you when you know not your way, to inspirit you when you are ready to be cast down, to confirm you when you have almost slipped with your feet. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you when heart and flesh are failing you, when the last hour has come, and you are about to appear before God. God grant you to know always all that Christ can do in you, and for you, and with you, and by you. What better benediction could John himself utter?

3. But, now, the third part of our discourse comes under the head of

"TO WHOM?"

"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." Surely if we were to take this in the widest possible sense, and say, May it be with you all, it could not be wrong to wish that all should have the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ with them; yet I know some sound brethren are very jealous of anything that looks like a wide expression, an expression which would wish good to all. For my own part, I do not understand the nature of the orthodoxy which would limit benevolent desires. I should like to be more and more heterodox in the direction of desiring good to all that come in my way. Would to God that the best that could happen to all men did happen to them. I would without the slightest hypocrisy breathe this desire over all mankind, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be Still, there is no doubt that the connection in which it stands, and also certain versions of it, do confine this benediction to the saints, and practically it must always be confined to them, for the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ is only known and enjoyed by those who have given their hearts to Jesus, and are living by Him, in Him, and to Him. Let us wish the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ to all the saints, at any rate. Some of the saints will hardly own us; but may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with them. They would not let us preach in their pulpits; but may grace be with them. They would not partake of the communion with us; but may grace be with them. They call us sectarians and schismatics, but may "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with them all. Amen," with every one of them, whoever they may be. If they are in Jesus Christ, may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with them.

If a man knows Christ, he knows the most important of matters, and is possessed of a secret quite as precious as any in our own keeping, for what know we more than Christ, and what hope have we but in Christ? If thou lovest Christ, give me thy hand, my friend, notwithstanding thy blunders. If Christ be all thy trust and all thy confidence, I am sorry for thine eyes that thou canst not see a great deal more; I am sorry for thine head that thou canst not think more straight; but thine heart is in the right place, resting on Jesus, reposing on Him, and who am I that I should judge thee? There is a life in Christ which a thousand errors cannot kill. There is a life which is the same in all that have it, however diverse they may happen to be upon opinion or outward ceremony. There is a life eternal, and that life is Christ Jesus, and to all that have that life we do with intensity of heart say, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all."

I notice Paul says this in one of his epistles to a church that misbehaved itself dreadfully. It was one of the churches that would not have any minister; a church where they all spoke as they pleased, to whom Paul said, "God is not the author of confusion." They were so depraved a church that they allowed an incestuous person to be present at the communion, but still, after the apostle had rebuked them, he said, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." Even so must we say to those who err ignorantly, as the Corinthians did.

II. So now, not to detain you much longer, I ask your earnest attention for a few minutes to the position of this benediction.

First, I draw what I have to say from the fact that it is

THE LAST WORD OF SCRIPTURE.

I regard it, therefore, as being the apostle's last and highest wish. We are glad to find that, while the Old Testament finishes with a curse—"Lest I come and smite the earth with a curse"—the New Testament concludes with a blessing, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all": as if to show that the very life and spirit of a Christian should be blessing; and this should be to us our last and highest wish for men—that they may receive and retain the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. I wish this blessing to you all, my dear brothers and sisters.

Standing at the end of the Book of Revelation as this does, I next regard its position as indicating what we shall want till the end comes—that is, from now in His second advent. This is the one thing we require, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." May it be with us daily, hourly! May it be with us, instructing us as to our behavior in each generation! May it be with us, cleansing us from all sin; enabling us to walk in the light as He is in the light! May it be with us, strengthening us to carry our daily burdens, and to bear our witness for His name under the varying circumstances of the ages. May it be with us counselling us when the trials of life distract us! With us transfiguring us from glory to glory, till we shall bear the image of Jesus Christ! May it be with us all-sufficiently! Hath He not said, "My grace is sufficient for thee"? May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all in every way in which you shall require it till He cometh!

Placed as this blessing is at the end of the book, there is but this one more thought—this is what we shall wish for when the end cometh. We shall come to the end of life, as we come to the end of our Bibles. And oh, aged friend, may thy failing eyes be cheered with the sight of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, on the last page of life, as thou wilt find it on the last page of thy well-thumbed Bible! Peradventure some of you may come to the last page of life before you get grace; I pray that there you may find it. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.

Or, suppose we should not die; suppose the Lord should suddenly come in His temple. Oh, then may we have grace to meet Him! I am so glad that a benediction closes the Apocalypse; for, as you stand in the book of Revelation, you hear the thunders roll, peal after peal, you see the vials poured forth, darkening the air, and sun and moon turned into blackness and blood! Earth reels beneath your feet, and stars fall like fig-leaves from the tree! You are full of confusion and dismay until you hear this holy whisper, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you." Let every star of the firmament fall where it will, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ is with us. Rock and reel, ye mountains, and be dissolved, O earth, and pass away; if the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us we fear not the end. We can serenely look upon the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds.

Let the last august tribunal sit, and men be summoned to stand before it, to receive their final doom, we shall without trembling advance before that great white throne and stand there, if the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us.

> "Bold shall I stand in that great day,
> For who aught to my charge shall lay?
> While through His blood absolved I am
> From sin's tremendous curse and shame."

Oh, happy they, shrouded, and sheltered, and hidden, in Christ their Saviour; to whom His grace shall be like the white robes of Mount Tabor's transfiguration, for they shall be accepted in the Beloved, glorified in the glory of their Master! These are they to whom the text shall be fulfilled —"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all."

FAREWELL.

Finally, brethren, farewell; and as you go out I would like just to take my place at the doorway, to offer my hand of friendship, and say to each one, "Farewell for a little while." This is my best wish for you—The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you." Will you start back and say, "Sir, I know nothing of this grace"? Then would I ask you to stay a moment while I breathe the prayer, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you." Maybe there is only a tear of penitence in your eye, no light of faith is there as yet. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, poor broken-hearted penitent! Maybe you do not know Jesus yet, and you are only seeking Him. His grace be with you now: may He manifest Himself to you! And you, backslider, do you feel as if you cannot receive a blessing? The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be especially with you, to raise you up, and set you on your feet again, as he did fallen Peter.

I would like, if I could, to say to the stranger within our gates to-night, who does not often attend the house of God, it is our heart's desire for you that you may know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ in truth. To the boys and girls here, the pastor says, "God bless you." Little Mary, or Jane, or John, or Willie, or whatever your name may be, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you;" for He saith, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." As for you, gray-headed friends, you who will soon be home, I wish you this parting blessing, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you." Till I see you again, "God bless you." Till the day break, and the shadows flee away, may the Lord Jesus never be absent from you. Amen and amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—1 Thessalonians 5.]

"WAS IT WORTH IT?"

THERE, you've paid your money, and drained your glass and I daresay are feeling very nice and comfortable. But, friend, a word in your ear—"Was it worth it?"

I'm an interfering, meddling man, am I? Poking my nose into other folks' business? Never mind. Suppose we grant it is so—but still I ask, "Was it worth it?"

You have paid down good honest coin of the realm, won by the sweat of your brow. It is now in the publican's till. There is so much less in your own pocket. "Was it worth it?"

Workingmen, we are told, are waking up in the present day. They are beginning to feel their feet. They are demanding a good day's pay for a good day's work. By union, by combination, they are making their power felt. And workingmen are never more alive than when the worth of toil is to be calculated. For a penny an hour more they will fight tooth and nail. For a trifle they will strike.

Friend, those coppers that are yours now no longer, and which are lying on the top of that big heap beneath the counter, ought to have their equivalent too, didn't they? You spent them in beer, which was drunk almost as soon as drawn. "Was it worth it?"

The times are hard. Rents are high. Provisions cost a goodly sum of money. Warm clothing cannot be got for nothing. And yet, in the face of this, you will toss down your twopences, and your threepences, and your fourpences, on the public-house counter, as though you didn't value money a bit, and had more than you could do with. O man! O father! O husband! O son! Answer me, I pray you, the single question, "Is it worth it?"

The rainy day, perhaps, is near, and work will be slack, and you, may be, will be dismissed with a good many more hands, and you would be glad then to fall back upon your savings. It's a grand thing, and a thing which lifts up a man's head as he walks through the world, to be able to say, "I've a bit of money put by for the rainy day. Please God, I shall keep out of debt yet." But you, you, you have no savings, you know. All your spare cash, and a good deal you couldn't spare, is laid up for the landlord's rainy day, should it ever come. With the workhouse looming in view, or the crouching posture of the beggar, it is no trifling question which I put to you to-day, "Is it worth it?" Then, there is the spoilt temper, and the miserable home, and the crushed wife, and the neglected children, and a thousand other like consequences of the indulgence in strong drink, which prompt the same question, "Is it worth it?"

Of course it isn't worth it. And the wonder is to me that any man with a grain of common sense, to say nothing of common humanity, ever thinks anything else. Drinking not only is worthless, but is noxious. It is not worth it!

You may not see it now. You will, perhaps, refuse to see it now. You will persist in holding that strong drink is a good and proper thing; and perhaps you will persist until death, in drinking freely and constantly.

God help you then! But you shall not damn your soul without a warning. Stop! Stop! After death is the judgment, and the "wages of sin is death." You may laugh me in the face, but what will you do when you stand before God?

Oh! it is so sad, when the Son of God has died to open the kingdom of heaven to all who believe in Him, that men should damn their souls eternally.

Is it worth it? A thousand times, NO.

A SAILOR'S TREACHERY DEFEATED.

(See Illustration on page 780)

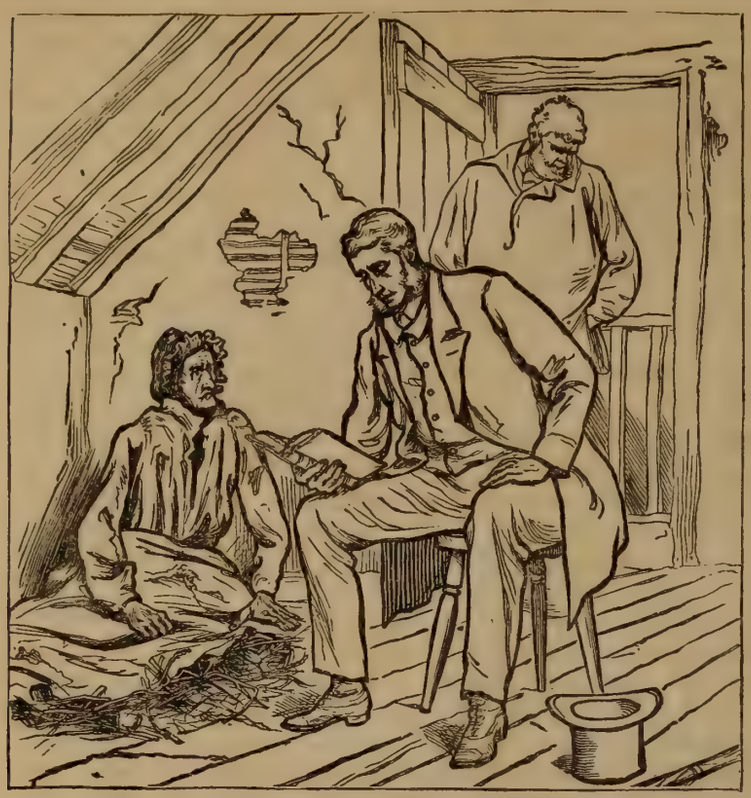
THE scene was off the Society Islands in the South Pacific Ocean. It was a hot morning, and the tropical sun, though scarcely above the horizon, shed its rays scorchingly on a vessel homeward bound. Those are dangerous waters, for sunken rocks and swift currents threaten a ship not carefully steered with instant destruction. The captain had been at his post night and day for some time, and, wearied out at last, had lain down for a short interval of rest. The worst of the dangers had been passed, and leaving explicit instructions as to the ship's course, and placing a sharp lookout aloft, he felt satisfied that all would go well for a few hours.

At the helm was placed a colored sailor who had been taken aboard at the Society Islands, chiefly because he was familiar with the waters and knew where the safest course lay. He was an ill-conditioned man, malicious and vindictive, but with an excellent reputation as an able seaman; and the captain being short of hands, had engaged him in default of finding any one he liked better. Unhappily, the crew were set against the colored man from the first, and they showed their ill-will in various ways. He had been teased and provoked until his spirit was maddened, and he only waited for an opportunity to wreak his revenge.

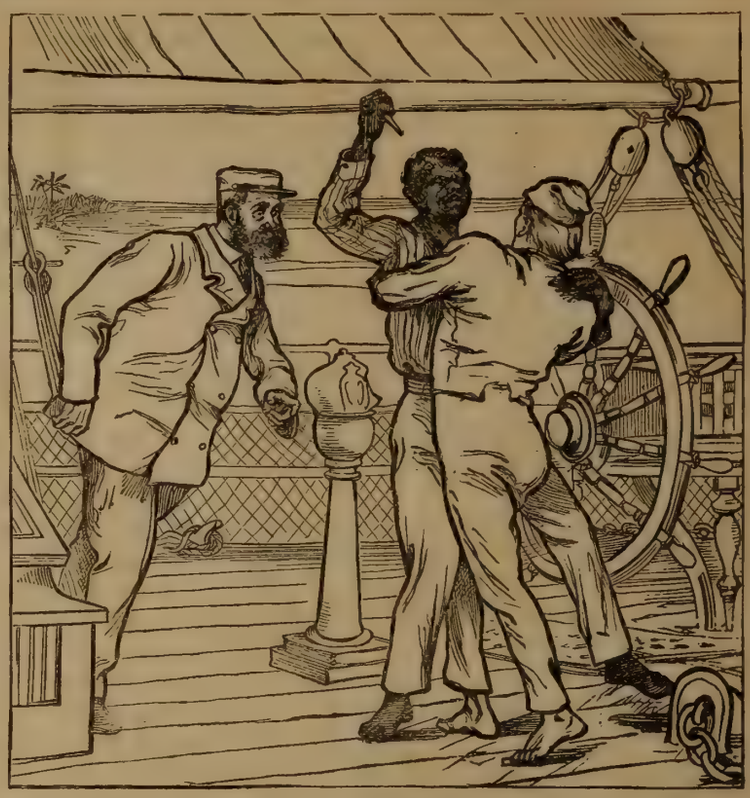
When the captain lay down, the colored man found himself put at the wheel, and saw at once that his desired chance had come. It was not so good a chance as he supposed, for he was ignorant of a precaution the captain had taken. He supposed that he was the only man awake except the lookout at the mast-head. The captain, however, distrusting the negro, had instructed the first mate to watch him and see that the ship was steered according to his instructions, and, unseen by the negro, a vigilant eye watched every turn of his hand. All went well for oevr an hour, and the mate began to think the negro was a better man than they believed, when, suddenly, a turn of the wheel excited his suspicions. He waited a moment to be sure that he was not misjudging the helmsman, and then sprang to his feet. "Breakers ahead!" sang out the lookout in a clear voice, and in an instant the negro and the mate were struggling in fierce fight.

The negro had steered straight toward a dangerous reef, and had calculated that the vessel would be dashed to pieces before the lookout could alarm the crew. The mate held firmly to the colored traitor, who, armed with a knife, struggled fiercely with his captor while the vessel drifted to her doom. The mate saw the situation and shouted at the top of his voice, "The wheel! The wheel!" and with a quick perception of the threatening danger the captain rose to his feet and rushed to the wheel. It was a narrow escape, for the reef grazed the vessel's side as she turned like a living creature from her danger. The traitor was quickly overpowered by the crew, whom the scuffle and the shouting aroused, and was placed in irons for the remainder of the voyage.

The old philosophers used to teach that every man has his good and his bad angel always by his side, and as he suffered one or the other to guide him the voyage of life was prosperous or disastrous. A more enlightened doctrine is held by those who are taught of God, and they know from their own experience, and from God's Word, that the enemy of souls is ever seeking their destruction. If his subtle temptations are heeded, and the passions, anger, malignity, and revenge are at his prompting allowed to guide us, then we are on the road to eternal wreck, from which the interposition of God alone can save us.



A Gospel Triumph in an Attic.



An Act of Treachery Defeated.

MAN HIS OWN BIOGRAPHER.

A Sermon by Mr. D. L Moody, preached at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, on October 21.

"And I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the Book of Life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the book, according to their work."—Rev. 20: 11, 12.

The Record of Our Life—Memory Immortal—Cyrus and Horace Greeley—Memory God's Officer—Mr. Moody's Recollections when He was Drowning—Torturing Reminiscences of Cain and Judas—The Murdered Boston Man—Conscience will Awake—Memory in Prison—No Repentance after Death—A Rider Killed.

I WANT to call your attention to one clause, 'And another book was opened which is the book of life." Now I may be wrong, but I think I am not. I think that book that is to be opened is the book of memory; and I think the time is coming in the history of each one of us when that book will be opened, and each one will read his own record.

A Scotchman said to me the other day, "You will have to use some other word than "record," for we don't know what it means." We use it a good deal in America. If a man has not a good reputation, and he goes into a community where he has not been before, he is told that he had better wait until he has cleared up his record. And I think the word is very expressive. We have in every county throughout our great country what we call a Recorder's Court, and if any important papers are made out they are taken up there and recorded. And so God makes every mind keep its own record. If we are to give an account of the deeds done in the body, how are we going to do it unless it is through memory? And that will be the opened book and out of it we shall be judged.

MEMORY IS IMMORTAL.

I firmly believe that memory is "the worm that dieth not;" that memory is what we are going to take with us when we leave this world. We shall not take our riches, but we shall take away our memory. Lord Bacon says that "the human intellect never loses anything." It is a very strong statement that everything a man has heard, everything that he has seen, is treasured safely away in his memory, and by-and-by it will all come back to his mind.

We very often hear people talk about their short memories; and then we hear, once in a way, about a man who has got an extraordinary memory. It is said of Cyrus, who had twenty thousand men in his army, that he could call every man by name, and that seemed to give him great power over the army.

I have read of a remarkable man who wrote a great deal, and then said he could record from memory everything he had ever written. I have met with men who could take up this book and commence at Genesis and go through to Revelation, and not make a mistake. Memory, we see, is a wonderful thing.

Horace Greeley, one of our great men who was nominated for the Presidency of the United States a few years ago, would take his morning paper—the New York Tribune—and read down column after column and then accurately quote it, without further effort, word by word. You say you wish you had such a memory as that. My friend, your MEMORY WILL BE LONG ENOUGH BY-AND-BY.

When you stand at the bar of God, He will touch a secret spring, and memory will do its work. I believe that memory is God's officer, who is going to bring you and me into condemnation. God makes every man keep his own account. We talk about a recording angel. I think that we shall find out at the end of life that we are the recording angel ourselves, that men are writing their own lives—their own biographies. They are keeping the record themselves.

Some men are very anxious to have their lives written before they die; but they need not be in haste, they will write it themselves. It will not be the work of fancy, it will be a most accurate life; there will be no mistake in it. That is the record of the life you and I will have to face. By-and-by the book will be opened, and then you and I will look at the record we have written. If unsaved, you will STAND BEFORE GOD'S BAR SPEECHLESS.

You will have to say amen to the sentence.

My friends, what kind of book are you writing? What have you been putting into the book to-day? What kind of life is it? Have you sworn to-day? Well, it is all written down. You will meet that oath. Don't flatter yourself that it will never come back. You will one day meet it. Have you been untrue to some friend to-day? That, too, is recorded—written, as it were, with an iron pen, and you will meet it by and by. Have you done some mean, contemptible thing to-day, and your conscience does not rise up to-night and smite you? It will! You will meet the record in the other world!

I believe there are thousands of men in this town that would give their right hand if they could forget the record they have made. There is something in their life that is so dark and black that they would like to forget it. Some men plunge into pleasure to drown it. They drink and fancy that in intoxication they will stifle the stinging accusations of their conscience; but the time is coming when God shall say, "Son," or "Daughter, remember!" or, as Job says, "He will change your countenance," and send you to read your own book that you have been writing—the record you have been making. The book that you have been keeping—that will condemn you.

TWICE IN DANGER OF DEATH.

I have been twice on the point of death. I was once drowning. I had gone down the second time, and just as I was sinking the third time I was rescued; and in an instant—in a second, everything I had said, everything I had done, everything I had ever thought of, came rushing before my mind. Everything came back. Tramp, tramp, tramp, came the whole life. Seemingly there was not a thing left out. How a whole life can be crowded into a second of time I do not know. It has now gone from my memory, but there is no doubt that it will all come back again. This record which I have made, as well as yours, will have to be used some day.

I would like to ask you a question. Do you believe that Cain, if he left this earth unforgiven—do you believe he has ever forgotten his killing Abel? Do you not think that that sin followed him into the other world? Six thousand years have rolled away, and do you think he does not now vividly remember how Abel looked in the field, when he rose up and slew him? We are not told how he killed him, but it was probably with a club. How Abel pleaded—"Don't take my life; I love you; I have done nothing against you." Do you think Cain has forgotten that pleading? Oh, he made that record, and he took it away with him; and I believe that is "the worm that dieth not," that it is that which helps to make hell so terrible. I believe Cain remembers how Abel looked, and he remembers how the blood looked when the first blow fell. The whole terrible scene is as fresh before him as though it happened but yesterday. He remembers to-night with an awful vividness,

THE SIGHT OF THE FIRST MURDERED MAN;

he remembers how those wounds looked, and how he covered up his slaughtered brother, and tried to cover up the sin and conceal it. He thought probably he had buried the sin, and it would never trouble him again. Do you think that it has never troubled him, and that conscience has not risen up and smitten him?

Do you believe that Judas has forgotten the cruel act of betraying his Master with the kiss? I do not. Do you not believe that Judas remembers how Jesus looked at him when He gently said, "Betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?" I think he took that away with him; and if you could see him to-night, he would say that it is those words which make hell so terrible. Not only that, but I believe Judas remembers the impressive sermon which Christ preached; how He said one day "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." I believe Judas can remember how Jesus looked when He wept over Jerusalem, and when he said "how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." I believe that Judas has taken away the memory of that sin; and I tell you, my friends, that you will take into the other world the memory of all the sins you have committed.

I have seldom been in more solemn meetings than we have had this week. I believe there are men who will go into eternity remembering this night. You will remember how everything looked; you will remember how those Christian ladies looked on the platform; you will remember those ministers; you will remember the singing—how Mr. Sankey sung "Eternity!" and how that word thrilled and rang in this house; how all this choir stood up here and sang those sweet songs of Zion.

CONSCIENCE AWAKENED.

Yes, the book will be opened by-and-by, and every individual among us will have to face the record. Do you doubt it, any of you? It is a terrible thought, my friends, that you and I are writing our own condemnation, and that it will take no one to condemn us but our own conscience, when it is thoroughly awake. I wish I could say something to wake up every man's conscience here, that would arouse every slumbering conscience in this house to call earnestly upon God.

Do you believe those Jews who saw Jesus Christ in Jerusalem have forgotten how He pleaded with them, and how He reasoned with them? Do you think those men who stood around the cross and saw Christ hang there—do you think they have forgotten? Do they not remember how He cried, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"? I think they remember that. I think they have taken that away with them. The books have been opened and they have read the things that took place in this life.

The first murder I remember in America was one that made a very profound impression, even in this country. There was a very prominent professor in Boston. He was an influential man, and was an intellectual giant. A doctor called and tried to get some money the professor was owing him. There were some words, the professor got angry and struck his creditor, and killed him Then, instead of confessing his guilt, he burned the body and tried to conceal the crime. But the murdered man was traced to his office, and never seen to come out. The professor was tried and condemned, and while he was in prison he could hear and it was a relief to him to be executed. He would rather die than live. He heard the cry, the voice, of that murdered man. Conscience was beginning to do its awful and increasing work of condemnation.

You had a case of crime here in England, of a man who murdered his wife, and then married some one else, whom he loved more than his own wife. He had seven children, and twenty long years passed; but at last the books began to be opened, his conscience smote him: and he gave himself up to justice. He would rather die than live.

My dear friends, the time is coming when your conscience will be thoroughly awake. If your conscience doesn't wake you up in this life, it will in the world to come. Do not let Satan deceive you with the falsehood that there is no future retribution. Listen to what Jesus Christ says. I bow to Scripture. When Jesus Christ says anything it is enough. "If ye die in your sins, where I am ye cannot come." That settles it. "If ye die in your sins, where I am ye cannot come."

Do you believe that Judas went right into the kingdom of God, with John the beloved, and with Paul, and those other mighty apostles? Would he have been admitted into heaven? Do you think he would, my friends? Oh, there is not a candid man here who believes it for a moment. "If ye die in your sins, where I am ye cannot come." And those who die in their sins will have to take this dark catalogue with them, and read it over and over again.

Go down to yonder prison and ask that man what makes prison so terrible. He will very quickly tell you, "It is not the prison walls, it is not the iron gates, it is not the prison garb, it is not the prison food, it is not even that I am deprived of my liberty." He will tell you that what makes it so terrible is his memory. He goes into that cell and begins thinking. He thinks of what he might have been, of the prayers of the sainted mother, or the godly wife, of those children upon whom he has brought ruin and disgrace. It is his memory that makes that prison like a hell to him.

We, too, shall have to take our memory away with us. "Son, remember! Daughter, remember!" and I hope the Holy Spirit of God will arouse you, and determine you to put off salvation no longer. Bear in mind, Now is the only day of mercy you will ever have,

THIS IS THE DAY OF CHRIST,

this is the acceptable time of the Lord. You can repent now and have this awful record blotted out. He wants to forgive you; He has been trying to this very hour to bring you to Himself. He wishes to blot out all this black record and save you; and you are persistently running away from the very best friend you have. Bear in mind what will happen and I think the Bible teaches clearly that there is no repentance after this life. There are some who tell you of the possibility of repentance in the grave; but I do not think you can find it in Scripture. I have looked my Bible over very carefully, and I cannot find that man is going to have another chance of repentance. If a man is favored with years and years here, an open Bible, and friends to tell him the way of life, and of a Saviour who has died for him, and of God who will accept him, what reasons have we for thinking that he will repent in another world?

Then why should he ask for any more time? You have time enough to repent now. You can turn from your sins this moment if you will. God says: "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God, therefore turn yourselves, and live ye." There will be no Gospel meetings over yonder for you to attend, and whence you will go out scoffing. You can do it now, there is no doubt about it. You can make light of sacred things now. You can mock at God and eternity, but, hereafter, you will never lift up your voice against the Son of God; you will never more make light of sacred things.

A young man had just come out of a public house where he had been drinking, and he saw a deacon of the Church on the road. He asked him, "Can you tell me how far it is to hell?" and rode on. I suppose he thought he was very witty, and had said a smart thing. He turned round the corner, and when the deacon came to that corner he found the horse had thrown his rider and broken the young man's neck. Probably the last words that fell from his lips were

"HOW FAR IS IT TO HELL?"

Do not trifle with sacred things. Go, rather, and trifle with the forked lightning, with the deadly pestilence. By-and-by that book will be opened, and you will have to face its startling record; read it yourself! Out of your own mouth you will be condemned.

What are you going to do to-night? Are you going to add another page to that book by rejecting Jesus Christ? Will you deliberately write on the page now and say, "I reject the Son of God; I reject mercy; I reject salvation once more, October 21st, 1881. I reject the Son of God who is offered me to-night in this building; I will go on in my sins a little longer; I will turn my back upon God and heaven still; I will add sin to sin." You can do it; you are a free agent.

You may say "Why does not God make me?" Because He does not want a heaven filled with slaves, He wants sons and daughters there. He might force you, but force you against your will He is not going to do. He is trying to draw you. Will you be drawn? Will you come?

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Suspense.

OFTEN Roland was overwhelmed with terror lest his wife should be watched, and her movements tracked, and that behind her would come the pursuers he had so successfully evaded. At other times an unutterable heartsickness possessed him to see her once more, to hear her voice, to press his lips, if he dared, to her pale cheeks; to discover whether she would suffer him to hold her in his arms for one moment only. He longed to hear from her lips what had happened at home since he fled from it six months ago; what she had done, and was going to do, supposing that he were not arrested and brought to justice. Would she forgive him? would she listen to his pleas and explanations? He feared that she would hate him for the shame he had brought upon her. Yet there was a possibility that she might pity him, with a pity so much akin to love, as that with which the angels look down upon sinful human beings.

Every day brought the solution of his doubts nearer. The rains of autumn had begun, and fell in torrents, driving him to any shelter he could find, to brood there hour after hour upon these hopes and fears. The fog and thick clouds hid the mountains, and all the valleys lay forlorn and cold under clinging veils of mist, through which the few brown leaves left upon the trees hung limp and dying on the bare branches. The villagers were settling down to their winter life; and though along the frequented routes a few travellers were still passing to and fro, the less known were deserted. It was safe now to go down to Engleberg, where, if ever again, except as a prisoner in the hands of justice, he would see Felicita.

Impatient to anticipate the day on which he might again see her, he reached Engleberg a week before the appointed time. The green meadows and the forests of the little valley were hidden in mist and rain; and the towering dome of the Titlis was folded from sight in dense clouds, with only a cold gleam now and then as its snowy summit glanced through them for a minute. The innumerable waterfalls were swollen and fell with a restless roar through the black depths of the forests.

The daylight was short, for the sun rose late behind the encircling mountains, and hastened to sink again below them. But the place where he had first met Felicita was dear to him, though dark and gloomy with the cloudy days. He hastened to the church where his eyes had fallen upon the young, silent, absorbed girl so many years ago; and here, where the sun was shining fitfully for a brief half-hour, he paced up and down the aisles, wondering what the coming interview would bring. Day after day he lingered there, with the loud chanting of the monks ringing in his ears, until the evening came when he said to himself, "To-morrow I shall see her once more."

Roland Sefton did not sleep that night. As the time drew near for Felicita to act upon his message to her, he grew more desponding of her response to it; yet he could not give up the feeble hope still flickering in his heart. If she did not come he would be a hopeless outcast indeed; yet if she came what succor could she bring to him? He had not once cherished the idea that Mr. Clifford would forbear to prosecute him; yet he knew well that if he could be propitiated, the other men and women who had claims upon him would be easily satisfied and appeased. But how many things might have happened during the long six months, which had seemed almost an eternity to him. It was not impossible that Mr. Clifford might be dead. If so, and if a path was thus open to him to re-enter life, how different should his career be in the future! How warily would he walk; with what earnest penitence and thorough uprightness would he order all his ways! He would be what he had only seemed to be hitherto; a man following Christ, as his forefathers had done.

He was staying at a quiet inn in the village, and as soon as daybreak came he started down the road along which Felicita must come, and waited at the entrance of the valley, four miles from the little village. The road was bad, for the heavy rains had washed much of it away; and it had been roughly repaired by fir-trees laid along the broken edges; but it was not impassable, and a one-horse carriage could run along it safely. The rain had passed away, and the sun was shining. The high mountains and the great rocks were clear from base to summit.

If she came to-day there was a splendid scene prepared for her eyes. Hour after hour passed by; the short autumnal day faded into the dusk, and the dusk slowly deepened into the blackness of night. Still he waited, late on into the night, till the monastery bells chimed for the last time; but there was no sign of her coming.

The next day passed as that had done. Felicita then had deserted him! He felt so sure of Phebe that he never doubted that she had not received his message. He had left only one thread of communication between himself and home, a slender thread, and Felicita had broken it. There was now no hope for him; no chance of learning what had befallen all his dear ones, unless he ran the risk of discovery, and ventured back to England.

But for Felicita and his children, he said to himself, it would be better to go back, and pay the utmost penalty he owed to the broken laws of his country. No hardships could be greater than those he had already endured; no separation from companionship could be more complete. The hard labor he would be doomed to perform would be a relief. His conscience might smite him less sharply and less ceaselessly if he were suffering the due punishment for his sin, in the society of his fellow-criminals. Dartmoor Prison would be better for him than his miserable and degrading freedom.

Still, as long as he could elude publicity, and preserve his name from notoriety, the burden would not fall upon Felicita and his children. His mother would not shrink from bearing her share of any burden of his. But he must keep out of the dock, lest their father and husband should be branded as a convict.

A dreary round his thoughts ran. But ever in the centre of the circling thoughts lay the conviction that he had lost his wife and children forever. Whether he dragged out a wretched life in concealment, or was discovered, or gave himself up to justice, Felicita was lost to him. There were some women—Phebe Marlowe was one—who could have lived through the shame of his conviction and the dreary term of his imprisonment, praying to God for her husband, and pitying him with a kind of heavenly grace; and at the end of the time met him at the prison door, and gone out with him, tenderly and faithfully, to begin a new life in another country. But Felicita was not one of these women. He could never think of her as pardoning a transgression like his, though committed for her sake. Even now she would not stoop so low as to seek a meeting with one who deserved a penal punishment.

Night had set in, and he was trudging along the road, still heavy with recent rains, though the sky above was hung with glittering stars, and the crystal snow on Titlis shone against the deep blue depths, casting a wan light over the valley. Suddenly upon the stillness there came the sound of several voices, and a shrill yodel, pitched in a key that rang through the village, to call attention to the approaching party. It was in advance of him, nearer to Engelberg; yet though he had been watching the route from Stans all day, and was satisfied that Felicita could not have entered the valley unseen by himself, the hope flashed through him that she was before him, belated by the state of the roads.

He hurried on, seeing before him a small group of men carrying lanterns. But in their midst they bore a rude litter, made of a gate taken hastily off the hinges. They passed out of sight behind a house as he caught sight of the litter, and for a minute or two he could not follow them, from the mere shock of dread lest the litter held her. Then he hurried on, and reached the hotel door as the procession marched into the hall and laid their burden cautiously down.

"An accident?" said the landlord.

"Yes," answered one of the peasants; "we found him under Pfaffenwand. He must have been coming from Engstlensee Alp; how much further the good God alone knows. The paths are slippery this wet weather, and he had no guide; or there was no guide to be seen."

"That must be searched into," said the landlord; "is he dead?"

"No, no," replied two or three together.

"He has spoken twice," continued the peasant who had answered before, "and groaned much. But none of us knew what he said. He is dying, poor fellow!"

"English?" asked the landlord, looking down on the scarred face and eager eyes of the stranger, who lay silent on the litter, glancing round uneasily at the faces about him.

"Some of us would have known French, or German, or Italian," was the reply, "but not one of us knows English."

"Nor I," said the landlord; "and our English speaker went away last week, over the St. Gothard; to Italy for the winter. Send round, Marie," he went on, speaking to his wife, "and find out any one in Engelberg who knows English. See! the poor fellow is trying to say something now."

"I can speak English," said Roland, pushing his way in amid the crowd and kneeling down beside the litter, on which a rough bed of fir-pine branches had been made. The unknown face beneath his eye was drawn with pain, and the gaze that met his was one of earnest entreaty.

"I am dying," he murmured; "don't let them torture me. Only let me be laid on a bed to die in peace."

"I will take care of you," said Roland, in his pleasant and soothing voice, speaking as tenderly as if he had been saying, "God bless you!" to Felix in his little cot; "trust yourself to me. They shall do for you only what I think best."

The stranger closed his eyes with an expression of relief; and Roland, taking up one corner of the litter, helped to carry it gently into the nearest bedroom. He was gifted with something of a woman's softness of touch, and with a woman's delicate sympathy with pain; and presently, though not without some moans and cries, the injured man was resting peacefully on a bed: not unconscious, but looking keenly from face to face on the people surrounding him.

"Are you English?" he asked, looking at Roland's blistered face and his worn peasant's dress.

"Yes," he answered.

"Is there any surgeon here?" he inquired.

"No English surgeon," replied Roland. "I do not know if there is one even at Lucerne, and none could come to you for many hours. But there must be some one at the monastery close by, if not in the village—"

"No, no!" he interrupted, "I shall not live many hours; but promise me—I am quite helpless, as you see—promise me that you will not let any village doctor pull me about."

"They are sometimes very skilful," urged Roland, "and you do not know that you must really die."

"I knew it as I was slipping," he answered; "at the first moment I knew it, though I clutched at the very stones to keep me from falling. Why, I was dead when they found me; only the pain of being pulled about brought me back to life. I'm not afraid to die if they will let me die in peace."

"I will promise not to leave you," replied Roland, "and if you must die, it shall be in peace."

That he must die, and was actually dying, was affirmed by all about him. One of the brothers from the monastery, skilled in surgery, came in unrecognized as a doctor by the stranger, and shook his head hopelessly when he saw him, telling Roland to let him do whatever he pleased so long as he lived, and to learn all he could from him during the hours of the coming night. There was no hope, he said; and if he had not been found by the peasants he would have been dead now. Roland must ask if he was a good Catholic or a heretic. When the monk heard that he was a heretic, and needed none of the consolations of the Church, he bade him farewell kindly and went his way.

Roland Sefton sat beside the dying man all the night, while he lingered from hour to hour: free from pain at times, at others restless and racked with agony. He wandered a little in delirium, and when his brain was clear he had not much to say.

"Have you no message to send to your friends?" inquired Roland, in one of these lucid intervals.

"I have no friends," he answered, "and no money. It makes death easier."

"There must be some one who would care to hear of you," said Roland.

"They'll see it in the papers," he replied; "no, I come from India, and was going to England. I have no near relations, and there is no one to care much. 'Poor Austin,' they'll say; 'he wasn't a bad fellow.' That's all. You've been kinder to me than anybody I know. There's about fifty pounds in my pocket-book. Bury me decently and take the rest."

He dozed a little, or was unconscious for a few minutes. His sunburnt face, lying on the white pillow, still looked full of health and the promise of life, except when it was contracted with pain. There was no weakness in his voice, or dimness in his eye. It seemed impossible to believe that this strong young man was dying.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 18. Golden Text, Heb. 8 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens." This, our golden text, beautifully sums up the teaching of the past quarter's lessons, for all these types and shadows in the Old Testament only illustrate, foreshadow, and point to Christ. Let each one of us make this great truth personal.

"I HAVE SUCH AN HIGH PRIEST

representing me in heaven, as Aaron represented the children of Israel within the veil." As the railway and the telegraph bind distant places together, and distance is made nothing, so much more fully the distance between heaven and earth is done away, the veil which separated is rent, the sin which was so terrible a barrier has been atoned for by Him who came "to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity" (Dan. 9 : 24).

Our first lesson this quarter was on Free Giving. This is in itself a gift of God to us, and it is an unspeakable privilege that we should be allowed to give anything to Him; we must always confess as David did, "Of Thine own have we given Thee" (1 Chron. 29 : 14). Our hearts warm toward God when He lovingly receives any offering at our hands, even more than when we receive of Him; it is always "more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20 : 35). The gifts of the children of Israel were the materials for the construction of the temple where God was worshipped, and the spirit which renders unto the Lord is truly the spirit of worship.

We next considered the offerings, especially the burnt offering and the peace offering, and we saw how all spoke of Christ. If we present our bodies a living sacrifice, it is because we come in the person of the one great burnt offering; in the meat offering, and in the trespass offering, still it is Christ we see; He alone can satisfy God, He alone can atone for sin. He is the Altar which sanctifieth every gift we bring (Matt. 23 : 19). In the great day of atonement we saw Him as the Sin-bearer, the Scapegoat, made "sin for us," "made a curse for us" (2 Cor. 5 : 21; Gal. 3 : 13), suffering without the camp; and we saw how impossible it is for God to ignore sin; He can "by no means clear the guilty;" "every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward" (Heb. 2 : 2). But "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. 5 : 19).

In the feast of tabernacles we saw the type of completion, of satisfaction, of rest from labor; the millennium upon earth, and afterward the "restitution of all things" (Acts 3 : 21). Then still more in the year of jubilee we saw the rest in God, the Sabbath-keeping which will then be perfected, but which He wills that His children should practise now. Is it not true that as soon as the least takes possession of us, whether in the form of wavering and hesitation as to plans, or in the shape of anxiety about our circumstances, or of self-condemnation when we have failed in anything, body and soul begin to suffer? God calls us to rest in Him, to commit our way unto the Lord in every circumstance as soon as it arises. How are we to be delivered from temptation? By our unrest? or by an unreserved committal of the temptation to Him? How may we be rid of the burden of anxiety? By fretting against it? or by casting all our care on Him who careth for us? How may we learn the hideousness of sin when we have fallen, the deep wrong done to God by our doubts, our impatience, jealousy, or any other sin which has overtaken us? By self-accusation? (Alas! the enemy will make us pleased with our own severity against ourselves.) No, but by coming to God to reprove us, judge us, and cure us of the sin. Then we learn to rest from ourselves: it is a true jubilee, every yoke is undone, and the oppressed goes free.

We had also in our lessons some instances of the people's sin, and this invariably came to pass through unbelief. They were being led in a miraculous way through the unyielding, barren wilderness, where neither corn grew nor water flowed, but again and again, instead of expecting their Almighty and present God to supply their need, they murmured against Moses and Aaron, and finally against God Himself. Their first murmuring was against Moses immediately before the passage of the Red Sea (Ex. 14 : 11). All the wonders of God in Egypt had not convinced them that He would not let them perish. Their second murmuring was at Marah when the waters were bitter (Ex. 15 : 24). The third was in the wilderness of Sin, when they complained that Moses had brought them forth into the wilderness to kill them with hunger, and when God rained manna upon them (Ex. 16 : 2). The fourth time was in Rephidim, where they complained that Moses had brought them out of Egypt to kill them and their children and their cattle with thirst, and then it was that God told Moses to smite the rock, a type of our smitten Saviour, from whom waters of life flow forth. Their fifth time of discontent was when Moses went up into the mountain and remained there, occupied with God on their behalf, and then it was they made the golden calf, and God's anger was kindled against them.

The next and sixth defection was not that of the people as a whole, but of Nadab and Abihu, the priests who, probably under the influence of wine, offered strange fire unto the Lord.

We are told nothing of the cause of their murmuring the seventh time, only the fact (Num. 11 : 1; Deut. 9 : 22), but it brought judgment with it, for "the fire of the Lord burnt among them" (Num. 11 : 3); yet immediately afterward we read of an eighth provocation, when the mixed multitude "fell a lusting; and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat?" (Num. 11 : 4-6.) This is a different occasion from that mentioned in verse 1, which took place at Taberah (comp. 11 : 1-3 with 11 : 4, 30-34). The ninth sin was committed by Miriam and Aaron, who murmured against Moses because he had married an Ethiopian woman (Num. 12 : 1, 2); and finally the tenth of their provocations in the desert was that for which the judgment of forty years' wandering in the desert was pronounced against them. They murmured at the evil report of the land brought by ten out of the twelve spies whom Moses had sent to spy the land of Canaan, and taking no account of the promise of their God that He would give them victory and deliver the Canaanites into their hands, they even went the length of proposing to make for themselves a captain, and turn back again into Egypt. And yet their supply of food day by day was they drank not from a spring, which might be accounted for on natural grounds, but which flowed out of the solid rock and followed them: so blind, so unreasoning is unbelief. But alas! even this judgment, even the solemn declaration that none of the men above twenty years old should see the land which God sware unto their fathers, did not cure them of their spirit of murmuring, and we find them "discouraged because of the way," and yet again speaking "against God and against Moses." Then it was that the judgment of fiery serpents was sent upon them, and then it was that the brazen serpent, the type of our crucified Lord, was given to exercise and test their faith, and to manifest the mighty arm of God's deliverance.

We then had the history of Balaam, the "double-minded man," who was "unstable in all his ways" (James 1 : 8). It is an awful thing to attempt to serve God and mammon; Balaam made shipwreck by this unhallowed venture; Lot tried it, and lost his earthly possessions, and probably the souls of all who were dear to him; Judas tried it, and won the unenviable reputation of being the betrayer of the Son of God. It is an awful game to play when eternity is at stake, but the Balaams are not few in all our professedly Christian lands; there are more Lots than Abrahams, and more Judases than Johns. God purify us from an earth-contaminated Christianity, which admits of a religion without moral rectitude, a conversion without consecration, a naming the name of Christ without departing from iniquity! The groanings of the Holy Spirit in our day must surely be for for a return in power to the old and true standard of faith and practice which obtained in the early days of the Church. Away with mediæval times; we want the early times again—the times of being "full of faith of the Holy Ghost," of being "of one heart and of one soul," of "having a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man," of having "great grace" upon us all.

Finally, we were occupied with the last days and the death of Moses; it was a great ending to a great life. And yet how simple! The meek man upon the face of the earth, himself led by God and thus able to lead his people, he went on with his work to the very last, and "died in harness." He needed no preparation, for all this life was a preparation for death. He was not going into the presence of an unknown God, but of an old acquaintance with whom he had had to do all through his life. His death seems to have been in some measure like that of the Lord Jesus Himself, giving up the ghost. There was no sickness, no death struggle; God undertook his burial, and allowed no human grave-digger to share in the work, only the mourning was left for man. Lord, make us also ready!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Applications to the Irish Land Court continue to pour in. There were, on December 1st, 55,000 applications on file, and they are increasing at the rate of five hundred a day. A correspondent in Ireland who has visited the courts says: "There have been only 178 decisions as the result of four weeks' work, being at the rate of two and a half decisions per day by each commission. I calculate from this that the ten commissions would only be able to adjudicate on 7825 cases per year, sitting six days in the week, without vacation. Thus it would take over six years to decide the cases already before the court. But before the year is past there will be at least one hundred and fifty thousand applications; so, if this unhappy country could stand the strain, the dawn of a new century would still find the Land Commissioners whittling away at the rents with their accustomed vigor. The friends of the Land Court say that it is simply a question of multiplying the number of commissions. Then there ought to be one in every county in Ireland. Meantime there is a deadlock."

Agrarian Outrages are Again Increasing in Ireland. The valiant Land Leaguers last week attacked a flock of sheep belonging to a farmer whose sole offence was that he had paid his rent, and slaughtered them all. On November 29th, two hundred valuable cattle belonging to another farmer were cruelly mutilated, and a large number of similar outrages perpetrated. Another report says: "A party of armed men recently entered the house of a woman named Henane, near Listowel, County Kerry, for the purpose of shooting her because she had given information to the police. The children threw themselves upon their mother in terror, and one of them received a charge of shot in its legs. The party then left, after cautioning the family against reporting the outrage." Bitter complaints are made by the Conservative press that the Gladstone Government are doing nothing toward checking the prevalent lawlessness.

M. Gambetta, the New French Premier, Vigorously defends the annexation policy in Africa. In a speech delivered December 1st, he said: "The abandonment of Tunis would compromise our prestige. The question is whether we desire, without rushing into adventures, to have a foreign policy. We cannot abandon Tunis. The Regency will prove a vigilant and necessary doorkeeper for our African colony. There is no intention of pushing military occupation to the frontier of Tripoli because it is not desirable to have the Porte for an immediate neighbor." The British Minister at the French capital has cautioned the Government against pushing its conquests further, and on behalf of England and Spain has assured M. Gambetta that an attack on Morocco would be met by the hostility of both countries.

The Appeal of Mr. Bradlaugh, the Infidel member of the British Parliament, against the decision requiring him to pay heavy penalties for sitting and voting in Parliament without taking the oath, has again been before the courts. This time the case was in the Court of Appeals, and the decision of the three judges was against Mr. Bradlaugh. The only other resort open to Mr. Bradlaugh is the House of Lords. It is yet possible that this lawsuit may be the means of delivering the House of Commons from the disgrace of having an avowed atheist as one of its members.

The Attempted Assassination of the Russian Minister, General Tchérévine has caused renewed uneasiness in St. Petersburg. It appears that a youth, under the pretence of urgent State business, obtained an audience on November 26th, at the Ministry of the Interior with General Tchérévine, who was presiding over a commission. As soon as he was admitted he fired a revolver at the General, but the ball passed harmlessly between his arm and side. The General secured and disarmed the youth, who said he was merely the instrument of another person. The General owed his escape to the precaution of wearing a suit of mail under his clothes. He showed great coolness and as the would-be assassin was led away to prison, said to him: "You should learn to shoot if you want to kill people." The Nihilist asked first for General Ignatieff, the Minister of the Interior, who had just left the building, and it is supposed that he intended to assassinate him.

The New German Reichstag has Lost no time in attacking the government. Both Lasker and Richter have made furious assaults on the policy of Prince Bismarck. The Chancellor, in replying, said he had advised the Emperor to the best of his belief, and had done his duty. The Emperor, he said, constituted a strong feature in the system of government. He (Prince Bismarck) fully and completely represented this imperial and monarchical policy. Prince Bismarck said that Germany was not to be governed after the English pattern. The conduct of affairs was in the hands of the Emperor, and the Chancellor was the sovereign's responsible adviser and so would continue to be. This avowal of personal government of an autocratic character will not surprise those who have watched the tendency of affairs in Germany; but this explicit statement may bring opposition to a focus and precipitate a struggle between the Emperor and the people.

The Conversion of the Roman Catholic Canon of St. Peter's at Rome, mentioned in a previous number, has caused much excitement among the pope's adherents. Dr. Leroy M. Vernon, in a letter from Rome, says: The moral significance and influence of this conversion can hardly be over-estimated. It may safely be said that no single case since the Reformation has so stunned the Vatican and its adherents. Count Campello has had many letters of congratulation and encouragement from various parts of Italy; not a few, also from other lands. A few priests of good position have appealed for admission and service in our Church. Certainly no dozen facts together, since the opening of Italy to the Gospel, have led so many people to note the waning influence of the papacy, or to think seriously upon the merits and rising importance of Protestantism in Italy. Nothing during this century has announced in Rome so like a bugle blast, the word, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

A Fenian Approval of the Irish Land Act is a circumstance so unlooked for that it should not escape notice. A cable dispatch states that O'Leary, a member of the Fenian triumvirate, has written a letter from Paris declaring that, while he maintains his principles and is resolved to combat England, he deprecates the maligning of Englishmen. Mr. Gladstone, he says, has given to Ireland a Land act such as nobody a few years ago could have hoped for, and Mr. Forster is very much better than most of the Irish secretaries.

Graveyard Thieves Have Been at Work in Great Britain. A cablegram says: The body of the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, who died in December, 1880, has been stolen from the Mortuary Chapel of Dunecht House, Aberdeen. The footprints of three persons have been discovered near the mouth of the crypt. The Earl died in Florence, and his body was embalmed, transported to Scotland, and interred in the vault beneath the private chapel. After the burial the vault was closed by heavy stone slabs, six feet square, and then covered with earth and planted with flowers. The body snatchers unscrewed the outer casket and chiselled away the ends of the others. The remains of the Earl were dragged out feet foremost. The silver mountings of the coffin were untouched, the object of the violators being evidently ransom. It is conjectured that the robbery of the Earl's body was suggested by reports of the revival of the negotiations for the recovery of the body of Mr. A. T. Stewart, of New York.

A Severe Storm Visited the British Islands on Sunday, November 27th, causing many disasters by land and sea. The London Times says: "Fifty barges were sunk in the Thames. There was great damage to property at Brighton, Hastings, Dover, Folkestone, and Ventnor; also to the piers and parades at Southampton, Plymouth, Penzance, and Cardiff. The gale blew with great fury along the eastern coast, and throughout the midlands the damage was immense. Shipping casualties are heavy. Four ships are ashore near Chichester. Large steamers are ashore on the Isle of Wight. There is serious alarm concerning the troopship Orontes, which sailed on Saturday for the Cape," Many of the vessels which had sailed for this country are long overdue, and one or two that have arrived, report the heaviest storms ever experienced by old sailors, and several lives were lost, the victims being washed overboard.

Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., has Returned to England, and in a speech delivered at a reception meeting said, that he could bear testimony to the hearty feeling which pervaded America toward England. If anybody, he said, should go, as he did, into the Western States, they would see the attractions they offered for certain classes of the surplus population of Great Britain. He recommended farmers to go there.

Money in Answer to a Missionary's Prayer —A lady missionary in the north of China writes to the headquarters of the China Inland Mission: "We had been rather short of money for some little time, on account of unexpected expenses; still, we had been able to manage. We thought that perhaps a remittance would come by this mail, so we left it in our Father's hands, knowing that He is able to supply all our needs. The mail arrived, our letters were sent on to us, but we found nothing from you. However, it did not trouble us, for we knew that He who cares for the flowers of the field and the birds of the air must surely care for His children, so we made it a matter of special prayer. The next morning I was in my own room asking the Lord to send the needful money. After praying I felt my faith much strengthened, and I was able to say, 'Jesus, I will trust thee.' I had only just risen from my knees when a sister came to my room and said, 'Here is something you will be glad to receive,' and she put into my hand the envelope from you containing the money. Even while I was calling upon the Lord He answered. How faithful He is to His promises!"

THE intelligence cabled here that the Stars and Stripes had been carried with military honors in the Lord Mayor's procession through the streets of London on Nov. 9, invests that ancient ceremonial with unusual interest for American citizens. It is true that it does not rank with the honors paid by command of the President to the British flag at Yorktown, for that was the act of the chief executive of the nation, while the British tribute of respect was simply the act of the chief of one city of the British Empire. But it is gratifying to American patriotism that the beloved symbol of our greatness which has floated over our brave troops on many a hard-fought field, and before which the flag of Great Britain was lowered a century ago, has received an honor never before accorded to any foreign flag on British soil.

Mr. G. W. Smalley, the London correspondent of the New York Tribune, who witnessed the procession, thus writes of the incident of and its reception: "The personal good feeling which dictated it deserves a cordial recognition. It turned out, moreover, that the Lord Mayor rightly estimated the feeling of his fellow-citizens and the people of London in general. A roar of cheering greeted the flag throughout the entire route. Whatever may be thought of the main features of the Show, it is an unprecedented thing that the flag of a foreign country should be borne through the streets of London from the Guildhall to Westminster and back again, with a guard of honor attending it, and cheers accompanying its progress.

"The flag was carried just before the Sheriffs in their state carriages, and just after the officers of the Corporation of London. The drums and fifes of the City of London regiment supplied music for it, and a company of sergeants detailed from the same regiment escorted the flag, carried by three watermen in the quaint costume of the Doggett coat and badge. The people did the rest. 'Indubitably,' remarks one journal, 'it was the cheers of the populace which turned what was a civic and municipal and official honor paid to America into a national one. At every point of the route the appearance of the famous ensign of the States was the signal for bursts of cheering, which were especially noticeable in the city, by St. Martin's Church and the New Law Courts, at Charing Cross, and opposite the Houses of Parliament and Westminter Bridge.'" It may interest our readers to know something of this ancient custom of the Lord Mayor's procession, and of the distinguished British citizen who in his hour of triumph remembered his "kin across the sea," and paid them the greatest compliment in his power.

One of the most important days of the whole year to a Londoner is November 9th, which goes by the name of Lord Mayor's Day. On that day every year the newly elected Lord Mayor, who is chosen by the Corporation, and not, as in New York, elected by the votes of the people, meets the Aldermen, Sheriffs, Recorder, and other great officers at an early hour at the Guildhall, in the east-central part of London, whence in the state carriage, attended by them in their respective carriages, he proceeds to Westminster Hall, in the west of the city, where his lordship, after some ancient ceremonies, takes the prescribed oaths before the Barons of the Exchequer. He then passes with the Recorder to each of the courts in the hall, and invites the several judges to dinner on that day, when he again returns to the east or city proper.

His lordship is preceded by the artillery company, next to which march the company (this year the Merchant Taylors') of which he is a member, and then the other city companies in their regular order, with their distinguishing banners and bands of music. To these succeed the domestics and servants of the Lord Mayor, and then the state coach, finely ornamented with abundance of gilding, and so large as to contain between the seats two stools, on one of which, facing the door, sits the sword-bearer with the sword of state, and on the other the mace-bearer carrying the city mace. The train is closed by the carriages of the retired Lord Mayor, of the Aldermen, the Recorder, the Sheriffs, the Chamberlain, the Common Serjeant, the Town Clerk, and other great officers, and in this order the procession reaches the Guildhall. This year a number of fire-engines formed part of the procession.

THE BANQUET TO A THOUSAND GUESTS.

This annual civic pageantry excites great interest, and exhibits an extraordinary display of municipal splendor. The day closes at the Guildhall by an entertainment of appropriate magnificence, at which it is common to see members of the Royal Family, the most distinguished public characters, and the ambassadors of foreign courts. A thousand individuals take their seats at this dinner, to which they are admitted by tickets from the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, who, in fixed proportions, bear their share of the expense, which generally costs $15,000.

At this banquet the great hall is brilliantly illuminated, carpeted, and adorned with evergreens. At five o'clock the Lord Mayor, in a rich state gown trimmed with sable and a heavy gold collar, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, who has her page and maids of honor, walks in state into the Council Chamber, where the guests are to be received. Trumpeters and marshals and sword-bearer precede them, and the Aldermen, in their gayest costume, bring up the rear. The Lady Mayoress takes her seat on her throne, which is placed on a raised dais at the end of the Council Chamber, while the Lord Mayor remains standing to receive his guests. When the dinner is announced, at seven o'clock, it is the duty of the Prime Minister to conduct the Lady Mayoress to her seat in the dining-hall. The trumpeters cause the ancient building to resound with music while the guests are taking their places; a band plays during the dinner, after which speeches are made, among them a speech from the Prime Minister, which is always anticipated with interest. This is chiefly occasioned by the fact that frequently the Prime Minister discusses on the occasion events which occur after Parliament is prorogued, which generally happens in July, and sometimes he takes the opportunity to express his intentions as to his future policy.

It will be remembered that on November 9th, 1880, the civic supremacy of Alderman W. McArthur, M.P., whose portrait and biography appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 2d, 1880, commenced. His year of office now terminated will long be memorable for the genial and generous, almost lavish hospitality, which he has shown, and for the faithful though unostentatious exhibition of the sterling and inalienable qualities of a truly converted and Christian man. Among the guests entertained at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor's official residence, during the year has been the Rev. Bishop Simpson, who attended the meetings of the Œcumenical Methodist Conference in London.

His Lordship's banquet to the veteran missionary, Dr. Moffatt, at the Mansion House, and his presidency at the Guildhall meeting, in April last, to commemorate Lord Shaftesbury's eightieth birthday, on which occasion the Te Deum was sung, are memorable events during his Mayoralty.

ALDERMAN JOHN ELLIS, THE LORD MAYOR.

THE new Lord Mayor of London was born in the beautiful town of Richmond, Surrey, on January 25th, 1829, and is, therefore, now nearly fifty-three years of age. He was educated in his native town under the care of the Rev. W. Allen, who conducted a private school well known in England for its sound practical system of education. The future Lord Mayor showed good ability at school, and was distinguished by his industry and capacity for hard work.

At the age of fifteen he was articled to a firm of surveyors, auctioneers, and estate agents in London, the chief partner of which, Sir John Musgrove, was Lord Mayor in 1851. His first promotion in the office was owing to a circumstance, which, like a great many other things called "trifles," became the turning-point of a distinguished career. It was this: The head of the firm of which young Ellis was an employé, Alderman Musgrove, had left a basket of fish at his office, to be sent by a porter to the railway station. When the Alderman arrived at the station he found his apprentice, Mr. Ellis, there instead of the porter, and in charge of the parcel. "Did I ask you to bring the basket?" inquired the Alderman. "No," replied the young man, "but the porter did not return in time, so I brought it myself." This pleased the old gentleman, and he never forgot it; it showed thoughtfulness, the old gentleman considered, and a disposition to oblige others without too much regard for personal dignity. Mr. Musgrove from time to time advanced the young man to positions of trust in his office, and at last, in 1854, took him into partnership, and he is now the sole surviving partner of the firm, which is known throughout London and the whole country under the style of Farebrother, Ellis, Clark & Co., formerly Musgrove & Gadsden.

In 1858 Mr. Ellis married the third daughter of Mr. John Staples, of Salisbury. In 1864 he entered the Court of Common Council as the representative of the ward in which his business offices are situated, having previously served in various offices connected with his parish. On the fact of Sir John Musgrove's intended retirement, in 1872, becoming known, an address signed by upward of eight hundred of the inhabitants of the ward, chiefly men of considerable mercantile importance, was sent to Mr. Ellis urging him to enter the lists for the vacant aldermanic gown, and he was unanimously elected.

Mr. Ellis joined the ancient court of the Merchant Taylors' Company in 1873, and in 1874–5 he was elected to the office of Sheriff, during the mayoralty of Mr. Alderman Stone, when the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs visited Paris to participate in the ceremony of opening the New Opera House. The civic party were cordially entertained by Marshal MacMahon, who was then President of the French Republic.

The Lord Mayor is a Conservative in politics, and so highly respected is he that he has been frequently requested to offer himself for election to Parliament. For some years past he has been actively engaged in agricultural pursuits in Surrey, where his country residence is, and where he is well known as a liberal supporter of the various philanthropic and religious institutions of the neighborhood.

NOTED LONDON BUILDINGS.

OUR frontispiece picture presents a view of one of the most remarkable localities in London, which is in fact the very heart of the city. The open space indicated receives the tributary contributions of no fewer than eight important thoroughfares. It is the most crowded, and, perhaps, the most interesting part of the British metropolis. From morning to night vehicles of all descriptions pass and repass in every direction, while pedestrians move to and fro in apparently never-ending procession. More people, and more omnibuses and hacks, perambulate the open space in front of the three buildings shown in our frontispiece, than at perhaps any other place in the world. Within a circuit of half a mile are most of the great city banking-houses, insurance offices, and commercial establishments, and the Stock Exchange is within a short distance.

On the extreme left of our front picture may be seen

THE BANK OF ENGLAND,

that colossal monetary emporium, which, from the heart of central London, diffuses throughout the empire of British commerce the golden stream that is the life-blood of its existence. There is no public institution in the world which lays bare its con-

Sylph declared her inability to say, looking at the same time wistfully round the old oak-panelled room in which she sat, her mind full of sorrow at the idea of parting from it.

"I did not suppose, dear child," said Wesley, "that you could give an answer to my question; but I put it before you, that I might be free to make a proposal. I shall in a few days be going to the sister land, and if you be willing, will take you over with me. I cannot, because my engagements are so fixed, come for you here, but if you meet me at Conway, I shall take you up there, in my carriage, for Holyhead, from which we shall start for Dublin, where, I should think, a letter if sent at once will insure that your Irish friends will arrange to receive you."

Sylph poured forth her grief at having to tear herself away from all her Chester associations, from the quaint old streets, the ancient walls, the unique house in the Rows, from the scenes in connection with her dim remembrances of her mother, from fellowship with her Christian associates, from the poor in the town whom she had come to know so well, and, not least, from Doctor Gilbart's new-made grave. All these made Chester very dear to her, and the thought of being severed from them, and so speedily, forced her to weep.

"I well understand your feelings, my daughter," said the venerable and saintly old man, "and will certainly not rebuke you. But what can you do, my child?"

Sylph saw this, and, therefore, though with a sharp pang, brought herself to agree to her aged friend's proposal. Wesley also arranged, with consent of the trustees, to put all law matters in connection with Doctor Gilbart's effects into skilful and trusty hands; and finally got a friend to stay with Sylph until the day should come for setting out upon what was then considered a distant and perilous journey.

THE KING: HIS PREDICTED WARFARE, VICTORY, AND MARRIAGE.

By Rev. William Maude.

Who is the "Queen" of the 45th Psalm?—The Jewish Bride—Difference Between the Jewish Bride and the "Lamb's Wife"—Bishop Horsley's Comment—The "Honorable Women"—The Companions of the Jewish Bride—The Mother-Church of Christendom—The Bride to Forget Her Own People, etc.—The Bride's Beauty—Israel's Husband and Divine Lord—The Bridal Procession—The Glory of the "King's Daughter"—The Virgin-Companions—The Glorious Results of the Marriage.

HITHERTO—in that portion of this sublime 45th Psalm which we have already considered—our attention has been concentrated, as it were, on the one magnificent figure which seemed to occupy the whole foreground of the prophetic picture—the King in the beauty of His person, the greatness of His strength, and the glory of His regal dignity. But at the 9th verse our mental glance, heretofore rivetted, so to speak, on the glorious person of the King, falls on another figure, second only in attractiveness to His own, though shining, moon-like, with a reflected beauty, and owing all her dignity and importance to the relation in which she stands to Him. This is of whom the Psalmist, still addressing the Divine Bridegroom, says:

(9.) "Kings' daughters were among Thy honorable women: Upon Thy right hand did stand the Queen, in gold of Ophir."

Now, as has already been pointed out, it is of the utmost importance, in order to the correct interpretation of this psalm, that the Queen who is here spoken of should not be confounded, as is commonly done, with "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," whose marriage is spoken of in the 19th chapter of the Book of Revelation. We have here to do with the earthly Jewish Bride, not with the heavenly Spiritual Bride, "the church of the first-born ones." For, as we find in Scripture two Israels and two Jerusalems, so do we find also two Brides. And some of the most distinguishing characteristics of the two are very clearly revealed. Thus, for instance, the Church is the Bride "of the Lamb," denoting a union based on sacrificial grounds, inasmuch as it is a body the individual members of which have been "redeemed unto God by Christ's blood out of every kindred and tongue, and people and nation;" the union itself being of an essentially spiritual nature, so that "he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit" (1 Cor. 6 : 17); whereas, most clearly, of which this Psalm speaks, is the Consort of the King Messiah; an elect nation from among nations, not an election of individuals out of all nations.

THE JEWISH BRIDE,

Again, whereas the heavenly Bride is destined to reign with Christ—as He to whom all power is given—"over the earth;" the Jewish Bride will reign with Him "upon the earth," when during the coming age He shall sit on "the throne of His father David." And so, once more, we may notice, as not being without symbolical significance, that whereas "the Lamb's wife" has it given unto her that "she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints" (Rev. 19 : 8); the Queen of the psalm is clad "in gold of Ophir," emblematic of a more objective but less Divine glory.

Speaking of the Jewish Church and nation, in the character of the Bride of the King Messiah, Bishop Horsley thus writes: "The restoration of the Hebrew Church to the rights of a wife—to the situation of Queen-consort in Messiah's kingdom upon earth—is the constant strain of prophecy. To prove this, by citing all the passages to that purpose, would be to transcribe whole chapters of some of the prophets, and innumerable detached passages from almost all. In addition to those which I have already cited in my former discourses on this subject, I shall produce only the latter part of the second chapter of Hosea. In that chapter Jehovah, after discarding the incontinent wife, and threatening terrible severity of punishment, adds that, nevertheless, the time should come when she should again address her offended Lord by the endearing name of Husband. 'And I will betroth thee to Myself for ever. Yes; I will betroth thee to Myself with justice, and with righteousness, and with exuberant kindness, and with tender love. Yes; with faithfulness

TO MYSELF I WILL BETROTH THEE.'

"These promises are made to the woman that had been discarded, and cannot be understood of mercies to be extended to any other. The Prophet Isaiah speaks to the same effect, and describes the Gentile converts as becoming, upon the reunion, children of the pardoned wife (see Isaiah 54 : 5; 62 : 5). And I must not omit to mention that St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, to clear up the mystery of God's dealing with the Jews, tells us, that 'blindness is in part only happened unto Israel, till the time shall arrive for the fulness of the Gentiles to come in: and then all Israel shall be saved,' for 'the gifts and calling of God are without repentance' (i.e., 'change of mind' on His part). To expound these predictions of the ancient Prophets, and this declaration of the Apostle, of anything but the restoration of the natural Israel, is to introduce ambiguity and equivocation into the plainest oracles of God."

THE "HONORABLE WOMEN."

But the question here very naturally presents itself: If the Bride be the Jewish Church, as we have supposed, who are the "honorable women," or, as the expression would be more correctly translated, "Thy beloved," or "precious ones"?

Figuratively, we can hardly err in regarding these "beloved" or "precious," ones, the companions or suite of the Jewish Bride, as the other Gentile churches; not in the sense of great ecclesiastical organizations, such as the Church of Rome or the Church of England, nor yet as possessing any distinctively national character, but more generally and indefinitely, in the New Testament sense of the word church, as gatherings of God's people united in Christian fellowship, as when St. Paul says to the Church of God in Corinth: "I am jealous over you with godly jealousy; for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ" (2 Corinthians 11 : 2). In which sense, moreover, they may very appropriately be described as "kings' daughters," as being in the highest sense of royal descent, the individual members of which they are composed "being born again, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John 1 : 13). This is the view on the whole favored by Bishop Horsley, though he gives an alternative one upon which we need not enter, for he says: "Some expositors have imagined that the Consort is an emblem of the Church Catholic in her totality—the 'Kings' daughters' being typical of the several particular churches of which that one universal is composed. But the Queen-consort here is unquestionably the Hebrew Church—the church of the natural Israel—reunited, by her conversion, to her Husband, and advanced by His favor to the high prerogative of and the kings' daughters mentioned are the churches which have been gathered out of the Gentiles, in the interval between the expulsion of this wife and the taking of her home again; that is, between the dispersion of the Jews by the Romans, and their restoration."

The inspired prophet-poet turns in verses 10 and 12 to address the Bride more directly, designating her as "daughter," according to the well-known idiom of Scripture, of which we have an instance further on in this Psalm itself (verse 12), where the "daughter of Tyre" unquestionably denotes the city and people of Tyre; and so we elsewhere read of the "daughter of Zion," the "daughter of Jerusalem," the "daughter of Babylon," "of Edom," "of Egypt," etc., as denoting these various kingdoms and peoples.

THE BRIDE TO FORGET HER OWN PEOPLE.

But what are we to understand by the exhortation which we here find addressed to the Jewish Bride to "forget her own people, and her father's house"? In answer to this question we will quote once more the language of Bishop Horsley: "If a princess from a distant land," observes that learned prelate, "taken in marriage by a great king, were admonished to forget her own people and her father's house, the purport of the advice would easily be understood to be, that she should divest herself of all attachment to the customs of her native country, and to the style of her father's court; and learn to speak the language, and assume the dress, the manners, and the taste of her husband's people. The "father's house" and "own people," which the Psalmist advises the Queen Consort to forget, is the ancient Jewish religion in its external form—the ceremonies of the temple service, the sacrifices and the typical purgations of the Levitical priesthood.

Not that she is to forget God's gracious promises to Abraham, nor the covenant with her forefathers (the benefit of which she will enjoy to the very end of time), nor the many wonderful deliverances that were wrought for them. Nor is she to forget so wonderfully preserved in the Scriptures of the Old Testament; nor the predictions of Moses and her prophets, the full accomplishment of which she will at this time experience; and, historically, she is never to forget even the ceremonial law; for the Levitical rites were nothing less than the Gospel itself in hieroglyphics, and, rightly understood, they afford the most complete demonstration of the coherence of Revelation with itself in all its different stages, and the best evidence of its truth; showing that it has been the same in substance in all ages, differing only in external form, in the rites of worship, and in the manner of teaching.

But, practically, the rites of their ancient worship are to be forgotten, that is, laid aside; for they never were of any other importance than in reference to the Gospel, as the shadow is of no value but as it resembles the substance. Practically, therefore, the restored Hebrew Church is to abandon her ancient Jewish rites, and become mere and pure Christian; and thus she will secure the conjugal affections of her husband, and render the beauty of her person perfect in his eyes."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE past year has been one of great prosperity for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the Publishers for the third time record their acknowledgments to Almighty God for the favor thus steadily and abundantly bestowed.

The Subscription List is a little more than fifty per cent larger than it was at this time last year; and, as the sermons of Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, which make the leading feature of the paper, are also its principal means of doing good, the publishers can, without self-glorification, express the satisfaction with which they send out thousands upon thousands of copies of those faithful statements of the way of salvation every week. They are read on Sabbaths in many solitary homes where the visit of the circuit preacher does not occur oftener than once a month.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has also prospered financially. For, as our terms are always cash in advance, every subscription means a receipted bill, and we have neither outstanding accounts nor doubtful assets.

Our relations with our subscribers also have been of the pleasantest kind, with no harassing for payment and no disputes about bills. We have adhered to a rule with which we started, and which we believe to be required by Christian courtesy; viz., to reply by return of post to every inquiry from a subscriber.

We hereby tender our thanks to eight hundred agents through whose exertions we have largely built up our circulation. Some are aged persons, who find that means of livelihood within their failing strength; some are young children, who take it as an easy way to earn pocket-money; and others are men and women in the prime of life who have chosen canvassing as their professional business; while not a few are to be included in the number, who, out of sheer good will and without a thought of gain, go to work to promote the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the usefulness of which they conscientiously believe.

Now we shall be glad to enter renewals for 1882 as early as it is convenient for our subscribers to send them, and we repeat our offer to mail a circular of agent's terms and a package of sample copies to any person who contemplates canvassing for the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Arthur's First Message to Congress was sent in on Tuesday, December 6th. It is an exhaustive state paper, longer than such documents usually are, and discusses minutely both foreign and domestic affairs. It has been generally well received by the Democratic as well as the Republican press as a clear and statesmanlike review of our national condition, and the recommendations it contains, although of course, Republican in principle, are admitted by Democrats to be moderately expressed and deserving of attention. The assistance the President has received from the heads of departments is recognized, but there is a distinct personal tone noticeable throughout the message, which indicates that President Arthur has expressed in it his individual opinions rather than suffered himself to be the mere mouthpiece of the Departments. His reference to the late President is graceful, and will find an echo in every heart. Of President Garfield, General Arthur says: "The memory of his exalted character, of his noble achievements, and of his patriotic life will be treasured forever as a sacred possession of the whole people."

The President's Review of Foreign Affairs records the gratifying fact that our relations with all the powers of the world are of a friendly character. We learn for the first time that a direct application has been made to Great Britain for a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which relates to the Panama Canal. President Arthur reiterates the opinion Mr. Hayes expressed, that a European guarantee of neutrality for the canal is superfluous, and that the United States and the Colombian Government are the only legitimate guarantors. The protracted strife among the South American republics is mentioned by the President with concern, and he explains the steps the Government has taken for the promotion of peace and the re-establishment of order. The treaty with China is also noticed, and the particular clause prohibiting the importation of opium into that country emphatically approved. The President mentions the efforts made by our Government for the protection of our citizens in Germany and Russia, and states that energetic remonstrances have been made to the latter Power against its treatment of American Jews. He refers, too, to a fact not generally known respecting Japan—namely, that "the emperor contemplates the establishment of a full constitutional government, and has already summoned a Parliamentary Congress for the purpose of effecting the change."

In Dealing with Domestic Questions the President states his opinion that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burden of taxation. The whole of the public debt, it appears, may be paid in ten years if the national income and expenditure continue to bear the same relations to each other as at present; but in view of the heavy load of taxation the people have already borne, the President believes it would be wise to reduce the revenues, even if that course should involve a little delay in the payment of the debt. He therefore recommends the abolition of all internal revenue taxes except those on liquor and tobacco, and the appointment of a commission to revise the tariff laws. With respect to the Post-Office and the Star routes, the President says he has enjoined upon the officials appointed before his accession the duty of prosecuting with the utmost vigor of the law all persons who may be found chargeable with frauds upon the postal service. The President favors the various projects for internal improvement, especially of the Mississippi River. He recommends an increase of the army and the formation of a more efficient navy. Referring to the Mormon question, he recommends a change in the law to facilitate prosecutions for polygamy. A considerable part of the message is devoted to the subject of civil service reform and to a searching examination of the English system, which, the President thinks, advantageous as it has been found there, would in some important particulars be unsuitable to our institutions. He recommends, however, several important changes in our present system which are identical in principle with those of the English plan. He concludes by advising Congress to define more explicitly the law touching the question of Presidential inability, which, as was shown in our recent trouble, is very vague and uncertain in its provisions.

The Defence in the Guiteau Trial Rested on Tuesday, December 6th. Evidence was then called by the prosecution in rebuttal of the theory set up by the counsel of the prisoner that Guiteau is insane. As fact after fact was elicited to prove from his own record that Guiteau has been for years, a fraud, a liar, a beat, and an adulterer, the assassin became excited and eventually gave way to a paroxysm of rage. He indignantly protested against the public money being wasted in bringing witnesses to prove that he was a wicked man, and said he could not see the relevancy of their evidence to the question at issue, which he claimed was whether, assuming that he believed himself divinely commissioned to shoot President Garfield, such belief constituted insanity within the meaning of the law. Judge Porter, of counsel for the people, obligingly explained to him the relevancy of the evidence by saying, he proposed to show that the affliction under which Guiteau was laboring was not insanity, as claimed by the defence, but "devilish depravity." The line taken by the prosecution was carefully followed with the view of showing that Guiteau's crime was not a sudden and uncontrollable impulse, but an act likely to be committed by a man whose craving for notoriety and whose deplorable want of principle had been observed for years by men who were associated with him. Guiteau then saw the relevancy of the evidence and the danger it portended to himself, and with deliberate cunning he assailed every witness who took the stand with filthy epithets and gross personal abuse, apparently in the hope of deterring other witnesses from appearing against him. Such an exhibition of depravity as this trial has produced has rarely, if ever, been witnessed before by the civilized world.

The Account of a Fearful Calamity by Fire, which occurred near Pittsburg, Pa., on Saturday last, is one of the most distressing narratives published for some time. A two-story wooden shanty on the line of the Pittsburg and Lake Erie Railroad, at Gibson Station, about eight miles from Pittsburg, caught fire about daybreak, and in less than half an hour was burned to ashes. Forty-five men were sleeping on the upper floor of the building, and of these, eleven were burned to death, and nine others were so severely burned that no hope is entertained of their recovery. The statement of the woman who kept the shanty is that she awakened before daylight on Saturday morning, and called to her daughter and a servant girl, who like herself slept on the ground floor, to get up and prepare breakfast for the boarders. Soon afterward she heard the explosion of a kerosene lamp, and almost instantly the whole place was in a blaze. She shouted to the men up-stairs, who were sleeping in two tiers of bunks around the room. Some jumped from the window without waiting to dress, and others groped through smoke and flame down the stairs. All who did not awake or who waited to dress were burned or fatally injured. Many of the bodies recovered were so charred as to be wholly unrecognizable. Most of the men were unmarried, and were in the employ of Martin Joyce, a contractor. It is stated that many of them had been drinking heavily the previous night, and were too stupefied to comprehend their danger, or all might have been saved.

So Much has been Said Publicly and Privately of the failure of the Prohibition Law in Maine that it is gratifying to note a statement made by a journal so impartial as the Portland Press. In a recent issue that journal says: "In spite of defects and violations, Maine is much better off for the law which bears her name. In some of the cities, particularly in Portland and Bangor, where the sheriffs omit to enforce the law, much intoxicating drink is unlawfully sold. But even here the condition is much better than if license were given to open grogshops on every corner; while in all the country towns a generation has grown up practically free from the knowledge of intoxicating drinks and the temptations to ruin by their use."

A Remarkable Instance of Commercial Integrity was recorded recently. Twenty years ago the well-known dry goods house of Hood, Bonbright & Co., of Philadelphia, became embarrassed and was compelled to make a settlement with its creditors. On November 17th the creditors of the house were agreeably surprised to receive a circular letter informing them that the firm some years ago commenced a fund intended for the benefit of the creditors. The firm says: "This we have pleasure now to offer them. Covering in its equitable application more than the percentage abated in our settlement under the recommendation of their committee of creditors, the excess in each case will represent a pro rata apportionment of interest derived from said fund. In grateful remembrance, therefore, we inclose herewith our check for $—."

A Homeless and Disconsolate Man Sitting in Madison Square, New York, one day, some months ago, was accosted by an old gentleman who pointed him to Christ as the sinner's Refuge. Eventually he was directed to the Bowery branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the happy result that followed may be learned from an affecting letter received last week by the secretary from the man's father in England. The letter says: "This afternoon, when I came home from my office to tea, I found a letter awaiting me from my son, who left his employment four years ago last Easter, and of whom we had lost all traces. From his letter I gather that you have interested yourself in his behalf, and have obtained for him a situation at ——. I do not know whether he may have given you any account of his antecedents. He is my only son. He was holding a good situation in the —— Bank in London, was drawn aside, and on Easter Sunday, 1877, he left his lodging stating that he was going into the country to dine with a friend. From that time till the present we have heard nothing of him, until his letter arrived to-day. I feel I need not ask you to continue your labor of love, to watch over him as you would over your own child, and give him all the help you can. I would that I could come to you and express all I feel, but I can do no more than pray that our Heavenly Father may abundantly bless you and all who help you in the work."

The Gospel Cars on the Railroads may soon be an actual fact. As we have already mentioned, a Christian conductor on the Old Colony Railroad first suggested the idea, and it has found so much favor among Christians of all denominations who spend much of their time on the cars, than an agitation has been commenced to secure the desired object. Circulars have been distributed by Rev. W. W. Dowd to passengers on the New York, New Haven, and Hartford line asking such of them as approve the movement to co-operate with Mr. Dowd in obtaining signatures to a petition, which the superintendent of the line has promised to favorably consider if influentially supported. The plan, Mr. Dowd said, was to make the experiment on one road and if it proved successful on that one to adopt it on others. It is not intended to make the idea denominational, and for that reason the pastors of all churches in Stamford, Rye, Mount Vernon, and other places on the road, will be asked to select laymen travelling between New York and the different points, to conduct the services.

A Sister Lost for Twenty Years was Found through an act of benevolence in Davenport, Iowa, a few weeks ago. She was born in Maine, but in 1861, having married a man who turned out badly, she and her husband went West. Her father and brothers went to the war, and the family home in Maine was broken up. At the close of the war the only surviving member of the family was one brother named Aaron Carter. He was in prosperous circumstances, and was anxious to find his sister, that if, as was probable, she were in poverty, he might relieve her. But all his efforts were vain, and he concluded she was dead. On November 22d last, he was on board the raft steamer Clyde, which put in at Davenport on her way north. He went ashore with the other men, who were all shivering before a keen northwest wind. While going along the street Carter met a poorly-clad little boy, who was running along, crying bitterly. Carter asked him what was the matter, and the little lad sobbed out, "I'm cold." "Come with me," said Carter, and, taking the boy to a clothing store, he bought him a suit of warm clothes and a pair of mittens. He then asked the boy his name. "Aaron Dunlap," was the reply. Carter was thunderstruck. "Aaron Dunlap!" he cried. "Where are your father and mother?" "Father is dead," the boy replied. "Well, take me to your mother, then, as quickly as you can," said Carter. The boy took him to his humble home, and there Carter found in the boy's mother his long-lost sister, whom, with her three children he took with him to the north, where he promises to keep them in comfort. Carter's obedience to the apostolic injunction (Heb. 13 : 2) thus helped him to achieve his long cherished desire.

A Part of a Man was Sentenced to State Prison by Judge, afterward Governor, Kent, of Maine. A man was charged before him with burglarizing a lumberman's camp, taking clothing and money. The witness for the government testified that he saw the prisoner's head, arm, and shoulder thrust through an opening he had made in the camp and the articles disappear with them. The prisoner's counsel went to the jury, gravely protesting that there was no case; that to make out a case of burglary the prosecution must show an entrance of the whole man; the feet as well as the head must have been within the camp. The judge instructed the jury to return a verdict of guilty to the extent the evidence would warrant. After a brief absence the jury returned a verdict of guilty against the prisoner, as to his arm, shoulder, and head, and the judge sentenced the arm, shoulder, and head to State prison for two years. The prisoner might do with the remainder of his body as he pleased. There are men who have managed to gain admission to Christian churches who engage in businesses which no Christian should profit by, and we are often puzzled to know whether they belong to the Church or the world. But at the last there will be no mistake, for the judgment of God is unerring, and He demands the service and consecration of our whole being.

The Propagation of Contagious Disease has been made the subject of legislative enactment, but the law is frequently evaded. A glaring case of this kind was discovered last week in New York. A tailor was found in a tenement-house making clothes for a large firm of clothiers in the city, and on his board covered with pieces of the new material was a child in an advanced stage of small-pox. The tailor admitted that since the child had been ill several articles of clothing had been finished and sent to his employers. This reckless disregard of consequences is horrible, and will probably entail punishment. It would be a beneficial thing if the propagation of moral pestilence by pernicious literature by example and by the sale of intoxicating liquor were also made a criminal offence (Eccles. 9 : 18).

A Faith Cure has been Followed by a Wedding in Pennsylvania. The correspondent of a Philadelphia daily journal, writing from Honesdale, vouches for the facts as true in every particular. Miss Lillie D. Tyler, of Damascus, Wayne County, Pa., was engaged to be married some years ago to Mr. John G. Mitchell. She was, however, attacked by a painful disease, which so completely prostrated her that she became a confirmed invalid. Her case was pronounced hopeless, and all thought of being united with the husband of her choice was reluctantly abandoned. Some Christian friend, however, related to the sufferer the case of Miss Carrie Judd, and other similar cases, and it was decided to humbly supplicate God for recovery. November 26th, 1880, was the day appointed, and the young lady's pastor, Rev. Thomas Westcot, with other Christian friends united in prayer together. Prayer was continued until complete recovery was assured. On November 26th last, one year from the day when prayer was commenced for her healing, her pastor had the pleasure of performing the marriage ceremony, when the bride, in perfect health, was united to the man to whom she was affianced before her illness.

TWO GOOD THINGS.

A Short Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"It is good for me that I have been afflicted: that I might learn thy statutes."—PSALM 119 : 71.

"It is good for me to draw near to God: I have put my trust in the Lord God, that I may declare all thy works."—PSALM 73 : 28.

In Reference to Ourselves—Things Manifestly Bad—Things we are not Sure About—I. Affliction has been Good—It Sours Some People—Is Good for Others—As a Corrective—As a Cure for Evil—Weight that Gave Strength—As an Actual Producer of Good—Of Patience—Sympathy—As a Quickener—A Coachman's Device—As an Instructor—The Teaching of The Blackboard—II. Drawing Near to God is Good—In Knowing Him Better—In Trusting Him More—A Faith for the Kitchen—The Testimony that has Power.

THERE is an old proverb which says, "When a man is forty he is either a fool or a physician"; that is to say, he either does not know anything, or else he begins to know what is good for him. Some of us who are beyond that age think that we know in some measure what is good for us. We are not inclined to be very positive as to what is good for other people, but there are one or two things in reference to ourselves of which we say very dogmatically, "They are good for me." We have undergone such a sufficiency of investigation, experiment, and personal trial, that we are not in any fear of being contradicted; or if we should be, we put our foot down and defy the contradiction.

These two things in my two texts I am certain about, and I believe there are many here who share my positiveness. The first is, that whatever it may be for other people, "it is good for me to have been afflicted;" and the second is, that whatever it may be to other people, "it is good for me to draw near to God." We assert this, not because we have been told so, but because of personal proof; and we assert it now, not as young beginners who are buckling on their harness, and who think themselves certain, but as those who have gone some distance in the pilgrimage of life, and know by actual test and matter of fact that it is even so.

Brethren beloved, during our lives we have met with many things which we know were not good for us. Some things have been manifestly bad. Sin is always poisonous, whatever form it takes. Error is always injurious, however insidious may be its shape, and however poetic may be the terms in which it is expressed. We pray God that we may have nothing to do with sin or with error, for these things cannot be good; they must be evil.

We have also met with certain things which at the time appeared to us to be good, and under some aspects might have been so; but at the present moment whether they were good or not. We have enjoyed soft hours of ease which, perhaps, weakened us, or sunshiny times of high delight which in a measure turned our brain. There have been allotted to us times of learning in which we made great acquisitions of knowledge; but "knowledge puffeth up," and we were puffed up, we fear. There have been calms with us when the sea-birds sat upon the waters, and the seas were glassy as a lake, for the winds were hushed; but the calm was treacherous, and it bred ill savor and unhealthiness within our spirit.

I am not sure, my friend, though you thought it a fine day when you grew rich—I am not sure that it was a good thing for you to be wealthy; for you have not been half so spiritually-minded or half so happy as you used to be. Yes, you did enter into a much larger sphere, and you thought it a noble thing. You almost rang the bells about it. Are you quite sure that it was good for you? Are you as good a man in the great sphere as you were in the little one? Do you live as near to God now, with that great business to handle, as you did when your hat covered your whole estate, and you went to bed at night with no fear of robbers, for you had nought to lose?

Much that seems good is only good in the seeming. As for the two things before us in our texts, we have no question about them. We know that it is good for us that we have been afflicted; we know that it is good for us that we should draw near to God. We will talk about these undoubted jewels, and may God grant that our talk may be profitable.

I. Turning to the 119th Psalm, at the 71st verse, we will talk of that good thing first:

AFFLICTION HAS BEEN GOOD

for us. "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes." I repeat what I said just now: every man must speak for himself; we are not sure that affliction is good for everybody. Some persons have been soured by affliction. They fell into trouble and they rebelled against God, and so the trouble did not work in them any permanent good; it rather developed their combative tendencies, and they have ever since remained with their hands against other men, compelling others to lift their hands against them. I have known individuals in a family who seemed to have a spite against every one they saw, simply because they were disappointed in early life, or had made a venture and sustained a loss. They grew sour, they keep sour, and they grow sourer every day, till one wonders what strength of vinegar will yet flow through their veins.

It is not good for some people to have been afflicted at all, and yet it is not the fault of the affliction; it is the fault of the persons afflicted. It might have produced in them a splendid character if all had been right to begin with; but, inasmuch as all was wrong, that very process which should have ripened them into sweetness has hastened them to rottenness. That same thing which in gracious souls has brought forth everything that is pure and lovely, has in others produced everything that is malicious and envious. I hope, however, that I may say of many here present, or that they can say of themselves, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted." The inquiry is,

HOW HAS IT BEEN GOOD?

First, it has been good in connection with many other good things. It has acted as a counteractive with reference to the great blessings which God has bestowed upon us in other ways. We are so constituted that we cannot bear very much prosperity. Some men might have been rich, but God knew they could not bear it, and so he has never suffered them to be tempted above what they are able to bear. Others might have been famous, but they would have been ruined by pride, and so the Lord in tender mercy has withheld from them an opportunity of distinguishing themselves, denying them this apparent advantage for their real good. Where God favors any man with prosperity he will send a corresponding amount of affliction to go with it, and deprive it of its injurious tendencies.

I put it to some of you whom God has greatly favored. You have looked upon your prosperity as a boon, but you have wondered why you should be tried at the same time; it was because you could not have borne the favor if you had not received the chastening. You were glad of the sail, and glad of the wind that filled it, but you could not understand why the ballast was put into your hold; you thought it hindered your progress. My friend, you would have been blown out of the water if it had not been for the ballast which kept you where you ought to be.

I, for my part, owe more, I think, to the anvil and to the hammer, to the fire and to the file, than to anything else. I bless the Lord for the correctives of His providence by which, if He has blessed me on the one hand with sweets, He has blessed me on the other hand with bitters. To me He has measured out a double blessing—the lamb, and the bitter herbs to eat with it; seldom the one without the other. Thus "It is good for me to have been afflicted"—good as a corrective for other goods.

It is good, dear friends, to have been afflicted existent within our nature. David says, "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now I have kept thy word." That is the case with many of God's servants. They were prone to one peculiar temptation, and though they may not have seen it, the chastening hand of God was aimed at that special weakness of their character. We sometimes talk about phrenology, and the bumps on one's head; and you may make a great many mistakes over that matter, but God knows your tendencies and faculties. He knows the characteristics of His children accurately—far more accurately than any science can ever tell them, and He deals with extraordinary wisdom and prudence toward His family.

I suppose that, when the biographies of the saints are all read by the light of eternity, we, even we, shall be able to see why the painful career of certain Christians could not have been other than it was if they were to get to heaven at last; we shall see why that unusual trial was sent, and sent when they seemed least able to bear it. We shall discover that God interposed the screen of trial against the unseen fiery dart which only His eternal eye discovered, and laid the weight just where Satan was about to put the hand to overthrow, that very weight adding power to stand to the man who, in the lightness of his heart, had else been tripped up. It is all well, brother; it is all well.

THE SURGERY

which is cutting so deep—the knife which is cutting to the very quick—is only reaching to the point where the mischief lies. That mischief must come out, root and branch. There is a cancer of evil tendency within us, and not a rootlet of it must be left; for if the least fibre of it be suffered to remain through tenderness it will be an unkind tenderness; for the cancer will shoot again, and fill the heart with its malevolence. Therefore does the Lord out of love cut deep: sharp and cruel are His wounds. Most cruel do they seem when they are in greatest tenderness of grace.

We do not know yet all the mischief that is in us. I would undertake in five minutes to make any perfect man prove to himself that he was not perfect. Only let me set certain persons upon him to tease him, and we shall soon see his irritation. Let the devil loose on a man who is hard by the threshold of heaven, and you will soon find that corruption dwells even in the hearts of the regenerate. The Lord would have us aware of this, and therefore he often sends trial to reveal the hidden evil. We are often like a glass of water which has been standing still for hours, and looks very clear and bright; but there is a sediment, and a little stir soon discovers it, and clouds the crystal: that sediment is the old nature.

Trial comes and arouses into activity that which had been lying still, and we say, "Dear me, I had no idea that such evil was in my heart." Of course you had not. You will live so comfortably at home among Christian friends do not know how sinful you are; you hear of people out in the world doing this and that, and you say, "What naughty folks they are." They are no worse than you would be if you were put into the same position, only you are at ease and they are sorely tempted. Dogs sleep when no one enters the house; but a knock at the door will set them barking.

The Lord does not wish us to boast of sham holiness, and therefore He sends us trials that we may see the mischief which lurks in our hearts, and that we may be driven to the Holy Spirit for power to conquer our sin, and to the cleansing blood of Jesus Christ for the real taking away of guilt. He who has struggled with his inward sins must know that he has been helped both to discover and to overcome many of them by his afflictions; and so in this sense it is good that he has been afflicted. "Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child; but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him;" if this be so, we may not only bear the rod, but even kiss it.

Affliction is also useful to God's people

things in them. Some virtues cannot be produced in us—at least, I do not see how they can be—apart from affliction. One of them is patience. If a man has no trial, how is he to be patient? We all think ourselves patient when we have nothing to bear. We can all stand on the mountain-tops before we have tried those dizzy heights, and we are all brave when the war is over, though things look rather different when bullets whistle about our ears. When we are thrown into the sea our swimming abilities are not quite so extraordinary as we thought they were. We have great notions of what we can do, but trial is the test. Patience, I think, can scarcely be said to be in a man unless he has endured tribulation, "for tribulation worketh patience." A veteran warrior is the child of battles, and a patient Christian is the offspring of adversity.

There is a very sweet grace called sympathy, which is seldom found in persons who have had no trouble. We are told that our dear Lord and Master Himself learned sympathy by being tempted in all points like as we are. He had to feel our infirmities, or else He could not have been touched with a fellow feeling toward us. It is surely so with us. I have stayed sometimes with an admirable brother who never had, he told me, an ache or a pain since he was born that he recollects; he is a man of fifty, and in splendid health. Well, he tries to sympathize with people, and he does do it to the utmost of his power, but it makes you smile. It is like an elephant picking up a pin. It is a wonderful feat for him to do. He does not understand it.

You know yourself how hard it is to get sympathy out of those who have never endured a trial similar to your own. Some one goes to see a widow, and talks to her about her grief, and she says to herself all the time, "What does he know about it? He has never lost the partner of his life." A bachelor speaks to a dear soul who has just buried her little child. Unless he is a very wise man he is apt to say something about children which will irritate rather than console the bereaved mother.

You may try your best, but you have not much of the faculty of sympathy unless you have been in the trial. It is by passing through the fire that we know how to deal with people who are in the furnace. So we may thank God that we have been afflicted, if we are ministers, or if we are teachers of others. We have sometimes to suffer, not for our own sake, but for the sake of others, that we may be enabled to speak a word in season to him that is weary, and say to such, "I know your road. I have been that way before. I know the darkness and weariness of the way." Pilgrims who are enduring the ills of the wilderness take heart when they see a fellow-traveller to whom all these are common things.

Again, it is good for me to have been afflicted because affliction is

A WONDERFUL QUICKENER.

We are very apt to go to sleep, but affliction often wakes us up. A coachman driving a pair of horses was noticed by one who sat on the box-seat to give a cut of the whip to the off horse. The animal was going on quite regularly and properly, and it seemed a needless cruelty to whip it. Another journey, and he was observed to do just the same just at that place, and the question was put, "I always notice that you give that horse a cut of the whip just here—why is it?" "Well, sir, he has a nasty habit of shying just at this spot," said the driver, "and I take his attention off by making him think of the whip for a moment." There is something in that, brethren. Every now and then you and I are apt to shy, and an affliction takes off our attention from temptation.

There is also another danger in a life of ease: we are far too apt to go to sleep. Like horses, we are apt to get into the way of going on at a regular trot till we move mechanically and pursue our way half asleep. I do not know whether we are all awake even now. Many ministers preach asleep. I am sure they do. Many deacons do all the church business asleep, and numbers of people come to the prayer-meetings and pray in their sleep. I do not mean physical sleep, but I mean spiritual sleep, which is quite as serious a matter.

The whole of some men's religion is a kind of sleep-walking. There is not that vigor in it, there is not that heart in it, there is not that earnestness in it, that there ought to be. They want to be waked up by something startling. Our trials and afflictions are intended to do this. They come like a clap of thunder, and startle us till we ask, 'Where am I? What am I at?" And we begin to question ourselves, "Am I really what I profess to be?" Death stares us in the face. We are put into the balance and weighed and tried; we try our hopes and professions, and are less likely to be self-deceived. Realities become realities, and fancies become fancies, when sharp trials befall us. The things of this world become dreams to us when keen affliction comes, and so it is of special benefit to us because, under the Spirit of God, it is awakening and arousing.

Again, according to our text, it is good for us to have been afflicted by way of instruction. "It is good for me to have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes." Trial is our school where God teaches us on the blackboard. This school-house has no windows to let in the cheerful light. It is very dark, and so we cannot look out and get distracted by external objects; but God's grace shines like a candle within, and by that light we see what else we had never seen. I stand on the level of my fellow-men in the daylight, and I cannot see the stars; the glare of day hides them; but if I am made to go down the deep well of affliction, I look up, and there are the stars visible above my head. I see what others cannot see. I get the Bible; and its promises seem written as men sometimes write with juice of lemon, in invisible characters; I hold the book before the fire of affliction, and the writing comes out clearly, and I see in the Bible what I never else had seen if it had not been for fiery trials.

I would to God that some young preachers were plagued all the day long, and chastened every morning, that they might become sound in the faith. I could wish that some of God's people were plunged into a sea of tribulation, that they might get rid of the modern nonsense which delights them now, and come back to the old, substantial doctrines of the Puritans, which are the only things worth having when we come to suffer or to die. Yes, it is good for me to have been afflicted. Is it not good for you too, dear friends, in the way of holy education, teaching you God's Word, and the value and the preciousness of it?

II. I cannot, however, speak any longer upon the virtues of affliction; for I want two or three minutes to dwell upon the truth that,

DRAWING NEAR TO GOD HAS BEEN GOOD FOR US.

Turn to the seventy-third psalm at the last verse—"It is good for me to draw near to God." Here, again, we speak with great certainty. Come, brothers and sisters, is it not good for you to draw near to God? But what does this drawing near to God mean?

First, to feel that God is near us—to be conscious of His presence; to feel, next, that we are perfectly reconciled to Him by the death of His Son, and that we are permitted to speak with Him as a man speaketh with his friend, and in speaking to Him to praise Him for what we have received, and to ask Him for what we need. We draw near Him when we tell Him what we feel, and assure Him of our belief in His great love. You know what it is to draw near to your friend and to have heart to heart converse with him. This is drawing near to God—when the secret of your heart is with God, and the secret of the Lord is with you; when He speaks to you by the Word and you speak to Him by prayer; when you confess sin and He grants forgiveness; when you spread your wants before Him and He assures you of abundant supplies. Now, is not this good? Is it not pleasant? Is it not enriching? Does it not raise the soul up above the world? Is it not a very good and profitable thing, so that we may say of it emphatically, "It is good for me to draw near to God"?

One good thing that comes out of it is mentioned in the text. Observe: "I have put my trust in the Lord God." The nearer you get to God the more you will be able to trust Him. An unknown God is an untrusted God. "They that know Thy name will put their trust in Thee." Those who have had most dealings with God believe most in Him. You that begin with Him try to trust Him; but those who have dealt with Him for long feel that they do trust Him, and cannot help it. I pray you draw near to God, so that faith may become to you the mainspring of your life, the new common-sense of your instructed spiritual nature. I rejoice in a faith that will go with me in everything. Sunday-keeping faith, meeting-going faith, if it ends there, is a pretty piece of confectionery; but faith about my pain, my poverty, my despondency, my old age—that is faith.

I want to see a more hardy, practical, workable faith abroad in the land. Look at Abraham's faith. I know it was spiritual, and so do you; but what had it to do with? It had to do with the birth of a child, with seeking a city, with cattle, with land, and the events of every-day life. That is the sort of faith you and I want—Monday faith, and Tuesday faith, and Wednesday faith; faith that will go into the kitchen; faith that will live in the workshop with you that are bookfolders, when the other girls laugh at you; faith that will be with you men that are in the workshop where others use foul language; in a storm; a faith that can help a dying man in the hospital—household faith, every-day faith. This is only to be got by drawing near to God. Get right close to Him, in deed and in truth, the very life of you living upon the life of God, and then faith will enter into your daily life. You will put your trust in God as your constant helper if you constantly draw near to Him.

FAITH THAT CAN CHEER A SAILOR

I desire to bear my witness in the last words of this psalm—"I have put my trust in the Lord God, that I may declare all Thy works." My first text, as far as it relates to a preacher, shows how he is taught in private: "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn Thy statutes": my second text, so far as it relates to the preacher, shows how he is helped to preach in public: "It is good for me to draw near to God: I have put my trust in the Lord God, that I may declare all Thy works." To be able to speak of God's works to others is no small gift, and you gain it by trusting in God yourself, finding His promise true, and then bearing witness to others.

It is not merely what is in the Bible that we have to set before the people, but what we ourselves have tasted and felt of the good word of truth experimentally; declaring Jesus Christ in the power of His resurrection as we know it in our own hearts. We cannot do this except by intimate personal fellowship with God. You, dear friends, who are engaged in teaching, cannot learn the truth without some measure of affliction, and you cannot tell it out in the right spirit without a large measure of drawing near unto God. Then you can say, "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him." You can say, "One thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see." You can say, "I sought the Lord, and He helped me."

There is a convincing power about personal testimony. Then it is not only Christ's word that God blesses, but it is your word too. "Oh," say you, "dare you say that?" Yes, Jesus Himself said "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also that shall believe on Me through their word." They themselves took the word from Christ just as they took the bread out of Christ's hands when he fed the multitude. And you must get the bread in your own hands; you must taste it yourself; you must break it yourself, or else you will not be likely to be blessed with living power among men.

Now, let us join in thanking God, if He has afflicted us, and if He has drawn us near to Himself; and let us go forth, not to ask for afflictions—that would be unwise—but to accept them hopefully when they come. Let us draw near to God to-night, and let us not go to our beds till we have seen the face of the Well-beloved. This shall be my vesper song:

"Sprinkled afresh with pardoning blood,
I lay me down to rest,
As in the embraces of my God,
Or on my Saviour's breast."

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Psalm 73.]

WHY HAZEL COTTAGE WAS VACANT.

WHEN a notice was issued that the furniture at Hazel Cottage would be sold by auction, and that the cottage itself was to let, all the village wondered. It was a handsome house, though the owner with characteristic modesty chose to designate it a cottage. He was a thriving man, and the first suspicion that he had failed in business was soon disproved, for no one could be found to whom he was indebted. What could be the reason of the sale? The people could not ask Dawson himself, for he was away, no one knew where, and curiosity had to wait unsatisfied. The furniture was sold, and a board set up intimating to any one desiring to occupy the house that arrangements might be made with the village lawyer.

Dawson was never seen in the village again, though he visited it the day after the sale. He slept at an inn a few miles off, and rising before it was light entered for the last time the house where he had spent many happy hours. No one was astir in the village, and he passed hastily through the rooms and left the house before any one was abroad. As he closed the garden gates after him he stood for a moment, his hand clasping the rail of the fence as if he could scarcely tear himself away. His face wore a determined look, but resolve was not the only mark his features showed. He was weighed down by a heavy sorrow, and as he bade good-by forever to his beloved home, he, stalwart man though he was, brushed away a tear.

It is necessary to go back a little to account for this scene. Ten years earlier, Robert Dawson set up in business as a builder in the village. He had a little capital, and he was intelligent and industrious. He rightly judged of the needs of the village, and the cottages he built were soon let and sold. In four years Robert Dawson was a well-to-do man.

Robert did not tell any one why he remained a bachelor, but he had his reasons for celibacy. Near the village was a fine residence known as "The Hall." There lived an old gentleman and his only daughter. He was supposed to be very rich, though he made little display. Some repairs to the house were needed, and Dawson was intrusted with the work. While it was in progress he had frequent consultations with the owner, and with him, always at his side, was the daughter. She was very beautiful, and Robert fell in love with her. He kept his love a secret, for he believed an offer of marriage with a lady so aristocratic would only bring him into ridicule. But the old squire conceived a great liking for the young man, who was well educated, well read, and more refined than many of his class. Thus it came about that a friendship sprang up, and the young builder became a welcome guest at The Hall.

One evening, strolling up to the home of his aristocratic friends, as he often did at the close of his day's business, he was astonished to find it in commotion. The old gentleman was laid on a lounge, insensible and very ill. He had been seized with apoplexy, and before morning he was dead. Then it was discovered that instead of being rich he was very poor—so poor that even the house he lived in, was mortgaged to its full value, and the furniture would have to be sold to pay his debts. The girl Robert loved was penniless; she had no friends to receive her, and had only a vague idea of earning her living as a governess.

It was then that Robert told his love. His offer was a surprise to Marian, and she, without actually declining it, asked him to give her a day or two to consider it. She shut herself in her room and thought. The question was a momentous one. On the one hand was a life of uncertainty, of precarious remuneration, on the other a life of comfort with an honest man to love and cherish her. She could not pretend to love him; she never thought of him as a suitor, but she respected him highly, liked him very sincerely, and her regard for him had increased since she first knew him. There was, too, an element of uncertainty in her mind. A year or two before a young officer in the army visited her father. He was the son of an old friend, and the old gentleman gave him a cordial welcome. He had won her heart, but when he proposed for her hand, her father refused his consent, alleging as a reason that the young man's habits were dissipated, and he would not confide his most precious treasure to such keeping. The young man departed abruptly, saying he should come back some day and renew his suit. As Marian sat considering Robert Dawson's offer, the thought of Captain Halcomb was the great difficulty in her mind. If he should return as he promised, then how could she conquer her heart? Finally the recollection of her father's words, her own conviction of their justice, and her present necessities carried the day, and Robert's offer was accepted.

That was the happiest day of Robert's life. He bought a dilapidated house surrounded by a large garden, pulled down the old ruin, and built such a home for his bride as won her warm admiration. They were married, and such happiness as is possible to man upon earth Robert enjoyed. It was his delight to surround his wife with all the refinements and luxuries which the most fastidious tastes could desire, and he toiled early and late that he might gain money to lavish upon her. Two years of married life passed, and one evening Robert, returing from his office, found a stranger at his fireside. He was elegantly dressed, and had an easy, well-bred air that sat well upon him. Robert was introduced to Captain Halcomb by his wife, who merely described him as an old friend of her father. As such Robert welcomed him, and the Captain accepted the hospitality freely offered.

Conversation was on general topics, and Robert found his guest a gentleman in a manner, and with considerable knowledge of affairs. He had travelled, and talked fluently and brilliantly of what he had seen, and of the places he had visited. Robert considered his guest an acquisition to his home circle, and went to business the next day pleased that Marian's time would not hang heavily on her hands in his absence. But he would have been less satisfied had he heard the Captain ask Marian, when they were left alone, how she came "to marry that boor." And still more uncomfortable, had he seen that Marian permitted a man so to speak of her husband without anger. The guest was a wicked, unprincipled man, and he prolonged his stay under the hospitable roof until he had corrupted the mind of his host's wife.

At last the end came. Robert was called away from home for two days to attend to business at a distance, and when he returned he found it despoiled. His wife had deserted the man who had toiled to make her happy, and had shown his love for her by his life, for a man who was a libertine and a profligate. That was the reason there was a sale at Hazel Cottage, and it was "to let."

Many years the injured husband wandered through the world. He never sought to avenge himself or to punish those who had wrecked his life. He wandered aimlessly from city to city, and was often in peril of his life in the course of his voyages and travels. He heard that Captain Halcomb had grown weary of the woman he had won, and had deserted her, but he was not moved by the news. She was lost to him, and he took no steps to find her. But a change came over him. On one of his transatlantic voyages he became intimate with a fellow-passenger, a clergyman, and for the first time he told his story. The confidence drew the two men together, and the friendship was blessed to Robert Dawson's conversion. He who alone can heal the broken-hearted touched the wanderer's wounded spirit, and for the first time in many years he was at peace.

The voyage over, Robert thought he would visit his old home again, which, before, he had never thought he could bear to see. As he walked the streets of the seaport where he landed, absorbed in this new impulse, he paid no heed to his steps, and in crossing a street was knocked down by a passing vehicle and his arm was broken. He was stunned, too, and was carried insensible to the nearest hospital. On recovering his senses he was astonished to find his wife, clad in the garb of a hospital nurse, at his bedside. She, too, had been driven by sorrow to the Saviour. In want and penury, she had been found by a Christian lady, who relieved her, and having heard her story, did not shrink from her with Pharisaical self-righteousness, but sought to win her in penitence to the Friend of sinners. Deeply humbled, she accepted the congenial position of hospital nurse, and by the bedside of many a dying sufferer had been able to direct the sinner to the blood which cleanseth from all sin.

It was with a sad and chastened feeling that Robert listened to her story, and with a full heart that he saw her kneeling at his side asking him to forgive her as Christ had forgiven. That night he read in the best of books how Jesus had written in the sand, and what He had said to one similarly guilty (John 8 : 7-11), and the next morning the rays of the rising sun fell on a picture that none could behold unmoved—a penitent forgiven for Christ's sake. Husband and wife reunited in a love better than they had ever known, because blessed by Him who came to save those who were lost.

AN ATLANTIC RESCUE FROM A SHIPWRECK.

Few events in the annals of seafaring heroism have been more worthy of record than an incident which recently took place some four hundred miles from the West Coast of Ireland. The Cunard steamer Parthia, during a recent voyage from Boston, Mass., to Liverpool, England, encountered a hurricane, which blew with fearful violence from the S.S.W. and produced terrible distress on board. At ten o'clock at night of the sixth day of the voyage the gale broke, the wind moderated, but the immense ocean swell which the cyclone had left, made the ship roll heavily.

The next day was Sunday, and the passengers and crew were gladdened by the sight of sunlight, but the swell was still exceedingly heavy. Shortly after nine A.M. the look-out man reported a vessel on the lee-bow, apparently hull down. She proved to be in distress, waterlogged, and so low in the water that she buried her bulwarks with every roll. Twenty-two people could be counted on board of her, in a plight most miserable. It was well understood by the men of the Parthia that these unhappy beings could only be saved at the risk of their own lives. So great was the swell that the distressed vessel at times became invisible to those on board the Parthia, and then the steamer was lifted so high that those on deck could look down from their elevation on the half-buried hull and terrified crew beneath. Volunteers were soon forthcoming, and a boat was lowered; eight hands sprang aft and seated themselves in the lifeboat, Mr. William Williams, the third officer, taking command.

Quickly she was bounding over the billows, now taking a headlong, giddy swoop into a prodigious hollow, and completely lost to view, and now reappearing for a moment, only to be again hidden by the waves. At length the third mate hailed the crew of the bark. Presently one of the shipwrecked sailors was seen to heave a coil of line toward the boat; it was caught, a life-buoy fastened to it, and hauled aboard the wreck. To this life-buoy was attached a second line, the end of which was retained by the people in the boat. One of the men on the wreck put the life-buoy over his shoulders, and in an instant flung himself into the sea, and was dragged smartly, but carefully, into the boat.

One by one the shipwrecked seamen leaped into the water, until eleven of them had been dragged into the Parthia's boat. This number made a load, and with a cheery call to those who were to be left behind for a short while, Mr. Williams headed for the steamer. The boat approached the Parthia slowly; meanwhile Captain M'Kaye's foresight had provided for the perilous and difficult task of getting the rescued men on board the steamer. This accomplished, the boat returned to the wreck, the rest of the crew were dragged from her by means of the buoys and life-lines, and hoisted along with six of the boat's crew into the Parthia.

But not yet was this nobly executed mission completed. There was still the boat to run up to the davits. All the old fears returned as she was brought alongside with Mr. Williams and two men in her. But Jack has a marvellously quick hand and a steady pulse; the "blocks" were swiftly hooked into the boat, and soon she soared like a bird to the davits under the strong running pull of a number of men, before the swell that followed her could rise to the height of the chain-plates. Such as remember the faces of those shipwrecked Englishmen and Canadians; the aspect of them as they were hoisted one by one on to the Parthia's deck; the bewildered rolling of their eyes, incredulous of their wonderful preservation; their streaming garments; their hair clotted like seaweed upon their pale foreheads; the passionate pressing forward of the crew and passengers of the Parthia to rejoice with the poor fellows over their salvation from a terrible doom—those who can recall these things will not need to be told that no words could possibly depict that impressive scene.

If such anxiety and peril was undergone to save the lives of these shipwrecked people temporarily, how much greater should be our efforts to save the souls of those who are in danger of spiritual shipwreck. "He that converteth a sinner from the error of his ways shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins" (James 5 : 20).

"TEN SHILLINGS AND COSTS."

JOE SPARROW, having a little spare time on his hands, and a few spare pence in his pocket, had spent both in the public-house. And, being somewhat intoxicated as the result of his expenditure, had amused himself by making a very loud noise, smashing some glass, knocking down his wife, and doing the same to a policeman. For which entertainment, he had been brought before the magistrates, and fined ten shillings and costs, which he paid.

Are you sure he paid it? The ten shillings, no doubt, was forthcoming, and as much of the costs as could be estimated in money, but did he pay all the costs?

If these lines are read by any Joe Sparrow, let me tell him as flatly and emphatically as I can that he did not pay all the costs the other day in the police-court.

You didn't clear off the tarnish and the blot upon your name. There it is, a great, black, ugly stain, which will cling to you for a longer time than you think. You have had a policeman's hand upon your shoulder, and handcuffs upon your wrists. You have been locked up in a prison cell. You have stood in the prisoner's dock. No, no, you can't put away such a disgrace as this with money.

You didn't wipe away the bruise on the poor wife's body. There it is, in all its livid blue, witnessing against you with fearful energy. By and by its colors will die away, and the wife you swore to love and cherish will be better. So you say. But I tell you that the bruise has eaten down into the heart, and will rankle there for many a long year perhaps. You have paid the costs? No, no, it is not in your power to do that.

You have paid the costs? What means that empty cupboard then, and the crying children, crying for hunger? What means that defrauded rent? What means that bill run up at yonder little shop, where some poor, lone woman is trying in vain to make two ends meet? The costs you paid you have taken out of the home cupboard, out of your landlord's pocket, and out of the till of that struggling widow.

You have paid the costs? No, there's much to be paid still.

There's the shake of that employer's head when you apply to him for work—"I don't employ a drunkard."

There's the fresh hold the love of drink has upon you, for that drunken spree has left you weaker than before. Your will is sadly battered and broken.

There's the go-by of the respectable man who has never had to pay "ten shillings and costs" for being drunk, and who doesn't care to have a drunkard for his friend.

You have paid the costs? You are paying them still. You are paying them in the shape of an uneasy, restless conscience. You are an unhappy man in spite of your shouts, and songs, and jokes, and laughter.

You have paid the costs? Listen a moment, for I have a solemn, solemn word to whisper in your ear. The costs you will not only have to pay in this world, but, if you do not alter, you will have to pay them in the next world as well.

Oh, men and brethren, will you ruin your souls for a pot of beer? Will you toss away your eternal hopes for a mere tickle of the palate? "Turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die?"

"Would to God I knew how. I am heartily sick of this miserable state of things. Tell me how, I pray you."

Give up the drink, for one thing. This is indispensable. But this is not enough. Total abstinence will not purge your soul from its past stain, and give you a happy death.

You want a Saviour—a Saviour who shall pardon and strengthen you, stand by you in danger, and bring you to glory.

And there is a Saviour, thank God, a perfect Saviour. And He waits, He waits for you, to be all this to you from this day. Go to Him just as you are. Cast your guilty heart into His hand. Trust Him.

Jesus says, "Him that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out." (John 6 : 37.)

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

On the Altar Steps.

"I LOST my valise when I fell," said the wounded man, speaking in a tranquil tone; "but there was nothing of value in it. My money and my papers are in my pocketbook. Let me see you take possession of it."

He watched Roland search for the book in the torn coat on the chair beside him, and his eyes followed its transfer to his breast-pocket under his blue blouse.

"You are an English gentleman, though you look a Swiss peasant," he said; "you are poor, perhaps, and my money will be of use to you. It is the only return I can make to you. I should like you to write down that I give it to you, and let me sign the paper."

"Presently," said Roland; "you must not exert yourself. I shall find your name and address here?"

"I have no address; of course I have a name," he answered; "but never mind that now. Tell me, what do you think of Christ? Does He indeed save sinners?"

"Yes," said Roland reluctantly; "He says, 'I came to seek and to save that which was lost.' Those are His own words."

"Kneel down quickly," murmured the dying man. 'Say "Our Father"—so that I can hear every word. My mother used to teach it to me."

"And she is dead?" said Roland.

"Years ago," he gasped.

Roland knelt down. How familiar, with what a touch of bygone days, the attitude came to him! how homely the words sounded! He had uttered them innumerable times—never quite without a feeling of their sacredness and sweetness; but he had not dared to take them into his lips of late. His voice faltered, though he strove to keep it steady and distinct, to reach the dying ears that listened to him. The prayer brought to him the picture of his children kneeling, morning and evening, with the self-same petitions. They had said them only a few hours ago, and would say them again a few hours hence. Even the dying man felt there was something more than mere emotion for him expressed in the tremulous tones of Roland Sefton's voice. He held out his hand to him when he had finished, and grasped his warmly.

"God bless you!" he said. But he was weary, and his strength was failing him. He slumbered again fitfully, and his mind wandered. Now and then during the rest of the night he looked up with a faint smile, and his lips moved inarticulately. He thought he had spoken, but no sound disturbed the unbroken silence.

It was as the bells of the abbey rang for matins that the stranger died. For a few minutes Roland remained beside him, and then he called in the women to attend to the dead, and went out into the fresh morning air. It was the third day that the mountains had been clear from fog and cloud, and they stood out against the sky in perfect whiteness. The snow-line had come lower down upon the slopes, and the beautiful crystals of frost hung on the tapering boughs of the pine-trees in the forests about Engelberg. Here and there a few villagers were going toward the church, and almost unconsciously Roland followed slowly in their track.

The short service was over and the congregation was dispersing when he crossed the well-worn doorsill. But a few women, especially the late comers, were still scattered about praying mechanically, with their eyes wandering around them. The high altar was deserted, but candles burning on it made a light in the dim place, and he listlessly sauntered up the centre aisle. A woman was kneeling on the steps leading up to it, and as the echo of his footsteps resounded in the quiet church she rose and looked round. It was Felicita! At that moment he was not thinking of her; yet there was no doubt or surprise in the first moment of recognition. The uncontrollable rapture of seeing her again arrested his steps, and he stood looking at her, with a few paces between them. It was plain that she did not know him.

How could she know him, he thought bitterly, in the rough blue blouse and coarse clothing and heavy hobnail boots of a Swiss peasant? His hair was shaggy and uncut; and the skin of his face was so peeled and blistered and scorched that his disguise was sufficient to conceal him even from his wife. Yet as he stood there, with downcast head, as a devout peasant might have done before the altar, he saw Felicita make a slight but imperious sign to him to advance. She did not take a step toward him, but leaning against the altar rails she waited till he was near to her, within hearing. There Roland paused.

"Felicita," he said, not daring to draw closer to her.

"I am here," she answered, not looking toward him; her large, dark, mournful eyes lifted up to the cross above the altar, before which a lamp was burning, whose light was reflected in her unshed tears.

Neither of them spoke again for a while. It seemed as if there could be nothing said, so great was the anguish of them both. The man who had just died had passed away tranquilly; but they were drinking of a cup more bitter than death. Yet the few persons lingering over their morning devotions before the shrines in the side aisles, saw nothing but a stranger looking at the painting over the altar, and a peasant kneeling on the lowest step deep in prayer.

"I come from watching a fellow-man die," he said at last; "would to God it had been myself!"

"Yes!" sighed Felicita, "that would have been best for us all."

"You wish me dead!" he exclaimed, in a tone of anguish.

"For the children's sake," she murmured, still looking away from him; "yes! and for the sake of our name—your father's name and mine. I thought to bring honor to it, and you have brought flagrant dishonor to it."

"That can never be wiped away," he added.

"Never!" she repeated.

As if exhausted by these passionate words, they fell again into silence. The murmur of whispered prayers was about them, and the faint scent of incense floated under the arched roof. A gleam of morning light, growing stronger, though the sun was still far below the eastern mountains, glittered through a painted window, and threw a glow of color upon them. Roland saw her standing in its many-tinted brightness, but her wan and sorrowful face was not turned to look at him. He had not caught a glance from her yet. How vividly he remembered the first moment his eyes had ever beheld her standing, as she did now, on these very altar steps, with uplifted eyes and a sweet seriousness on her young face! It was only a poor village church, but it was the most sacred spot in the whole world to him; for there he had met Felicita and received her image into his inmost heart. His ambition as well as his love had centred in her, the penniless daughter of the late Lord Riversford, an orphan, and dependent upon her father's brother and successor. But to Roland his wife Felicita was immeasurably dearer than the girl Felicita Riversford had been. All the happy days since he had won her, all the satisfied desires, all his successes, were centred in her and represented by her. All his crime too.

"I have loved you," he cried "better than the whole world."

There was no answer, by word or look, to his passionate words.

"I have loved you," he said, more sadly, "better than God."

"But you have brought me to shame!" she answered; "if I am tracked here—and who can tell that I am not?—and if you are taken and tried and convicted, I shall be the wife of the fraudulent banker and condemned felon, Roland Sefton. And Felix and Hilda will be his children."

"It is true," he groaned, "I could not escape conviction."

He buried his face in his hands, and rested them on the altar rails. Now his bowed-down head was immediately beneath her eyes, and she looked down upon it with a mournful gaze; it could not have been more mournful if she had been contemplating his dead face lying at rest in his coffin. How was all this shame and misery for him and her to end?

"Felicita," he said, lifting up his head, and meeting the sorrowful farewell expression in her face, "if I could die it would be best for the children and you."

"Yes," she answered, in the sweet, too dearly loved voice he had listened to in happy days.

"I dare not open that door of escape for myself," he went on, "and God does not send death to me. But I see a way, a possible way. I only see it this moment; but whether it be for good or evil I cannot tell."

"Will it save us?" she asked eagerly.

"All of us," he replied. "This stranger, whose corpse I have just left—nobody knows him, and he has no friends to trouble about him—shall I give to him my name, and bury him as myself? Then I shall be dead to all the world, Felicita—dead even to you; but you will be saved. I too shall be safe in the grave, for death covers all sins. Even old Clifford will be satisfied by my death."

"Could it be done?" she asked breathlessly.

"Yes," he said; "if you consent it shall be done. For my own sake I would rather go back to England, and deliver myself up to the law I have broken. But you shall decide, my darling. If I return you will be known as the wife of the convict Sefton. Say, shall I be henceforth dead forever to you and my mother and the children? Shall it be a living death for me; and deliverance, and safety, and honor for you all? You must choose between my infamy or my death."

"It must be," she answered slowly, yet without hesitation, looking away from him to the cross above the altar, "your death."

A shudder ran through her slight frame as she spoke, and thrilled through him as he listened. It seemed to them both as if they stood beside an open grave, on either side one; and parted thus. He stretched out his hand to her, and laid it on her dress, as if appealing for mercy; but she did not turn to him, or look upon him, or open her white lips to utter another word. Then there came more stir and noise in the church, footsteps sounded upon the pavement, and an inquisitive face peeped out of the vestry near the altar where they stood. It was no longer prudent to remain as they were, subject to curiosity and scrutiny. Roland rose from his knees, and without glancing again toward her, he spoke in a low voice of unutterable grief and supplication.

"Let me see you and speak to you once more," he said.

"Once more," she repeated.

"This evening," he continued, "at your hotel."

"Yes," she answered. "I am travelling under Phebe Marlowe's name. Ask for Mrs. Marlowe."

She turned away and walked slowly and feebly down the aisle; and he watched her, as he had watched the light tread of the young girl eleven years ago, passing through alternate sunshine and shadow. There was no sunshine now. Was it possible that so long a time had passed since then? Could it be true that for ten years she had been his wife, and that the tie between them was forever dissolved? From this day he was to be dead to her, and to all the world. He was about to pass voluntarily into a condition of death amid life; as utterly bereft of all that had once been his as if the grave had closed over him. Roland Sefton was to exist no more.

Roland Sefton went back to the room in which the corpse of the stranger was now lying. The women were gone, and he turned down the sheet to look at the face of the man who was about to bear his name and the disgrace of his crime into the safe asylum of the grave. It was perfectly calm, with no trace of the night's suffering upon it; there was even a faint vestige of a smile about the mouth, as of one who sleeps well, and has pleasant dreams. He was apparently about Roland's own age, and a description given by strangers would not be such as would lead to any suspicion that there could have been a mistake as to identity. Roland looked long upon it before covering it up again, and then he sat down beside the bed and opened the pocketbook.

There were notes in it worth fifty pounds, but not many papers. There was a memorandum made here and there of the places he had visited, and the last entry was dated the day before at Engstlensee Alp. Roland knew every step of the road, and for a while he seemed to himself to be this traveller, starting from the little inn, not yet vacated by its peasant landlord, but soon to be left to icy solitude, and taking the narrow path along the Engstlensee, toiling up the Joch pass under the mighty Wenden-stöcke and the snowy Titlis, clear of clouds from base to summit yesterday. The traveller must have had a guide with him, some peasant or herdsman probably, as far as the Trubsee Alp; for even in summer the route was difficult to find. The guide had put him on the path for Engelberg, and left him to make his way along the precipitous slopes of the Pfaffenwand. All this would be discovered when an official inquiry was made into the accident. In the mean time it was necessary to invest this stranger with his own identity.

THE BABE AND THE KING.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 25, Isaiah 9 : 6-7. Golden Text, John 1 : 45. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR subject begins with an announcement, "Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given." Unto us? Unto whom? Unto the house of David, unto the race of Israel, yes to the whole world. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son;" God's Son to become the Son of man, God's Heir, "whom He hath appointed Heir of all things" (Heb. 1 : 2), to come into the inheritance of our only real possession, sin and death. Do they rejoice in the house where the Child is born? They find no room for Him in the inn (Luke 2 : 7); His eyes first open on the stable with the beasts of burden. Do they take pride in the Son which is given? He is despised and rejected of men." Yet He is God's gift to man, a gift which must be accepted or rejected, and every living man who has heard of Jesus stands responsible for his possession or rejection of God's great, "His unspeakable gift" (2 Cor. 9 : 15). God has laid us under an obligation, for He has made advances to us, and we are His debtors, whether we will or no; God has established a relationship with us, His Son has been made a member of our race, whether we will or no.

Reader, have you personally accepted God's gift, and personally acknowledged the relationship which God has established between Jesus Christ and you? O it is time you did. I have heard of a girl who was when an infant, by her own mother, whose intrepid courage failed not, even when none of the firemen could venture. She dashed through the flames, her clothing all ablaze, wrapped the little one in a blanket, and returned through the fiery way to sink exhausted with her precious burden. The child grew up to be a lovely woman, but the poor mother was one mass of seams from the fire which had nearly cost her her life; she was a poor unsightly object. One day some young friends of the daughter's were making fun of the poor mother as she passed by, and the girl, instead of glorying in the honor of having such a mother, instead of saying, "She purchased my life with those scars," joined in the laugh against her. Our hearts sicken at such heartlessness, and we say, "She was unworthy of such a mother." Are there any of us who have seen in God's great gift "no beauty that we should desire Him," and have regarded His unpopularity as sufficient excuse for rejecting Him?

But if our hearts are His, if God's Holy Spirit has unsealed our eyes, and we can see Him as the chief among ten thousand, the altogether lovely; then, indeed, the gift is beyond all other gifts to us; the glorious relationship is that by which we measure all other relationships, for it stands first of all. Jesus, Heir of all things—and mine! Jesus, Son of God—and yet mine! Jesus, possessed of all authority, and all power, both in Heaven and earth—mine, my possession, my relation. Why, then, the possession is infinitely greater than the possessor. Lord, teach me to know what I have in thee. "He that hath the Son hath life"—first instalment. In whom we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sin—second instalment. These things have I spoken unto you that in Me ye might have peace (John 16 : 33)—third instalment. And how many more we might mention, for in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and He is mine.

This is He "of whom Moses in the law and in the prophets, did write," the substance of all the Old Testament shadows, the subject of all the predictions of the prophets. He is the rainbow in the cloud, in the flood He is the ark, He shines in the priestly Melchisedec, we see Him in the offering of Isaac, and He is Jacob's ladder, the Stranger who wrestled with him on his journey. He was Joseph's companion in Egypt. He was in the burning bush, and His blood was prefigured in the Passover Lamb. He was in the cloud and in the fire which guided His people through the desert. The Tabernacle and the offerings, the high priests and the altar—all speak of Him; the scapegoat, the smitten rock, and the brazen serpent—all point to Him. "The captain of the Lord's host," whom Joshua met at Jordan; "the Lord's anointed," the suffering one, and the coming King in the Psalms, and in the prophets—all speak of Him, and this is the Child born to us, this the Son given.

"And the government shall be upon His shoulder;" "He must reign until He hath put all enemies under His feet" (1 Cor. 15 : 25.) The government of this world will most surely come into the hands of Jesus. But now, even while the mass of mankind reject Him, He loves to be King where He is received, He loves to have the empire even in hearts like ours. Are we letting Him reign, letting the weight of all our household cares, our business anxieties, our social perplexities, our spiritual difficulties—rest on His shoulder? Are they there, and no longer upon us? Have we cast on Him the responsibility, and has He taken it? Is His will supreme in our hearts, homes, and business? Does He have His way with us? When it is so, our experience all the day long will be "His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

the colored evangelist, once said to me, "When I can't find words to express the power and the grace of God, I just say, 'It's wonderful, you can't go beyond that.'" It is His name first made known to Manoah (Jud. 13 : 18, margin), and then repeated here. Trace the life of any man of faith—Joseph, Moses, Elijah, Daniel—it is just one wonder from beginning to end. Human power and natural laws must bend before men who are in the counsels of Him who made these laws and who is above them all. Men of faith are God's instruments to manifest to the world His sovereign power; and in measure as we enter into a life of faith all things become transparent to us, and we see God's will and God's purposes through all. But this can only be when He reigns supreme in our life and being. His name is "Counsellor." Wonder of wonders that He who directs the universe, should busy Himself with one little sphere like ours; and still more that He should enter into the tiny details of each individual life among us, and counsel us as to when we should pray and when we should act, what we should say, and in what we should keep silent, what we should buy, or what we should sell. He is "wonderful in counsel" (Is. 28 : 29).

And He is "the mighty God," He who came down to all the helplessness of infant humanity, who learned to take His first tottering steps like any other baby, learned to lisp forth broken words. He, the mighty God! He let Himself develop day after day just as any other child; learned to read and write, and work at Joseph's trade, like any other boy in Nazareth—this was "the mighty God." He who could divide the heavens, learned of Joseph how to divide a piece of wood.

"The mighty God," all the mightier because He could afford to stoop so low without losing one iota of His power. He is "the everlasting Father" (some say the Hebrew reads, "the Father's Witness"), for "He shall see His seed" (Isa. 43 : 10). His seed are resurrection children, who have learned, like Him, to lose their lives in this world, but who live by the faith of the Son of God. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit" (John 12 : 24) He is also the "Prince of Peace." Bless God, wherever Jesus reigns there is peace; distress, anguish, perplexity vanish in measure as the reins of our life are abandoned to Him; He knows how to unravel every tangle, how to pick up every dropped stitch, let us trust Him.

"Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." This glorious prophecy shall be fulfilled when, in the time of the millennium, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our God, and of His Christ; and He shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. 11 : 15); born King (Matt. 2 : 2), He shall reign for ever. Eliakim, whose name signifies "the God of the resurrection," is a striking type of the reigning Messiah, and the very fact that Rev. 3 : 17 is a quotation from Is. 22 : 22, establishes the fact that Christ is his antitype. "I will call My servant Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah; and I will clothe Him with thy robe (garment of salvation), and strengthen him with thy girdle" ("righteousness shall be the girdle of His loins, and faithfulness the girdle of His reins," Is. 11 : 5), "and I will commit thy government into His hand; and He shall be a Father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah."

All this may be true of Christ's rule over us, if we submit implicitly to His blessed government, but He must have undisputed sway, unlimited authority. "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon His shoulder; so He shall open, and none shall shut, and He shall shut, and none shall open." This is despotic sway, and none is so blessed when it is perfect love and perfect justice which reigns. Lord, so reign in my heart over my will and my lips, that thou shalt open, and none shall shut, thou shalt shut and none shall open. "And I will fasten Him as a nail in a sure place; and He shall be for a glorious throne to His Father's house. And they shall hang upon Him all the glory of His father's house, the offspring and the issue, all vessels of small quantity, from the vessels of cups, even to all the vessels of flagons" (Isa. 22 : 20-24).

What a lesson of dependence! A garment or a vessel hanging on a nail, put by until it is wanted, always there to be found if it is asked for. O to be found an empty vessel hanging upon Jesus when used to bring glory to Him, always hanging the glory on the nail, always to be found there when wanted, never out of the way in self or sin. Then, truly, His government and peace will increase until every thought is brought into the obedience of Christ, and until my whole being hangs conquered by love, ready for His service.

"It Didn't Strike Him."—In the Course of a sermon by Mr. Moody, he said: "I was speaking to a man in my own country some years ago, about giving his heart to Christ, and he always had one answer to give me. For five years I tried to win him to Christ, and every year he said, 'It has not struck me yet.' 'Man, what do you mean? What has not struck you?' 'Well,' he said, 'I am not going to become a Christian until it strikes me; and it has not struck me yet. I do not see it in the way you see it.' 'But don't you know you are a sinner?' 'Yes, I know I am a sinner.' 'Well, don't you know that God wants to have mercy on you—that there is forgiveness with God? He wants you to repent and come to Him.' 'Yes, I know that; but—it has not struck me yet.' He always fell back on that. Poor man, he went down to his grave in August last. Six long years God gave him to repent, and all he had to say at the end of those years was that it had not struck him yet."

The Destruction by Fire of a Large Theatre in Vienna has caused the death of a large number of persons. It appears that Thursday last was a fête day at the Austrian capital. The Ring Theatre, the second largest theatre in the city, it was expected, would be crowded owing to the fête and the first production of a new piece. The play was to commence at seven o'clock, but a few minutes before that hour the curtain was observed to bulge outward, and then tongues of flame burst forth, which quickly consumed the curtain and extended to the scenery and the roof. A wire gauze screen had been provided, to let down in case of such an emergency, which would shut off the stage from the other part of the house, but it was not used, owing, it is supposed, to the terror-stricken flight of the man in charge. Some officious person then turned off the gas, and darkness was added to the horror of the scene. There were four galleries, and the people who filled them made a rush for the staircases. In the darkness some fell and were trodden to death, and the road was blockaded by fallen bodies. A few who were first to get to the doors, and some stalwart men succeeded in reaching the stairs, and from there jumped into cloths held below to catch them. An Austrian journal says that after the fire was extinguished, "the firemen who came in saw the most dire spectacle. In lines, in heaps, dead men and women lay at the doors and entrances, in such thick knots that they could hardly be disentangled. More than once a couple of corpses were brought out, man and wife, who had entwined themselves in the cramp of death. The smoke had had pity on them, and had executed the sentence of death before the flames could do their devouring work. Persons were found suffocated and crushed to death, but no marks of burning were on them." At first it was hoped that not more than three hundred people had been killed, but as inquiries come in from the city for missing relatives, and as the ruins are examined, it becomes evident that the list will approach, if it does not exceed, a thousand victims.

Russian Journals are Exercised by President Arthur's reference in his message to the barbarities perpetrated on the Jews in Russia. The Novoe Vremya, of St. Petersburg, says that President Arthur has departed from the principles of the American policy of non-interference in the affairs of foreign countries, and it remarks that the message does not refer to England's treatment of Ireland. It further says that President Arthur recently repelled interference in regard to the Panama Canal, but yet allows himself to judge Russian affairs, which he does not understand. The report of the message cabled to Russia was probably incomplete, and the journals have misunderstood the President's remarks, but it is noteworthy in the light of prophecy how anything that affects this ancient people becomes at once a matter of diplomatic concern.

A Disastrous Railroad Collision Occurred near London on Saturday last. A train on the North London Railroad, by which business men in large numbers travel to and from their city offices, stopped in a tunnel at Canonbury, a northern suburb of London, and the signalman being unaware of the fact, allowed three other trains to follow on the same line of rails. A series of collisions resulted, in which seven persons were killed and many others fatally injured.

A Reign of Terror in Ireland has Commenced with the winter months, as careful observers predicted it would. In the eastern counties the assizes have begun, and the judge spoke of the great increase of crime. He said that threatening letters and intimidation were everywhere on the increase, and the fearful crime of arson was much more frequent. A newspaper correspondent, whose utterances have hitherto been remarkable for their accuracy, cabled thus last week: "I am not an alarmist, and do not predict civil war, but certainly the situation is most critical here. The liberal Irish policy and the existence of the Liberal government is trembling in the balance. It is generally believed here that the present crisis is the most important of the whole land movement, for the people have clinched with the government, and have thus far successfully resisted all the strength of coercion. It is a startling fact that two thirds of the rents are not being paid, and that the tenants have no intention of paying them without heavy reductions, which the landlords refuse. The land courts are so slow that the act is yet no remedy whatever for the troubles.

Another Quarrel has Arisen in the Irish Land League. Mr. Piggott and Mr. Egan, two prominent members, have during the past week been making public charges against each other. Mr. Egan allegesthat Mr. Piggott has threatened that unless he was accommodated with a loan he would make public a statement of a misuse of the funds of the League. Mr. Piggott denies the charge, and maintains that it was the League which offered him £500 to publish a false account of the Land League. He comments severely on Mr. Egan's conduct, and declares that the "no rent" cry is an injury to Ireland and a libel on Irish patriotism.

A Committee has been Formed by the Lord Mayor of London to aid the owners of estates in Ireland. Many persons, widows, trustees, and others, who some time ago so invested their all on the faith of the representations of the Irish Estates Court, are now in abject poverty, as they cannot collect any rent, and their property is now unsalable. The Archbishops of Dublin and York are engaged in collecting funds for the relief of the most needy of this class, and when the committee is properly organized, assistance will be given to such as are unable to enforce their claims. Seventeen thousand dollars are already subscribed. A correspondent of a New York journal, describing these operations, says: "Certainly, it is a sight not very flattering to Englishmen to see private citizens forced to band together, like a vigilance committee in a border town, to protect life and property, while the most powerful government of modern times, with an empire's resources at its back, looks on languidly at their efforts."

The Following Particulars Respecting the death of Mr. Adam McCall, to which we briefly alluded in a previous issue, have been received. An English journal says: "He succeeded in establishing three mission stations, leaving them in charge of workers who followed him. While pushing on to Stanley Pool he was attacked by a painful illness, and compelled to return. He set out for England, but on arriving at Madeira was obliged to remain there. His mother and brother left Dartmouth for Madeira, and an hour afterward, a telegram arrived saying he was dead. He was a man of great energy and perseverance, and was thirty-one years of age."

The Policy of the Emperor of Germany, in spite of the clear statement Prince Bismarck read on behalf of the aged Kaiser at the opening of the Reichstag, was still a matter of uncertainty in the minds of many prominent men. There was a doubt whether the Emperor fully indorsed the principles laid down by the Chancellor. The Emperor, however, when receiving the President and Vice-President of the Reichstag on December 6th, emphatically declared that his message, read at the opening of the Reichstag, was the fullest expression of his innermost convictions as to the welfare of the nation. He also said that it was the duty of all desirous of supporting the monarchical principle to pursue the ends indicated in the imperial message.

A Fight with a Slave Ship.—A Telegram from Zanzibar, received at the British Admiralty, says that "on December 3d, Captain Brownrigg, of the British man-of-war London, with ten men in a steam pinnace, attempted to capture a dhow, flying French colors and loaded with slaves. The Arab crew resisted fiercely; Captain Brownrigg, a seaman, a stoker, and a supernumerary were killed, and one man was severely and two slightly wounded." Captain Brownrigg was on a tour of inspection, and had gone alongside of the dhow to ascertain whether she was flying correct colors. The Arab crew of the dhow, seeing that the men in the London's pinnace were unprepared, fired a volley into them and then boarded the pinnace, killing some, wounding others, and driving the remainder of the crew overboard. They then closed on Captain Brownrigg, who, after a gallant resistance, during which he received twenty-one wounds, fell, shot through the heart. A boat from the London has since captured the dhow, which was empty. A body of the Sultan of Zanzibar's troops have captured a party of Arabs who are suspected of having formed the crew of the dhow.

American Missionaries in South Africa have obtained a concession from one of the chiefs of the country. The London Standard's correspondent at Durban, Natal, says: "The Rev. Messrs. Richards and Jourdan, who were sent on a mission by the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions to Umzeila, a powerful chief in the country north of Delagoa Bay, have returned here. Umzeila granted their request, that the American Board should be permitted to establish missions in his country. A section of the people here are disposed to resent the interference of Americans in South African affairs. The general public, however, clearly perceive that America can have no interest here beyond converting the heathen."

IN this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we give a portrait and a short sketch of the life of Governor St. John, of Kansas. In doing so we make no invidious political selection. Each of the great political parties is able to point to able statesmen who are worthily filling the gubernatorial chair of their respective States. From the Democratic as from the Republican ranks have come men of large capacity, unimpeachable integrity, and wise executive ability, whom their fellow-citizens have honored by intrusting them with the responsible functions of the governorship. No party has a monopoly of great men. Democrats and Republicans are patriots; they may and do differ on the question of what is the best policy in political matters, but on the great object of the highest good of the country, and their efforts to attain that good, both parties are of one mind. In the heat of party strife we are prone to forget that fact, but it is one we ought never to lose sight of; and though we naturally and properly strive to win a victory for our own particular party, we may wisely exercise Christian charity by remembering that our opponents may be as sincere in their aims and as honest in their intention to labor for the public weal as we are ourselves.

In selecting from among many honored names that of Governor St. John, we are prompted by our sympathy with the brave band of men who are waging relentless war on the liquor traffic. Among that intrepid army Governor St. John is a recognized leader. The struggle in which he and thousands of men are engaged is a very bitter one. In Kansas it has been victorious, and as we honor the victorious general who has overcome the enemies of his country, so we render homage to the leader who has fought and conquered in the moral warfare on the foes of national honor and prosperity. That warfare should enlist the sympathies of every patriot.

If a hostile fleet were at our shores, if a hostile army were encamped on our soil, every citizen would become a soldier, ready to wield a weapon in defence of our flag, our homes, and our hearths. But we have to-day in our midst, an enemy which is sapping our strength, draining our wealth, desolating our homes, making our wives widows, and our children fatherless. It is the worst of foes, for its approaches are so insidious that its true character is not apparent until its fell mission is accomplished. Our great men, men of noble genius, men capable of serving their generation, have called it a friend, and falling under its paralyzing power have been lost to their country, to themselves, and to God. It is against this treacherous and formidable foe that the temperance cause is fighting, and now that Kansas, the stalwart young giant of the West, has risen in its might, and driven the enemy beyond her borders, it is right that the chief citizen of that State who has played an active and vigorous part in the conflict should be known and honored by the lovers of their country throughout the land. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gladly lends its aid in such a work.

Governor St. John comes of

A CHRISTIAN FAMILY.

His grandfather, Rev. Daniel St. John, was an honored minister of the gospel, a native of Pennsylvania, who for more than sixty years faithfully labored in the cause of Christ. Some of his life was spent in the State of New York, and he ultimately removed to the West, where he spent his declining years, and died at Broad Ripple, Ind., at the advanced age of eighty-eight. While residing in New York State the family was blessed by the birth of a son, Samuel St. John, the father of the present Governor of Kansas. He is described as a man of good education and considerable natural ability. He settled on a farm at Brockville, Franklin County, Ind., and there, on February 25th, 1833, John P. St. John, the future Governor, was born.

Like the majority of great and good men, John P. St. John was blessed with that choicest of God's blessings, a good mother. She was of English extraction, a daughter of that Captain Snell who distinguished himself in the war of 1812. Of this Christian lady Governor St. John has many times spoken in words of heartfelt veneration. Her influence seems to have had great power over him from his earliest years, and to have had no slight part in moulding the character of his mind.

The narrative of boyhood's years is one that our young people may study with advantage. Pioneer life in the West fifty years ago was more favorable to the development of the physical than the mental powers. But this boy had a very clear idea of the value of an education. Possibly his mother had something to do with the estimate he formed, but his own persistence and untiring industry, qualities which have distinguished him all through his life, were mainly instrumental in its realization. "The chores" had to be done on the farm, morning and night. The boy was young, but he could do something to help his parents, and that little was thoroughly done. In the interval between those morning and evening labors he attended school in the little log school-house of the neighborhood, and when he returned home at night and had performed his home duties on the farm he never failed to get in his lessons before he retired to rest.

School days, however, were brief, and when, before he emerged from boyhood, he finally quitted school, he set to work on a self-imposed course of study, laying the neighborhood under tribute for such books as could be borrowed, or purchased at low rates. There is something very interesting in the picture of this farmer's boy, tired and weary in the evening with labor on the land, settling himself down by the light of the fire to voluntary study. Any one witnessing the spectacle would have said there was "grit" in the boy, and subsequent events have proved that such an opinion would have been correct.

There was, however, a trouble in the Indiana farm-house. The heart of the beloved mother was slowly breaking under a bitter sorrow. Her husband had fallen under the power of the social glass, and was fast becoming its slave. "Things about the farm were not as they used to be," is the pathetic description we have of that time, and "father was not so well off as formerly." It was decided that John should leave home to earn a living for himself, and while yet in his teens he was placed in a store at a salary of six dollars a month. That was scarcely the life for which the active lad was adapted, and before he was twenty he resolved on quitting it for more congenial pursuits.

California attracted him, and he determined to try his fortune in the Golden State. It was a hazardous enterprise for a mere boy to undertake, but he was not afraid of work; he was adventurous and ambitious. We can easily understand how anxious the mother must have been when she bade him farewell. The temptations to which he would be exposed she could imagine, and she had at her side a doleful example of what evil those temptations might achieve.

THE LAST DAY AT HOME

Governor St. John has described with much pathos. "My mother," he said, "was not cheerful and happy; how could she be? and though she never spoke of her fears or secret sorrow, yet I saw it all, and, boy as I was, I hated the demon, Drink, that had made such a change in my father, had broken my mother's heart, and darkened my boyhood's home; and I resolved it never should pass my lips, and anything I could say or do should be done to put the blighting curse from other homes. My mother called me to her, and said, 'John, my son, promise me you'll always be a man wherever you go.' I promised her, and wherever I went after, and whenever tempted to go astray, or do anything that I knew my mother would not approve of, that promise kept me right. Oh, mothers! talk to your boys and get them to promise you against everything that leads men astray; and men! when you are tempted to do wrong, to enter a saloon and imbibe the poisonous draught, think, would God want you to go in there? And if your thoughts won't go as high as that, think of your mother, your next best friend to God. Think whether she would have you do this thing or not; and if she would not, don't do it."

In California St. John accepted any work that offered. He had his own way to make, and he recognized no way of making it but steady, honest work. Our young men in the present day are dazzled by "lucky coups," fortunate speculations, which have indoctrinated them with a contempt for the slower process of work; but St. John chose the slow way and succeeded. Sometimes mining, sometimes working on the steamboats, or trading at others; when nothing better could be had, chopping wood, but always at work, and always careful of his money that he might be able to send home some little help to his mother, whose straitened circumstances rendered such assistance only too welcome. His connection with the steamboats proved more lucrative for St. John than his other employments, and the length of his voyages increased. He sailed to South America, to Mexico, the Sandwich Islands, and took a journey through Central America. In 1852 and 1853 the Indian wars broke out, and then St. John, with many other citizens, entered the field against the red men, was wounded twice, and several times narrowly escaped death.

During St. John's Californian experiences he commenced the study of the law. We have here another of those picturesque interiors that a Rubens might have painted. In a rough miner's cabin by the light of pine knots, on board a steamer by the faint glimmer of a lantern, or the dim light of the moon, the persistent young man, but little over twenty years of age, was seen

PORING OVER HIS LAW BOOKS.

The same tenacious hold on mental culture which distinguished him in childhood was apparent in his adolescence. It was a pursuit of knowledge under difficulties; but it was so far successful that in 1860 he was accepted as clerk by the law firm of Starkweather & McLean, of Charlton, Ill., and in a year from that time had given evidence of so much ability and learning that he was given a partnership. When the war broke out, St. John, like many other professional men both North and South, closed his office to take the field in defence of his principles. He enlisted as a private in the 68th Illinois Volunteers, but before the close of the war he had risen to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. When he returned to private life he settled at Independence, Mo., and there he remained for upward of eight years.

During the political campaign of 1868 St. John was an active worker. He visited all the towns of Western Missouri, and became well known as an effective speaker. In May, 1869, he removed to Kansas, and commenced a law business at Olatha, at first in partnership with Mr. M. V. B. Parker, but afterward alone. Three years later he was elected to the State Senate. This was the first prominent political office he had filled, though he had, while in Illinois, received from his fellow-citizens evidences of public confidence. In 1876 the nomination for Governor was tendered him, but at that time he declined it. It was, however, again offered him by the State Convention, held at Topeka on August 28th, 1878, and his friends urgently pressed him to accept it. He consented, and at once commenced an energetic campaign. He was in a total vote of 138,285, by a majority of 36,812 over his principal rival, and a majority over all of 9755. Last year, in a total vote of 198,238, St John was re-elected by a majority over the next highest candidate of 51,647, and a majority over all of 32,170, a fact which shows how satisfactory to the people had been the manner in which he had discharged the duties of his office during the first term.

The chief events which have distinguished Governor St. John's administration have been the negro exodus to Kansas in 1879, and the passage of the constitutional amendment last year. Both these movements are so fresh in the recollection of our readers that recapitulation is unnecessary. It is sufficient to say that even at this early date Governor St. John has had evidence that the enactment of the prohibition law has worked beneficial results in the State. An official return of the State prisons for the first nine months of this year shows that 114 prisoners have been sent to the penitentiary, while 226, or nearly double the number, were incarcerated during the corresponding period of 1880.

GLOOMY PREDICTIONS.

During the campaign there were not wanting politicians who urged that prohibition would impoverish the State, and would also prevent immigrants settling there, and especially that German immigrants would never be persuaded to make their homes in a State where lager could not be procured. Governor St. John, in a recent speech, thus criticised those predictions in the light of events which have followed the prohibition law. "Let us see if we are losing business: Take the Santa Fé road, for instance, which earned in June, 1881, $438,998 more than it did in June, 1880. Business is increasing everywhere; our State never was so prosperous; let us see whether we are losing in dollars and cents or not. I find that in the year 1876 we commenced the biennial system of assessing real property. In 1877 there was no valuation on real property, and consequently the increase was on personal property alone; it amounted to $3,648,213.52; in 1879 the increase on personal property was $6,231,468.71, and in 1881, the present year, the increase on personal property reached $10,243,611.59. Can't we stand that kind of ruination?

"WHERE WE LOSE.

"The population of the penitentiary, December 30th, 1880, was 725. July 1st, 1881, it was only 659; thus it will be seen that in one spot, and one only, are we losing population, and I think we can stand it.

"We were told that we should get no German immigration. I went down the Santa Fé road not long since, and had to ride on the rear platform of the sleeper on a camp-stool, because there was no room in the inside of the train, and when I finally got in the front car I found it full of Germans. I supposed, of course, that they were going to New Mexico or Colorado, where they could get whiskey and beer, but discovered that they were really going to Kansas.

"A gentleman said to a man, who seemed to be acting as interpreter for them, 'Where are these people going?' and was informed, 'To Kansas.' 'Why,' said he, 'they can get no beer there.' The interpreter repeated the assertion to one who seemed to be a leader, then turned to the gentleman who had addressed him, and said, 'They say they are not going to Kansas for beer; that they go to secure a home for themselves and families; that a home gives more true happiness than all the beer manufactured.' I said to myself, they are on the right platform. They are coming to Kansas for a legitimate purpose, and we welcome them with all our hearts. We are having a better class of immigration this year than ever before.

"We are told that if we enforce this law it will depopulate the State. Over in Kansas City, some time ago, a man said to me, 'St. John, your temperance law over there in Kansas is an awful good thing for Missouri, but it is hard on Kansas. Only a few days ago from ten to fifteen respectable saloon-keepers came over here and went into the whiskey business, and brought their capital with them.'

"'Yes,' I replied, 'and brought their forty-rod whiskey with them also.' I tell you, my friends, every man who goes out of Kansas because he cannot lay drunk on our sidewalks, or is not allowed to make some other man drunk, does the State a benefit. Our doors are open to the down-trodden and oppressed of every land; we will say to them, Come; we will not ask your politics, your religion or your condition; we will take you by the hand and welcome you, and say, God bless you in every effort you may put forth to better your condition and the condition of your fellowmen; but if you have no higher aspiration than to come here to drink or deal in intoxicating liquors, you had better settle in some community where they give your vocation the sanction of law."

Governor St. John is an effective orator, enviably successful in the principal test of a public speaker, viz., securing and holding the attention of his audience. He speaks slowly, correctly, and distinctly, showing no hesitancy and using no rhetorical device. There is, therefore, everything in his manner to add to the impressiveness of his subject and of his felicitous style of treating it. He knows the value of illustration to add to the weight of argument, but while his memory is stocked with the aptest anecdotes, he never tells one for its own sake, or to help him out of a failure in his speech. When delivering an address in the Cooper Union, New York, about a year ago, he related the following incident which had occurred in connection with his own official duties, and it produced a sensation in the crowded assembly:

A TOUCHING INCIDENT.

"A heart-broken woman came into my office with a babe in her arms to beg the pardon of her husband, who was under sentence of ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary for homicide. She showed papers recommending the pardon from the judge who tried the man, the prosecuting attorney, and other prominent men. After closely examining the papers, I said, 'If I were to consult my personal feelings, I should gladly let your husband go, but I am bound by my official duty, and that forbids it.'

"The woman fell at my feet in a paroxysm of weeping. 'Then hear me,' she cried, 'till I tell you how he came to be where he is. We were married seven years ago; we went to a town (mentioning the place), and there in our little village we were happy. My husband was sober, industrious, and thrifty. By great exertion and self-denial we finally got our home paid for. But in an evil day the State licensed a saloon, and let it plant itself right between my husband's shop and our house. He was prospering so well that he could leave his business in other hands and lose an hour or two without feeling it. He was solicited to enter this saloon, and weakly yielded. Hour after hour he spent there, playing cards. One day he became embroiled in a drunken quarrel, and, fired by drink, struck a man and killed him.

"'He was tried and sent to the penitentiary for ten years, and I had nothing to live on. By and by the sheriff turned us out of our comfortable home into a rough shanty, neither lathed nor plastered. The cold wind came in through the walls and ceiling. My oldest boy took sick and died. Then little Tommy, my next, fell sick and died. Now this babe in my arms is sick, and I have nowhere to take it. The State licensed that saloon; the State murdered my children; and now in God's name I want you to set my husband free.' I said I would—and I did."

Innumerable instances are related of men who have been induced by Governor St. John's appeals in public and in private to quit drunken habits and lead sober lives. Fully occupied as he necessarily is with official duties, an opportunity to talk to a poor drunkard is one he has never been known to neglect, and there are few Sundays on which he is not preaching Gospel temperance in some city or village in his State.

Somewhat above middle height, St. John is a fine specimen of physical manhood; robust, active, energetic, decisive in all his movements, he gives those with whom he comes in contact the impression of being vigorous in work, prompt in action, and unswerving in purpose; yet, with all his manly qualities, those who have seen him listening to a tale of distress or urging a dissipated man to forsake his evil ways, carry away a deeper impression of his delicacy, sympathetic kindness, and sensibility, for which other aspects of his character had not prepared them. It is not surprising that such a character should have aroused the unbounded enthusiasm of the citizens of Kansas, whose views are in harmony with his own, or that he should have won a regard more devoted than is usually given to a mere politician. How fervent that affection is, is manifested when the name of St. John is mentioned to a citizen of the State, one of whom, in a letter we recently received, naively says, "We almost worship our Governor. Is it a sin?"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MR. MOODY'S MEETINGS IN ENGLAND.

The Minister and the Wringer.

AT Mr. Moody's midday meeting, a minister rose and said he endorsed all which had gone before, and then related the following incident: "I was holding a mission in a colliery district, and in the course of the morning, when I was inviting people to the evening meeting, I knocked at a door and found a woman at the washing-tub. I said to her, 'I called to tell you I am holding mission services at such and such a chapel, will you and your family join us?' 'Chapel,' she said; 'I am up to my eyes in washing. I have three black men coming in, and there's that wringing machine, I gave fifty shillings for it, and it's broken the first round.'

"She was in a towering passion, and I thought I would not say any more to her, so I took a look at the machine and found it was not broken, but had only slipped out of its gear, so I unscrewed it altogether, and set it right, and then said, 'Now you have been hindered, so I'll just take a turn at the wringing.' So I went to work, turn, turn, turn. At last she looked up and said: 'Where did you say the chapel was?' I told her. She said: 'I'll tell my husband to-night, and we'll come.' That woman got blessed, and her husband, and all her family, and she turned out the best worker in the village, and there was a blessed work of God in that place. She went from house to house saying, 'Come and hear the minister, it's he as mended the machine.'"

A Point not Easily Reached.—The Rev. T. Champness, at one of the Newcastle meetings, said, "Our chief difficulty is that people will not believe the Bible. I am very greatly interested in this question of how to deal with inquirers, because once for many, many months I was in doubt myself. I then read all the religious biographies I could lay my hands on, just as far as I got to the point of conversion. At last I saw it, very slowly—but I saw it—that I didn't believe the Bible. The Bible says, Christ died for the ungodly; and I have found when in my humble way I have to deal with inquirers, it is well to begin with this question, 'Do you believe the Bible?' People generally answer, 'Of course I do.' Then I ask, 'Do you believe that Christ died for you?' Again I get the same answer, 'Yes.' 'Did you thank Him?' 'Well, we cannot get up to that point.' I say, 'Supposing I was a young tradesman, and through the failure of a bank I am in difficulties. I have a creditor about to call upon me for £140, and I haven't 140 pence. But I get a letter from my grandfather—send to the bank, I will let you have £200. If I believe that, I shall not be afraid of the creditor coming on the Monday for his money. I haven't seen the money, but I say to the man, 'Go away with me to the bank, it is all right.' So I say to the inquirer, 'I can't think you believe that God died for you, and not thank Him.'"

An Infidel was Won to Christ Through witnessing the efficacy of His grace to sustain and comfort in the hour of human desolation. At the prayer-meeting on November 7th, the Rev. T. Champness said: "When I was in Africa some years ago an avowed infidel used to visit me frequently for the purpose of discussing the fundamental truths of Christianity. It was at this period that I lost my dear wife, and in the midst of my bereavement, with my lonely cross to bear, it seemed as though a blight had fallen upon my life; but the Lord helped me to continue my work, although my heart was nearly broken. My Atheist friend came one day and said, 'I never believed in Christianity before, but now, knowing as I do how fond you were of your deceased wife, and the strength of your mutual attachment, I can understand the naturally overwhelming character of your grief; and having seen the way you give God the glory and live for Him, I cannot but believe your religion is true and mighty.'"

THE TEN PLAGUES OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.

THE PLAGUE OF PROFANITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Morning, December 18, 1881.*

"Curse God and die." JOB 2 : 9.

A Series of Catastrophes—A Wife's Advice—Job's Better Sense—Blasphemy a Plague of To-day—A Two Days' Record of Travelling Profanities—How the Swearing Habit Grows—By Children Thinking it Manly—By Example of Fathers and Employers—From Infirmity of Temper—From Profusion of Bywords—Leads to Perjury—What is the Cure?—Entreat God to Deliver—Sudden Punishment of the Habit—A Man's Tongue Cut Out in New Jersey—A Scotchman's Remarkable Death—A Blasphemer at Catskill—The Cave of Dionysius—Who is Blasphemed—The Dark Day in New England—A Great Rainbow Arch.

A STORY oriental and marvellous. Job was the richest man in all the East. He had camels and oxen and asses and sheep, and, what would have made him rich without anything else, seven sons and three daughters. It was the habit of these children to gather together for family reunion. One day, Job is thinking of his children as gathered together at a banquet at the elder brother's house.

While the old man is seated at his tent door, he sees some one running, evidently from his manner bringing bad news. What is the matter now? "Oh," says the messenger, "a foraging party of Sabeans have fallen upon the oxen and the asses, and destroyed them, and butchered all the servants except myself." Stand aside. Another messenger running. What is the matter now? "Oh," says the man, "the lightning has struck the sheep and the shepherds, and all the shepherds are destroyed except myself." Stand aside. Another messenger running. What is the matter now? "Oh," he says, "the Chaldeans have captured the camels, and slain all the camel-drivers except myself." Stand aside. Another messenger running. "What is the matter now? "Oh," he says, "a hurricane struck the four corners of the tent where your children were assembled at the banquet, and they are all dead."

But the chapter of calamity has not ended. Job was smitten with elephantiasis, or black leprosy. Tumors from head to foot—forehead ridged with tubercles—eyelashes fall out—nostrils excoriated—voice destroyed—intolerable exhalations from the entire body, until with none to dress his sores, he sits down in the ashes with nothing but pieces of broken pottery to use in the surgery of his wounds. At this moment, when he needed all encouragement, and all consolation, his wife comes in, in a fret and a rage, and says: "This is intolerable. Our property gone, our children slain, and now you covered up with this loathsome and disgusting disease. Why don't you swear? Curse God and die!"

Ah, Job knew right well that

one of the tumors of his agonized body, would not bring back one of his destroyed camels, would not restore one of his dead children. He knew that profanity would only make the pain more unbearable, and the poverty more distressing, and the bereavement more excruciating. But judging from the profanity abroad in our day, you might come to the conclusion that there was some great advantage to be reaped from profanity.

Blasphemy is one of the ten plagues which have smitten these great cities. You hear it in every direction. The drayman swearing at his cart, the sewing girl imprecating the tangled skein, the accountant cursing the long line of troublesome figures. Swearing at the store, swearing on the loft, swearing in the cellar, swearing on the street, swearing in the factory. Children swear. Men swear. Ladies swear! Swearing from the rough calling on the Almighty in the low restaurant, clear up to the reckless "O Lord!" of a glittering drawing-room; and the one is as much blasphemy as the other.

There are times when we must cry out to the Lord by reason of our physical agony or our mental distress, and that is only throwing out our weak hand toward the strong arm of a father. It was no profanity when James A. Garfield, in the Washington depot, cried out, "My God, what does this mean?" There is no profanity in calling out upon God in the day of trouble, in the day of darkness, in the day of physical anguish, in the day of bereavement; but I am speaking now of the triviality and of the recklessness with which the name of God is sometimes managed. The whole land is cursed with it.

A gentleman coming from the Far West sat in the car day after day behind two persons who were indulging in profanity, and he made up his mind that he would make a record of their profanities, and at the end of two days several sheets of paper were covered with these imprecations, and at the close of the journey he handed the manuscript to one of the persons in front of him. "Is it possible," said the man, "that we have uttered so many profanities the last few days?" "It is," replied the gentleman. "Then," said the man who had taken the manuscript, "I will never swear again."

But it is a comparatively unimportant thing if a man makes record of our improprieties of speech. The more memorable consideration is that every improper word, every oath uttered, has a record in the book of God's remembrance, and that the day will come when all our crimes of speech, if unrepented of, will be our condemnation. I shall not this morning deal in abstractions. I hate abstractions. I am going to have a plain talk with you, my brother, about a habit that you admit to be wrong.

The habit grows in the community in the fact that young people think it

MANLY TO SWEAR.

Little children, hardly able to walk straight on the street, yet having enough distinctness of utterance to let you know that they are damning their own souls, or damning the souls of others. It is an awful thing the first time the little feet are lifted to have them set down on the burning pavement of hell!

Between sixteen and twenty years of age, there is apt to come a time when a young man is as much ashamed of not being able to swear gracefully as he is of the dizziness of his first cigar. He has his hat, his boot, and his coat of the right pattern, and now, if he can only swear without awkwardness, and as well as his comrades, he believes he is in the fashion. There are young men who walk in an atmosphere of imprecation—oaths on their lips, under their tongues, nesting in their shock of hair. They abstain from it in the elegant drawing-room, but the street and the club-house ring with their profanities. They have no regard for God, although they have great respect for the ladies! My young brother, there is no manliness in that. The most ungentlemanly thing a man can do is to swear.

Fathers foster this great crime. There are parents who are very cautious not to swear in the presence of their children; in a moment of sudden anger, they look around to see if the children are present, then they indulge in this habit. Do you not know, O father, that your child is aware of the fact that you swear? He overheard you in the next room, or someone has informed him of your habit. He is practising now. In ten years he will swear as well as you do. Do not, O father, be under the delusion that you may swear and your son not know it. It is an awful thing to start the habit in a family—the father to be profane, and then to have the echo of his example come back from other generations; so that generations after generations curse the Lord.

The crime is also fostered by master-mechanics, boss carpenters, those who are at the head of men in hat factories, and in dock-yards, and at the head of great business establishments. When you go down to look at the work of the scaffolding, and you find it is not done right, what do you say? It is not praying, is it? The employer swears—his employé is tempted to swear. The man says: "I don't know why my employer, worth $50,000 or $100,000 should have any luxury I should be denied simply because I am poor. Because I am poor and dependent on a day's wages, haven't I as much right to swear as he has with his large income." Employers swear, and that makes so many employés swear.

The habit also comes from infirmity of temper. There are a good many people who, when they are at peace, have righteousness of speech, but when angered they blaze with imprecation. Perhaps all the rest of the year they talk in right language, but now they pour out the fury of a whole year in one red hot paragraph of five minutes. I knew of a man who excused himself for the habit, saying: "I only swear once in a great while. I must do that just to clear myself out."

The habit comes also from the profuse

USE OF BYWORDS.

The transition from a byword which may be perfectly harmless to imprecation and profanity, is not a very large transition. It is "my stars!" and "mercy on me!" and "good gracious!" and "by George!" and "by Jove!" and you go on with that a little while, and then you swear. These words, perfectly harmless in themselves, are the next door to imprecation and blasphemy. A profuse use of bywords always ends in profanity. The habit is creeping up into the highest styles of society. Women have no patience with flat and unvarnished profanity. They will order a man out of the parlor indulging in blasphemy, and yet you will sometimes find them with fairy fan to the lip, and under chandeliers which bring no blush to their cheek, taking on their lips the holiest of names in utter triviality.

Why my friends, the English language is comprehensive and capable of expressing all shades of feeling and every degree of energy. Are you happy, Noah Webster will give you ten thousand words with which to express your exhilaration. Are you righteously indignant, there are whole armories in the vocabulary, righteous vocabulary—whole armies of denunciation, and scorn, and sarcasm, and irony, and caricature, and wrath. You express yourself against some meanness, or hypocrisy in all the oaths that ever smoked up from the pit, and I will come right on after you and give a thousandfold more emphasis of denunciation to the same meanness and the same hypocrisy in words across which no slime has ever trailed, and into which the fires of hell have never shot their forked tongues—the pure, the innocent, God-honored Anglo-Saxon in which Milton sang, and John Bunyan dreamed, and Shakspeare dramatized.

There is no excuse for profanity when we have such a magnificent language—such a flow of good words, potent words, mighty words, words just to suit every crisis and every case. Whatever be the cause of it, profanity is on the increase, and if you do not know, it it is because your ears have been hardened by the din of imprecations so that you are not stirred and moved as you ought to be by profanities in these cities which are enough to bring a hurricane of fire like that which consumed Sodom.

Do you know that this trivial use of God's name results in perjury? Do you know that people take the name of God on their lips in recklessness and thoughtlessness are fostering the crime of perjury? Make the name of God a foot-ball in the community, and it has no power when in court-room and in legislative assembly it is employed in solemn adjuration. See the way sometimes they administer the oath: "S'help you God—kiss the book!" Smuggling, which is always a violation of the oath, becomes in some circles a grand joke. You say to a man: "how is it possible for you to sell these goods so very cheap? I can't understand it." "Ah!" he replies, with a twinkle of the eye, "the Custom House tariff of these goods isn't as much as it might be." An oath does not mean as much as it would were the name of God used in reverence and in solemnity. Why is it that so often jurors render unaccountable verdicts, and judges give unaccountable charges, and useless railroad schemes pass in our State capitals, and there are most unjust changes made in tariffs—tariff lifted from one thing and put upon another?

* An authentic report, revised and approved by Dr. Talmage.

WHAT IS AN OATH?

Anything solemn? Anything that calls upon the Almighty? Anything that marks an event in a man's history? Oh, no! It is kissing the book! There is no habit, I tell you plainly—and I talk to hundreds and thousands of men this morning who will thank me for my utterances—I tell you, my brother—I talk to you not professionally but just as one brother talks to another on some very important theme—I tell you there is no habit that so depletes a man's nature as the habit of profanity. You might as well try to raise vineyards and orchards on the sides of belching Stromboli as to raise anything good on a heart from which there pours out the scoria of profanity. You may swear yourself down; you cannot swear yourself up. When the Mohammedan finds a piece of paper he cannot read, he puts it aside very cautiously for fear the name of God may be on it. That is one extreme. We go to the other.

Now

of this habit? It is a mighty habit. Men have struggled for years to get over it. There are men in this house of God this morning who would give half their fortune to get rid of it. An aged man was in the delirium of a fever. He had for many years lived a most upright life and was honored in all the community; but when he came into the delirium of this fever he was full of imprecation and profanity, and they could not understand it. After he came to his right reason he explained it. He said: "When I was a young man I was very profane. I conquered the habit, but I had to struggle all through life. You haven't for forty years heard me say an improper word, but it has been an awful struggle. The tiger is chained, but he is alive yet."

If you would get rid of this habit, I want you, my friends, to dwell upon the uselessness of it. Did a volley of oaths ever start a heavy load? Did they ever extirpate meanness from a customer? Did they ever collect a bad debt? Did they ever cure a toothache? Did they ever stop the twinge of the rheumatism? Did they ever help you forward one step in the right direction? Come now, tell me, ye who have had the most experience in this habit, how much have you made out of it? Five thousand dollars in all your life? No. One thousand? No. One hundred? No. One dollar? No. One cent? No. If the habit be so utterly useless, away with it.

But you say "I have struggled to overcome the habit a long while, and I have not been successful." You struggled in your own strength, my brother. If ever a man wants God, it is in such a crisis of his history. God alone by His grace can emancipate you from that trouble. Call upon Him day and night that you may be delivered from this crime. Remember also in the cure of this habit that it arouses God's indignation. The Bible reiterates from chapter to chapter and verse after verse, the fact that it is accursed for this life and that it makes a man miserable for eternity.

INSTANCES OF AWFUL PUNISHMENT.

There is not a sin in all the catalogue that is so often peremptorily and suddenly punished in this world as the sin of profanity. There is not a city or a village but can give an illustration of a man struck down at the moment of imprecation. At New Brunswick, N. J., just before I went there as a student, this occurrence took place in front of the college. On the rail-track a man had uttered a horrid oath. He saw not that the rail-train was coming. The locomotive struck him and instantly dashed his life out. The peculiarity of the circumstance was that the physicians examining his body found hardly a bruise except that his tongue was cut out! There was no mystery about it. He cursed God and died.

In Scotland a club assembled every week for purposes of wickedness, and there was a competition as to which could use the most horrid oath, and the man who succeeded was to be president of the club. The competition went on. A man uttered an oath which confounded all his comrades, and he was made president of the club. His tongue began to swell, and it protruded from the mouth, and he could not draw it in, and he died, and the physicians said: "This is the strangest thing we ever saw: we never saw any account in the books like unto it: we can't understand it." I understand it. He cursed God and died.

At Catskill, N. Y., a group of men stood in a blacksmith's shop during a violent thunder storm. There came a crash of thunder and some of the men trembled. One man said: "Why, I don't see what you are afraid of. I am not afraid to go out in front of the shop and defy the Almighty. I am not afraid of the lightning." And he laid a wager on the subject, and he went out, and he shook his fist at the heavens, crying, "Strike, if you dare! and instantly, he fell under a bolt. What destroyed him? Any mystery about it? Oh, no. He cursed God and died.

Oh, my brother, God will not allow this sin to go unpunished. There are styles of writing with manifold sheets, so that a man writing on one leaf writes clear through ten, fifteen, or twenty sheets, and so every profanity we utter goes right down through the leaves of the book of God's remembrance. It is no exceptional sin. Do you suppose you could count the profanities of last week—the profanities of office, store, shop, factory? They cursed God, they cursed His word, they cursed His only begotten Son.

Yesterday morning, on Fulton Street, as I was passing along, I heard a man swear by the name of Jesus. My hair lifted. My blood ran cold. My breath caught. My foot halted. Do you not suppose that God is aggravated? Do you not suppose that God knows about it? Dionysius used to have a cave in which his culprits were incarcerated, and he listened at the top of that cave and he could hear every groan, he could hear every sigh, and he could hear every whisper of those who were imprisoned. He was a tyrant. God is not a tyrant; but He bends over this world and He hears everything—every voice of praise—every voice of imprecation. He hears it all. The oaths seem to die on the air, but they have eternal echo. They come back from the ages to come.

LISTEN! LISTEN!

"All blasphemers shall have their place in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." And if, according to the theory of some, a man commits in the next world the sins which he committed in this world—if unpardoned, unregenerated—think of a man's going on cursing the name of God to all eternity!

The habit grows. You start with a small oath, you will come to the large oath. I saw a man die with an oath between his teeth. Voltaire only gradually came to his tremendous imprecation; but the habit grew on him until in the last moment, supposing Christ stood at the bed, he exclaimed, "Christ, that wretch! Christ, that wretch!" Oh, my brother, you begin to swear and there is nothing impossible for you in the wrong direction.

Who is this God whose name you are using in swearing? Who is He? Is He a tyrant? Has He pursued you all your life long? Has He starved you, frozen you, tyrannized over you? No. He has loved you, He has sheltered you, He watched you last night, He will watch you to-night. He wants to love you, wants to help you, wants to save you, wants to comfort you. He was your father's God and your mother's God. He has housed them, saved them from the blast, and He wants to shelter you. Will you spit in His face by an imprecation? Will you ever thrust Him back by an oath?

Who is this Jesus whose name I heard in the imprecation? Has He pursued you all your life long? What vile thing has He done to you that you should so dishonor His name? Why, He was the Lamb whose blood simmered in the fires of sacrifice for you. He is the brother that took off His crown that you might put it on. He has pursued you all your life long with mercy. He wants you to love Him, wants you to serve Him. He comes with streaming eyes and broken heart and blistered feet to save you. On the craft of our doomed humanity He pushed out into the sea to take you off the wreck.

Where is the hand that will ever be lifted in imprecation again? Let that hand, now blood tipped, be lifted that I may see it. Not one. Where is the voice that will ever be uttered in dishonoring the name of that Christ? Let it speak now. Not one. Not one. Oh! I am glad to know that all these vices of the community and these crimes of our city will be gone. Society is going to be bettered. The world by the power of Christ's Gospel is going to be saved, and this crime, this iniquity, and all the other iniquities will vanish before the rising of the Sun of Righteousness upon the nation.

There was

memorable for storm and darkness. I hardly ever saw such an evening. The clouds which had been gathering all day unlimbered their batteries. The Housatonic, which flows quietly save as the paddles of pleasure parties rattle the oarlocks, was lashed into foam, and the waves hardly knew where to lay themselves.

Oh! what a time it was. The hills jarred under the rumbling of God's chariots. Blinding sheets of rain drove the cattle to the bars, or beat against the window pane as though to dash it in. The grain fields threw their crowns of gold at the feet of the storm king. When night came in it was a double night. Its mantle was torn with the lightnings and into its locks were twisted the leaves of uprooted oaks, and the shreds of canvas torn from the masts of the beached shipping. It was such a night as makes you thank God for shelter, and open the door to let in the spaniel howling outside with terror.

We went to sleep under the full blast of heaven's great orchestra, the forests with uplifted voices, in chorus that filled the mountains, praising the Lord. We woke not until the fingers of the sunny morn touched our eyelids. We looked out the window and Housatonic slept as quiet as an infant's dream!" Pillars of clouds set against the sky looked like the castles of the blest built for heavenly hierarchs on the beach of the azure sea. All the trees sparkled as though there had been some great grief in heaven, and each leaf had been God-appointed to catch an angel's tear. It seemed as if our Father had looked upon the earth, His wayward child, and stooped to her tear-wet cheek and kissed it.

So will the darkness of sin and crime leave our world before the dawn of the morning. The light shall gild the city spire and strike the forests of Maine to the masts of Mobile, and one end resting on the Atlantic coast, the other resting on the Pacific beach, God will spring a great rainbow arch of peace, in token of everlasting covenant that the world shall never more see a deluge of crime. God save the city! God save the nation!

A Tunnel Through the Pyrenees is a Scheme now engaging the attention of European engineers and capitalists. The tunnel will be four miles long, and it is expected that the communication it will afford between France and Spain will contribute materially to the commercial prosperity of both nations. Antiquated military circles in both countries are the only opponents of the plan. Several foreign and native companies offer to undertake the work immediately. The efforts which this generation has seen to facilitate intercourse between different countries and to overcome natural obstacles to international communication is one of the most prominent characteristics of this age, and prophecy informs us that it would be a sign distinguishing the final chapter of this dispensation.

An Appropriate Monument to a Beloved daughter was dedicated in Brooklyn on December 11th, when Bishop Peck preached in the new Seamen's Bethel. The lot and building are the gift of a New York merchant, who believed that in erecting an edifice for the spiritual benefit of sailors temporarily in the port, he was best testifying to his love for his dear dead daughter. A tablet in the wall near the pulpit bears witness to the object. On it is the following inscription: "In memory of Julia C. Mead, whose devotion to Jesus' poor friends led her father, Edwin Mead, of New York, with his sons, to consecrate this property to the Bethel Ship Norwegian Methodist Episcopal Church. To the poor the Gospel is preached. The abundance of the sea should be converted to Him. Glory be to God alone."

SYLPH SOMERS.

Wesley's Proposal—Good-by to Chester—Captain Vaughan's Attachment—Journey to Ireland—A Narrow Escape — Runaway Horses Bravely Stopped—Seasickness—Wesley's Blessing.

We shall pass over all incidents in connection with Doctor Gilbart's burial (which took place in the cathedral) to the day of Sylph's departure. Captain Vaughan followed the hearse as a mourner, and poor Hugh, the doctor's Welsh valet, was inconsolable. "Oh, the poor doctor! oh, the poor doctor!" he sobbed out, as the clay, whose sound ever startles those who hear it, rattled upon the coffin.

After the funeral not a day passed without a visit from Captain Vaughan to the Rows. He went, he said, on a mission of consolation to the sorrowing Sylph, but we suspect, although he did not acknowledge it even to himself, that there was another motive. The fact is, the charm of Sylph's beautiful face and character had thrown their fascination around the young officer. Nor was Sylph much less interested in Captain Vaughan than he was in her. His Christian principles, his handsome face and manly form, his courage and self-forgetfulness, all appealed to her maidenly heart. Hence, notwithstanding her heavy griefs and troubles, thoughts about him she discovered came up very often before her.

Neither of them, however, realized how close they were to each other's hearts, until the morning of Sylph's setting out. Then the pain of separation, which each felt, revealed to them the fact of a mutual passion. Time, however, was not given for an open understanding, and with a warmth of grasp from the hand of Captain Vaughan, coupled with a look more eloquent than words, Sylph, accompanied in the chaise by an elderly gentleman, started on the road to Conway, amid the blessings and tears of a crowd of her poor clients, who had come to bid her farewell and witness her departure. "Alas!" cried the poor Welsh weaver, as he saw the carriage vanish in the distance, "Alas, this day for the city of Chester, 'The winter of its discontent is come,' and its Somer's departed."

Conway was reached in safety, and there, under the shadow of the grand old castle, Sylph's elderly escort handed her over to the yet more venerable guardianship of Wesley, who, pronouncing a blessing "upon her fair young head," received her into his carriage.

Space would fail us to record the conversation of her illustrious companion upon this journey, never forgotten by Sylph in all her future history. Every word showed the pure and lofty atmosphere he breathed. The day was breezy and bright, and the surface of the sea, crisped by the wind, rose and fell in a dancing radiance.

"See there," he said, as they passed along the bold sea-shore. "See how brightly those waves, far out from land, gleam in the sunlight, and yet break into a purer and more dazzling whiteness as they leap upon the shore. Is it not beautiful? It speaks to me, dear child of God," he went on, "of the Christian's history. Out upon the open sea of life, my daughter, the saint of the Lord, as putting on righteousness, is clothed, in holy sheen, and reflects the glory of his Saviour. But what is that, to what shall be, when perfect in holiness he reaches the heavenly shore of the golden land. One touch of that celestial, and he rises in a moment into all the life and love of Heaven, and shall shine in snow-white robes, bright with purest rays of uncreated light, forever!"

Another incident of the journey we also must record. It exhibits what some have deemed the weaker side, or the vein of credulity and fanaticism, which, as human, certainly ran more or less through this wonderful man's character. We pass no opinion upon Wesley's interpretation of what occurred, but narrate an actual occurrence,* and this because of its influence in after days upon Sylph.

Penmaen-mawr is a naked and gloomy mass of rock, rising abruptly fifteen hundred feet and more above the sea, some distance beyond Conway. Toward the close of last century the government were induced to assist in forming a good road around this stupendous natural obstruction; but, at the period before us, this highway though begun had not been completed, and the only method of surmounting the gigantic headland was by a steep zig-zag road, narrow and unprotected. The view seaward from the summit of this mountain path was magnificent, but the traveller was not often in a mood to enjoy it; the awful and dizzy steep close at hand was too suggestive of peril.

The chaise, in which were the aged Wesley and Sylph, painfully wound its way up the tortuous and rugged promontory, and safely reached the topmost elevation, the prospect from which to Sylph, who had never before this day seen the open sea, was simply entrancing, and gave her the delightful consciousness of enlarged thought and "a new sensation."

Even down the more perilous path on the other side of the great "Stone Head," as its Welsh name signifies, the chaise had worked its laborious way, safely overcoming every difficulty and danger, but scarcely had the horses reached the level road than off they set, as though scared by an apparition.

Sylph was filled witn alarm, which was much increased in a minute or two by seeing the driver of the chaise fall off the coach-box; but Wesley was undisturbed and calm. "Trust in the Lord and be at peace, my daughter," he cried to the agitated Sylph. "'He shall give His angels charge over thee.' True," he continued, "there are demon angels as well as good—the spirits of the power of the air, as the Scripture calls them; but their might, as thou knowest, is under restraint and limited—so far can they go but no farther; and behold the proof of this, my daughter. No power had they to inspire panic in our horses until we had passed that stage of our journey where it would have been our destruction. And look behind thee; even our driver's life has been guarded, for though cast to the ground, he lives unhurt, and is following us on the road."

"Yes," said Sylph, half covering her eyes in fear; "but see, the road before us, though level, is rough and winding, and the carriage drives hither and thither, and to strike the wall of rock on the one hand, or to fall into the steep hollow ditch on the other, will be destruction."

"Still, be calm and of good cheer," said Wesley. "He that calleth forth the stars by number, as a flock of sheep, and guides them in their courses, and makes the clouds His chariot, also rules our way, and no harm shall befall us. Only believe, my daughter—yes, believe—and thou art safe."

Wesley's words continued for a time miraculously true. A heavily laden cart was in the road before the horses in their headlong flight, and then a narrow bridge, and after that a pile of broken stone jutting far forward into the highway; but, as though guided by the most unerring skill, the horses avoided them all, just grazing the cart, kept the exact middle of the bridge, and swept, with mathematical exactness, round the stony cairn.

"Thanks unto the Lord, whose angel bands guide our perilous path!" exclaimed Wesley. "It is the Lord's hosts, my daughter, and this is another Mahanaim."*

But after a little looking onward Sylph saw a closed gate, standing, as it seemed, across the whole road, having this appearance from a sharp bend of the highway; and a collision seemed inevitable. She felt a strong impulse to scream, but pressing her hands hard to her face and mouth she restrained herself.

"Thou doest right, my daughter," said Wesley again, who had observed the movement and the reason of it; "thou doest right, my daughter," he repeated. "Let not, even now, thy faith and courage fail thee. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints; and the very hairs of our heads are all numbered. Even in this extremity He will not fail us, for His angels are round about them that fear Him."

His words seemed prophetic, for the horses, rushing on in wild gallop, were unable to take the sharp turn of the road, and bore themselves and the carriage straight against the barred entrance; but there was, neither to Wesley nor to Sylph, a ruinous collision. The end of the chariot-pole struck exactly the centre of the gate, bore intact itself the tremendous blow, but shivered the gate into a thousand fragments.

The terrified animals, startled still more by the flying pieces falling thick around them, scampered more furiously across the field they had entered, and covered with foam, tore on blindly with the chaise behind them.

The field now entered upon by the still careering horses was a long and narrow one, and after some distance, rose rather steeply; and this steepness ended abruptly in a precipitous height which overhung the sea. This peculiar conformation of the ground was recognizable by Sylph and Wesley; for a great sweep of the land in crescent form on one side the field gave them to see the waves wildly dashing at the foot of a beetling wall of rock; and it was certain that the part of the headland not directly visible, and toward which they were being swiftly borne, was just as exposed and precipitous. The horses, as though guided by a demon hand, galloped straight on for this perpendicular height, and in headlong speed, as though driven by the furies; and Sylph's fortitude sank. Pale with fear, she looked into the face of Wesley for a renewal of her trembling faith and failing courage.

"Our ghostly enemies, my daughter," he said; "are, indeed, strangely persistent in their malignity, and hunger for our lives; but for myself I do not heed their rage, and mock their fury. I am and have been for years, my daughter, the servant of the Lord. He has given me a mighty work to do. Much of it I have already done; but the whole is not yet accomplished; and until it is done I know full well this mortal life of mine, whatever seems to threaten, shall not fail.

"But as for thee, my daughter, I cannot so surely speak. Thou hast not had my great mission committed to thee as a pledge of perpetuation to thy life. What if this hour, then, thou surrenderest thyself, in full devotion, to the Lord? Let it be so, my daughter—let it be so. It will fling an ægis round thy life that will render thee invulnerable to all the shafts of hell; and even in this dread moment of thy history will preserve thee."

Sylph had scarcely time to make this resolve—even if prepared and prompt, for such an absolute surrender, before affairs came, at length, to a sudden and happy crisis. Within a few yards of the great wall of rock which has been spoken of, and over which the sea far beneath was visible, a horseman, who had seen their danger and who had leaped his steed over the wall next the road, with a rare courage, galloped between and shouted and waved his hands. In a moment the horses of the chaise, strange to say, came to a full stop, driving both Sylph and Wesley forward from the sudden halt in their impetus. But their safety was assured, for the animals, hitherto uncontrollable in their terror, suffered themselves to be quietly led through a field-gate at hand, and on to the highway.

After this exciting incident nothing further of moment occurred on the road, and Holyhead was arrived at in time for the "Claremont" Dublin Packet. The passage across the Channel was tedious and rough, and Sylph, never before at sea, suffered the usual unpleasant consequences, and her troubles in this respect were shared in by her aged companion, who, "chosen vessel" and angel-guarded as he felt himself to be, was not exempted, it was proved, from the common ills of life. Of this voyage he thus writes in his journal—"The wind stood fair for three or four hours; it then turned against us and blew hard. I do not remember I ever was so sick at sea before, but this was little to the cramp, which held most of the night with little intermission."

Wesley had ministered to Sylph both in a time of sorrow and a time of danger; glad was she now, as more free from pain than he was, to soothe his mind with gentle, loving words, and to alleviate his sufferings.

* Not, however, in chronological order or locality.

* Genesis 32 : 2.

At length the quay of Dublin, after a two days' passage, was reached. A good night's sleep had greatly recovered Wesley, so that, taking Sylph with him, he went up at once to what he calls the New Room, and it being Sunday, he preached with his wonted unction and power to a crowded congregation.

In a day or two afterward Sylph's friends, Mr. and Mrs. Denzille, took over his young charge from Wesley, having come up to the city for this purpose.

Tender was the parting of the snowy headed patriarch from Sylph. She kneeled at his feet, and bending down her golden-tressed head, asked his blessing. Placing his hands upon her, and raising his eyes in rapt devotion to heaven, he said: "'The Lord bless thee and keep thee,' my daughter; 'The Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up the light of His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace'; and, in life and in death, may Christ be to thee most precious."

He kissed her as she rose from her knees, and then, embracing her, bid her a long and loving farewell. She never saw him more, for in two years afterward he died, with the words, "the best of all is, God is with us," upon his lips; words which are treasured up by his followers as an encouragement and a watchword, and whose prophetic truth, all will admit, has been proved in the history of Methodism.

THE KING: HIS PREDICTED WARFARE, VICTORY, AND MARRIAGE.

By Rev. William Maude.

THE BRIDE'S BEAUTY.

"So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty." What a pathetic yet powerful picture is that in which the prophet Ezekiel represents the origin of the daughter of Jerusalem as a wretched infant cast out and left to perish, in contrast with the regal dignity and surpassing beauty to which, through the unmerited favor of God, she was ultimately exalted (see Ezekiel 16 : 1–4). "When her renown went forth among the heathen for her beauty; for it was perfect through my comeliness, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God." And, notwithstanding her many backslidings, her fornication with many lovers, as the prophet expresses it, and her final rejection of the King himself, when He "came unto His own possessions, and they that were His own received Him not," how great and unalterable has been the love of Jehovah for His Israel! How does He let the fulness of His everlasting love pour forth in the wondrous language of the fifty-fourth of Isaiah.

Moreover, Israel's faithful and loving husband is at the same time her Divine Lord. "He is thy Lord; and worship thou Him." And so Isaiah, in the chapter which we have just quoted, says, addressing Israel: "For thy Maker is thine husband, the Lord of hosts is His name; and thy Redeemer the Holy one of Israel; the God of the whole earth shall He be called" (Isaiah 54 : 5).

Once Israel's trust was in Moses and his law, and her proudest boast, "We have Abraham for our father;" but when again restored from all her wanderings, redeemed out of the hand of all her enemies, and joined unto Christ in that new covenant of which Isaiah speaks when he says, as quoted by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews: "This is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to Me a people;" then, in truth, shall "Israel rejoice in Him that made him, and the children of Zion be joyful in their King" (Psalm 149 : 2).

The addresses to the King and Queen, descriptive of the glory and beauty of each, being finished the Psalmist, in prophetic vision, now sees, as it were, from the house of the Bride to the palace of the Monarch, set forth; the Bride being carried in a magnificent litter or palanquin—such as we read of in the Song of Solomon (3 : 9, 10), surrounded by her maidens; and as the joyous procession advances, the following chant is raised:

"The King's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold. She shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needlework; the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought. They shall enter into the King's palace."

A curious misinterpretation has arisen in connection with the words, "The King's daughter is all glorious within;" as though the reference were to some inward and spiritual glory of purity and virtue, in contrast to the outward adornment of her person which is immediately afterward spoken of. But this is not the meaning of the word, which refers to the interior, either, by anticipation, the palace to which she is being conducted; or, as we apprehend, to the interior of the splendid litter in which she sits curtained from the too-curious gaze of the spectators. The statement that her clothing is of "wrought gold" has also caused the commentators some perplexity, but it refers in all probability to the "variegated or embroidered garments" in which the Bride is arrayed, such as we read of in Ezekiel 16 : 18; 26 : 16.

The mention of the "virgins," the "companions" of the Jewish Bride, suggests a very interesting question of prophetic interpretation—namely, the relation in which this Psalm may be supposed to stand to the parable of the Ten Virgins, and how they can best be interpreted harmoniously and so as to illustrate and confirm each other. Into this matter we cannot enter fully here, but a few points may be mentioned which will perchance help to guide those who are disposed to study the question further into the right line of interpretation.

THE VIRGIN-COMPANIONS.

In the first place, then, we cannot fail to notice that whereas in the Psalm the Bride occupies the prominent place, her virgin-companions appearing only in a subsidiary position, in the parable the virgins engross the whole attention, the Bride not being so much as mentioned. Again, while clearly in the Psalm it is the procession of the Bride which is described, from her own home to the palace of her royal spouse; in the parable, on the contrary, it is the Bridegroom, returning from the wedding (comp. Luke 12 : 37), whom the ten virgins go forth to meet.

And so, once more, whereas in the Psalm all the virgin-companions of the Bride enter with her, "with gladness and rejoicing" (literally, "with great joy and exultation"), into the King's palace; in the parable it is only the "wise virgins," those who, having provided themselves with a due supply of oil, are found "ready" when the Bridegroom appears, who find admission to the marriage supper of the Lamb, while even their joy must, one would think, be more or less overwhelmed by the exclusion, for a time at least, if not forever, of their former companions.

But we must hasten to the close. In the next verse of the Psalm the prophet's standpoint seems again changed. The Bride has arrived at the King's palace, the marriage festivities are concluded, and the royal pair are established in their regal authority and dominion. Finally, therefore, he has a word to say as to

THE GLORIOUS RESULTS OF THEIR UNION.

"Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth." We have here the germ of Isaiah's more explicit prophecy, already quoted, in which he declares that the heretofore barren one's children shall be more in number than those of the married wife, as well as the echo of God's great promise to Abraham that he should be "a father of many nations," yea "the heir of the world" (Genesis 17 : 5; Romans 4 : 13); for, as it is elsewhere written, "He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root; Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isaiah 27 : 6).

But it must be borne carefully in mind that the time for the accomplishment of these promises and the branching out of Israel into a multitude of nations belongs not to this but the coming millennial age, inasmuch as it is the result of the glorious union of the Jewish Bride with the King Messiah, the time of which union, as has been clearly shown, is not before the Second Advent. Hence all theories which would find their present fulfilment in the vast increase and wide dispersion of the Anglo-Saxon race are but unscriptural attempts to antedate the purposes of God and give to Gentiles what is solely the heritage of the Jews. Nevertheless the prophecy shall in God's own good time and way be accomplished, and in the sure anticipation of this the Psalmist concludes his glorious epithalamium in these words: "I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations; therefore shall the peoples praise thee for ever."

Yes, "His name shall endure for ever; His name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in Him; all nations shall call Him blessed. Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things. And blessed be His glorious name for ever; and let the whole earth be filled with His glory. Amen, and Amen" (Psalm 72 : 17–19).

Messrs. Moody and Sankey, after an Absence of more than six years, renewed their evangelistic work on Wednesday, November 23d, in the city of Edinburgh, Scotland. The first meeting was held in the Free Assembly Hall, at three o'clock, but long before that time every inch of available space was occupied, and many persons were unable to gain admission. Messrs. Moody and Sankey were accompanied by a large number of clergymen and others. After singing and prayer, oral and silent, Mr. Moody delivered an address on "The Holy Spirit," which was listened to with breathless attention. An evening meeting was held in the United Presbyterian Synod Hall, and Mr. Moody spoke with much power on "Triumphs of Faith."

The Solution of the Opium Problem has hitherto been impeded by British financiers, on the ground that if India were not permitted to send opium into China, the chief and almost the sole source of Indian revenue would be destroyed. An effort is now being made that appears to hold out hope of such a deficiency arising from a discontinuance of the iniquitous traffic being supplied by increased cultivation of Indian cotton. A deputation of cotton spinners have recently waited on the British Government to urge the propriety of government assistance. They state that there is no reason why cotton of a quality equal to broach should not be grown in India in such quantity as would sell in Liverpool at four and a quarter to four and a half pence per pound. They point out that under the conditions now existing a series of bad seasons in the American cotton district would reduce Oldham to beggary. More Indian cotton is wanted, and they consider that the output of India might be increased fivefold. In this way it is possible that God may be preparing the way to the abolition of the trade which British Christians view with horror and shame.

A Railway Ride in Spain, from Figueras to Barcelona, is thus described by a Christian lady: "The carriage was full of passengers, and, lifting up my heart to God, I asked that a message might be given me to each one in the compartment. Offering the man who sat next me a Bible text, I found he was a Spiritualist. A long and interesting conversation ensued, and since then I have had the privilege of preaching the Gospel in that man's shop in a neighboring town. On the other side of the carriage sat a respectable man, a very superior Spaniard, with his wife and pretty little daughter. The Spiritualist whispered, 'Don't speak to him, he is a bigoted Catholic.' I felt that I must, and so I asked, 'Can the little one read?' 'Oh, yes,' said the man, 'she has been well taught.' I then asked her to read a text-card, and selecting that straight knock-down to Popery, 'There is one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus,' I gave it to the little girl, who read it aloud, while all the passengers listened eagerly. A conversation followed with the man, whose attention was thus won. I afterward gained the hearing of a soldier, and with him also had a few pointed words. Thus I was enabled to bear testimony to all in the railway carriage, and of the seed thus sown who can tell the fruit?"

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE past year has been one of great prosperity for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the Publishers for the third time record their acknowledgments to Almighty God for the favor thus steadily and abundantly bestowed.

The Subscription List is a little more than fifty per cent larger than it was at this time last year; and, as the sermons of Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, which make the leading feature of the paper, are also its principal means of doing good, the publishers can, without self-glorification, express the satisfaction with which they send out thousands upon thousands of copies of those faithful statements of the way of salvation every week. They are read on Sabbaths in many solitary homes where the visit of the circuit preacher does not occur oftener than once a month.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has also prospered financially. For, as our terms are always cash in advance, every subscription means a receipted bill, and we have neither outstanding accounts nor doubtful assets.

Our relations with our subscribers also have been of the pleasantest kind, with no harassing for payment and no disputes about bills. We have adhered to a rule with which we started, and which we believe to be required by Christian courtesy; viz., to reply by return of post to every inquiry from a subscriber.

We hereby tender our thanks to eight hundred agents through whose exertions we have largely built up our circulation. Some are aged persons, who find that means of livelihood within their failing strength; some are young children, who take it as an easy way to earn pocket-money; and others are men and women in the prime of life who have chosen canvassing as their professional business; while not a few are to be included in the number, who, out of sheer good will and without a thought of gain, go to work to promote the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the usefulness of which they conscientiously believe.

Now we shall be glad to enter renewals for 1882 as early as it is convenient for our subscribers to send them, and we repeat our offer to mail a circular of agent's terms and a package of sample copies to any person who contemplates canvassing for the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, was nominated by the President on December 12th to be Secretary of State. The Senate, as is usual in cases where the nominee has once been a United States Senator, confirmed the nomination without reference to a committee. The Republican press of both wings and the majority of Democratic journals have expressed approval of the nomination on the ground that Mr. Frelinghuysen is an able lawyer and a safe administrator. These qualities are especially necessary in a Secretary of State, because an error of judgment or an anxiety to make a brilliant record might embroil the nation in unpleasant diplomatic complications with the governments of Europe or South America. Mr. Frelinghuysen belongs to a family conspicuous in the history of the Republic. His grandfather was a delegate from New Jersey to the Continental Congress in 1775, 1778, 1779, and 1782. He is the nephew and adopted son of Theodore Frelinghuysen, who sat in the United States Senate from 1829 to 1833, and who was nominated for the Vice-Presidency by the Whigs in 1844 on the same ticket with Henry Clay. In that election James K. Polk and George M. Dallas were elected. The new Secretary of State was born in 1817, graduated at Rutgers College in 1836, and after serving as Attorney-General of New Jersey from 1861 to 1866 he was elected United States Senator from that State. He sat in the Senate from 1866 to 1877. General Grant offered him the post of minister to England, but Mr. Frelinghuysen declined the honor. He took a prominent part in the Presidential controversy of 1876, and advocated the claim of Mr. Hayes before the Electoral Commission. Mr. J. C. Bancroft Davis, of New York, is nominated to be Assistant Secretary of State. Mr. Davis was the agent of the United States at Geneva on the arbitration of the Alabama question, and at present is an Associate Justice of the United States Court of Claims. He is fifty-nine years of age.

The President sent to the Senate on Friday the nomination of Benjamin H. Brewster, of Pennsylvania, to be Attorney-General. Mr. Brewster is a well-known lawyer of Philadelphia, and has frequently been named by amateur cabinet-makers for a Cabinet position. He was appointed by Governor Geary in 1867 Attorney-General of Pennsylvania, and sat on a commission appointed by President Polk to arbitrate on the Cherokee Indian claims; which public positions are the only two he has yet held. Mr. MacVeagh, whom Mr. Brewster succeeds, had so high an opinion of his abilities that he selected him to prosecute in the Star Route cases. Three changes have now been made in the Cabinet, in each of which a member of the Stalwart wing of the party takes the place of a representative of the section currently denominated "Half-breed."

The Principal Witnesses in the Trial of the assassin Guiteau, last week, were medical experts. Mr. Spitzka, of New York, unhesitatingly pronounced the prisoner insane. He formed the opinion before he examined him, from his letters, statements, and published works, as well as from the pictures of him which have appeared in the illustrated journals. That opinion was confirmed by an examination of the prisoner in the jail. Dr. Spitzka stated his conviction that Guiteau is a congenital monstrosity, whose head is malformed and who, as to moral sense, is a cripple. On the other side Dr. Fordyce Barker testified to his belief in the assassin's sanity, and expressed his conviction that the affliction denominated moral insanity does not exist in any one, but is simply a term used to describe wickedness so extreme as to be indefensible on any other theory. He also believed that insanity is not hereditary. Dr. Hamilton, of New York, also considered the prisoner sane. Dr. John L. Withrow, of Boston, under whose ministry Gutieau sat in 1879, testified that he had never seen signs of insanity in him, but rather deemed him a shrewd and acute lawyer. Mr. Reynolds, a Chicago lawyer in whose office Guiteau had a desk in 1868 and 1875, was an important witness whose testimony enraged the prisoner. He related how he visited Guiteau three times in jail soon after the shooting, and that on those occasions Guiteau spoke to him of the crime as assassination, and justified it on political grounds. This went to show that the inspiration theory was an afterthought, adopted by Guiteau when he learned that the political leaders who would profit by his crime were unanimous in denouncing it. Guiteau continued through the week his interruptions, and his abuse of those witnesses who gave evidence detrimental to him.

Two Important Bills have been Introduced in Congress. Senator Pendleton, of Ohio, has attacked the civil service difficulty from two points. He endeavors to reform the system of appointments by organizing a commission to regulate competitive examinations and to make such suggestions from time to time as appear to be needed to make the system efficient; he also, by a stringent measure, proposes to abolish political assessments by protecting officeholders from injury if they refuse applications for campaign purposes, and by punishing those party managers who attempt to enforce the assessments. The second measure of importance is an effort made in the House by Mr. Willits, of Michigan, to deal with the Mormon question. It is understood that Mr. Willits discussed the subject fully with the late President, and that the bill now introduced in the House had President Garfield's approval. It proposes to suspend the functions of the Utah Legislature, and to vest them in the Governor and a legislative council consisting of nine members, to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. As usual, a large number of other bills have been introduced, both in the Senate and the House, but the questions of Civil Service Reform and the Mormon scandal are so urgent that they will probably occupy a prominent place in the debates.

The Protection of Theatre-Goers has been the chief matter occupying the attention of the city authorities of New York during the past week. The Vienna calamity has aroused them to vigilance. Every place of amusement in the city has been inspected, with the view of ascertaining what would be the probable chances of escape for the audience should a fire or a panic occur. Many alterations to the theatres are recommended, which, if made, will, it is believed, permit the audience to make their escape readily should there be sudden cause for alarm. These measures the authorities are taking to ensure what protection they can to the bodies of those who attend the theatres. Who can tell the extent of the alterations that would be required before people might witness the performances there without peril to their souls?

The Atlanta Cotton Exposition will Close on December 31st, as originally determined. The Director-General of the Exposition has issued an address in which he says that it is impossible to alter the date fixed for the closing of the Exhibition. The last week, he says, will be in all respects the most interesting and important of the Exposition, and the closing ceremony will be particularly impressive. Mr. Kimball says: "In giving to the press this, which will probably be the last general bulletin I shall issue, I desire to thank the journals of this country for the untiring and unstinted support they have given to the Exposition from first to last. To this, more than to all other causes, its magnificent success is to be ascribed." A miniature ship, filled with the products of the South was sent as a gift to Cincinnati on December 14th, in charge of a committee. It was the same vessel which, as a floral ship, was sent by the citizens of Cincinnati to the Exposition at Atlanta.

The Last Sermon.—Some Interesting Reminiscences of Dr. Prime were related last week by his son, Dr. Irenæus Prime, who thus describes the preparation of his last sermon: "He was writing, in the evening, one more sermon: the theme was the love of God: he had advanced into the middle of the discourse, and then quoting these words, 'He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him,' he laid down his pen and went to bed. The angels came for him, and when he fell asleep they bore his spirit to the bosom of Him whose love he celebrated with the last effort of his mind and pen." How appropriate the subject, from the contemplation of which, he went to its full realization.

The Week of Prayer.—The Following Programme of subjects for the week of prayer, January, 1–8, 1882, has been arranged by the Executive Committee of the Evangelical Alliance. Sunday, Jan. 1.—"Renewed Consecration." Monday, Jan. 2.—Thanksgiving for the blessings, temporal and spiritual, of the past year, and prayer for their continuance. Tuesday, Jan. 3.—Humiliation and confession on account of individual, social, and national sins. Wednesday, Jan. 4.—Prayer for the blessing of God on His Church and His Word. Thursday, Jan. 5 —Prayer for the young and all agencies for Christian training. Friday, Jan. 6.—Prayer for the universal prevalence of peace and righteousness. Saturday, Jan. 7.—Prayer for Christian Missions, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and the conversion of the world.

The Annual Appeal of the Hospital Saturday and Sunday Association, which has just been issued, names Christmas Day as Hospital Sunday, and December 24th as Hospital Saturday. Last year $41,000 were raised for the twenty hospitals in the association. A still larger sum is needed this year.

A Publishing Firm's Practical Protest will give general satisfaction among Christian people who saw with regret the appearance of a paper in a recent issue of the North American Review, by the notorious infidel, Colonel Ingersoll. The Messrs. Appleton now announce: "The North American Review, although published by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., is owned and wholly controlled by its editor. Messrs. Appleton & Co., in view of recent articles that have appeared in it, will decline to act even as its publishers after the close of the present year." It is well that the eminent publishing firm appreciate the responsibility of disseminating pernicious doctrine.

On the spot where President Garfield fell, in the waiting-room of the Baltimore & Potomac Railway Station, when the assassin's bullet struck him, a silver star has been fixed, and on Wednesday, November 30th, a beautifully carved marble tablet was placed on the wall above it. An eagle, holding in its claws arrows and laurels, surmounts the stone, on which is inscribed: "James Abram Garfield, President of the United States, shot July 2, 1881." It is stated that the new five-cent postage stamps will bear the portrait of President Garfield.

Sixty Thousand Children have been Enabled to settle in the West and other parts of the country by the efforts of the Children's Aid Society since it commenced its work in 1852. At the annual meeting of the society on November 22d, an interesting report was read showing the useful work already accomplished in preventing neglected children from drifting into vicious habits and becoming habitual criminals. It was stated that the lodging-houses of the society have sheltered and partly fed and instructed about 200,000 different boys and girls during its existence. Over 100,000 poor little girls have been taught in the industrial schools, and although four-fifths of them were children of drunkards, it is not known that even a score have entered on a criminal life or become drunkards. The police statistics of crime show that during a portion of the period through which these figures run the commitments of young girls for vagrancy and thieving have largely decreased.

A Thrilling Story is Related by Five Sailors who were brought into Charleston, S. C., on November 21st. They were part of the crew of a French vessel, and were picked up in an open boat in mid-ocean and brought to this country by an English steamer. The voyage commenced October 6th, when the vessel left the Saint Lawrence off the Isle Verte. They encountered a perfect hurricane, and on the 9th orders were given to throw the cargo overboard. While that was being done, the storm increased, and all the lamps and the compass were washed away, and the provisions damaged with salt water. The work of throwing over the cargo was discontinued because when the hatches were open the water that washed over the decks threatened to engulf the vessel. Then a hole was cut in the stern of the vessel, and the cargo was flung through that until the crew were exhausted, and all hope of saving the ship abandoned. The sailors then divided what provisions they had into three portions, placing one in each of three boats into which they entered. As they parted, the captain, with tears in his eyes, made the men a little speech, and obtained from them all a pledge to make an offering of thanks to God in the event of their being saved. Only one of the boats has been heard from, and it is feared that the other two must be lost. The wrecked sailors had been in the open boat ten days, when they were seen and rescued.

A Murderer in New York will Probably escape the just punishment of his crime through a legal technicality. Some time ago an officer named Williams was murdered in the prison of Sing Sing by a convict named Morgano. There was no doubt as to the guilt of Morgano, and it being an atrocious case his life is justly forfeited. But he is already undergoing a sentence of imprisonment for life for a previous murder. It has now occurred to Morgano's lawyer that, as under the laws of New York State a criminal under punishment cannot be tried for a subsequent crime till he has served his original sentence, he can never be legally tried in this world. The situation is a curious and perplexing one, and may issue in the criminal's escape from hanging. That will be a miscarriage of justice due to a legislative blunder, but when the redeemed sinner escapes the punishment due under God's law, it is through no blunder, but because the penalty of his sin has already been suffered by his Substitute (1 Peter 2 : 24).

A Curious Postal Prohibition Appears in the New Postal Guide. Mr. James finds it necessary to caution the public against splitting post cards. Paragraph No. 648 states that post cards which have been split, written upon on the insides, and the edges pasted together again, are unmailable. Among all the schemes that have been devised to save money, this is one of the most remarkable. The trouble of splitting a post card and the difficulty of writing legibly on the uneven surface, seems very inadequately compensated by a saving of two cents; yet that there are people who are satisfied with it, is evident, or the caution would not have been given. To most people it would appear that the time and trouble expended might have been employed more wisely, as well as more profitably. Business men whose favorite maxim is, that "time is money," naturally regard a pursuit costing so many precious minutes, and bringing so small a reward, much in the same light as angels must regard the life of the godless merchant or manufacturer who labors all his life to become a millionaire, yet neglects his eternal interests. If the unsaved man who is satisfied with a day's work that has made him richer by a thousand dollars, is compared with him who spends his time in splitting a post card to save two cents, it will be seen that the difference between them is one of degree not of kind (John 6 : 27).

Why it was Decided not to build a Hotel in a town in Georgia is explained by a local editor. A project was started to build a hotel, and a committee formed to solicit subscriptions. One gentleman to whom the committee applied was noted for his liberal hospitality and for his readiness to entertain strangers. His answer to the application was, "What do you want of a hotel here? Every respectable person who comes to town puts up with me and is welcome, and every disreputable person leaves town because he cannot put up anywhere." The committee regarded the existing arrangement as beneficial to the town, and it is stated that no hotel will be built. As a rule a traveller feels that his prospect of securing accommodation in a town where he is a stranger, depends rather on his possessing money than character, but it appears that there is at least one place where character is the indispensable requisite. If this hospitable gentleman were gifted with penetrating and unerring judgment, there are many people welcomed elsewhere who would do well to avoid being benighted in that town. A day is coming when a test will be applied to those who would enter into another guest chamber; they will be challenged with the question, "How camest thou in hither, not having a wedding garment?" (Matt. 22 : 12).

THE MAIN MATTER.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through His name."—JOHN 20 : 30, 31.

Christ's Public Life—Brief Yet Full—Its Most Useful Part Recorded—I. The Design of all the Scriptures—To Produce Faith—Who Sows the Seed of Doubt—The Bible a Library, yet one Book—Not Written to Magnify the Writers—Nor to Impart Biographical Knowledge—Where the Evangelists Differ—Not to Gratify Curiosity—Nor to Present an Example—John's Single Object—II. Christ the Object of Faith—What to Believe—How to Believe—III. The True Life of the Soul—In Whom it Lies—How it Comes—What it Is—Common Mistakes.

THE public life of our most blessed Lord Jesus Christ was brief; few suppose it to have exceeded three and a half years; but yet what a full life it was. It had in it not only enough to compose the four gospels, each one of which contains sufficient to lead men to saving faith, but so much remained over and above that the apostle John makes this remarkable statement: "And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." Our Lord's life was as ample as His own festivals; it feeds thousands, and with the fragments that remain many baskets might be filled. A man may complete a great and fruitful life in two or three years, while another may have existed as long as an antediluvian and yet his life may be poor and powerless.

Not only did the Lord Jesus speak and do great things as to number, but there was a world of power in each word and work. He did not display a multitude of feeblenesses, but each individual outcome of His life was grand enough to have been a marvel if considered by itself alone. As was the doer, in whom "dwelt all the fulness of the godhead bodily," such were the deeds; they also were full of grace and truth. There was a fulness of divine wisdom, grace, and power about each act of Jesus. Hence the apostle here speaks of the Lord's acts as signs—"many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His disciples."

There was a mass of instruction in all our Lord's movments; nothing about Him was trivial. He preached by His entire life, preached a marvellous array of truths, and preached them with living freshness. Never is He twice the same, though always the same. When we find Him repeating His discourses, as we sometimes do, if the Sermon on the Mount sounds very like the Sermon on the Plain, yet a different drift, and aim, and tone create a singular variety. Each separate act of the Lord is a sign of something beyond itself, and the whole of the acts put together display an ocean of doctrine without bottom or shore. What a Christ was this! Oh that His Spirit may dwell in us, that our lives also may be rich and full; rich to the glory of God, and full to the blessing of our fellow-men.

Yes, dear friends, though the whole of Christ's life has not been written, we perceive in our text that what has been recorded is the most useful part of it, and that it was preserved for our benefit. The inspired record was written with a purpose: the facts were wisely culled and collected out of the entire mass on account of their bearing upon the desired object, and sufficient has been preserved to effect a design which, above all others, is most important to us: "these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name." May our reverence to the inspired gospels lead us to give earnest heed to their design and object, for it would be profane to baffle their purpose by refusing their testimony.

First, this morning, let me speak a little with you upon the design of all Scripture, which is faith; secondly, upon the great object of true faith, which is Jesus the Christ, the Son of God; and then, thirdly, let us further commune together upon the true life of the soul, which is linked and wrapped up with the name of Jesus Christ, in whom we are led to believe by the testimony of the things written concerning Him.

I. First, then, dear friends,

THE DESIGN OF ALL SCRIPTURE

is to produce faith. There is no text in the whole book which was intended to create doubt. Doubt is a seed self-sown, or sown by the devil, and it usually springs up with more than sufficient abundance without our care. The practice of reading sceptical works is a very dangerous one; we have enough tendency to sickness in our own constitutions without going to fever hospitals to test the atmosphere. Holy Scripture is no mother or nurse of doubt; it is the creator of a holy confidence by revealing a sure line of fact and truth.

It has been thought by many expositors that John here refers only to the things which Jesus did after His resurrection—"Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His disciples;" but I think there are abundant reasons, with which I need not trouble you just now, to show that John must have referred to the whole of our Saviour's life, and to all the acts of it, and that the book which he speaks of is his own book, the evangel which contains his own life of Christ. John includes the whole story of Jesus of Nazareth in the reference of the text.

I venture to go much further, and to say that the statement that John here made, though it must refer to his own gospel, is equally true of the entire Scriptures. We may begin at Genesis and go on to the Book of Revelation, and say of all the holy histories, "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." Though this Bible is a wonderful library of many books, yet there is such a unity about it that the mass of the people regard it as one book, and they are not in error when they do so: this one book has but one design, and every portion of it works to that one end. Of the whole canon of inspiration we may say, as we read every detail, "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God."

Observe, then, no part of Holy Scripture was written with any wish to magnify the writer of it. Many human books are evidently intended to let you see how profound are the thoughts of their authors or how striking is their style. Self-consciousness is full often apparent, and the man is seen as well as the fruit of his mind.

The inspired authors lose themselves in their theme, and hide themselves behind their Master. A most striking instance of this is found in John's Gospel. John was a man above all others fitted to write the life of Christ. Did he not know more of Jesus both by observation, by intimate fellowship, and by hearty sympathy with Him than any other of the evangelists? and yet he has left out many interesting facts which the others have recorded—others, mark you, who did not actually see the facts as he did. Speaking after the manner of men, this silence is very wonderful. Can you guess how much this abstinence cost the apostle?

The other three evangelists received much at second hand, though, truly, by the Spirit of God; but John literally and personally saw these things, and beheld them with his own eyes, and yet he gives us fewer incidents in the life of Christ than the other evangelists. What self-forgetfulness was this! He is silent because his speech would not serve the end he aimed at. And the most striking point is this: he omits, as if of set purpose, those places of the history in which he would have shone. He and James and Peter were frequently selected by the Master to be with Him when others were excluded, but of these occasions he says nothing.

What a lesson is all this to us who write or speak of God! Let us labor for this one thing, that we may lead men to believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. If any sort of preaching would exalt ourselves, let us choose another, lest we hide the cross of Christ. If we can occupy the space with something more forcible, let us omit the choicest piece of oratory. Let us prune the vine of our speech that all its sap may go to fruit, and let that fruit be the bringing of men to believe that Jesus is the Christ.

Further, notice that Holy Scripture was not written with the mere view of imparting knowledge to men by presenting them with a complete biography of Jesus Christ. The one intent of Scripture is that ye may believe on Jesus Christ. It was not the aim of either of the evangelists to present us with a complete life of Jesus Christ. Observe the difference between such a writer as John and an ordinary biographer. Usually when you see a biography advertised it will be your wisdom to save your money, for scarcely ever is there a biography written that is fully worth the money asked for it. I can point you to biographies stuffed full of letters which might just as well have been burned, and commonplaces which might as well have been forgotten.

How different is the biography of Jesus of Nazareth. The signs and wonders which he did are they are not even written that you may be informed of all that Jesus did; these are written with an end, an aim, an object—"that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." Matthew, when he writes of "Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the son of Abraham," leaves out everything that does not bring out Christ in connection with the kingdom: he paints Messiah the Prince, and he will not be taken off from his work. Luke brings forth Jesus as the man, and you see how wondrously he keeps to that one line of things.

But when you get to John, and he is about to bring forth the Lord Jesus Christ as the Son of God, he omits numbers of details that show our Lord in other lights and other aspects. Here Jesus is not so much the King in his kingdom—he leaves that to Matthew, he sticks to his own point, which is indicated by his opening sentences, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." He desires to set forth our Lord's glorious Messiahship, and personal Sonship, and Deity, and he adheres to that, and to that alone. The evangelists do not attempt merely to increase our knowledge, but they aim to win our understandings, and to conquer our hearts for Christ.

Notice yet again, dear friends, that the gospels and the other books of Scripture were not written for the gratification of the most godly and pious curiosity. Truly, I would have liked to have acted to our Lord as Boswell did to his friend Dr. Johnson. I would have thought it an honor to have noted down every choice word He dropped, and every act He did. I would have recorded the very color of His hair, and you should have known whether His eyes were blue or hazel: I would have left on record every incident about the very fabric of that hem of His garment which the woman touched. Would not any of you have done so? Do you not love Him so much, and prize Him so greatly, that you would have thought the smallest trifle about Him to be

A GEM OF KNOWLEDGE.

Our love ennobles everything that has to do with our adorable Lord. But the writers inspired of the Holy Spirit were not led astray by this feeling; they knew their object and gave their whole strength to it. The Holy Ghost did not send His servants to gather up interesting details and preserve curious facts. None of them wrote to gratify your curiosity, even about the things which concern your Lord and Master. You shall be told that which shall lead you to believe Him to be the Son of God, but you shall be told no more; for had all been written you might have spent all your time in trying to know Christ after the flesh, but now He hath preserved only that which by His blessing shall teach you to know Him after the spirit. It is not to gratify curiosity but to beget faith within the soul that the memoirs of our Lord are written by the evangelists.

Again, the Scriptures are not even written with the view of setting before us a complete example. I want you to notice that. It is true that the gospels set before us a perfect character, and we are bound to imitate it. It is true that when we read the life of Christ we may learn how to live, and how to die; but that was not the first and chief design of the writers: they wrote that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, by believing, we might have life through His name.

Good works are best promoted, not as the first, but as the second thing. They come as the result of faith, and he that would promote that which is pure and honest and holy, had best promote faith in Jesus Christ, the Saviour. The Scripture does not go in for flowers first, nor even for fruit, but it plants roots, and hence it aims at implanting faith in Jesus Christ, for when we have believed in Him, the faith that worketh by love will be sure to produce a sacred imitation of His most beloved and perfect character. Yes, let the truth stand as I have put it, "these are written," first and last, with no other end and object but this, "that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God."

Open his gospel and see how John all through keeps to his design. It would be worth while to spend the whole morning, and a half-dozen other mornings, in showing you that John never takes his eyes from this one point. You will soon perceive that his book contains borne by persons led to faith in Jesus as the Christ. I am afraid you would soon grow weary if I were to dwell upon every incident which would prove my point. The whole book is made up of modes of reasonings by which men have been led to believe in Jesus: it might have been written for the sake of the Unitarians of our own time. It contains repeated declarations that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and a series of testimonies of persons brought to see this by the signs that Jesus wrought among them. Study John's gospel with that view, and you will see how the Lord brings one to believe on Him by a call which came with divine authority, a second by unveiling the secrets of her life, another by answering his prayers, another by enlightening his mind.

II. We turn, in the second place, to a subject which is a step further on:

is Christ Jesus. The text does not say, "These are written that ye might believe the Nicene creed," for, good as that creed is, it was not then composed, and is not the chief object of faith. It does not say, "These are written that ye might believe the Athanasian creed;" a very good creed, but rather savage, and also not then devised. No, no: "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name." That is to say, the faith which brings life to the soul is faith in the person, offices, nature, and work of Jesus; and though you may be in the dark about a thousand things, and may make mistakes about ten thousand more, yet if you believe in the Messiah, the Son of God, you have eternal life.

First, I am to believe in Jesus that He is the Christ, that He is the promised Messiah, anointed of God to deliver the human race. I must believe that this is He whom God promised at the gate of Eden, when He said, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." This is the sent One, who is come to seek and to save that which is lost: in Him we are to believe, for it is written, "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God."

Next we are to believe that He is the Son of God—not in the sense in which men are sons of God, but in that higher sense in which He is the only begotten Son of God, one with the Father, eternally and indissolubly one. "The Word was with God;" but more than that, "the Word was God." Now, this is to be believed if we would live unto God. "Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God." "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" A Jesus who is not divine could give us no power to overcome the world; but in His Godhead we find our strength. Put the two together, that He, the divine One, became man, and was sent into the world to redeem us, and we have the right idea of Immanuel, God with us. Will this belief save me? Assuredly it will, but listen while I explain.

First, believe this to be a matter of fact. Having believed it to be a matter of fact, go on to look into the record concerning Him till you are undoubtedly sure of it; for these are written that ye might believe with the fullest confidence that Jesus is God and Saviour. When you are sure of the fact, the next thing is to accept it for yourself: agree that Jesus shall be your anointed, through whom you will get the anointing which comes upon Him as the Head, and descends to you as the skirt of His garment. At the same time unfeignedly consent that He shall be your God, and cry with Thomas, "My Lord and my God."

You are getting on now to complete faith; go one step further. Yield yourself up to the grand truth which you have received, for that is saving faith, the submission of yourself to the truth. Acting upon the conviction of its truth, I must say—since Jesus is now my Saviour He shall save me. Since He is the Christ anointed for me I will trust Him, and share His anointing. Since Christ is the Son of God I will rest in Him, that I also may become in Him a child of God. That is the point. "He that hath the Son hath life: and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." Accept Jesus as He is set forth, for to "as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." The faith which receives Christ as He is revealed as the Messiah, and as the Son of God, is the faith which hath eternal life, and the Scriptures are written that you may have this faith.

I want you to notice one thing more, and that is, we are to receive Jesus of Nazareth as being the Christ and the Son of God on the ground of the written word. See—"these are written that ye might believe"; from this it is clear that the ground of acceptable faith is the written word of God, and it is vain to look for any other. "Oh," says one brother, "I could believe, but as I ought." What have your feelings to do with the truth of the statement that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God? I read in a newspaper such and such a statement about affairs in Europe. I may have sufficient cause for doubting the news, but it certainly would not be a good reason if I were to say, "I do not believe the telegram because I do not feel that it is true." How can our feelings affect matters of fact? They are either true or not, altogether apart from the condition of the hearer.

Now, here is a testimony concerning Jesus borne by John and three other evangelists. If these things are true, then they are true whether your heart dances for joy or sinks in despair. Whatever becomes of our changeful feelings, facts are stubborn things, and alter not. Experience cannot make a thing true; and frames and feelings cannot make a thing to be a lie which is in itself true. Over the head, then, of all the storms, and turmoils, and changes of my poor, weak, silly nature, there rises a rock that is higher than I, higher than all things, a rock which cannot be moved, let the storm rage as long as it will—Christ Jesus, the anointed Son of God, died in the room, place, and stead of all who trust in Him; I trust in Him, and I am saved.

III. So I come to the third point, which is this, that lies in Christ Jesus, and comes to that soul through faith in Him. I understand by the life of a soul only one thing, and yet for the sake of clearing it we must divide it a little.

First, when a man has been found guilty of death, if by any means that sentence is removed from him, he may be said to obtain life, life in its judicial form. Suppose that a person who is condemned to die is by some just and lawful means acquitted; in that fact he finds life. That is the first form of life that every man has who believes that Jesus is indeed the Christ. He is acquitted, pardoned, justified, and therefore he lives. Through the righteousness of Jesus Christ he is made just in the sight of God; and being covered with perfect righteousness he lives, and must live for ever. He is absolved, for he hath believed in Christ Jesus, and by that act he has accepted the righteousness of God and escaped from death. The guilt has been removed, and therefore the penalty cannot be inflicted.

This judicial life is attended with an imparted life. God the Holy Spirit is with believers, breathing into them a new, holy, heavenly life. They are dead to the world, and buried with Christ, but they live unto God, never more to be slain by sin. The life of Christ is infused into them by the Spirit of the living God, even as the Lord Jesus hath testified. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."

Observe that this life grows. It continues to gather strength, and as it increases it is spoken of by John as life "more abundantly." That life never dies; it is impossible that it should ever be destroyed; it is a living and incorruptible seed which abideth for ever. The life of saints on earth is, in fact, the same life as that of saints in heaven. There is no change in the substance of the new life when we enter glory, only it grows and developes and reaches perfection in heaven.

The new life enters the soul in and through believing, and is the same life which we shall exercise for ever at the right hand of God, even as Jesus said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on Me hath everlasting life."

I want to enlarge a little upon the fact, that this life comes with believing, because I want it to be noticed that it really comes with believing, apart from any other necessary circumstances. One person complains to me, "Sir, I cannot tell exactly when I was converted, and this causes me great anxiety." Dear friend, this is

A NEEDLESS FEAR.

Turn your enquiries in another direction: Are you alive unto God by faith? Do you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God? Are you resting and trusting in Him? "Yes," say you, "with all my heart." Well, never mind about when you were converted; the fact is before you, and its date is a small matter.

If a person were to say to you, "You are not alive," how would you prove that you are alive? A good plan would be gently to tread on his toe, or do something to make him feel that you possess life. I do not think it could be necessary for you to find your certificate of birth, because if you held it in your hand and said, "That document is conclusive," it would not be half so convincing a proof of life as some distinct act of life. If I thought that I knew the very moment in which I was born again I might be mistaken; indeed little reliance can be placed upon our memories. I would sooner believe to-day than be quite sure that I began to believe thirty years ago.

Perhaps very few of you know the exact minute at which the sun rose this morning, and yet you do not doubt that he has risen, for at this present moment you are enjoying his light. Some mornings you can tell the instant of the sun's rising, but frequently it is so cloudy that the sun is up before you know it. A man would be an absolute lunatic who should say, "I do not believe that it is daylight, for I do not know when the sun rose." Date is a very small and unimportant matter compared with certainty and fact. Do you believe in Jesus Christ? then you are alive unto God, and life is the evidence of birth.

"Well," says another, "but I hardly know how I was converted." That, again, is another minor matter. Some of us can trace the way in which the Lord led us to Himself, and we are very grateful to the instrument by whom we were brought to a knowledge of the truth; but our text does not state that the Bible was written that you and I might trace our faith in Christ to John, or to any one else. No, it was written that we might believe in Jesus Christ as the result of testimony: and I care not one farthing by what testifying agent you were brought to do it, so long as you do but believe because of the witness of the Word of God. I am sure whatever the outward means of your faith the Spirit of God must have wrought it, for there is no living faith apart from His sacred working upon the mind. If you believe sincerely, the mode in which you gained your faith need not be enquired into.

"Well," says one, "but I want to know that I am alive unto God by my feelings. I feel often so sad and full of pain." Listen: is not pain as good a proof of life as pleasure? If anybody said to me, "I know I am alive because I feel so well," I should reply, "And I sometimes know that I am alive because I feel so ill." Rheumatic pain is as sure a proof of life as a thrill of delight; and so anxiety about your state, and hatred of sin, and grief over your imperfection are just as sure signs of spiritual life as the highest joy or the liveliest energy. Do not worry yourself, therefore, about that; if you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and are resting in Him, it is well with you. "But," saith one,

"I CHANGE SO MUCH.

I feel sometimes as if I must be a Christian; at other times I feel as if it was out of the question that I could be saved." Yes, and do you not change a great deal as to your bodily life? I do, I know. Why, this heavy, damp, thick atmosphere half poisons me. Lift me up a few thousand feet on a mountain side, with a good stiff breeze blowing, and I feel quite another man. Are these changes reasons for questioning my being alive? Nay, nay. Quite the reverse. The reason why I feel these changes is because I am alive, for I reckon that if I were a broomstick or a brick wall the atmosphere would not matter much. If you have no spiritual life you will know few changes, but because you are alive these variations must and will occur to you. I make you smile; I wish I could smile away some of those fears which hang like a nightmare over certain of the best of you.

"But I have such conflicts within," cries one. Ah, dear friend, there are no conflicts in dead men; there would be no warfare between faith and unbelief if you were not on the Lord's side. If our whole being remained in its natural death there would be no inward fighting, but inasmuch as there are two minds within you, depend upon it one of those minds is the mind of God. This inward conflict should not cause you to doubt, but rather lead you to cling the more tenaciously to your conviction that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of men.

Faith in Jesus begets life, and this life will flourish or decay very much in proportion to our faith. Believe firmly, and your life shall be vigorous; believe tremblingly, and your life will be faint.

I come back to my beginning, and there I close:

THE MAIN THING,

the only thing is, that we do hold on to Jesus Christ, through thick and thin, through foul and fair, up hill and down dale, in the night and in the day, in life and in death, in time and in eternity; that we do steadfastly believe that Jesus of Nazareth, who died upon the cross, is the Messiah of God, yea, the Son of God, sent to cleanse away iniquity and bring in perfect righteousness. Whether we see Him on His cross or on His throne, all our hope, all our trust must be fixed in Him, and so we shall live when time shall be no more. Verily, I say unto you, those who thus trust Him shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of His hands, for He hath said it, "I give unto my sheep eternal life."

Stay you there, O true believers, and let none entice you from your steadfastness! If any of you have never exerted this faith, may the Lord bring you to Jesus at once. This sacred book was written on purpose to make you believe; the Spirit is given to lead you to believe; the object of every preaching of the Gospel is that you may believe; therefore come and welcome, and at this hour believe on the one saving name, and live thereby. God grant it for His name's sake. Amen.

A Rescue from Niagara.

A Mother's last Words.

A RESCUE ON THE NIAGARA RIVER.

(See Illustration.)

Some years ago a party of five, two gentlemen and three ladies, crossed the Niagara River in a small boat, many miles from the Falls. They were young and light-hearted. They had a merry passage, spent a happy hour on the Canada side, and then embarked for their return. All went well till they neared the centre of the stream. Just then there came down upon them a fierce gale of wind, rushing down the mighty river. The boat shot forward. It was in the mad current. The men plied their oars. They were strong and stalwart; but a power stronger than theirs held them within the strong stream of those swiftly moving waters.

The landing they aimed for was left far behind them. They looked with speechless lips into each other's white faces. They knew that they were going down with the current. The oarsmen strained every muscle. If they could only breast the stream for a while, relief might come. One of the fragile oars snapped. One more hold was gone. Not a word was spoken. Death and eternity stared them in the face. Upon one solitary oar and one single oarsman hung five precious lives. Surely, very surely, they were going down with the dark current.

Two of the five were Christians, and they afterward gave the joyful assurance that, when the first great terror was over, they fell back upon hope and faith, and that in them the near prospect of death was swallowed up in victory.

Suddenly, when the hands of the oarsman were bleeding and torn, when the signal of distress had long fluttered in vain, and the agitation and alarm had sown the seeds of death in one fragile frame, a little boat was seen coming cautiously toward them. It turned back. It durst not venture too close. Not a word from the five. They seemed very near God and eternity.

Another and stouter craft put off, rapidly at first, then very slowly. It must not come within the power of the irresistible current. One moment it paused. No nearer. A rope was uncoiled. "Seize the rope!" shouted the boat's crew. An eager hand caught it. The stout craft shot rapidly off, and the rescued boat was drawn from the hurrying current.

Sinner, you too are drifting, swiftly and surely, down a subtle current. A noble craft comes to your rescue. A rope is flung out to you. It is salvation through Christ. Seize that rope, and escape the destruction which awaits you. Jesus waits to save. It is high time to awake. It is high time to flee for thy life. Will you do it now? All the invitations of the Bible are offered now. Its promises claim acceptance now. Its offer of pardon and peace and holiness and heaven is made now. Gratitude demands that you decide now. Eternity with all its solemnities cries Now. "Behold, Now is the day of salvation."

A MOTHER'S LAST WORDS.

(See Illustration.)

A mother lay dying, and her three children were weeping around her bedside. Death comes as the king of terrors to many: but to her it did not, for her soul was at rest in Jesus, and she seemed to bask in the sunshine of His love. The light of heaven beamed in her intelligent and affectionate eye even then; and above the sobs of her children might be heard her voice pleading for them in prayer. Sometimes in a song of triumph as with the voice of a conqueror, she exclaimed, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" It was a solemn scene, for the chariot was waiting to take her home, and the angel-guard were ready. Life was ebbing fast away, and the beatings of the pulse were getting weaker and weaker as she neared the goal.

She had said that before the day had passed she should be gone, and so it was. Calling her children near her, she blessed them each one, then slowly and earnestly said, "Seek Jesus, and you will be happy: seek Him now." With a look full of holy affection, she shortly afterward bade them "Good-night," and fell sweetly asleep in Jesus, whom she loved so well, even unto death.

There was much sorrow of heart in that family; but the sight of the mother triumphing over death took the sting from the wound, and amid its sadness cheered the soul. They knew she had gone to the land where—

> "Sickness and sorrow, pain and death,
> Are felt and feared no more."

All were impressed by the remembrance of that solemn hour; but on one of the children the effect was deep and lasting. By night and day that dying scene was hardly ever absent from his mind. In the whirl of business, in the bustle of life, in the height of gayety, a voice often seemed to startle as it said, "Seek Jesus, and you will be happy; seek Him now." Louder and louder it sounded; and, mingling with other voices, sent home to the heart by the Holy Spirit, it made that son seek Jesus, and find Him. Then, and not till then, was he happy. Then, for the first time, he knew the peace that passeth all understanding.

PROPOSED NEW HEADQUARTERS FOR THE SALVATION ARMY.

Our readers are already acquainted with the aims, objects, and modes of operation of the Salvation Army. The abundant blessing God has bestowed upon the organization in England has been the marvel of Christians as well as of the ungodly. Among the worst classes of society in the cities and towns of Great Britain, thousands of men have been rescued from lives of sin and have become sincere Christians. Burglars, thieves of all kinds, desperadoes, drunkards and vicious men, have been brought to the feet of the Saviour crying for mercy, and have left the meetings rejoicing in hope, to lead consistent Christian lives.

These miracles have been worked by means apparently inadequate. The preachers of the Salvation Army are for the most part without even the rudiments of education, and their addresses are full of expressions repulsive to people of refined taste. Yet God, who chooses His own instruments, has blessed the words of these illiterate men and women as He blessed the preaching of the fishermen of Galilee. The Holy Spirit has worked through their instrumentality as He can work with any instrumentality, and men have been turned from the error of their ways to serve the living God.

So mightily has this work prevailed and so extensive is the progress chronicled, that a need has been experienced for some large building in London which may be used as a headquarters, with accommodations for meetings and for such educational training as has been found necessary for the preachers and officers of the army. This need has long been present to General Booth and his assistants, and as hundreds of men are applying for assistance of an educational character to fit them for the work of declaring with power the glad tidings of salvation, the project has assumed urgent shape. Very recently, and while the subject was under prayerful consideration, an offer was made to General Booth, which he describes as follows:

"The London Orphan Asylum, standing on over two acres of ground in Lower Clapton, within five minutes' walk of the Hackney (North London) and the Clapton (Great Eastern) railway stations, is offered to us for the comparatively small sum of £15,000 (about $75,000).

"The buildings originally cost over $300,000, without the land on which they stand, are substantially built, and in comparatively good condition. The land is freehold, without restrictions, and is alone worth £8500 ($42,500) for building purposes. Having been erected and used as a dwelling-place for 600 children, the building is so constructed that it will require very little, if any, alteration at once to accommodate our cadets—the men in one wing, and the women in the other, both with separate entrances, and altogether apart.

"The great quadrangle, when floored, seated, and covered with a suitable roof, will make a grand hall capable of containing 4700 persons. The large class and drill rooms inside the building will accommodate 3000 more, while at the back there are grounds on which tents could be erected in the summer-time to contain an additional multitude. In the basement there is a steam-engine, boilers, ovens, and other apparatus, which will enable provision to be made for furnishing refreshments for all-day meetings.

"So extraordinary a supply of our urgent needs, such a magnificent opportunity of improving the wonderful tide of blessing which God is making to flow in upon us, I could not think of allowing to pass by, no matter how great the difficulty of securing and carrying out the undertaking. It is ours not to confer with flesh and blood, but to do with our might what our hands find to do, for the work is of indispensable moment, and the time is short."

The officers of the Salvation Army have been encouraged to make the effort to secure these premises by many generous friends. No sooner was the scheme made known than before any appeal for help was made, a few wealthy Christian men in London voluntarily sent to General Booth $25,000, one fourth of the entire sum required, and it is expected that in a short time the whole amount for both purchase and necessary alterations will be realized.

"THE DOCTOR ORDERED IT."

WHEN Mrs. Sparrup drinks her glass of something strong, she drinks it openly. She doesn't mind who knows it. Regularly, publicly, and frequently does she partake of her alcoholic beverage.

Sometimes she is remonstrated with, and advised to take less or none at all. She then bristles up, assumes an indignant air, and says, "The doctor ordered it."

When in the presence of strangers, who wonder somewhat at the quick disappearance of the glass's contents, and perhaps betray their wonder a little, she volunteers the information that "The doctor ordered it."

Sometimes Mrs. Sparrup assumes a martyr's air, and drinks her grog with a wry face. Any one to see her at such a time would be struck with the air of submission with which she takes it. And if asked why she puts up with such an infliction as this strong drink appears to be, she will answer, "The doctor ordered it."

Mrs. Sparrup's creed is not a very large one. It contains but few articles. But these articles are, though peculiar, very precise. I may perhaps be permitted to mention two or three of them.

Mrs. Sparrup believes for one thing that her constitution is a most peculiar one, indeed one altogether unique. She questions whether the most diligent search throughout the whole wide world would discover another like it. She stands entirely alone in physical organization.

Another article of her creed is that there never was but one doctor in the world who understood her case, and in whom, consequently, she could have supreme faith. This was the doctor who ordered it.

She further believes that of all the medicine she ever took, there is none so potent, none so suitable, and none on which she can so implicitly rely, as the various forms of strong drink.

For these articles of faith Mrs. Sparrup would lay down her life. At least she says so.

Now I, for one, think Mrs. Sparrup a humbug, and intend to show her up as such. It is plain that if I can convince the public that her pet phrase, "The doctor ordered it," is all moonshine, I shall be doing them a service.

Now I do not accuse her for a moment of telling an untruth. I accept her statement as true. The doctor did order it.

Neither do I intend to run down the doctor. Perhaps he did understand her constitution. He ought to understand it if he did not. And it is possible too, that when he ordered her stimulant he knew what he was about.

My course will be rather to state a few facts calculated to throw light upon Mrs. Sparrup's phrase, "The doctor ordered it." They will somewhat alter the complexion of affairs, I think.

My first fact is, that the doctor who ordered it is dead and buried, poor man; indeed, has been dead and buried for a good many years. Now, to hear Mrs. Sparrup's use of our dead friend's advice, one would naturally suppose that he was as fresh and hale a doctor as could be found anywhere. No one would ever have dreamed that "The doctor ordered it" so many, so very many, years ago. O crafty Mrs. Sparrup!

And then this fact is worthy of notice, that when the doctor ordered her to imbibe strong drink, he also ordered her sundry other remedies, such as pills, a plaster, and some stuff of a very bitter nature in a bottle. Is it not strange that our friend long ago dropped the rest in favor of this one? Why, we ask, did she not continue the other medicines as well? O forgetful Mrs. Sparrup!

Neither should we forget the bad illness—the reason of Mrs. Sparrup's original recourse to stimulants by order. I need not specify what the illness was, any more than to say that to all outward appearances she has long since recovered from it.

It is, however, but fair to state, that Mrs. Sparrup herself denies that she has recovered. To which we reply, "Well, Mrs. Sparrup, if after all these years your medicine has done you no good, why do you continue to take it?" My own opinion is, that if she is no better, it must be the strong drink which keeps her back.

The case against her looks all the worse, when it is remarked that several other doctors have distinctly ordered her not to drink alcohol. But then they had no insight into her constitution, which explains it all, at least to her own satisfaction.

It ought not to be unnoticed either, that since the doctor ordered it, Mrs. Sparrup has decidedly increased her daily supply, on the principle, I suppose, that you cannot have too much of a good thing.

Poor Mrs. Sparrup! So weak, so deluded, so much to be pitied. Why will she continue her false cry of "The doctor ordered it"?

Oh! that she would listen as attentively and earnestly to the words of the Great Physician, who so lovingly calls upon her to turn from the ensnaring things of earth, and to commit her soul for safe keeping into His hands.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

A Second Fraud.

THERE were two or three well-worn letters in the pocket-book, but they contained nothing of importance. It seemed true, what the dying man had said, that there was no link of kinship or friendship binding him specially to his fellow-men. Roland opened his own pocket-book, and looked over a letter or two which he had carried about with him, one of them a childish note from Felix, preferring some simple request. His passport was there also; and his mother's portrait, and those of the children, over which his eyes brooded with a hungry sorrow in his heart. He looked at them for the last time. But Felicita's portrait he could not bring himself to give up. She would be dead to him, and he to her. In England she would live among her friends as his widow, pitied, and comforted, and beloved. But what would the coming years bring to him? All that would remain to him of the past would be a fading photograph only.

So long he lingered over this mournful conflict that he was at last aroused from it by the entrance of the landlord, and the mayor and other officials who had come to look at the body of the dead. Roland's pocket-book lay open on the bed, and he was still gazing at the portraits of his children. He raised his sunburnt face as they came in, and rose to meet them.

"This traveller," he said, "gave to me his pocket-book as I watched beside him last night. It is here, containing his passport, a few letters, and fifty pounds in notes, which he told me to keep, but which I wish to give to the commune."

"They must be taken charge of," said the mayor; "but we will look over them first. Did he tell you who he was?"

"The passport discloses that," answered Roland; "he desired only a decent funeral."

"Ah!" said the mayor, taking out the passport, "an English traveller; name Roland Sefton; and these letters, and these portraits—they will be enough for identification."

"He said he had no friends or family in England," pursued Roland, "and there is no address among his letters. He told me he came from India."

"Then there need be no delay about the interment," remarked the mayor, "if he had no family in England, and was just come from India. Bah! we could not keep him till any friends came from India. It is enough. We must make an inquiry; but the corpse cannot be kept above ground. The interment may take place as soon as you please, monsieur."

"I suppose you will wish for some trifle as payment?" said the landlord, addressing Roland.

"No," he answered, "I only watched by him through the night; and I am but a passing traveller like himself."

"You will assist at the funeral?" he asked.

"If it can be to-morrow," replied Roland; "if not, I must go on to Lucerne. But I shall come back to Engelberg. If it be necessary for me to stay, and the commune will pay my expenses, I will stay."

"Not necessary at all," said the mayor; "the accident is too simple, and he has no friends. Why should the commune lose by him?"

"There are the fifty pounds," suggested Roland.

"And there are the expenses!" said the mayor. "No, no. It is not necessary for you to stay; not at all. If you are coming back again to Engelberg it will be all right. You say you are coming back?"

"I am sure to come back to Engelberg," he answered, with gloomy emphasis.

For already Roland began to feel that he himself was dead, and a new life, utterly different from the old, was beginning for him. And this new life, beginning here, would often draw him back to its birth-place. There would be an attraction for him here, even in the humble grave where men thought they had buried Roland Sefton. It would be the only link with his former life; and it would draw him to it irresistibly.

"And what is your name and employment, my good fellow?" asked the mayor.

"Jean Merle," he answered. "I am a wood-carver."

The deed he had only thought of an hour ago was accomplished; and there could be no undoing it. This passport and these papers would be forwarded to the embassy at Berne, where doubtless his name was already known as a fugitive criminal. He could not reclaim them, for with them he took up again the burden of his sin. He had condemned himself to a penalty and sacrifice the most complete that man could think of, or put into execution. Roland Sefton was dead; and his wife and children were set free from the degradation he had brought upon them.

He spent the remaining hours of the day in wandering about the forests in the Alpine valley. The autumn fogs and the dense rain-clouds were gathering again. But it was nothing to him that the snowy crests of the surrounding mountains were once more shrouded from view; or that the torrents and waterfalls which he could not see were thundering and roaring along their rocky channels with a vast effluence of waters. He saw and heard no more than the dead man who bore his name. He was insensible to hunger or fatigue. Except for Felicita's presence in the village behind him, he would have felt himself in another world—in a beamless and lifeless abyss, where there was no creature like unto himself, only eternal gloom and solitude.

It was quite dark before he passed again through the village on his way to Felicita's hotel. The common light of lamps, and the every-day life of ordinary men and women busy over their evening meal, astonished him, as if he had come from another state of existence. He lingered awhile, looking on as at some extraordinary spectacle. Then he went on to the hotel, standing a little out of and above the village.

The place, so crowded in the summer, was quiet enough now. A bright light, however, streamed through the window of the salon, which was uncurtained. He stopped and looked in at Felicita, who was sitting alone by the log-fire, with her white forehead resting on her small hand, which partly hid her face. How often had he seen her sitting thus by the fireside at home! But though he stood without in the dark and cold for many minutes she did not stir; neither hand nor foot moved. At last he grew terrified at this utter immobility, and stepping through the hall, he told the landlady that the English lady had business with him. He opened the door; and then Felicita looked up.

Roland advanced a few paces into the gaudy salon, with its mirrors reflecting his and Felicita's figures over and over again, and stood still, at a little distance from her, with his rough cap in his hand. He looked like one of the herdsmen with whom he had been living during the summer. There was no one else in the large room, but the night was peering in through half-a-dozen great uncurtained windows, which might hold many spectators watching them, as he had watched her a minute ago. She scarcely moved, but the deadly pallor of her face, and the dark shining of her tearless eyes fixed upon him, made him tremble as if he had been a woman weaker than herself.

"It is done," he said.

"Yes," she answered, "I have been to see him."

There was an accent in her voice of terror and repugnance, as of one who had witnessed some horrifying sight, and was compelled to bear a reluctant testimony to it. Roland himself felt a shock of antipathy at the thought of his wife seeing this unknown corpse bearing his name. He seemed to see her standing beside the dead, and looking down with those beloved eyes upon the strange face, which would dwell for evermore in her memory as well as his. Why had she subjected herself to this needless pang?

"You wished it?" he said. "You consented to my plan?"

"Yes," she answered in the same monotonous tone of reluctant testimony.

"And it was best so, Felicita," he said tenderly; "we have done the dead man no wrong. Remember he was alone, and had no friends to grieve over his strange absence. If it had been otherwise there would have been a terrible sin in our act. But it has set you free; it saves you and my mother and the children. As long as I lived you would have been in peril; but now there is a clear, safe course laid open for you. You will go home to England, where in a few months it will be forgotten that your husband was suspected of crime. Only old Clifford, and Marlowe, and two or three others will remember it. When you have the means, repay those poor people the money I owe them. And take comfort, Felicita. It would have done them no good if I had been taken and convicted; that would not have restored their money. My name then will be clear of all but suspicion, and you will make it a name for our children to inherit."

"And you?" she breathed with lips that scarcely moved.

"I?" he said. "Why, I shall be dead! A man's life is not simply the breath he draws; it is his country, his honor, his home. You are my life, Felicita; you and my mother and Felix and Hilda; the old home where my forefathers dwelt; my townsmen's esteem and good-will; the work I could do, and hoped to do. Losing those I lost my life. I began to die when I first went wrong. The way seemed right in my own eyes; but the end of it was death. I told old Marlowe his money was as safe as in the Bank of England when I was keeping it in my own hands; but I believed it then. That was the first step; this is the last. Henceforth I am dead."

"But how will you live?" she asked.

"Never fear; Jean Merle will earn his living," he answered. "Let us think of your future, my darling. Nay, let me call you darling once more. My death provides for you, for your marriage-settlement will come into force. You will have to live differently, my Felicita; all the splendor and the luxury I would have surrounded you with must be lost. But there will be enough, and my mother will manage your household well for you. Be kind to my poor mother, and comfort her. And do not let my children grow up with hard thoughts of their father. It will be a painful task to you."

"Yes," she said. "Oh, Roland, we ought not to have done this thing!"

"Yet you chose," he replied.

"Yes; and I should choose it again, though I hate the falsehood," she exclaimed vehemently. "I cannot endure shame. But all our future life will be founded on a lie."

"Let the blame be mine, not yours," he said; "it was my plan, and there is no going back from it now. But tell me about home. How are my children and my mother? They are still at home?"

"No," she answered; "the police watched it day and night till it grew hateful to me. I shall never enter it again. We went away to the sea-side three months ago, and there our mother and the children are still. But when I get back we shall remove to London."

"To London!" he repeated. "Will you never go home to Riversborough?"

"Never again!" she replied. "I could not live there now; it is a hateful spot to me. Your mother grieves bitterly over leaving it; but even she sees that we can never live there again."

"I shall not even know how to think of you all!" he cried. "You will be living in some strange house, which I can never picture to myself. And the old home will be empty."

"Mr. Clifford is living in it," she said.

He threw up his hands with a gesture of grief and vexation. Whenever his thoughts flew to the old home, the only home he had ever known, it would be only to remember that the man he most dreaded, he who was his most implacable enemy, was dwelling in it. And when would he cease to think of his own birthplace and the birthplace of his children, the home where Felicita had lived? It would be impossible to blot the vivid memory of it from his brain.

"I shall never see it again," he said; "but I should have felt less banished from you if I could have thought of you as still at home. We are about to part for ever, Felicita—as fully as if I lay dead down yonder, as men will think I do."

"Yes," she answered with a mournful stillness.

"Even if we wished to hold any intercourse with each other," he continued, gazing wistfully at her, "it would be dangerous to us both. It is best for us both to be dead to one another."

"It is best," she assented; "only if you were ever in great straits, if you could not earn your living, you might contrive to let me know."

"There is no fear of that," he answered bitterly. "Felicita, you never loved me as I love you."

"No," she said, with the same inexpressible sadness, yet calmness, in her voice and face; "how could I? I was a child when you married me; we were both children. There is such a difference between us. I suppose I should never love any one very much—not as you mean. It is not in my nature. I can live alone, Roland. All of you, even the children, seem very far away from me. But I grieve for you in my inmost soul. If I could undo what you have done I would gladly lay down my life. If I could only undo what we did this morning! The shadow of it is growing darker and darker upon me. And yet it seemed so wise; it seems so still. We shall be safe again, all of us, and we have done that dead man no wrong."

"None," he said.

"But when I think of you," she went on, "how you, still living, will long to know what is befalling us, how the children are growing up, and how your mother is, and how I live, yet never be able to satisfy this longing; how you will have to give us up, and never dare to make a sign; how you will drag on your life from year to year, a poor man among poor, ignorant, stupid men; how I may die, and you not know it, or you may die, and I not know it; I wonder how we could have done what we did this morning."

"Oh, hush, hush, Felicita!" he exclaimed. "I have said all this to myself all this day, until I feel that my punishment is harder than I can bear. Tell me, shall we undo it? Shall I go to the mayor and deliver myself up as the man whose name I have given to the dead? It can be done still; it is not too late. You shall decide again."

"No; I cannot accept disgrace," she answered passionately; "it is an evil thing to do; but it must be done. We must take the consequences. You and I are dead to one another for evermore; but your death is more terrible than mine. I shall grieve over you more than if you were really dead. Why does not God send death to those that desire it? Good-by now forever, Roland. I return to England to act this lie, and you must never, never seek me out as your wife. Promise me that. I would repudiate you if I lay on my death-bed."

"I will never seek you out, and bring you to shame," he said; "I promise it faithfully, by my love for you. As I hope ever to obtain pardon, I promise it."

"Then leave me," she cried; "I can bear this no longer. Good-bye, Roland."

(To be continued.)

THE BEGINNING OF THE GOSPEL.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 1. Mark 1 : 1–12. Golden Text, Luke 2 : 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN giving to the world the glad and glorious tidings of the Redeemer and of His redemption, the Spirit of God has worked through different instruments, giving different views, both of the person and of the work of Jesus. Thus Matthew grasps the kingly side of the Messiah, commencing his Gospel with the genealogy of Him who is the Son of David, the king, and of Abraham, the head, of the Israelitish race.

Mark, who was himself a servant, sets forth specially that side of our Lord's life in which He was the servant and the sacrifice; details which belong to the life of servants are more dwelt on in this Gospel than in the other three. Luke represents Christ as the Man, relating in full the details of His birth; tracing His genealogy from Adam, the first man, he gives the human side of our Lord; while John, beginning in the past eternity of God, takes the range of one who stands on the mountain top, and he sets forth the Godhead of his Lord as no other evangelist does.

Mark, who enters upon no genealogy, and who tells us nothing of the birth of our Lord, goes straight to the time of His ministry, and that of His forerunner, John the Baptist. He breaks suddenly into his subject with the words "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; as it is written in the prophets, Behold, I send My messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee. The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His path straight," thus connecting together the prophecies of Malachi 3 : 1, and Isaiah 40 : 3, and showing that both were fulfilled in the coming of John the Baptist.

How strange it seems to us that, with prophecies so clear as these, the majority of the people, and very specially the scribes, who had all the writings of the prophets at their fingers' ends, should yet have failed to acknowledge Christ as the Messiah and John as His forerunner! They knew that Christ must be born in Bethlehem, for they could enlighten Herod, the king, on this point, and yet when He was born and others were on their way to do homage to Him, and when even the time prophesied by Daniel was expired (Dan. 9 : 25), they were as though they understood not. But how much more incomprehensible is it that, in the present day, when the signs of our Lord's second coming are multiplying all around us, the masses of mankind should be living carelessly on, like the men before the flood.

This evangelist does not touch upon the preparation of John the Baptist for his ministry, but goes straight to the point, "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." "Repentance for (or Gr. unto) the remission of sins," according to Mark. This was the beginning of the Gospel. And so it is always where the Gospel is a reality. Sin must be brought to light, renounced and confessed, if real pardon and cleansing are to be obtained. A man who comes to the Lord for pardon and deliverance must first have made up his mind to have done with sin. A clergyman was visiting a man who seemed to be in great distress about his soul; he unfolded to him the full and immediate salvation which is in Christ, and the man understood it all, but said, "I can't believe." "Perhaps you keep your little shop open on Sunday?" "O I can't help that, I am a poor man, and cannot afford to lose Sunday gains." "And are you doing right?" "No, I know I am doing wrong." "Will you then sell your soul for the sake of Sunday gains?" "I will make no promise for two days." This was on a Saturday; the following Monday morning the clergyman came again, the shop which had been open on Sunday was closed on Monday; the Sabbath-breaker was gone to answer for his woeful folly in losing his soul for the gains of one Sunday. He did not turn from his sin, he would not repent, and without repentance there is no salvation.

John the Baptist did not mince matters, extenuating circumstances were not to be considered; excuses were not to be listened to; God was the aggrieved party, and God was to be considered, and away in the desert he preached on from his one uncompromising text, "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." He had no need to use all kinds of inducements to persuade men to come and listen to him. "There went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins." It takes a good deal to make a man confess his sins; he will never do it until necessity compels him; but there was something in the preaching of the Baptist which made men feel as though they were turned inside out, as though their very faces were tell-tales, and as though every passer-by knew the iniquity which was going on within. There was a pressure from above, the Spirit of God was at work, the veil of self-deception fell from their eyes, and they no longer strove to keep up appearances, they came to reality. God was real to them in those days, sin was real, Heaven and hell were real, and they felt it was worth the humiliation which it would cost them to confess their sins, if only, only they might be rid of them for ever. O how much must have come to light that had long lain hidden; how many restitutions and reconciliations must have taken place!

The preacher was a real man, he lived for nothing but for the message which had been committed to him; food and clothing were no object to him, the camel's hair which he found in the desert was his clothing, the locusts and wild honey were his food; he did not think his a hard lot, his one thought was the coming Messiah, and he said after he had seen Him: "He that hath the bride is the Bridegroom: but the friend of the Bridegroom, which standeth and heareth Him, rejoiceth greatly because of the Bridegroom's voice; this my joy, therefore, is fulfilled" (John 3 : 29). He gloried to know that Christ must increase and that he must decrease. This is the true spirit of a worker for the Master, and by such the Lord's second coming is prepared and hastened.

"And it came to pass in those days," when the awakening was at its height, when consciences were quickened and a current of higher morality was running counter to the degenerate condition of things among the people, "it came to pass in those days that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan. And straightway coming up out of the water, He saw the heavens opened, and the Spirit like a dove, descending upon Him: and there came a voice from Heaven, saying, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Multitudes may have been around, but only John saw the heavens open; the messenger of God and God's Messiah were made known to one another by the voice from Heaven. John understood the sign, for it had been told him before. "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost" (John 1 : 33).

John's theme was now altered, he no longer pointed sinners to a coming Christ, no longer spoke of the Kingdom of Heaven as being at hand; he said: "There standeth One among you whom ye know not." What, was He there, who should thoroughly purge His floor and gather His wheat into the garner, but should burn the chaff with unquenchable fire (Matt. 3 : 12)? What, there, and close to them? Yes, but a new revelation of Him was made to John, and he cried, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John 1 : 29). Praise God, the message increased but the messenger decreased. No sooner had John baptized Jesus than He was withdrawn from him. "Immediately the Spirit driveth Him into the wilderness. And He was there in the wilderness forty day tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts."

Little would John the Baptist understand how the Conqueror, the King, should thus need to go into the hottest of the fight against sin and Satan, and little do we understand that, in order to gain victory for every child of man, He must needs place Himself on man's ground and be tempted in all points like as we must needs be tempted (Heb. 4 : 15; 2 : 18). While there was nothing in Him which responded to the temptation, for "the prince of this world," He said, "hath nothing in Me" (John 14 : 30), yet the suffering was perhaps all the keener; His sensibilities were divine, and awful was the loathing against the suggestions of the wicked one, continued for forty days, i.e., nearly six weeks, during which time, human though He was, "He did eat nothing."

All this is a part of "the beginning of the Gospel." The messenger and the message of repentance, the awakening, the spirit of confession, the baptism of Jesus, and His sore temptation—all were preparatory to the great and mighty works of grace which should follow. O that "the beginning of the Gospel" in our own hearts and lives may be thus thorough, that the work of true repentance, of separation from sin, may be fully effected, "bringing forth fruits meet for repentance," that Christ may meet the enemy hand to hand in our hearts and lives and conquer, then He will be able to establish His kingdom and work out His will in us.

The Seizure of the Land League Organ United Ireland, was made by the British Government on December 15th. The League appears to have expected the seizure, for it was issued a day earlier than usual, and the bulk of the edition was distributed when the Government officers arrived. It contained a cartoon holding Mr. Forster up to ridicule. The officers seized copies of the United Ireland in the news shops, about 4000 in the office of the paper, and arrested Mr. Burton, a clerk, and Mr. O'Keefe, a sub-editor, and seized and removed all the books found in the office. This step was taken by direction of the Attorney-General, who is of the opinion that the paper was a "no-rent" manifesto of the worst kind, seditious, and a direct incitement to murder. It is understood that the United Ireland is to be printed in London, and thence posted to subscribers.

The State of Ireland was Publicly Discussed by the Marquis of Hartington on December 17th, who said in a speech to his constituents that the Government is determined to bring the Irish difficulty to a successful conclusion. During the last few days, he said, there had been some hopeful signs. The Government was not and could not be an organization for collecting rents and enforcing the rights of property. The association for that purpose formed in Ireland was a legitimate association and might be beneficial. He said that the power of the Land League was now broken, and that it was impossible for the present guerilla warfare to succeed. Mr. Herbert Gladstone, a son of the Premier and a member of the Government, in a speech on the same day said that there was very great exaggeration in England in regard to the condition of Ireland. The alarmists, he said, took their standard from the worst county. The arrests had produced a striking and remarkable impression in the districts where they were made. He did not think more coercion was needed, and the talk of martial law was absurd. Alteration of the jury system would now be worse than useless. The "no rent" movement was not deep-rooted, and was only kept up by intimidation.

Mr. Parnell's Popularity in Ireland Appears to have been increased by his imprisonment. A cable despatch of December 15th states that "several hundred tenant farmers have ploughed Mr. Parnell's farm, Avondale, in Wicklow county, and performed all the necessary work thereon. On separating after completing their work they cheered Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, Father Sheehy and others. An effigy, supposed to have been of Mr. Gladstone, and labelled 'The Last Landlord,' was paraded over the grounds. Messrs. Corbett and Redmond, members of Parliament, subsequently delivered addresses. There were 3000 persons present. One hundred and eighty-three ploughs and 500 carts were engaged in the operations."

Mr. Francis Murphy's Gospel Temperance campaign in Europe is reported as singularly successful. At latest reports he was speaking among the operatives of Sunderland in the North of England. There the large Victoria Hall was being crowded nightly, and more than 1000 new pledges were taken by the end of one week. Mr. Edward Murphy writes: "I have just closed the most successful week's campaign I have ever had, at Haslingden, near Manchester. Out of a population of 12,000, more than 5000 put on the ribbon, and 4500 signed the pledge, including two local magistrates."

The Funeral of the Victims of the Fire in the Vienna theatre, to the number of 126, took place on December 11th. The following day 151 more were interred. The charred remains of the remainder, supposed to be about seven hundred, which are utterly unrecognizable, were enclosed in large metal coffins as they were found, and placed in a vast excavation 108 feet long by 14 feet wide. There were Protestants, Catholics, and Jews among the number, but it was found impossible to separate them, and clergymen of all the faiths took part in the last sad rites. An eye witness of the scene writes: "Large crowds of mourners stood or knelt around the grave weeping bitterly. Among the poor old creatures some were ready for the grave themselves. There were also strong workingmen who cried like children, young girls who have lost brothers and lovers, and children who could hardly understand the grief and sorrow around them. Painful interest was caused by the eighth coffin, numbered 165. It was very small, apparently containing the body of a child, but in it were the remains of a once beautiful woman, the wife of the engineer. Her body was burned to a cinder and she was only identified by the jewels she wore when she dressed for the theatre. One large coffin contained the bodies of two brothers who had been allowed by their parents to celebrate their birthday by visiting the theatre. They were found in the third gallery, tightly clasping each other's necks."

The Origin of the Fatal Fire is still Uncertain. A letter sent to the newspapers by a gentleman who was formerly connected with the Ring Theatre, states his conviction that the fire originated below the stage floor, and had there gathered strength before it appeared among the scenery. This assertion gains in credibility from an incident described by a person who was present at a morning rehearsal in the theatre a few days before the fire occurred. During the rehearsal smoke was noticed on the stage issuing from below. On sending to ascertain the cause, it was found that a workman intrusted with the removal of rubbish had swept it into a corner of the place below, and, to save himself the trouble, was burning it up. The city is in mourning, and a proposal is discussed that the ruins of the theatre should be removed, and on its site a monument erected to the thousand victims who perished there. This proposition meets approval in spite of the value of the ground on which the building stood, for there is a superstition among the people of Vienna that the very site is accursed.

A Stormy Debate Continuing past Midnight occurred in the German Reichstag on Thursday. It was upon the subject of official influence in the recent elections. Herr von Puttkammer, Vice-President of the Council, stated that the conduct of the Prussian officials merited the thanks not only of the Government, but also of the Emperor. Herr von Bennigsen declared that the late elections surpassed all others for the rancor displayed. The Government, he said, and the press which they inspired must be held to have incurred greater responsibility for these proceedings than individuals. He protested against Herr von Puttkammer attempting to drag the person of the Sovereign into the electoral contest. Herr von Puttkammer replied that he could retract nothing, as the Government had been accused of following an interested policy of the lowest and meanest description.

A Fresh Revelation in Connection with the assassination of the late Czar of Russia on March 13th, was made last week at a criminal trial. It will be remembered that the statement was made in the reports of the assassination that when the second bomb burst under the Emperor's feet and he fell, bleeding profusely, a man of the people rushed up, looked him in the face, caught the dying sovereign in his right arm and held him until other help came. This "man of the people" was not more definitely described at the time, but it was divulged in the course of the trial of certain police officers for negligence on the occasion, that he was a Nihilist placed at the spot by the conspirators to kill the emperor in the event of the three other assassins posted there failing to complete the attempt. While he supported the dying emperor he had under his arm a bomb similar to those the assassins had used and which he would have thrown had he not seen that the emperor was already fatally wounded.

The Threatening Letters and Warnings Received by the young Czar of Russia have been since his accession to the throne very numerous. He has found them in his handkerchiefs, under his pillow, in the pockets of his clothing, and in other places, indicating that the Nihilists had agents near his person. For several weeks a close watch has been set on the rooms occupied by the imperial family, and last week a woman who had been in the service of the empress for the last eight years was caught in the act of placing a letter in his prayer book. This letter reminded the emperor that he had only a few weeks of life before him. The woman wept and declared that she had done this out of gratitude and with the conviction that she was averting a catastrophe to the sovereign whom she loved so well. But nevertheless she refused to give the name of the man who supplied her with the letters and proclamations. It would appear from this that the atmosphere of alarm and suspicion in which the emperor and his family continually live, is still charged with plots and danger.

The Reception into the English Church, of the Turkish ulema Ahmed Tewfik, whose arrest and imprisonment in September, 1879, caused a diplomatic controversy, was celebrated last week. He was arrested for assisting in the preparation of Dr. Koelb's translation of the English prayer-book and other religious books into the Turkish language and was condemned to death but afterward had his sentence commuted to banishment. He finally escaped to England and has now been baptized at St. Paul's cathedral. He intends devoting his life to the translation of Christian writings into the Turkish language.
